
7453. Does the corporation of London discharge that duty efficiently?—I believe they have considered hitherto that no case has arisen in which they have been called on to exercise it.

7454. Do they inspect or examine, or in any way exercise a control over the proceedings of the Irish society?—To this extent; that the Irish society do, in effect, submit to the corporation of London a paper shewing the receipts and expenditure of the society; that is presented annually to the Court of Common Counil.

7355. Do you consider that these estates are economically administered?—I think they are.

7456. You think there has been no disposition to multiply needless offices in the management of the estates?—Certainly not.

7457. Nor to give excessive salaries?—I think not.

7458. Do you know whether the corporation watch those points at all?—I think they do. I think that their members. being constantly moving through the society, all come to have a general knowledge of the trust and the estates; and, consequently, when a man has once been upon the Irish society he always retains some feelings of interest connected with it. I, for one, always look with great interest upon it.

7459. In whom are the appointments connected with the management of this property vested?—In the common council.

7460. The common council at large?—Yes; they annually appoint the governor; they also appoint the members; the members recommend the deputy governor, and the Court of Common Council appoints.

7461. Who appoints to the places connected with the management of the property in Ireland?—The Irish society.

7462. It is stated in the report, that the corporation itself has a small share, on account of their having taken up the share belonging to the Coopers' company, who did not pay their instalment?—I know there is a small share which has been subdivided among the companies and the corporation of London.

7463. I suppose the total amount of the separate estates of the companies would be greater than the estates of the Irish society?—No doubt of it.

7464. Considerably greater?—I think so. I have no precise knowledge on the subject, but I have no doubt of it.

7465. The companies manage their separate estates in the north of Ireland just as they manage any other portion of their property?—Yes; and in the same way as the Irish society manage the indivisible portion. They have a resident agent and officers.

7466. Is the Irish society entirely composed of members of the corporation?—Yes.

7467. Is that by charter?—I believe it is in accordance with the charter.

7468. A person who is not a member of the corporation is ineligible?—I believe, up to a certain period, it was considered necessary that members of the corporation entering the Irish society should be members of one of the twelve principal companies; but in the progress of time, as I stated before, the connexion between the companies and the corporation became less immediate, and there was some difficulty found in framing the Irish society in accordance with that regulation,—and then it was found that the Irish society might be constituted from members of the corporation, irrespective of their being connected with any of the companies.

7469. One witness expressed a wish that persons who are members of the companies and not members of the corporation, should be eligible for election to the Irish society. Is that a point which has ever come under your consideration?—No. I have never heard such an opinion mooted.

7470. Is there any opinion that the companies are not adequately represented in the Irish society?—Not that I am aware of; they have each their own portion, which they received in consequence of the amounts they contributed. I remember the litigation between the Skinners' company and the Irish society in regard to what is termed the indivisible portion, and that litigation went on to a considerable extent.

7471. If there were any available surplus, would not it be divided among the companies?—I think not. It would be employed, I think, in the improvement of the property.

7472. Supposing the Irish society were to say "We will put an end to all the charities, "and will not make this expenditure for the benefit of the property which now goes on, "but we will seek to create a fund to that amount,"—that fund would be the property of the twelve companies?—I am not able to speak to that.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

7473. I understand you to say that the Irish society have the management of the indivisible portion of the property of the companies, which can only be managed as a whole?—Yes.

7474. Then it would seem to follow that the produce of that indivisible portion, as soon as it was realised, would be divisible among the twelve companies?—That would entirely depend upon the arrangement that was entered into by the companies with the corporation at the time the division was carried out.

7475. Do you consider that the corporation has any interest in the rents received by the Irish society?—Not at all.

7476. They have never, under any circumstances, considered themselves entitled to any surplus which might accrue?—Not in any instance.

7477. Have they ever interfered in the detailed management of the property?—Not in the slightest degree. As I have mentioned, it was considered very desirable that, by their interference, the duration of the members serving on the Irish society should be increased. It was felt that if the period of four years were allotted to each, the constitution of the society might be made more efficient. Directly a member acquires some knowledge of the property he has to manage, he goes off and makes way for a new member. On that occasion the question was mooted in the common council, what power the common council had over the Irish society. The question was referred to the law officers of the corporation, who decided that the corporation had no power over the Irish society to alter their arrangements, but they must act under the charter, except they could be impeached in some way of a breach of trust, and then the corporation would have a visitorial power over them. They are completely distinct, and the corporation have no connection with the Irish society, except in that limited sense.

7478. The present state of things is, that certain estates in the north of Ireland belong to the Irish society; the Irish society are elected by the corporation; the persons elected manage those estates; and, under the present mode of management, there is no surplus income, but the whole of it is expended for the benefit of the property?—That is so.

7479. How are the accounts of the Irish society audited?—In the constitution of the Irish society there is a sub-committee; the sub-committee audits the accounts, and looks to that particular department of the society. It is always considered that the deputy-governor for the year takes under his special control the financial statement. I know they are very careful in auditing the accounts. I have done it myself for a year, and I know the care and precision with which it is done. The statement of accounts so audited is printed, and sent annually to the members of the corporation of London, to the twelve companies of London, to peers and members of parliament connected with the government and with Ireland, and is also inserted in the newspapers published in the county of Derry.

Henry Blake, Esq.

HENRY BLAKE, ESQUIRE, having been sworn, was examined as follows

7480. How long have you been connected with the corporation of the City of London?—Upwards of eight years.

7481. You are a common councilman, I presume?—I am.

7482. I believe you are chairman of the Freedoms' committee?—Yes.

7483. How long have you filled that situation?—Not more than twelve months. Perhaps you will allow me to state the circumstances under which I became a member of the Freedoms' committee. In 1851, I made a motion in the Court of Common Council, to refer it to the Freedoms' committee to consider what amendment, if any, could be made in an Act of Parliament for the reform of the corporation which had passed in 1849, the efficacy of which had been considerably impaired by the alterations which had been made in it in its progress through the House of Lords, thereby disappointing very materially the expectations which had been formed by the framers of it. I was successful in passing that resolution, that it should be so referred to a committee; and the bill of 1852 grew out of that reference. In consequence of my having so succeeded, the zeal that I manifested upon that occasion induced the Court of Common Council at once to place me upon the Freedoms' committee, though I am not a member representing the ward in which I reside. I was placed upon it as an extra member. I mention that fact in order to answer certain portions of the evidence which have been given before the Commission, to the effect that if any member of the court manifests any unusual zeal upon a question, or appears to take a more than usual interest in any particular topic, he is thereby debarred from the opportunity of exhibiting that zeal in committees, or bringing his ability to bear upon that particular question. When placed upon the committee, my sentiments were pretty well known with regard to the inexpediency of pressing upon non-freemen the obligation to take up their freedom; and yet, notwithstanding, such were the liberal sentiments generally entertained by the members who constitute that committee, that they unanimously placed me in the chair. My principal object in attending here, which I have done at the request of the town clerk at a very brief notice, is to contradict the impression conveyed in the evidence that an undue severity has been exercised on the part of the committee in enforcing upon non-freemen the taking up of their freedom within the City of London. That allegation is emphatically contradicted in the statement which was read by the recorder before this Commission; but as this was only put forward by the authority of the officers, I felt it my duty, as representing the Freedoms' committee, to come here and tender my evidence in support of that contradictory statement. I can most truly say, that but one motive influenced the members in the performance of their duty, which was to carry out the order in as merciful a spirit as it was possible for them to do. Their duties were very much narrowed; inasmuch as a very large number of persons claimed to be excused from the operation of the law, either on the ground of privilege or as being wholesale dealers; and also a large number of persons applied ad misericordiam, pleading that they were not in a condition to take up their freedom. In the one instance, we were obliged to acquiesce in the reason urged; and in the other, we readily abandoned our efforts to enforce it. I wish to allude to the evidence given by Mr. Acland, in questions 80 and 90. He gives a table, which is a very correct one, no doubt, of fines for admission to freedom, showing that to 1834, when the fines were about 30*l.*, there were 1,000 persons annually admitted. After that time, when the reduction was made to a much lower rate, the admissions gradually decreased, averaging for thirteen years 877, and afterwards a still lower amount. It must be quite in the knowledge of the Commissioners that the Reform Act of 1834, which gave the parliamentary franchise to householders of the City of London, to a great extent removed a very large temptation from persons to take up their freedom, unless they were coerced into so doing. Of course, as there were a large number of persons, and there are a large number of persons indisposed at all times to serve the seriously responsible office of sheriff, and also a large number who desire to avoid the responsibilities and duties of members of the corporation altogether, that operated as a strong reason why they should not take up their freedom, unless coerced into so doing. Therefore, the decline in the number may be readily accounted for, without supposing it to arise from the causes which Mr. Acland imputes to the public generally; namely, a reluctance to associate with the class of persons who constituted the corporation at that time. In answer to another question, Mr. Acland alludes to disputes, which he says existed between the aldermen and common council, in respect to the enforcement of freedom, and which he states were put an end to by the bill of 1852. So far from there being any dispute, the contrariety of instructions which he supposes to have existed between the two courts, did not exist. The orders given originally by the Court of Aldermen had been given in consequence of the occasionally altered policy of the Court of Common Council. After the rejection of the bill of 1852 by the House of Commons, it was resolved to enforce the law against non-freemen trading within the City. The letter to which allusion is made in Mr. Acland's evidence, was written to the Freedoms' committee. The Freedoms' committee addressed a report to the Court of Common Council, asking for further instructions upon the subject. Those instructions were a reference of their report back to them, with an order to carry into execution the instructions they had received on the 10th of June preceding, which was to compel non-freemen to take up their freedom. From that moment there was no conflict, nor anything in issue between the two courts whatever. The chamberlain obeyed the order, and the result, I believe, you are perfectly well acquainted with. I should say, moreover, that I think that the feeling with which the Court of Common Council acted upon that occasion has been very much misrepresented, and very much misunderstood. There being a section of that court which may have entertained the opinion that there was no necessity for any reform, they allied themselves with a large portion of the members who desired to have a very extensive reform, and by that means they succeeded in their particular object of defeating, in fact, any reform. In respect to the answer to question 388, given by Mr. Acland, I may say that considerable pain has been felt by many members of the corporation at the tone in which the evidence has been given by that gentleman, and others who have followed him. They, being conscious of their own sincerity in the performance of their respective duties, have been pained to find, not that they have been misunderstood, but, I must almost say, wilfully misrepresented. The answer here is, as to members of corporations, under the Municipal Corporation Act—or rather the aldermen. Mr. Acland is asked, "Are they re-eligible?" He says, "They "are. I do not think in the case of the City of London, that would meet what are the "views of the most thinking men in the City; namely, that the corporation should be of "such a character as that the higher classes of the commercial population of London "should be induced to join it." In answer to that, I will refer you to a paragraph in the report of the Commissioners of 1836. That report appears to me to have taken the clearest and most correct view of the feelings of the merchants, and of the higher classes of our City in the present day, which I have been able to meet with; and, if you will allow me, I will read it. They say, "The aldermen chosen are often those who have "acquired the good opinion of the electors as common councilmen. But they do "not appear to be in general taken from the higher classes of the merchants or bankers of "the City. There is a disinclination to serve in civic offices, which appears to be a very "prevalent feeling in these classes, and which has latterly much increased. Various causes "of this feeling were suggested to us. The office renders the holder liable to serve in the "expensive offices of Lord Mayor and sheriff; but this is not sufficient to account for the "circumstance, for the reluctance seems to be felt most strongly by the highest class; and "the expenses have of late years diminished, while the reluctance has increased. Another "cause suggested was the unpopularity of the Court of Aldermen, which is supposed to be "traceable to the secrecy of a part of their proceedings. There is, however, no more

Henry Blake, Esq.

" secrecy observed now than in former times. But, on the other hand, it is said that the " public dislike to secrecy has much increased of late, and that therefore the court, " though itself not changed, stands in a new relation to the public. But, as far as we " can perceive, the reluctance is seldom found to exist among those who have already " engaged in other municipal functions. The highest class of common councilmen, for " instance, seldom show an unwillingness to become aldermen, though they would be " particularly alive to the feelings pointed out. Another cause has occurred to us, which " we think may have had some effect, and which can scarcely be traced to any peculiarity " in the civic institutions. For a long time, from a point perhaps earlier than the " revolution, the importance of the monied interest, with relation to what are considered the " highest classes in the country, has been increasing. The distinction between the richest " class of merchants and bankers, on the one hand, and the aristocracy and highest " commonalty of the country, on the other, has continually become less definite. As the " upper stations in society have become more accessible to the highest class of traders, " these latter appear to have become anxious to establish a distinction between themselves " and the lower mercantile or trading classes. Many symptoms of this growing feeling " might be pointed out. One very striking change which has taken place, as late as the " last generation, is in the choice of residences, either in town or country, made by " wealthy merchants. Thus the civic honours may have been looked upon as badges " implying that the person bearing them belonged rather to the class from which he was " endeavouring to escape, than to that into which he was seeking entrance." That so entirely embodies my view of what the feeling is which influences the higher classes of merchants in avoiding corporation offices, that I could not have put it in more appropriate language.

7484. Still it is the case, is not it, that in London the highest class of merchants avoid corporation offices more than they do at Liverpool, for instance?—I have not a doubt of it. I believe the labours of an alderman or common councilman in London are infinitely more onerous than in Liverpool.

7485. That disposition to disconnect themselves with trade, which the extract which you have just read would ascribe to the merchants at the top of their profession does not seem to operate in Liverpool in the same way that it does in London?—In London, I apprehend, there are far greater inducements to men to keep aloof from the corporation than in the instance which has been mentioned. Parliament is open to men in such a position; and the higher walks of science and art offer temptations which there are not in provincial towns.

7486. Is there any other point to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—The evidence of Mr. Travers has been already animadverted on by a previous witness. I feel myself that it was a most unfair thing on the part of any gentleman situated as Mr. Travers is, to have spoken in the way he did of the corporation, when he practically, and at once confessed, in his answer to an early question,—" Have you " directed your attention much to the municipal concerns of the City of London,"—that he had not.

7487. Have you been a member of the Irish society?—I have.

7489. Is there anything which you wish to add to what he stated?—I differ from him to this extent. I think, after all, the obligations of the trust are performed by the Irish society, if there were any residue, the companies who originally contributed would be entitled to it. As the trust was originally constituted, it was for the purpose of a settlement of the North of Ireland by Protestants. So long as any funds could be fairly and legitimately applied to that purpose, the companies would have no claim upon any amount which might be in the hands of the Irish society; but, if there were a residue, I apprehend they would have a claim.

7490. You think it would be the companies, and not the corporation, who would have a claim upon the funds at the disposal of the Irish society?—I cannot conceive that the corporation can have any claim. The corporation originally negociated for the loan of the money; and they raised it through the companies. They were merely the medium by which the money was conveyed. The lots were drawn in the City of London by the several companies, and they received their share according to the lot they drew.

7492. Have any representations ever been made from time to time from parties in Ireland interested in the good management of this trust?—As respects their own personal and private interests, constantly.

7493. Not of a public nature?—Not of a public nature. I believe the only communications have been appeals for contributions towards public institutions, and so forth. Recently, a large sum of money was spent for the purpose of erecting a college. An application was made to the Irish society to contribute to so desirable an object, and a large portion of land was given for that purpose.

7494. In your view of the case, you think if there were surplus income, the companies would have a fair claim to it; but, supposing there to be no surplus income, and supposing it not to be available for the companies, have the corporation of London any interest in their connection with the management of the property?—I believe, excepting the small share which has been mentioned, the corporation have not the slightest interest in it.

7495. Under present circumstances, do you understand that the corporation stand in the situation of performing a public duty gratuitously, deriving no advantage whatever from it?—That is my sincere belief.

W. S. Hale, Esq.

WARREN STORMES HALE, Esq. having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7496. How long have you been connected with the corporation of London?—Twenty-eight years.

7497. Are you a trader?—I am a wholesale manufacturer of stearine and composite candles, and an importer of Indian produce.

7498. Do you reside in the City?—My place of business is in the City. I reside at Hampstead.

7499. Have you taken an active part in the business of the corporation?—During the whole period I have taken a very active part.

7500. Are you on any important committee at present?—I am on two committees, by virtue of being deputy of the ward; and on two by an act of the common council,—those are the City of London school and the Orphan school.

7501, Do not you find some inconvenience in being on so many committees at the same time?—It requires a consumption of time, which I have given to it.

7503. Do you think it desirable that gentlemen should be called on to act at the same time upon so many committees?—It is so arranged by the corporation, that there are seldom two committees sitting at the same period. The principal committees have certain days of meeting, and in that arrangement they do not allow one committee to interfere with the sitting of another.

7504. Do you mean that you are able to give your constant attendance to those four committees?—I do not attend constantly to each of them. I give a very frequent attendance. The meetings of the school committees I have invariably attended.

7506. Are you chairman of either of those committees?—I have been chairman of the City of London School committee from its appointment in 1834 to the present time. I was unanimously re-elected yesterday. I have been chairman of the Orphan School committee from its appointment, which was two years back.

7507. Are there any statements which you wish to make to the Commission?—The corporation have been left as trustees for various bequests. I am here to state that they have discharged their duty with fidelity and judgment. The first matter I wish to refer to is the interest they have taken on the subject of education. In the year 1828, a member of the corporation of the name of Peacock, took a strong interest in converting a useless institution to that which promised to be practically useful, it was called the London Workhouse. That was an institution established in the reign of Charles II., for the reception and employment of destitute persons frequenting the City. That continued up to the year 1829. An Act was then obtained for the abolition of it, in consequence of its being rendered useless through the alteration of the poor laws, and there was an expense attending it. They had power to tax the inhabitants of the City; but at the same time the institution was useless. The poor law had made a great alteration in the provisions for the poor, and the effect was this, that though there was a treasurer, a matron, and some servants, there was probably not an inmate for months together. Parties had left lands and tenements towards the support of it. Those rents were received, and a rate was also made upon the inhabitants. The gentleman I have named paid great attention to the subject; and he endeavoured to obtain the proceeds of the lands for the purpose of their being appropriated to the establishment of a corporation school. The provisions of that Act were intended to be of a liberal character, for it was to be open to all classes without religious distinction; but in the House of Lords a clause was inserted that the principles of the school should be according to the articles and doctrines of the Church of England. The Lord Mayor, the aldermen, and sixty members of the Court of Common Council, were to be governors or managers of it; at the same time, any person paying 20*l.* became a life governor. The corporation subscribed 2,000*l.* towards it; but, from its being made of so restrictive a character, and the corporation not standing well in the estimation of the public, there were but few persons who subscribed their 20*l.* The consequence was, that though various attempts were made to sustain it, it remained useless. In 1825 the corporation of London appeared before the Commissioners, under Lord Brougham's Act, appointed to inquire into the various charities of England. The sum of 19*l.* 10*s.* had been left by a gentleman of the name of Carpenter, who had been town clerk in the reign of Henry VI., for the purpose of boarding, clothing, and educating four boys; 4*l.* for each boy, and 3*l.* 10*s.* to the corporation for the management of the fund. Great research has been made for the will, but it has never been found. The will for the personal property has been found by my friend

W. S. Hale, Esq.

Mr. Brewer, but not the will devising the freehold property. I think there were three or four houses in the City of London and five acres of ground in the neighbourhood of Tottenham Court Road. It comprises part of the eastern side of the Tottenham Court Road, with Alfred Place, the Crescent, and so on, which has been let upon building-leases, at a rental of about 900*l.* a-year. The corporation thought there was not a sufficient sum of money expended, and a scheme was adopted to send four boys to Tonbridge school, at a cost of 80*l.* a-year each for boarding and education, and 20*l.* a-year for clothing, so that there was something like 400*l.* a-year expended. The Lord Mayor had the nomination of those boys as vacancies occurred. I happened to be upon the City Lands committee in 1832; the bills came before me. I noticed the expense, and it occurred to me that a much more useful mode of spending the money could be proposed; and at the same time I thought the corporation ought to spend the whole of the proceeds of the property. I made a suggestion to the corporation, which they adopted, and a Bill was brought into Parliament, first to establish a school and to perpetuate it for ever, and next to do away with that which had been a market, which was useless, but which I suggested for the site of the school, called Honey Lane Market. The site I should say at present is worth 1,000*l.* a-year, but it was not useful to the public at that time. The Bill was to provide that the school was to be open to all denominations; the authorized version of the Scriptures was to be taught in the school, and prayers were to be read morning and evening. There was another provision with respect to the mode of electing the masters. We have been charged with improperly providing for our sons, and so on, which I deny. To prevent the possibility of such a thing as that, it was suggested that for the election of the first and second masters, there should be three professors of King's College and three professors of the London University, who should meet together and select three of the best qualified candidates for the office of first master, and three of the best qualified candidates for the office of second master, the common council selecting one out of each three. There is a guarantee to the public by that means that we shall not be able improperly to elect those who are related to us; but that we shall have well qualified persons to discharge those important duties. That Bill was opposed in the House of Lords. The corporation proposed that they shall expend the whole sum of 900*l.* a-year, and found some scholarships in memory of John Carpenter; and at the same time that they should take the produce of the lands which had belonged to the London Workhouse, amounting to about 300*l.* a-year, which had been lying useless, and that it should become part of the endowment as well. In the House of Lords the opposition was mainly against the appropriation of 300*l.* a-year. The Bishop of London, after various interviews, stated that he would not oppose the Bill; but in committee the late Lord Shaftesbury very strongly opposed it. I had an interview with Lord Brougham, who was then Lord Chancellor, and he very considerately and kindly lent his assistance. The Bill passed appropriating the 900*l.* a-year, but not the 300*l.*, and the school has been established. Of the success of that school you heard the other day from our much respected master, Dr. Mortimer, a gentleman who has not his superior in the kingdom, either for judgment, respectability, or the power of communicating information to his pupils, nor in the talent which he possesses of enlisting the best feelings of the masters to engage actively in the service of the institution. The building for the school was erected at an expense to the corporation of 20,000*l.*, independently of the ground. It has now been in use for some years. In 1834 the Bill passed, and the school was opened in 1837. From that period to the present we have had but one course of success. At first we were not quite so well off for masters as we are at the present time. All the officers of the corporation are subject to annual election. Gentlemen of standing at the Universities thought, probably, they might be dismissed at the expiration of twelve months, and they hesitated to offer themselves; but I can state now, that whenever there may happen to be a vacancy, there will be gentlemen of the first attainments offering themselves as masters. Yesterday we proceeded to elect a second classical master at 250*l.* a-year, and we elected a first-class man in classics, and second in mathematics of the University of Oxford. I think the public feel much indebted to the corporation for the establishment of that school; it is a great accommodation to that class of persons who object to boarding schools, and it affords a great accommodation to those who have not the means of sending members of their families to boarding schools. In consequence of omitting the 300*l.* a-year, it had been lying useless from that period till 1848. The corporation were desirous that persons should become freemen. Compulsory measures were adopted; and it occurred to me that if the public were aware that the money was applied to a useful purpose, they might be induced to take out their freedom instead of being compelled. It occurred to me that if we could take that 300*l.* a-year, with the fines for the sheriffs and the fines for the parties taking up their freedoms, which I calculated would be about 1,000*l.* a-year, the corporation might be induced to provide a school for the orphan children of freemen. It was suggested to them. I gave notice of the motion. It was discussed and agreed to, and I was requested to furnish them with an estimate of the probable expenditure upon such an institution. My calculation was that there should be provision for 100 children, and I asked them for the sum of 2,500*l.* a-year. I thought that the funds suggested would amount to about 1,000*l.* a-year, and I asked the corporation to supply the rest out of their own funds. They agreed to it. It was necessary to have a Bill to repeal the Act of 1829. The corporation applied to Parliament for a Bill. I then waited upon the Bishop of London again. He most kindly and considerately looked into the case, and said he should not oppose the Bill. It met with a different reception from the former one. It passed the House of Lords readily. In the House of Commons it experienced some opposition. I am sure the orphan children of London are very much indebted to the chairman of the present Commission for the very able speech that he made in defence of the Bill, which passed the House almost without opposition. A division was demanded, but only seven walked out of the House against it. The Bill received the royal assent shortly afterwards. I am happy to say that the corporation have appointed a committee to carry the provisions of the Act into effect; that committee did me the honour of appointing me chairman. I think the expense of the building will be from 18,000*l.* to 19,000*l.*, when fit for occupation. It is for the accommodation of 100 children, 70 boys and 30 girls. The rules of the school are the same as those of the other. The authorized version of the Scriptures is to be used and taught; a form of prayer is to be read morning and evening, and the children are to be taken to church. We have elected a portion of the number, and we shall shortly open the school. We did not elect the 100 at once, feeling that probably we might not get the proper objects to occupy the school.

W. S. Hale, Esq.

7509. Is the master chosen?—Yes; we have chosen the master who was a master in the City of London school. The head master of King's College, the head master of the City of London school, and the head master of the London University were to select three of the best qualified candidates for the office of master of this orphan school. One of the gentlemen happened to be a master in the City of London school, at a salary of 250*l.* a year; in this school he will have a salary of 300*l.* a year with a residence and some other benefits. I trust so far as the corporation is concerned they have done their duty with fidelity, and I hope with judgment. There is another matter which I wish to mention respecting some alms-houses. In the year 1834, at the time of the passing of the Reform Bill, one gentleman thought that it would be much better to erect a substantial commemoration of the passing of the Bill than to have a mere illumination. He suggested that, instead of an illumination, Reform alms-houses should be erected. He made an appeal to the public. The corporation subscribed 1,500*l.* to that object. The public did not respond to it to the extent that the individual anticipated; but the projectors proceeded to purchase a piece of ground and to erect sixteen cottages or alms-houses, with two sets of apartments in each cottage; there were to be an equal number of widows and married couples, sixteen of each It was found that merely giving them shelter was not the benefit that it was thought it would be. Not having funds sufficient to carry the object any further, and the buildings not being well and substantially erected, they applied to the corporation to take the matter off their hands. The corporation after some hesitation and discussion did so. They took upon themselves all their liabilities, substantially repaired the cottages that were erected, and they have added eight more to them; and they are now occupied by twenty widows and twenty married couples; each married couple is allowed 25*l.* per annum, and the widows 15*l.* per annum, and each party two tons of coals per annum. It has entailed upon the corporation an expense of something like 900*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year.

7510. Who appoints to the situations which are vacant in those almshouses?—The corporation.

7511. Do you mean the common council?—That matter is under the management of the Coal, Corn, and Finance committee, and they appoint.

7512. How does the Coal, Corn, and Finance committee make the appointment?—That committee is composed of a member from each ward. They draw lots, in the first instance, as to the priority of appointment to the almshouses. Supposing, for instance, Coleman Street ward drew No. 1, they would have the first appointment.

7514. I suppose he named just the person whom he thought proper?—Yes; but the party must have been a housekeeper in the City, and be not less than sixty years of age. As vacancies occur they go through the list of the wards and appoint in turn again.

7515. I believe the corporation have some ecclesiastical patronage, have not they?—They have.

7516. Do you know what is the nature and the amount of it?—They are proprietors of the advowsons of St. Peter's Cornhill, and St. James' Duke's Place, and alternately of St. Margaret Pattens, at the bottom of Rood Lane.

7517. In what way are the appointments made?—By the common council.

7518. By election?—Yes; two appointments have taken place since I have been connected with the corporation. The living of St. Margaret Pattens may be worth about 300*l.*; there was a very severe contest, but the Rev. Mr. Newbery was the successful candidate, and a very worthy man he is. The value of the other at St. James' Duke's Place, is very small, about 60*l.* a year. A gentleman was appointed, and the corporation have increased the amount paid to him to 200*l.* a year out of their own funds.

Thomas Dakin, Esq.

7519. Is there any other point to which you wish to refer?—I will take the opportunity of stating that I feel it an honour to be a citizen of London. I have a list here of those who have done themselves honour by founding schools. The secretary of the City of London school, Mr. Brewer, is now about publishing a work in which he will show that the citizens of London have done more throughout the country for the promotion of education than almost any other class of persons.

Mr. Stephen William Leach was further examined as follows.

Mr. Stephen William Leach.

7520. When you gave your evidence on the former occasion you were asked respecting the foundations of Waterloo Bridge. You expressed an opinion that the foundations of Waterloo Bridge were not quite secure. Will you state the grounds upon which you expressed that opinion?—My opinion is mainly formed upon this circumstance. Several communications have taken place on the part of the Waterloo Bridge company to the Navigation committee upon the subject of the removal of the shoals in the neighbourhood of the bridge. Two or three times dredgers have been employed, not by the corporation but by private parties, and representations have been made to the corporation by the Bridge company that they might possibly endanger the foundations of the bridge if they were not stopped from working. I have memoranda of the proceedings which have taken place before the Navigation committee, which show that the same thing has occurred over and over again. Complaints have been made of the piles which surround the bridge, and I believe the company themselves are not very sanguine as to the security of the bridge. I am of the same opinion as I was when I gave my previous answer, but I am certainly not aware of any settlement having occurred at Waterloo Bridge as has been the case at Westminster and at Blackfriars Bridges. I am clearly of opinion, however, that the foundations of Waterloo Bridge are not so strong, but that a settlement may be apprehended on account of the alterations which are going forward from day to day in the bed of the river.

Mr. George Powell, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Mr. George Powell.

7521. You are the surveyor of Waterloo Bridge?—I am. I have held the appointment since the opening of the bridge in 1817. I witnessed the laying of the first stone, and the progress of the work almost daily up to its completion in 1817 when it was opened.

7522. Have you been the surveyor of the bridge since that time?—I have.

7523. Are you acquainted with the state of the foundations of the Bridge?—Perfectly.

7524. Has your attention been directed to the statements of Mr. Leach upon the subject?—It has, and I wrote a letter to Mr Leach upon the subject. I received Mr. Leach's answer. He stated that the fears entertained by the company from the cutting off and removal of the piles alone formed a sufficient ground for the opinion which he expressed to the Commission. In answer to that I may state that the company have never by implication objected to the removal of a pile or the cutting off of one—on the contrary, all that they have objected to has been the expense, and nothing more; but upon an application being made to me by Mr. Sanders, the water bailiff, I immediately directed an answer to be returned, which being very short, with the leave of the Commission, I will read Mr. Sanders states in his letter to me that complaints have been made of the piles, which have been exposed and rendered dangerous to the navigation. His letter is dated the 12th of July 1833. I received it on the following day, when I directed the secretary to write this answer: "Sir, In reply to your letter of the 12th instant addressed to "Mr. Powell, I am directed to inform you that the Waterloo Bridge company have no "objection to the Thames Navigation committee cutting off the sheeting piles of the piers, "or to the removal of any other piles that may be considered necessary." Upon that the Navigation committee employed Messrs. Joliffe and Banks to remove those piles complained of, and they paid Messrs. Joliffe and Banks for the work, and the company was never called upon to contribute 6*d.* towards the expense.

7525. Are you of opinion that the foundations of Waterloo Bridge are in a secure state?—They are as sound as the rock of Gibraltar, and nothing but the injudicious interference of the Thames Navigation committee can by possibility shake them. Mr. Leach has stated that there were private parties taking ballast. On the contrary, we had an application from the Thames Navigation committee to allow them to do so. I, in company with Sir John Rennie and Mr. Plews, pointed out how the work was to be done. Instead of carrying it out as we directed, they set a powerful dredging steam engine to excavate, and it was not till I called the attention of the City authorities and of the contractors to the fact, and Mr. English found, close to the piers, excavations from twelve to eighteen feet deep. They themselves filled up those excavations, and restored the bed of the river to its present state at their or the City's expense; and there it now remains, perfect. From the day the bridge was opened up to the present time none of the foundations of the bridge have shown the slightest appearance of defect or settlement, and it will remain an ornament to the metropolis for ages after the Thames Navigation committee and all their officers are forgotten.

7526. You are of opinion that the result of those operations has not been to affect the security of the bridge?—Not the least. But they might have endangered the bridge if they had gone on, and you would not sit very quietly here if you were aware that excavators were employed cutting under the foundations, particularly upon a tidal river. With respect to the removal of shoals I will venture the opinion that the Thames Navigation committee know nothing about it—they cut through the middle of a shoal. Any one acquainted with the operation of currents in tidal rivers knows that which they so cut away in such manner must fill up again.

7527. Was there any previous communication made by the Thames Navigation committee to any one connected with Waterloo Bridge before those operations were commenced —Yes; and we gave permission to them to cut a channel of about four feet in an invert manner, but instead of that there was no superintendence over the operations of the parties. They obtained a valuable material, and as long as they could obtain it they kept working away, as long as they obtained ballast that was valuable for concrete and for other building purposes.

7528. Was this done by the Thames Navigation committee or by the Trinity House? —It was done by the Thames Navigation committee.

Mr. Stephen William Leach.

Mr. Stephen William Leach was further examined, as follows.

7529. You have heard the evidence of Mr. Powell. Is there anything which you wish to say in reply to it?—I wish to correct the statement of Mr. Powell, that dredges were employed by the Navigation committee. They were not employed by the Navigation committee.

7531. Are private parties allowed to do what they please with the bed of the river without some control?—No They have to apply for a licence to the Lord Mayor before they can take ballast from the river. When they have obtained that licence, they can only work according to the conditions set out upon it.

7532. Are those conditions precise; and is there any person watching to see that those conditions are complied with?—The conditions are very precise; and there is an officer appointed to see that they are carried out.

7534. You have heard what Mr. Powell has stated as to the danger which the bridge was subjected to from the nature of those operations. He has also stated that the persons dredging the river there, to a certain extent, acknowledged that they had done what they ought not, by putting things back again in their former state. Do you know if that was so?—Yes. I am perfectly acquainted with that.

7535. Does not that seem to imply that there had been an abuse of the power given them?—I think not. It was an excavation of the channel on the south side of the river, I believe, with the concurrence of Sir John Rennie, one of the directors of the company. It was thought, that the operation would divert the strength of the current, and would tend to expose the bridge to less danger. It was for that purpose that, with the concurrence of Sir John Rennie, as I understood, the channel was excavated upon that side. It is possible that a greater depth was made than was prudent to be made, and the parties who made the excavation were called on to stop it up. They did so, rather than incur any further liability.

7536. Were they called upon to stop it up by the Navigation committee before any representations were made by persons connected with Waterloo Bridge?—No. It was by the Waterloo Bridge company that they were called on.

7537. Do you believe that the error which they committed would have been discovered and corrected but for the interference of the Waterloo Bridge company?—As far as the river was concerned, it was doing no damage to the river. The duty of the Navigation committee is to take care of that. But immediately they received the intimation of the Bridge company, the parties desisted.

7538. In what profession are you engaged?—None whatever. I am a private gentleman, living at Lewisham.

7539. I believe you are desirous of making some statement to this Commission?—I am. And, with the view of being correct in dates, I have put it in a concise form on paper. As a private gentleman, living at Lewisham, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, I am desirous of offering some suggestions, and of expressing my opinion as to the appointment of tradesmen and practising lawyers to be magistrates, elected by a small knot of freemen, without any reference to their intellectual or moral qualifications, is very pernicious. I think the system pursued is capable of great improvement. I would relieve the recorder from the incubus of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, whose interference has a tendency to disturb the calm deliberations that a judicial mind should invariably possess. As an instance of the unseemly custom of appointing practising lawyers to be magistrates, I refer to a case reported in the Times of the 6th of June 1851. —"Mansion House.—G. D. Mayne was brought before Mr. Alderman Wire (sitting as "police judge in the case), in custody of Daniel Forrester, charged with having unlawfully "attempted to obtain from the Monarch Life and Fire Assurance Company, the sum of "118*l.*, with the view to cheat and defraud the said company. Mr. Alderman Wire asked "the prisoner if he had anything to say, giving him the usual caution. Prisoner, "acknowledging his guilt, threw himself on the mercy of the office. Mr. Alderman Wire "committed the prisoner for trial at the Old Bailey." Now, it must be observed here, that Mr. Alderman Wire, who acted as judge in this case, was at the same time the solicitor to the Monarch Life and Fire Assurance Company; thus the judge to try the delinquent who attempted to defraud the company, and the solicitor to the prosecutors, was one and the same person. He was the gentleman also to instruct counsel for further prosecution, and then the alderman who might sit next the recorder and assist to try him before a jury of his country. I may mention, that the partner of Mr. Alderman Wire, Mr. Child, was the solicitor who appeared at the Mansion House to prosecute the case before the alderman.

7540. Did Mr. Alderman Wire himself sit upon that case?—He committed him; but I am not in a position to say with certainty whether or not he sat as the alderman on rota when the prisoner was tried.

Mr. Henry De Jersey, having been sworn, was examined as follows. Mr. H. De Jersey.

7541. How long have you been connected with the corporation?—About fourteen years.

7542. Are you engaged in trade?—I am a solicitor.

7543. Do you reside in the City of London?—I resided in the City of London for thirteen years. I now reside out of it. My offices are in the City.

7545. Are there any points to which you wish to call our attention?—I was desirous of coming here to give any information in my power upon any points which the Commissioners may think fit to ask me about; and also to make some observations with regard to the evidence of one or two witnesses.

7546. Will you proceed to make any statement which you are desirous of making?—I refer first to the evidence of Mr. Bennoch in question 1156. The question is, "What "was the nature of the point upon which the prosecution turned? The answer was, "The point at issue was whether they conducted their business by retail or by wholesale. "The corporation attempted to prove that a wholesale dealer who divided perhaps a dozen "stockings into three sales, which is sometimes done in high priced articles, was really "carrying on a retail transaction; or if he cut ten yards from a piece of silk to oblige a "particular customer, that again was a retail transaction. They employed spies, for the "purpose of ascertaining the fact." He was then asked, "Were those questions raised "for the purpose of seeing whether they could oblige you to take up your freedom as "retail dealers?" The answer is, "Expressly with the determination that they would "thus be able to find a volume of evidence sufficiently strong to convict us of trading by "retail, and thereby oblige us to become free of the City, the object being to get the money." I, as a member of the corporation, give a most explicit denial to that statement. The object was simply to increase the number of the constituency. When the Bill was passing through Parliament, it was opposed, and, I believe, was thrown out, upon the ground that there was no application from those who were interested as freemen of the City of London, or householders to obtain the Bill. I allude to the case in which the Court came to the resolution in consequence of the Bill being thrown out, that individuals, who were traders in London, should be summoned to take up their freedom. The answer given by Mr. Bennoch is this: "That it was a resolution of the Court of Common Council, "which may be characterized as an insane resolution in my opinion. Even gentlemen "who had been in the habit of considering this an essential element of corporation reform,

Mr. H. De Jersey, — — 2d Feb. 1854.

" joined with a great number of others to compel those men to take up their freedom, " under, as they say, the persuasion that such a proceeding would draw the attention of " the Government, and bring about a reformation which they were unable to effect of " themselves; that, in fact, they would drag the corporation through the dirt for the " purpose of having it made respectable." My answer to that is, the resolution was come to by a majority of the members of the Court of Common Council, many of them men who had been engaged in endeavouring to carry out questions of reform, and had been working in the corporation for a number of years, and they came to that resolution, with a sincere desire of increasing the representation of the City of London. In a following paragraph of the answer, he says, "We have been engaged in preparing bills for "Parliament to effect reform, but always when it came to the point we have been defeated, " either by a combination of our own officers, or by a combination of the companies." I think I may say, from my experience, that I do not think such a thing could by possibility exist as that we should be defeated by a combination of our own officers. In a subsequent answer, Mr. Bennoch spoke respecting the sale of the site of the Excise office by the Government. I believe the fact to be that when it was sold to the corporation it was a spot of ground covered with old buildings of a decayed character. The Government, when they purchased it, laid out about 120,000*l.* or 130,000*l* and then it was sold with those buildings in addition.

7547. Do you know what the actual area of the ground was?—I do not. The next point to which I wish to allude is I think in the same answer. He is speaking of the management of the market, and he says, " I believe the market will not be finished for " less than 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.*" I may say I am a member of the Markets Improvement committee. We are daily proceeding with it. Every work which it is necessary to do is open to public tender; it is done at the smallest possible cost, and in every case the tender is given out to individuals who are prepared to do it in the best possible way, at the least possible cost. I am quite sure, whatever may be the amount which may be spent on it, not one farthing will be spent which is not for the benefit of the public at large. The Commissioners asked the question, " Does it appear to you that it was " necessary to take so much land for a cattle market." I may say that subsequently to the corporation having purchased all that they thought was necessary, and perhaps rather more, they had an interview with Lord Palmerston, and his Lordship recommended strongly that the corporation should purchase some more land. We endeavoured to do so, but we could not succeed. In his answer to the following question, " Will not a " portion of this land be devoted to other purposes than a cattle market?" He says, " I " believe it will be. It will be re-sold on building leases, so as to get the land into a " proper shape to accommodate the market itself." That is not so; I believe not one inch of land will be sold on building leases. One border of the land it was intended to build on, simply to protect the property, but there was no idea of letting it out on building leases. In another place, speaking of the improvements which have been carried out by the corporation, Mr. Bennoch says, " The greatest improvement was that of " London Bridge, but they were goaded into it by several members of their own body " before they gave their consent, and even now, there are other bridge proposals into " which they are being goaded in the same manner, being very unwilling to give a " cordial support to any plan of the kind." I believe that is systematically incorrect. When any new bridge has been proposed, it has been discussed in the Court of Common Council, and I think as much intelligence and discretion has been manifested upon that subject as on any other that has come before the Court of Common Council. Mr. Bennoch himself proposed some plan for a bridge, but when his gradients and his statements came to be tested in the Court of Common Council it was found that they were very inaccurate. He says in the following sentence, "The only street which I " remember to have been voluntarily made by the City of London is the new one from " the end of London Bridge up to St. Paul's Church-yard, called new Cannon-street, " which is one of the last streets that ought to have been constructed." I think it must appear to the Commissioners that that is not so. I have always been an advocate for carrying out the plan of Mr. Bunning to continue Cheapside through Paternoster-row, to join the intended Government plan in Carey-street. No doubt that would be a most perfect and excellent plan, but at the same time, it must be considered that we have already Newgate-street and Fleet-street, and that if Paternoster-row were opened in the same manner, the result would be that the traffic of three large areas would be thrown into the small channel of the Poultry, which is even now inconveniently crowded. It appeared to me, therefore, that Cannon-street was one of the best improvements that could be brought to bear for the purpose of taking off the traffic which comes from the docks and other places, consisting of heavy waggons, and such like. To prevent its being thrown upon Ludgate-hill, a small street has been projected connecting Cannon-street with Blackfriar's Bridge, the object of which would be to take a great portion of the traffic away from that street down to Blackfriars Bridge, which is a large means of communication with the City, instead of its coming round and blocking up Ludgate-hill. The next question to which Mr. Bennoch refers is the appointment of the chairmen of committees. I have been on the principal committees of the corporation. I was five years on the City Lands committee; four years on the Bridge House committee; I have been on the Navigation committee and on the City School committee, and I may say that the conclusion which Mr. Bennoch has come to with regard to the appointment of chairman is, according to my view, most incorrect in every sense of the word.

7548. Do you think there might be any improvement in the system of the committees?—I have no doubt about it. With respect to the reduction of the committees, I have myself moved, in the Court of Common Council, a reduction of the number of the committees. I think they may be reduced, not to any considerable extent, but to some extent. I think to reduce them to a considerable extent would be exceedingly injurious. It is desirable that the members of the corporation should know as much as possible all that is going on, and if you put a man upon one committee only, you only give him the means of obtaining information as to the business transacted by that committee, and shut him out from all the rest, whereas, by his being a member of two or three committees, he acquires a knowledge of all the business which is before the corporation, and that is the great check to jobbing and corruption in my opinion.

7549. How often do the committees meet generally?—When I was on the City Lands committee it was suggested that I should be chairman; however, Mr. Ashurt was elected chairman, though I practically attended as such, because he was unable to attend. I dare say I attended during the year nearly seventy meetings.

7550. How often does each committee generally meet?—They have regular monthly meetings, besides extra meetings and the meetings of sub-committees.

7551. Do you mean that most of the committee can get through their business, meeting as seldom as once a month?—Certainly not, if that was the only occasion of their meeting.

7552. How often do they meet?—Their monthly meetings are called grand committees, that is for the benefit of the public who are called there for the purposes of business. They some times meet two or three times a week.

7553. How long do they generally sit?—I have gone to a committee at twelve and left it at five.

7554. Is not it very difficult for a man who desires to do his duty upon several of those committees, who may perhaps have private business, to do so satisfactorily?—I think not. I think a man who becomes one of a public body ought to endeavour to perform his duty zealously. When I say that I have attended committees from twelve to five in the afternoon, that is not the common attendance necessary upon every committee. In some cases the business is done in an hour.

7555. Does your experience induce you to think well of the system of allowances given to the committees?—If you were to ask me if I were to support it, if it was introduced for the first time, I should perhaps not be willing to do so, but I think in the working of it it has been practically beneficial. Mr. Bennoch, speaking of the Navigation committee, says: "In connexion with the Navigation committee, to which reference has been made "to-day, I need hardly say that gentlemen are placed upon the Navigation committee "who have really scarcely anything else to do." I am a member of the Navigation committee, and I certainly would beg leave to give that the most explicit denial. It is true that there are men in the corporation who have little or nothing to do, and so far they have a greater opportunity of giving their services to the corporation. Again, in the evidence of another witness, two parties are named who are said to be the only parties acquainted with navigation. I think every man of business who joins a committee of that description, can bring an amount of intelligence and information to bear upon the subject of the committee to which he is appointed. I feel no difficulty in the Navigation committee, though I am not particularly acquainted with the subject of shoals and so on. It is highly beneficial that these matters should not be left to the care or guidance of a mere officer, but that there should be a controlling body, who shall hear the necessity of any step, and the remedy to be applied in every case and exercise an efficient control. Mr. Bennoch, in a subsequent answer, says, "With regard to the "committees, when any gentleman shows himself particularly au fait upon a certain "point, the chances are that he will be tabooed and excluded from the committee, because "they fancy he has some private interest or some private motive. They are very liable to "attribute motives to people who take an independent course; therefore, they think it "would be improper to have him upon that committee, because he might turn it to his "private ends; and they would rather appoint a man who was incompetent, than one "who should thoroughly understand the question." I again explicitly give that a denial. My experience in the corporation with regard to the committees is, that such a circumstance I never saw or heard of; and that with regard to appointments on committees, that is not the course of proceeding. I have adopted quite as independent a course in the common council as Mr. Bennoch, if not more so, during the period I have been there; and I am sure I have never been excluded from a committee upon that ground. I believe the committees are appointed in the fairest way; they are generally appointed as ward committees. It is true you may not invariably get the particular men upon the committees who may be considered desirable; but if it be thought important that any particular gentleman should be appointed, who could bring to bear upon the question a large amount of information, I have no hesitation in saying that it would be done, and has been done in numerous instances. Mr. Bennoch, in another place, speaks of Blackfriars Bridge. He says, "We have two conflicting jurisdictions—the Bridge "House Committee, to keep up the bridge and fill up the bed of the river, and the Navigation "Committee to take away that which had been put in for the purpose of sustaining the "structure." He subsequently refers to an accident which took place in the neighbourhood of the bridge. It was fully proved that that accident did not occur in consequence of anything which had been done to the bridge. I should say, that the fact with respect to Blackfriars was this:—At the period in question, when one of the piers of the bridge was found to be sinking, it was ascertained that the bed of the river, which originally formed a natural protection to the bridge, had been washed away, and laid almost flat. The piles supporting the bridge, therefore, were left without any support outside. Accordingly, they bulged out, and then the bridge naturally sunk. When that was brought before the committee, they, acting under the advice of Mr. Walker, whom they had consulted, gave orders that the piles should be brought back as nearly as possible to their original position, and then that a large quantity of material should be thrown into the river, which would restore its natural support.

7556. There is no City engineer, properly so called, is there?—There is not.

7557. Upon questions of engineering importance and difficulty you consult some eminent engineer?—Always.

7558. You have no special engineer whom you consult?—Certainly not. We consult Mr. Leach upon all matters connected with the Navigation Committee. Mr. Walker also has been very generally employed; and so has Sir John Rennie. On the subject of the sewers, some of the witnesses have given evidence on which I will make no other remark than saying, that having lived thirteen years in the City of London, I believe the system which is adopted there is productive of the greatest practical good. I believe that a municipal institution like that of sewerage should be brought home as closely as possible to men's doors. I live now in the outskirts of London, in the neighbourhood of Brixton; and I am painfully conscious of the difference between the two; and I should very gladly again live in the City, so far as the advantages of sewerage and police are concerned. I have now an application unattended to, which I made nine months ago to the General Board of Sewers, upon a matter which then required immediate attention. In the City I have only to walk to Guildhall, and I find immediate attention to any thing that I may require. With respect to the Irish society, Mr. Bennoch complains that not being a member of that society, he has no power to get at the particulars of their accounts. I am rather surprised at that answer, inasmuch as a printed statement of the receipts and expenditure of the Irish society is sent round every year to every member of the common council. Speaking of the chamberlain's office, in a subsequent part of the evidence, he says, "Those directions have been given so that the expense of his office is fixed at "2372*l.* 10*s.* That is an exceedingly unwise resolution, because the chief clerk of the "chamberlain has, within the last few days, resigned his office;" and he comes to this conclusion, that because we have fixed the expense of the office of chamberlain at 2372*l.* 10*s.*, whenever a vacancy occurs, an incompetent person might be appointed as clerk, and we should still have to give him 800*l.* a year. That is not so. Mr. Bennoch knows that whenever a vacancy occurs, it is always referred to a committee, who report upon it. So, in this case that has been done, and a gentleman has been appointed at a salary of 500*l.* a year. He speaks, in a subsequent passage, with regard to another officer—"The "comptroller who is a solicitor, and merely a conveyancer, whose duties are by no means "arduous, nor require a man of great genius to perform, receives 1,500*l.*" a year. He speaks of a combination of that office with those of the Bridge House comptroller and the solicitor. I notice that my Lord Mayor has also said the same. I may say, with the greatest respect for his lordship, that he is unacquainted with the duties of those offices. I do not believe any man living could properly perform the duties of those three offices together. It is possible that the two comptrollerships might be amalgamated, but that a man, with the present work of the corporation, should perform all the duties of solicitor, which are perfectly distinct from those of the comptroller, is in my opinion impossible. I believe the health of the last comptroller suffered most materially from the duties which he performed.

7560. You think there could not be a simplification in the management of the corporation business?—No doubt everything might be improved to some extent, but I do not think the business of the corporation could be much simplified so long as you retained the present duties of the corporation. Mr Bennoch goes on to say, that the corporation might be carried on efficiently by a reduction of from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* a year. It appears to me so impossible to reduce the offices to the extent which he has mentioned, that I cannot think any such saving could take place. I have been myself rather distinguished in the corporation by a desire to reduce offices, and to vote for a reduction of salaries; therefore, my motive for speaking at the present moment is a desire to lay before the Commissioners that which I believe to be the facts. Mr. Bennoch then speaks of the question of the chamberlain, and of there being no discussion on the office becoming vacant. If he had been in his place in the common council, he would have recollected that when the report was brought up, recommending that 2,500*l.* should be given to the chamberlain, I moved myself that the salary should be 1,000*l.* I have read the evidence of Mr. Woodthorpe and Mr. Leach, as to the working of the Navigation committee, and the mode in which business is transacted, and I fully concur in the evidence which they have given. With regard to the constitution of the Navigation committee, Mr. Leach was asked what would be the effect of the introduction of members of the dock companies upon the Navigation committee. My opinion fully concurs in his, that it would be a very improper proceeding, and that it would be most undesirable to appoint men to a committee of that description who had any local or personal interest. At present, the Navigation committee appears to me to be a most independent body, and one most calculated to carry out the objects which are necessary for the public interest.

7561. For how many years have you served upon the Navigation committee?—Two years.

7562. From your observations of the proceedings of that committee, do you think the conservancy of the river is managed in an efficient manner?—So far as the committee have the power. I believe they are restricted to a very considerable extent, in consequence of the existing litigation with the government, and that they require other powers, which, during that litigation, the government will not allow them to obtain from parliament. I believe, as far as the expenditure of money is concerned, and the works which they are executing, they are doing everything which is in their power. They ought to do more, but they have not the power. In some cases, they go beyond their means.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

William Payne, Esq.

WILLIAM PAYNE, Esq., was further examined as follows.

7563. Are there any corrections which you are desirous of making in the evidence which you have given to this commission?—Not in the evidence which I gave. Mr. Pulling in his evidence has made a statement that the Lord Mayor of London is the coroner, and the gentleman who performs the duties is only his deputy, and that he is appointed by the Court of Aldermen. I thought it desirable that you should not be under any mistake in regard to that subject, because the charter of Edward IV., which gives the office to the City, says the Mayor, commonalty and citizens may appoint whom they will to the office, and the statute regarding elections in London, which is the 11th of George I., confirms the appointment to be in the Court of Common Council. Therefore the Lord Mayor is not the coroner, nor is the gentleman who does the duty, his deputy, nor is he appointed by the Court of Aldermen. I wish also to be permitted to refer you to the case I alluded to the other day. Some questions were put to me regarding the tenure of my appointment. The case is the Queen against Grimshaw, reported in 11th Jurist, 16th Law Journal, and 10th Queen's Bench Reports. The fullest report is in the Jurist, and I find, upon looking at it, Mr. Justice Patteson, who was one of the judges of the court at that time, says "There can be no doubt as contended for by Mr. Martin, that a coroner well in, is in for life, and cannot be displaced without cause duly shown." Mr. Justice Coleridge enters much more fully into the reasons why it should be so. He says, "What "would be the consequences of carrying out the doctrine here set up? If a man could "be removed after six years possession he could after twenty, so that a coroner who has "performed a long course of duty, who has received fees, who has held inquests, recorded "verdicts, some of them, perhaps, for wilful murder, and discharged other important "functions affecting the public at large as well as himself, may be got rid of to gratify "some caprice or party feeling, the very persons who have appointed him, recognized "him, and enabled him to perform all these duties, turning round and calling him a "usurper. My mind shrinks from contemplating the circumstances which must "necessarily flow from such a state of things." The coroner is a magistrate by virtue of his office, and also a judge of a Court of Record, and I believe the corporation have admitted the principle that judicial officers shall not be annually appointed. So I presume there can no longer be any doubt, since that decision that a coroner is not an annual officer, and cannot be displaced without sufficient cause. I should not have referred to this if the Commissioners had not asked me the question before. When I attended the previous commission I took the liberty of stating the same thing, but the decision of the

William Payne, Esq.

Court of Queen's Bench did not take place till the year 1847. That confirms the view which I took the liberty then of stating, and the report of that case is quite decisive upon the subject.

7564. The coroner in the case referred to was not the coroner of London, but the case turned upon the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act?—The charter of Edward IV. says the Mayor, commonalty, and citizens may appoint whom they will to the office. The statute, the 11th of George I., regarding elections in the City of London says the election of coroner, with those of other officers, shall still remain in the Court of Common Council, therefore the Lord Mayor is not the coroner, but the Court of Common Council have the right of appointment. With regard to the office which I hold of High Steward of Southwark, I wish to say that Mr. Acland in his evidence has stated "That the constables "are elected at the Courts Leet, and they are told when they are appointed that they have "no duties to perform, but they have to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* for being sworn in." One of the first acts after my appointment to the office was to suspend the election of constables, ale-tasters, and flesh-tasters, as those offices appeared to me to be quite incompatible with the circumstances of the present time. There are no such officers now appointed, and consequently there can be no fee paid for swearing them in.

7565. Since when has that alteration taken place?—About three years ago.

7566. How were those officers remunerated when they were appointed?—There was no remuneration.

7567. Was there any object in obtaining an office of that kind?—Perhaps centuries ago, when there was a market there which required to be supervised, they might go round and see that the articles of food sold were proper.

7568. In recent times those officers were appointed, but they had no duties and no emoluments?—None; they were appointed, and there was an end of it.

Mr. Sergeant Merewether, D.C.L.

HENRY ALWORTH MEREWETHER, D.C.L. Serjeant-at-law, town clerk, was further examined as follows.

7569. Is there any addition which you desire to make to your evidence?—With your permission, there are one or two additions. I was required to give in a return of the offices of the corporation which have been sold. There are thirty of such offices. They are two attorneys of the Mayor' Court, the first serjeant of the chamber, the yeoman of the waterside, the sword bearer's young man, the common hunt's young man, the water bailiff's young man, three fruit meters, one of them having died in 1846, the corporation did not again sell the office, but placed a person in it to do its duties, and they have been discharged in a manner which is highly satisfactory to those who are connected with that trade.

7570. You are speaking of the offices which have been purchased by their present possessors?—Yes; either purchased by them or by those who preceded them, and who had the right of alienation. The others are the deputy day oyster meters, and the deputy morning meters of oysters. I thought it was desirable that you should also know which of them had still the power of alienation, and they are marked in a manner to distinguish them. Mr. Ashley, one of the attorneys of the Mayor's Court, is in that situation, so are all the oyster meters. With respect to Mr. Ashley, an arrangement is just now about to be made with him for his right of alienation, with a view of re-adjusting the Mayor's Court.

The statement was delivered in, and is as follows.

Mr. Serjeant Merewether, D.C.L.

Mr. Serjeant Merewether, D.C.L.

7th Feb. 1854.

7571. With regard to the others, have any steps been taken to buy up their power of alienation?—With regard to the oyster meters, the subject is now under the consideration of a committee of the common council, who have entered into the subject fully, and they are considering in what manner they can purchase the right.

7572. In short it is the intention and object of the common council to put an end to this system of sale and alienation?—Most decidedly; and it has been so for many years. I am also desirous of adding to the returns which have been already given in the return of Mr. Alderman Challis, which was not in readiness when I delivered in the other; and the same as to Mr. Sheriff Croll (the same were delivered in). I would also wish to add to the returns of the different officers of the corporation that of the conveyancing clerk to the comptroller (the same was handed in). There was a subject upon which I was interrogated, which appears to be material, viz:—what had from time to time been done by the corporation with a view of considering the duties and emoluments, and the general nature of the offices in the corporation. They have been in the habit whenever a vacancy occurs of inquiring into the nature of the office, the amount of the salary, and all the circumstances connected with it. In 1829, August the 6th, there is a report respecting the coroner involving inquiries as to the nature of the office, the duties of the office, the emoluments and whether any, and if any, what deduction should be made from the salary or any alteration in the office. That is the general nature of the inquiry which takes place. In 1829, the office of coroner was inquired into. In the same year the offices of the clerk of the peace, the Sheriffs' Court secondary, and the clerk of the works were inquired into. In 1830, the common serjeant's office was inquired into. In 1831, that of the secondary of the Sheriffs' Court; in 1832, the Sheriffs' Court officers. In the same year the compensation to the officers was also considered. The remembrancer's office was investigated—the common serjeant again—the remembrancer and the sword bearer—the registrar of the Mayor's Court—the common serjeant and the City solicitor. In 1834, the bridge house comptroller. In 1835, the question of the mayoralty was gone into, and two reports made upon it, the second report being in 1837. In 1839, the secondary's office was inquired into, and those of the police commissioner and the City solicitor. The Commission will observe that many of those offices have been inquired into again and again, when a fresh vacancy has occurred. In 1840, the deputy oyster meters. In 1841, the comptroller, the collector of Smithfield Market, and the coroner. In 1842, the clerk of the chamber, the judges of the Sheriffs' Court, with the Mayor's Court and the common pleaders, the clerk of the chamber, the town clerk, the bailiff of Southwark, the housekeeper of the sessions house, and the clerk to the auditors. In 1843, the office of chamberlain was twice reported on, and most minutely considered. Also the clerk of the City works, two reports. In 1844, the Sheriffs Court. In 1845, the librarian, the common pleaders, and the comptroller. In 1846, the high bailiff of Southwark, the clerk and registrar of the coal market, and the housekeeper of the sessions house. In 1847, the hall keeper, the clerk of the City works, dues on wines; an investigation which led to the discovery of some errors which have since been corrected. The Small Debts Act, the collector of the dock rents. In 1848, the Small Debts Act was again considered with regard to the City, the City solicitor, the bailiff of Southwark, the Small Debts Act, and the Sheriffs' Court. In 1849, the deputy registrar of the Mayor's Court, the Sheriffs' Court, and the Small Debts Acts came again under consideration.

7573. You mentioned the librarian. Is there any public library belonging to the City?—There is a library which has been instituted by the City, and it is open to the public, at least with the form only of applying for permission.

7574. Where is it?—It is in the Guildhall.

7575. Is it a large library?—It is.

7576. What is the number of volumes?—I do not know exactly; there are about 20,000, but I will forward a catalogue to the Commissioners.

7577. Is there any fund devoted to its maintenance and increase?—There is a fund voted every year by the corporation for its maintenance and increase; it is an annual sum of 200*l*., which enables them from time to time to purchase books, and the collection there is certainly valuable, particularly that part of it relating to the City of London.

7578. Is it open to the citizens generally?—It is, upon applying to any member of the common council for an order, which is given without hesitation. The present librarian is a person perfectly competent to his office, and gives every facility to every person who goes there. In 1850, the common serjeant's office was considered, and his salary readjusted; the common pleaders also; the judge of the Sheriffs Court, the prothonotary of the Borough Court, the comptroller's clerk, and the recorder, two reports; the Sheriffs' Court, and the town clerk's clerks, two reports respecting them. In 1851 the clerk of the chamber, the rectory of St. James, Duke's Place, the stipend of the rector was fixed, and the mode of election; the Sheriffs' Court, St. James,' Duke's Place, a second time; the City architect, the Sheriffs' Court again. In 1852, the coal duties was also considered by a committee, the office of the under marshal, and the secondary. In 1853, an arrangement was concluded with the common pleaders with the view of opening the Lord Mayor's Court to the practice of all counsel. The office of the common crier was also considered; also the question with respect to the offices which had been purchased; also the question as to the oyster meters, the Sheriffs' Court, and finally, upon the succession of Sir John Key to his office, the chamberlain's office was again inquired into, making altogether eighty-seven reports. It will probably be in the recollection of the Commissioners that Mr. Bennoch, in the course of his evidence, stated that the corporation continued for a considerable time in connection with the Gresham College, "but by and by they began to find it was a trouble, and they did not make "money out of it. They tried to get rid of it, but Parliament declined. At last in 1768, "the Government requiring some land for the purpose of an excise office, agreed with the "corporation and the Mercers' Company, and purchased this land and property for an annual "rental or annuity of 500*l.* a year. Now this very plot of ground has been sold this year, "realizing the sum of 108,000*l.*, so that it is held by some, that in consequence of the "negligence of the corporation and the Mercers' Company, and through collusion with "the Government at that time, the citizens of London, or the merchants of London, have "had alienated from them an amount of money equal to 108,000*l.*, which should have been "appropriated to the purposes for which it was left by Sir Thomas Gresham. Being done "by an Act of Parliament of course it is no use looking for a return of the money, still it "shows how careless the corporation were of the trusts reposed in them." This certainly involves a considerable charge upon the corporation of London, as well as the Mercers' Company, but I think I can in a very few words draw your attention to the manner in which this is overstated and aggravated, and I hope in a few observations that I shall satisfy you that it is totally unfounded. The 108,000*l.* which is spoken of takes no notice whatever of the 500*l.* a year, which was agreed to be paid out of the revenue of the country, and which is still paid to the corporation and the Mercers' Company.

7579. As I understand the 500*l.* is taken by the Government. The 108,000*l.* is over and above the 500*l.* a year?—The 500*l.* is now paid by the Government to the Mercers' Company and to the corporation in equal moieties; the property is not charged with the 500*l.*, that is payable out of the revenue of the country, and is charged upon the inland revenue; therefore, the 108,000*l.* is irrespective of the 500*l.* except that the Gresham trust have at this moment that money in their possession. But I will satisfy you that there is no foundation whatever for the supposition that there was anything collusive, or anything out of the most natural course of events.

7580. Do you believe that it was not an improvident bargain at the time?—I have every reason for so believing, because I have been informed of the circumstances by the architect and surveyor of the City, that this is a worse bargain at the present day than the 500*l.* a year was at the time when the former bargain was made.

7581. You believe that 108,000*l.* represents the increased value of that property, since the date of the former bargain, from the progress of time, and also from the buildings which have been put upon the property?—Quite so.

7582. The 108,000*l.* you believe fairly represents the increased value of the property?—Considering the manner in which it has been added to, and the manner in which it has been improved.

7583. Do you mean added to, in respect of the extent of ground?—There has been some addition to the area.

7584. It must have been valuable property 70 years ago?—No doubt, but at that very time a considerable quantity of land in Broad-street was let on building lease at 2*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.* a foot frontage.

7585. What is it worth now?—There is a very small piece of property in Threadneedle-street, which has now become vacant, and is to be sold, for which 20,000*l.* has been offered, and 30,000*l.* is demanded. There is also a property there, where a small house in Threadneedle-street was let 16 years ago, at a rack rent of 110*l.* a year; the house has been pulled down, the lessee having been compensated, and he has to rebuild, and pay a ground rent of 268*l.* a year, having a few additional feet of frontage; so that I believe an additional value, to the extent I have mentioned, can be made out most clearly and most distinctly, and I am informed that the bargain which has been recently made is rather worse than the bargain that was made in 1768.

7586. Has there been any calculation made as to what sum of money the ground in question would have fetched in 1768, if it had been sold for a gross sum instead of an annuity?—I think not further than that which I have just stated, that land in the neighbourhood was at that time let at 2*s.* a foot frontage. I am quite sure, when the Commissioners are informed of the facts connected with the sale, they will see that there is not the slightest possibility of any collusion whatever having taken place.

7587. Do you understand that this land was sold subject to the annuity of 500*l.* a year, or do the Government still pay the annuity and sell the property, annuity free, for 108,000*l.*?—You have the Act of Parliament before you, and you will see that the 500*l.* a year is not charged upon the property, but it is an independent sum to be paid out of the revenue by the Government of this day, contracted for by the Government of that day.

7588. The 108,000*l.* is not burdened with the 500*l.* a year?—Not at all. The following are substantial facts, which ought to be before the Commissioners. The first idea of selling the property arose in 1758, upon which a reference was made to a grand committee to consider "whatever may be proper to be done, in the present circumstances of Sir Thomas "Gresham's estate." A ground plan was ordered to be prepared, the surveyor laid that plan before the committee. I have done all I could to obtain that plan, but I cannot find it. The only plan which I have seen of the estate is to be met with in Ward's "History of the Professors of the Gresham College," where there is a representation given of the houses

Mr. Serjeant Merewether, D.C.L.

belonging to it, and also in "Maitland's History of London." The property was then in a dilapidated state, and the question was whether it was worth while to repair it. The surveyor laid the plan before the committee, and was ordered to estimate the value of the old materials, and the annual value of ground rent of the college, if cleared of the present old buildings. That was in the year 1759. The plans were reported on at different meetings; there were conferences with the lecturers who had houses within old Gresham College, and could not be displaced without compensation. In October of the same year, it was directed that the repairs should not be done, the general committee having under consideration an application to Parliament to rebuild the college. In the same year it was resolved, "That it is the opinion of the committee, that the City and the Company "apply to Parliament for an Act to empower them to pull down Gresham College, with "the almshouses and other appurtenances, and build commodious houses on the ground "thereof, for the benefit of the two corporations, the better to enable them to maintain the "uses appointed by Sir Thomas Gresham." Reports were made upon those proceedings. It was referred to a sub-committee, to treat with the lecturers for additional allowances. A petition to Parliament was agreed to, but was ordered not to be presented to Parliament that session, and it appears, in point of fact, that though a petition was in 1762 presented to Parliament, the matter was not pursued from that period for five years. In 1767 the committee had in consideration the letting the College for building a general office for the receipt of the revenue of excise, and the lecturers had notice to attend respecting the amount of compensation to them in lieu of their several apartments. It was therefore, the notion of building the excise office upon the property, which occurred five years afterwards, which led to a consideration of the affair. An accurate plan of the ground was ordered. "Sir Richard Glyn informed the committee that the City members several times "attended the Lords of the Treasury for building an excise-office where Gresham College now "stands, and that their Lordships had agreed to take the same at a rent charge of 500*l.* per "annum, and as different estimates had been made of the charge of building an excise-office, "at Ely-place, Holborn," the site of the Bishop of Ely's house, where now Ely-place is, "and "at Gresham College, whereby it was estimated that the charge of building it at Gresham "College would be 1,800*l.* more than at Ely House, which sum is to be made good by the "Treasury;" so that there was a competition at that moment between the site in Ely-place and the site of Gresham College, which should be adopted for the purpose, and it was found that Gresham College would be the dearer of the two, upon which they were obliged to make a concession, and reduce their claims. There was read a letter from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a copy of the agreement with the Bishop of Ely for Ely House. It seems that the situation of Gresham College was more desirable than Ely House. and though a larger sum was demanded for it, it was agreed that Gresham College should be taken; the trustees making an abatement. There was then a conference between the commissioners of excise and the committee on treating for Gresham College, and a proposal respecting it; the Gresham committee being directed by the Lords of the Treasury to conclude an agreement with the commissioners of excise, for the purchase of the College on the same terms as Ely House. They were obliged to come down to the terms on which Ely House was offered. There is an extract from a letter of the secretary of the Treasury, signed "Grey Cooper." "My lords agree that for the said College there shall be paid a clear annuity of "500*l.* in equal moieties to the City of London and the Mercers' Company, and that such "annuity do commence from Michaelmas 1768, and charged for ever on the revenue of "excise; their lordships do not see that any other terms or conditions are necessary for concluding an agreement between the parties." The Gresham committee acquiesced in, and accepted the terms in Mr. Cooper's letter, and stated that they would be ready at any time to give their consent to an Act of Parliament for the purpose. Then a draft of agreement was entered into, and a draft of a Bill was prepared by the commissioners for confirming the agreement. That Bill passed into an Act in 1768, the 8th of George the Third, chapter 32. The whole thing seems to have been done with as much care and caution as it was possible, either as a commercial or a legislative measure. It was submitted to committees of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords in succession. The price that was agreed for was in fact the price which resulted from the competition of the site of Ely House with that of Gresham House, and whatever deduction was made in the sum which was to be paid for it was entirely the result of that competition, as will appear from the statement I lay upon the table. (The same was delivered in.)

In respect of the sale of Gresham College to the Government, for which transaction it has been stated "that in consequence of the negligence of the corporation and the Mercers' "Company, and through collusion with the Government at that time, the citizens of "London, or the merchants of London, have had alienated from them an amount of "money equal to 108,000*l.*, which should have been appropriated to the purposes for "which it was left by Sir Thomas Gresham;"

The following statement of facts, connected with the transaction respecting the College, is extracted from the Minutes of the Joint Committee of Gresham Affairs, City and Mercers' Company, both bodies being trustees under Sir Thomas Gresham's will, and the journals of both Houses of Parliament:—

1758. December 11th. At a joint grand committee a reference was made to consider what may be proper to be done in the present circumstances of Sir Thomas Gresham's estate and on the 20*th* of the same month the surveyor was directed to draw a ground plot of the college, with observations on the places contiguous. Mr. Serjeant Merewether, D.C.L.

On the 1st May following he laid the plan before the committee, when he was ordered to estimate the value of the old material, and the annual value or ground rent of the College if cleared of the then present old buildings. 7th Feb. 1854.

On the 7th September in that year he reported the plans to the committee, and the lecturers ordered to attend. And on the 25th September the lecturers were directed to confer together, and to report. 1759.

And on the 12*th October* the committee ordered the repairs to the college then in contemplation not to be done, the grand committee having under consideration an application to Parliament to rebuild the College. And on the 5*th December*, in the same year, the committee resolved that in their opinion the City and the company should apply to Parliament for an Act to empower them to pull down Gresham College, with the almshouses and other appurtenances, and build commodious houses on the site thereof, for the benefit of the two corporations, the better to enable them to maintain the uses appointed by Sir Thomas Gresham.

On the 10*th December* 1760, petitions to Parliament accordingly agreed to, and the committee instructed to treat with the lecturers for additional allowances. 1760.

February 3*d.* The committee ordered the petitions not to be presented in that session. 1761.

On the 29*th September* they referred it to a committee to prepare a new petition, which on the 17th November, was ordered to be laid before the common council and the general court of the Mercers' Company, and on the 16th March 1762 was presented to the House, and referred to a committee.

No further proceedings took place till the year 1767, when, on the 19*th March*, the committee had under consideration letting the College for building a general office for the Revenue of Excise, when the lecturers had notice to attend respecting the amounts of compensation to them in lieu of their several apartments. Six years interval. 1767.

On the 26*th May* in that year, the committee were informed by Sir Richard Glyn that the City members had several times attended the Lords of the Treasury for building an Excise office where Gresham College stood, and that their Lordships had agreed to take the same at a rent charge of 500*l. per annum*, and a different estimate had been made of building the Excise office at Ely Place, Holborn, and Gresham College, whereby it was estimated the charge of building it at Gresham College would be 1,800*l. more than at Ely House*, which was to be made good by the Treasury.

May 30*th.* The committee received a communication from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a copy of the agreement with the Bishop of Ely for Ely House, and on the 2*d June* following a conference took place between the Commissioners of Excise and the Gresham Committee, when they concluded an agreement for the sale of the College on the same terms as Ely House.

On the 30*th June* the committee received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury stating that their Lordships agreed there should be paid a clear annuity of 500*l.*, in equal moieties for the same, to the City and the Mercers Company, charged for ever on the Revenue of Excise, in which the joint committee acquiesced, and would be ready to give their consent to an Act of Parliament for the purpose.

The Draft Bill prepared by the Commissioners for the purpose was approved by the committee; and on the 1768.

8*th George III., cap.* 32, the Act passed in which a clause was inserted for allowing the lecturers to marry, and also empowering the Lords of the Treasury to purchase additional lands to render the building more commodious.

From the foregoing it does not appear that there is any foundation for the assertion, "that the citizens, either by negligence or collusion with the Government of the day, "have been deprived of monies which should have been appropriated to the purposes for "which it was left by Sir Thomas Gresham."

I believe when I gave in a list of the charters the other day I did not, with sufficient distinctness draw the attention of the Commissioners to the statute setting aside the judgment in the quo warranto against the corporation of London, and confirming its charters. The words of it are material. They commence by reciting the judgment which had been given upon the quo warranto: "Whereas a judgment was given in the Court of King's "Bench, in or about Trinity Term, in the 35th year of the reign of the late King "Charles the Second, upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, exhibited "in the said court against the Mayor and commonalty and citizens of London, that the "liberty, privilege, and franchise of the said Mayor and commonalty and citizens being a "body politic and corporate, should be seized into the King's hands as forfeited. And for "as much as the said judgment and the proceedings thereupon is and were illegal and "arbitrary, and for that the restoring of the said mayor and commonalty and citizens to "their ancient liberties, of which they had been deprived, tends very much to the peace "and good settlement of this kingdom." It then goes on to declare that they may be described to be a body corporate and politic, and they ought to "peaceably have and enjoy all "and every their rights, gifts, charters, grants, liberties, privileges, franchises, customs, "usages, constitutions, prescriptions, markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, estates, and

Mr. Serjeant Merewether, D.C.L.

" hereditaments whatsoever, which they lawfully had, or had lawful right, title, or " interest of, in, or to, at the time of the recording or giving the said judgment, or at the " time or times of the said pretended forfeitures." Therefore, setting aside the judgment upon the quo warranto, it goes on with a series of clauses with which I need not trouble you, but which confirm everything belonging to the corporation of London, which restore all their officers, give validity to all that had been done by them, and entirely sweep out all trace of the former proceeding.

J. Anderton, Esq.

JAMES ANDERTON, Esq., having been sworn, is examined as follows.

7589. Are you under-sheriff of the City of London?—I am one of them.

7590. How long have you held that office?—This is the second time I have filled it.

7591. Is the under-sheriff annually appointed?—He is, by the sheriffs themselves.

7592. Are you under-sheriff of the City of London, or the county of Middlesex?—Of the county of Middlesex.

7593. Is there any difference in the tenure of the two offices?—The under-sheriffs are appointed by the sheriffs, upon their election, and they are under-sheriffs of London and of Middlesex, but they only derive benefit from their appointment as under-sheriffs of Middlesex. The secondary of London is, in fact, the under-sheriff of London, and is appointed by the Court of Common Council; so that the under-sheriffs have nothing whatever to do with the City of London.

7594. In point of fact you are only the under-sheriff as far as regards Middlesex?—That is so.

7595. Is that an annual appointment?—It is, by the sheriffs themselves. They usually appoint their own solicitors. There is a deputy also, who retains his office.

7596. It has not been customary for the deputy to be removed with the under-sheriff?—No, it would be very inconvenient that he should be so; there is an arrangement made with him as to the division of the fees received—he takes a certain portion, and a certain portion is given to the under-sheriff.

7597. What is the emolument of the office of the under-sheriff?—My share of the emoluments this last quarter was 175*l.*, I think.

7598. Is that about the usual amount?—I think it is; it is not so much as it used to be.

7599. Are there any disbursements?—They have to keep up some little state; a carriage, and an additional servant. Instead of keeping only one horse, as I should do, I keep a pair, and I am expected to contribute to various charities.

7600. You have been appointed by two sheriffs?—I have, by Sir John Musgrove and the present Mr. Alderman Wire, and without any solicitation on my part. I did not expect it; I was applied to by them, and no bargain whatever was made with me; but I was told that whatever the profits were they were my own.

7601. What has been the custom in other cases in that respect; have the under-sheriffs gone on from one sheriff to another?—No; the sheriffs have generally appointed their own solicitors. Each sheriff appoints one.

7602. Do the under-sheriffs perform personally any duties whatever?—We attend at the Old Bailey constantly. We attend the sheriffs upon all public occasions. Formerly the under-sheriffs used to attend the courts at Wesminster, but an arrangement has been made by which those duties are now performed by Messrs. Burchell, or some person from their office.

7603. Does neither of the under-sheriffs attend at Nisi Prius, at Westminster?—No.

7604. Does the under-sheriff attend, when the grand jury are sworn at Westminster, in term time?—No, Mr. Burchell attends.

7605. What is the necessity for the office of under-sheriff?—To indemnify the sheriff from any loss, which I consider I am bound to do; and for that indemnity I have the fees of the office.

7606. Is that indemnity a public engagement, or a mere private contract?—A mere private contract. I asked Sir John Musgrove whether I should give him any security. He said, No. I asked Mr. Alderman Wire the same question, and he said, No, if he had not had confidence in me he would not have appointed me.

7608. Does it ever happen that the under-sheriff is a loser?—I think I have heard so. At any rate they are liable to the amount of thousands of pounds.

7609. Are you speaking of what actually has happened?—What has happened. I had, as I have already stated, from 200*l.* to 300*l.* to pay in my last under-shrievalty, that is, I was that amount less in pocket than I otherwise should have been. I have lost more.

7610. How did you lose that amount?—The sheriff's officer failed, and his sureties failed.

7611. Who attends at Nisi Prius in London?—The secondary. He is, in fact, the under-sheriff of London.

7612. Is it necessary that there should be separate under-sheriffs for London and Middlesex?—I should say, No, if the corporation would take upon themselves the responsibility in the case of Middlesex which they do for London. The secondary of London does not give security to the sheriffs, but he gives security to the amount of more than 10,000*l.* to the corporation of London, besides having purchased his office; therefore, in the event of any failure on the part of the secondary of London, the corporation would be liable and not the sheriffs; whereas, in the county of Middlesex, in the case of any failure there, the under-sheriffs would be liable to the sheriffs, and the sheriffs would be personally liable.

7613. Is that the same system which prevails in other counties in England?—Precisely the same.

7614. In other counties in England is there any such officer as the secondary?—The secondary in London is a name for the under-sheriff.

7615. Has the secondary anything to do with the bound bailiffs?—Yes, he takes the security; he is, in fact, the under-sheriff of London.

7616. Then, in London, the under-sheriff is not answerable for the conduct of the bailiffs?—No; only in Middlesex.

7617. Is there any other observation which you wish to make?—A great deal has been said about the common council. I have had the honour of being, for seventeen years, one of the representatives of the ward of Farringdon without. I have had thirteen contests in that time and I never solicited a vote and never spent a sixpence. The electors under the Parliamentary franchise consist of about 1,500, but I am sorry to say that the number of municipal electors is only about half that amount, and they are annually decreasing; last year I think the decrease in the number was 58.

7618. Does that arise from persons not taking up their freedom?—Yes.

7619. You use that as an argument, showing that it is important that the municipal franchise should be put upon a more extended basis?—Certainly. I was here the other day, when some questions were put to Mr. Dakin, with regard to the Irish society. I have held the office of deputy-governor. I went over to Ireland in 1846. I examined the whole of the estates, and I shall be happy to answer any question which may be put to me in regard to that portion of the property.

7620. You are speaking of that part of the Irish estates which is under the immediate management of the Irish society?—Yes. The corporation of London have no more to do with it than any gentleman in this room.

7621. The Irish society emanates from the corporation?—They appoint the members, but the moment they have appointed the society that moment their authority ceases, except that they may be considered as visitors in the event of any complaint being made.

7622. Therefore the corporation has not only the appointment of the Irish society, but the power and the duty of redressing any malpractices or injudicious management of which the Irish society may be guilty?—That was the case, I think, the year after I was in Ireland. There was a petition presented to the Court of Common Council, of which I have a copy with me, complaining of the manner in which the affairs were conducted. Upon that petition being presented, the corporation of London, exercising their visitorial powers, appointed a committee for the purpose of going into the question, and hearing the petitioners upon it.

7623. What do you consider to be the object of the management of this property by the Irish society; is it to obtain any beneficial return for the Irish society or the corporation?—Not for the corporation certainly. It is for the benefit of the inhabitants of that portion of Ireland, Coleraine and Londonderry.

7624. It is not like the management of an ordinary estate, in which the object is to obtain a revenue?—Certainly not.

7625. The object is simply so to manage this property as to conduce to the welfare of that part of Ireland in which it is situated?—Entirely so. I have a copy of the resolutions which were passed by the synod of Ulster, commending the Irish Society for what they had done in regard to Presbyterian churches. It was forwarded with the following letter. "Belfast, 31st August 1846. Sir,—I have the honour to transmit a copy of a "resolution unanimously passed at the late annual meeting of the General Assembly of "the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, and which you will have the goodness to lay before "the Irish society at the earliest opportunity. Several brethren having referred to the "liberal aid received from the honourable the Irish Society towards the erection of "school-houses and places of worship in connection with this church, 'it was moved and "'unanimously agreed to—That our moderator convey the best thanks of this Assembly to "'the honourable the Irish society for the liberality evinced and the munificence exhibited "'in their contributions in aid of our churches and schools throughout their extensive "'estates in this country.' It affords me great happiness to be the medium of conveying "the above resolution to your honourable society; and with a deep sense of the obligations "under which our church is laid to them. I have the honour to be, your obedient servant, "James Morgan, moderator of General Assembly." Also upon that occasion, the society received an address from the Reverend the Dean of Derry, Mr. Archdeacon Monsell, and the Reverend Mr. Staples, with the first and second masters. "To the deputation from the "honorable the Irish society. Gentlemen,—It is with much gratification that we, the "undersigned trustees of Foyle College, hail your arrival in the city of Londonderry, and

J. Anderton, Esq.

"acknowledge the favour you have conferred on us by visiting the institution confided to "our charge, on which since its first establishment so many benefits have been bestowed "by the honourable the Irish society. We are further rejoiced at being enabled in person "to return you our most sincere thanks for the increased grant which your honourable "society has lately made Foyle College, and without which it would have been impossible "to have carried on with efficiency the important objects contemplated in the establish-"ment. We trust that on your inspection of the institution, you will perceive that your "present and former bounty has not been misapplied, but that notwithstanding the "existence of other and highly endowed schools in the north of Ireland, possessing the "advantages of scholarships and exhibitions, Foyle College holds a high position in the "scale of educational establishments, which we beg leave to say is mainly attributable to "the merits of our present excellent head master. We desire to call your attention to "the fact, that in consequence of the London companies having withdrawn their annual "contributions, the support of the school is chiefly dependent on your liberality. The "salaries of the masters, clerk, rent, and insurance premium amount to 390*l.* Knowing "the encouragement your honourable society gives to education, in every part of your "estates in Ulster, we take the liberty of submitting these particulars to your considera-"tion, and with confidence commend to your fostering care the interests of Foyle College." Upon this the Irish society established for ever an annual exhibition of 30*l.* for five years, consequently they have now, and will I hope for ever have five scholars at the Dublin institution, to each of whom there is 30*l.* a year allowed.

7626. You have considerable property in the towns of Derry and Coleraine, have not you?—Yes.

7627. What is your system of letting your property?—A great deal of the property is let upon lives on what they call "perpetuity leases." I could go through Coleraine and Londonderry, and point out every house which was held upon that tenure; they were in a bad and dilapidated state.

7628. Are they generally let to the occupants or to some person who takes a consider-able amount of property and underlets?—At that time a great deal of property was let to persons who had very long leases and so sub-let it to others. We determined to get rid of the middlemen, and that the whole of the property as the leases fell in should be let to the occupiers, and not to other parties for the purpose of sub-letting it. In other cases where the property was let upon perpetuity leases, we had no power of interfering, but we prepared a notice to serve on all the tenants calling upon them to repair, and stating that in the event of their not repairing, the conditions of their leases would be enforced.

7629. Who is the local manager of your estates?—A gentleman of the name of Green. At the time I was there he occupied a house that was hired for him, but upon the recommendation of the deputation, a house has since been built for him adjoining to Londonderry.

7631. Does the Irish society by its agents interfere in any manner as landlords in local or general politics in Ireland?—Not at all.

7632. Are you quite sure of that?—Quite. I have never known them do it since I have had any connection with the society.

7633. Is there special care taken that the agents shall not attempt to exercise any influence over the tenants?—I believe so. I believe if the Irish society were to know that their agent had exercised any undue influence over their tenants, they would immediately remove him. I know I would have done it when I was connected with the society.

7634. Is there a considerable staff for the management of these estates?—No. It is done chiefly by the agent.

7635. Is he agent for other properties besides your own?—No.

7636. Are you a member of the committee of the Irish Society now?—No. I think there is one great fault in the present system, that no person except the governor can be on the society more than two successive years, and just as you are getting used to the manage-ment of it, you go off.

7637. Is it rather a popular committee?—Yes; for the reason that there is what is called line money attached to it.

7638. There is line money attached to other committees, is not there?—No.

7639. Is this the only committee of the corporation which has what is called line money?—It is.

7640. What is the distinction between line money and those other allowances for the purpose of good fellowship which are made to the committees?—The governor, the deputy governor, and twenty-four members, for their attendances, &c. at fifty-four meetings held during the year, were allowed for their attendance and entertainments (I was on the committee) 590*l.* 15*s.* My share I think came to about 15*l.*

7641. How long do the members of the Irish society hold office?—Only, as I have already stated, two years; the governor, Mr. Alderman Humphrey, has held it some years; the governor is very seldom removed.

7642. Must the governor be an alderman?—He has generally or always been so.

7643. I observe in the book I hold in my hand, which is the report of a case in the House of Lords, the Skinners' Company versus the Irish Society, there are the following items. Tavern expenses in the year 1828, 498*l.*; in the year 1829, 555*l.*; in the year 1830, 357*l.*; in the year 1831, 601*l.*; in the year 1832, 452*l.*; how do you apprehend this money to have been spent?—I suppose in the same way as that which I have alluded to, in line money and in dinners.

7644. What I have been reading to you is under the head of tavern expenses. Besides those sums there are allowances to members. In the year 1828, 473*l.*; in the year 1829, 506*l.*; in the year 1830, 424*l.*; in the year 1831, 615*l.*; in the year 1832, 593*l.* In the year 1831, for example, more than 1,200*l.* was spent in tavern expenses and allowances to members of committees?—That amount has been very greatly reduced, it is not so large now by any means. When I was a member of the society, we had I think sixteen law suits going on, and we settled them all. I see, when we were in Ireland, we gave in aid of public improvements and the employment of the people 1,484*l.* In the case of one action which was going on, Mr. Wood and myself went over to Ireland and settled it without going to trial, for which we only received our travelling expenses, although both professional men.

7645. I see in the year 1832 the law expenses came to 3,460*l.* I see a note appended by the publisher of this book to this effect: It is said this sum was expended in the contested election of the late Mr. Alderman Thorp for Coleraine?—I am not aware of that; there has been nothing of the kind during the last few years.

7646. You think in former times some of this money may have gone in such a manner, but now it is not the case?—Certainly it is not so now. I am not surprised at anything they did formerly. The society was then composed of members belonging to the twelve livery companies, and not as at present chosen from the common council, irrespective of the companies.

7647. Are you aware of any control which either the Irish society or the corporation of London have over the municipal institutions of Derry and Coleraine, in the way of confirming bye-laws?—Yes; there is an Act of Parliament to that effect. The Irish Municipal Act provides that the corporations of Londonderry and Coleraine are to submit their bye-laws to the Irish society, previously to their being presented to the Lord Lieutenant.

7648. Does the Irish society ever interfere with the action of the municipal bodies of Coleraine and Derry in respect of bye-laws?—I have never known them to do so, but I imagine they cannot act upon any bye-law till it has been submitted to the Irish society. The clause I refer to is this, "Provided further, that no bye-law to be made by the council "of the boroughs of Coleraine and Londonderry respectively, shall be sent to the Lord "Lieutenant, until the same shall have been approved of by the honourable society of "the governor and assistants of London of the new plantation in Ulster, within the "realm of Ireland."

7649. Is there any object in maintaining that power?—That I am not able to state. In another clause it is said that "Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to prejudice, "diminish, alter or take away any of the rights, privileges, powers, or authorities vested "in or enjoyed by, or duties or liabilities imposed upon the society of the governor and "assistants of London of the new plantation in Ulster, within the realm of Ireland, under "or by virtue of any charter or charters heretofore granted to them by the Crown, or of "any statute or statutes in anywise relating thereto."

7650. Are there any other powers of a similar description belonging to the Irish society?—None; their powers are entirely confined to that part of Ulster.

7651. You believe they do not practically exercise this function?—I have never known them to do so; but the corporation cannot make any valid bye law till it has been submitted to the Irish society. I believe some few years ago the power was exercised.

7652. At present, you believe the bye-laws are agreed to as a matter of course?—I think they would be. The corporation have nothing to do with the funds of the Irish society.

7653. If those funds were misapplied, it would be the duty of the corporation to interfere, would not it?—Yes; and you will find by the judgment given by Lord Langdale, Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Campbell, that is so stated.

7654. In fact the Irish society emanates from the common council, and acts under their control?—Yes; I consider that the corporation of London are in the situation of visitors.

7655. Lord Langdale in his elaborate judgment calls the Irish society an instrument of the corporation; do not you think that that is a very correct term by which to designate them?—It may be so.

7656. Do the members of the London committee go over regularly every year to inspect their Irish estates?—No.

7657. Do they frequently go over?—Yes.

7658. How often?—That very much depends upon the society themselves. I believe when I went over they had not been for several years previously.

7659. They go occasionally?—They go occasionally. I believe the last three or four years they have been yearly.

7660. What are the expenses incurred by an expedition of this sort?—They gave me power to spend 500*l.*, and I spent 400*l.* There were seven of us; we entertained the gentlemen of the county and resident in the neighbourhood, the principal tenants, and the clergymen of various denominations, Catholics and Presbyterians.

J. Anderton, Esq.

7th Feb. 1854.

7661. You say for the last five years these missions to Ireland have taken place; has that been about the cost annually incurred?—I should doubt whether they have spent so much. I consider that we were rather extravagant, because instead of accepting invitations we gave them.

7662. How long did you stay there?—I was absent about a month.

7663. Did you go with the agent into the management of the property?—Yes; we visited every estate, and almost every house; that was the same year that there was a great famine and great distress, and we gave instructions to the agent to give employment to every labourer upon the estate, at good wages. To buy up all the quick he could get hold of for the purpose of planting the property, and to take care that every poor man had employment.

7664. What was the sum paid last year for the attendance of members?—560*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and the expense of the visitation of the members to the society's estates was 300*l.*

7665. In the year for which you have handed in the accounts, the gross receipt was about 8,500*l.* I observe in that year the expenses of management, in salaries, general agent, deputy vice-admiral, surveyor, water-keepers, and others, were 990*l.* The expenses for the deputation to Ireland were 400*l.* The expenses for the governor, the deputy-governor, and twenty-four members, for their attendance at fifty-four meetings in London, were 590*l.* Besides that there is the English management, 400*l.* That makes a total expense for management of about 2,000*l.* a year upon a property the gross rental of which is 8,500*l.* Does not that appear to you rather large?—I do not see where we could reduce it. The secretary devotes the whole of his time to it; and he is allowed 400*l.* a year.

7666. We will suppose this property to belong to a private gentleman; do not you think he would be rather startled to find that in a property which brought in 8,500*l.* a year, he was spending 2,000*l.* a year in management?—There are a great many expenses which they are obliged to incur which a private gentleman would not incur. He would reside upon his estate, and look after it himself.

7667. This is an estate given to you to use, not for your private advantage, but in your character of benefactors. Does not it appear rather a large subtraction from your means of doing good if 2,000*l.* a year is spent in agency?—I think the vice-admiral and some of the other officers have not been re-appointed.

7668. I find in the same year that the law expenses were, in Ireland, 3,261*l.*; I find in England they were 314*l.*; making nearly 3,600*l.* out of a revenue of 8,500*l.*?—The society had got into debt very considerably. I think, besides the suit with the Skinners' Company, there were sixteen suits pending at that time, advowson suits with the bishop of Derry. They were all settled and got rid of at the time that I was deputy-governor.

7669. Who succeeded in the suits, the bishop or the Irish society?—The bishop wanted those livings; and the Irish society were very foolish, in my opinion. Several livings became vacant, and instead of giving them to Irishmen, as I would have done, they unfortunately gave them to Englishmen. The bishop was, therefore, supported by several of the clergy there; and instituted proceedings against the Irish society, claiming the right of presentation. The law was decidedly in favour of the Irish society, and so the judges declared upon every occasion; but they could not get the jury to believe it, therefore the verdicts were always in favour of the bishop.

7671. The dispute has ended in the advowsons going to the bishop?—Yes; he has got them; and I think they are better with him than the society.

7672. You consider this, therefore, as a very unfortunate year for the Irish society?—Yes, in one sense; and in another it was very fortunate in getting rid of all those suits. Large sums were however spent, it will be seen, in that year, in the promotion of education and other public and benevolent objects.

7673. Do you believe the suit in which Lord Langdale's decision was given, which I have quoted, has made a material difference in the management of the Irish society?—I should say not. I think they have gone on in just the same way. I am sure there is every desire on the part of every gentleman connected with the society to manage the funds for the benefit of the people of the district.

7674. How much was spent in the year to which you have called our attention for the purposes of education?—The society spent 3,481*l.* for schools and churches; and in aid of public improvements, and for the employment of the poor, 1,484*l.* Since that time, I should state that the society have allowed the corporation of Londonderry 700*l.* a year for their expenses of recorder, and expenses connected with the corporation and the office of mayor.

7675. Why do they do that?—It is a claim which the corporation made. They thought they had a right to it; and I believe there is a clause in the charter to the effect that some allowance shall be made. They were always picking holes in the Irish society till they got that allowance.

7676. I observe, in the year 1845, when the law-suit of the Skinners' Company versus the Irish society took place, in the account then rendered of the disbursements of the Irish society, there were various sums divided amongst the twelve companies. In 1828, 1,149*l.*; in 1829, 1,149*l.*; in 1830, 1,200*l.*; in 1831, 3,498*l.* I imagine that the result of this suit put an end to those allowances to the twelve companies?—Yes; that was the bone of contention. The twelve companies said they had a right to call upon the Irish society to hand over to them, which they had done for a great number of years, any surplus which might remain in their hands.

7677. Since that time the Irish society feels bound to spend the whole of its surplus for the benefit of that part of Ireland in which their estates are situated?—Yes; and I hope they will always do so.

7678. That, therefore, is a material difference between the system before the suit and afterwards?—Yes. The year after I was in Ireland, in February 1847, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Londonderry, presented a petition to the Court of Common Council, making many complaints with regard to the management of the Irish society; and, upon that, a committee was appointed to investigate the allegations contained in the petition. A day was appointed for hearing the petitions, and persons were to come over from Ireland for the purpose; but, instead of coming, their solicitor wrote a letter, stating that they understood, by the advice of counsel, that the corporation had no power to rectify the errors complained of, and, therefore, they declined to attend them; and the petition, after considerable expenses had been incurred as well by the society as by the coporation, was not proceeded in.

7679. I observe in the last account an item of 700*l.* to the corporation of Derry for the recorder and other officers. Are you able to give us any further explanation why that has been paid lately?—They applied for it during the two years that I was on the Irish society; but we thought that the corporation of Derry had not done what they ought to have done, and therefore we would not allow it them.

7680. You did not think it was a legal claim upon you?—No; but the society afterwards thought it was an equitable claim. They had no funds to sustain the office of recorder and the usual municipal expenses; and instead of their laying a borough rate upon the inhabitants, it was thought better by the society to make this allowance.

7681. You do not suppose that it is a fixed annual charge of 700*l.* which you are to give to them?—Only so long as it is the pleasure of the Irish society to give it.

7682. Londonderry is a flourishing town, is not it?—I should say it is.

7683. Do you know any other town in England or Ireland where the public officers are paid by a society of this description?—I know many that would like it.

7684. I see among the expenses in the last year there is 4,000*l.* repaid to the Union Bank of London?—They had to borrow money to carry on the suits.

7685. Is the debt now cleared off?—I believe it is.

7686. Did they pay that sum out of the income of one year?—No. I think they were going on several years paying it off; now, I believe, they are free.

7687. I see there is a balance in favour of the society of 1,400*l.*, upon the receipts of last year?—Yes; but I can give you no account of it, The mischief of it is, a person having been on the society for two years, and then going off, has very little chance of ever being on again; and that is just the case with me.

7688. In the last year, 1853, I see the expense of management was very considerable. There are salaries in Ireland of 790*l.* a year; visitation of members to society's estates, 300*l.* a year. In England, there is the governor, the deputy governor, and twenty-four members, for their attendance at thirty-seven meetings, 560*l.* The secretary in London has a salary of 400*l.*, besides, I presume, some part of those charges, such as incidental expenses, 361*l.*?—They have a house in London, which was built by the society.

7689. All that must be put under the charge of management?—No doubt.

7690. Why are they obliged to have a house in London?—They are in daily communication with the agent in Ireland, and with other parties. There are, also, continual applications for charities of every description, which are always closely investigated.

7691. I will again suppose that this was an estate belonging to a private individual; would not this be thought rather an extravagant way of managing that property?—I think if the income of the House of Commons belonged to you and me, we should manage it much more economically than the House of Commons does. I never expect public property to be managed like private property.

7692. The whole object of the society is to do good with its estates?—Yes; and they have done a great deal of good, more than a private individual could do.

7693. Do you think they could have done more good if less money had been spent in the management?—I think they have been induced to look after it and manage it as closely as can be expected, and as honestly.

7694. If this property were once put in perfect order, might not it be managed more economically, without these visitations and this immense staff?—I must refer you to the observations which were made by Lord Langdale and Lord Lyndhurst, upon their giving judgments in the suit by the Skinners' Company, in which various charges of wasteful expenditure were made against the Irish society. When I was in Ireland, the deputation visited twenty-one schools, to which we gave donations; sixteen churches and chapels. I had the honour of laying the first stone of a Presbyterian church, in Londonderry, to which the society gave a liberal donation. We also visited various hospitals and public institutions, and granted annuities to several aged persons, and gave donations to others.

7695. Are there any other observations which you wish to make to the Commissioners?—

J. Anderton, Esq.

7th Feb. 1854.

I wish to refer to the evidence of Mr. Hankey. I see, at 1710, a question is put to him with regard to the hospitalities exercised by the Lord Mayor. "Do not you think there "is a certain fitness in the chief magistrate of the City sometimes presiding at "entertainments on public occasions?—So long as there is a corporation in the City of "London, and a chief magistrate, or chief, by whatever name he may be designated, if "the magisterial duties were removed, I think the duties of hospitality, as exercised by the "present Lord Mayor, are by no means undesirable; but I think the annual entertainment "at the Guildhall is a very heavy expense, and a very useless one. I do not know how "many thousands of pounds are spent in that entertainment, which scarcely gives "gratification to anybody but the idle boys about the streets of London." I have here a copy of a letter which Mr. Hankey must have forgotten; for whatever his opinion with regard to the dinner at the Guildhall may be, Mrs. Hankey it seems is of a different opinion. In that letter, written by Mr. Hankey himself to the remembrancer, he says, "Dear Sir,— "On former occasions I have received an invitation to the Guildhall dinner for Mrs. "Hankey; may I expect the same this year, or must I make a special application for it "in order to obtain or to ask for the favour?" And yet Mr. Hankey condemns the dinners, and says that they are only fit for the gratification of boys. Again, in December 1852, he writes by the secretary of the Bank of England, who says he is desired by the governor of the bank to apply for a seat for Mrs. Hankey, at the Guildhall, on Wednesday the 8th; that she has got an alderman's ticket, but is not aware whether that of itself would insure suitable accommodation. Yet Mr. Hankey gives this evidence in condemning the dinner at the Guildhall. Mr. Travers also chooses to attack the corporation. The question is put to him, whether the higher classes of London would accept the office of Lord Mayor. He says, "No; I do not think that anything would "induce the higher class in the City of London to undertake an office that would be at "all of the nature of the present office of Lord Mayor." I only know that at a dinner which was given to Sir John Pirie, upon the occasion of presenting a piece of plate to him, when Mr. Cotton, the then governor of the Bank, was in the chair, I heard from some of the principal merchants who were then present that they should feel proud to fill the office of chief magistrate, but that they could not afford time to reach the office, by the duties which they would have to perform as aldermen. I believe, taking the Court of Aldermen, there are not twenty-six more honourable men to be found in the City of London; and any one of them, I believe, may stand in as good a situation as Mr. Travers, in point of class, talent, character, and respectability. Then he says, in regard to the common council, "If you were to ask the opinions of the smaller shopkeepers who "belong to the common council, I think they are strongly in favour of local government." Now, I belong to the common council, and I think I am as respectable and as independent a man as Mr. Travers. In regard to shopkeepers, there are six common councilmen of this ward, and not a shopkeeper among them, and he ought to have known that. I firmly believe Mr. Travers would not have come here to make the statements he has done, if he had been allowed to have his carts and waggons standing in his street, and the aldermen had not pulled him up for it. He says, "The office "has lost the character that it once possessed; but I believe that, beyond that, there is a "feeling on the part of every educated man that the office itself is what we may term a "humbug from beginning to end." I, in reply to this, think the Commissioners have received evidence from gentlemen belonging to the common council, which must have shown them that it contains men of as high respectability and education as Mr. Travers. With regard to the Lord Mayor's show, I hope it will never be done away with. I have here a statement of the expenditure on Lord Mayor's day, for the Lord Mayor's show, in 1850 (producing the same). In Mr. Alderman Farncomb's mayoralty, the expense of the show was about 130*l.*; in Sir John Musgrove's, 400*l.* I think the show is the strongest demonstration which we can have of the advantages of self and popular government. The thousands and tens of thousands, including thousands of respectable men and women with their families, that were drawn out upon the last Lord Mayor's day, without the necessity of a single soldier, and almost without necessity for a single policeman, I believe astonished every foreigner who saw it. Besides which, it is always looked upon as the working man's holiday, the only one in the year. With regard to the accounts of the corporation, I may mention that some years ago, I think three years after I entered the common council, I had a committee given to me, "To investigate the accounts of the "produce and expenditure of the City and Bridge House estates, and to report whether "any reasonable retrenchments could be effected; also, to inquire and report by what "authority (if any) the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen grant pensions and draw upon "the chamber of the City for payment of the same, or for any sum of money without the "previous sanction or authority of this court." After which they gave me a further committee of inquiry: "To inquire into the duties, salaries, fees, profits, and emoluments of the several "officers of the corporation, and also into the amount of the City's revenue, the various "sources from which it arises, and how and in what manner it is expended, specifying "each item in detail both at this time and in the year 1797, and to report whether any, "and if any, what reduction can be made in the several items of expenditure above referred "to. To consider the charges on the admission of persons to the freedom. To inquire "into the nature and extent of the duties performed by the prothonotary of the Borough "Court, and the necessity or expediency of continuing the same, or whether any and

" what alteration should be made in respect of the said office." Of this committee I had the honour of being chairman for several years. We suggested various alterations and improvements in the mode of keeping the accounts, among others the following: " That for the purpose of better showing the receipt and expenditure of the income of " the corporation in its several departments, all officers and tradesmen of the corporation " do in future send in separate bills and accounts for all business done under the following " heads, and that the warrants be respectively drawn for the same accordingly, viz., In " respect of the magistracy and police connected therewith. In respect of each prison " separately. In respect of the administration of justice at the Central Criminal Court " and the Sessions House in the Old Bailey. In respect of the conservancy of the river " Thames and waters of the Medway. In respect of the civil government of the City. " In respect of the markets, each market separately. In respect of the Guildhall and the " buildings connected therewith. The like of the public buildings of the City. The like " of casual, miscellaneous, or extraordinary work or business not connected with either " of the foregoing heads. And it was ordered, that the comptroller, remembrancer, and " solicitor do also hereafter deliver in separate bills and accounts for all business done, or " expenses incurred by them in relation to the City dues upon coals, corn, and all other duties " belonging to the City, and also in respect of the general property and estates of the City." It was likewise ordered, " That the hall-keeper do so keep his accounts of disbursements " as shall enable the committee for letting the City's land or any other committee to draw " warrants for the same under each head of expenditure." These were some of the results of that committee, and the accounts have since been kept in the way so recommended by the committee. We also made various other reports upon the accounts from time to time, and no men ever went into those accounts more honestly or zealously than those did who were connected with me upon that occasion. Although that committee worked frequently four and five hours a day they never spent a single farthing of the corporation money. With regard to the members of the common council, I take leave to say that in 1841 I issued an address to my constituents in which I stated this: " Having communi- " cated to you what is in progress in relation to the revenues and funds of the " corporation, it is but an act of justice I owe to the general body of the members of the " Court of Common Council thus publicly to declare that I have at all times witnessed, " both in the court and in the various committees in which I have been present, the " most anxious desire among men of all parties to conduct the business in such a manner " as should best promote and secure the interests of their fellow citizens; and it has " often been a matter of surprise to me (as it must have been to others) that so many " individuals of respectability engaged in large mercantile and trading establishments " should be willing to devote so much of their valuable time to the affairs of the " corporation without (as far as I have been able to discover) any other advantage to " themselves, than what arises from the satisfaction of having faithfully and honestly " discharged a public duty." That was my opinion of the Court of Common Council in 1841, and it is my honest and unbiassed opinion in 1854. I would also add that some few years ago I had some doubts about the allowances to the committees. I doubted whether they were not over paid. Like many others, being then as I am still a reformer, I thought the allowances were too much for the duties performed; and, therefore, in 1841 I got an order of the court made that all the committees should make a return of their duties and the amount of property under their control. Upon which the Coal, Corn, and Finance committee made a return of their duties, stating them to be: " To examine the " accounts of the collection of the dues on coals monthly at the coal market, and to see " that the amounts of the whole dues are paid into the chamber of the City, which for " the last three years have been as follows:—In 1839, 139,818*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*; in 1840, " 144,471*l.* 3*s.* 10½*d.*; in 1841, 157,847*l.* 12*s.* 2¾*d.* To give such directions as may " appear to be necessary from time to time for the repair of the coal market in Thames " Street, and the several offices connected therewith; to let such offices to proper persons " and to examine and audit the collectors' accounts of the rents for the same half yearly; " the produce of which for the last three years has been as follows,—in 1839, 582*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*; " in 1840, 573*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; in 1841, 597*l.* 14*s.* 0*d.*" And it goes on stating other duties which that committee have to perform, for which they are allowed 200*l.* a year. Formerly that same committee used to spend 1,200*l.* a year. The City Lands committee, which is the chief committee of the corporation, in 1808 spent 1,417*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* a year; they are now allowed 400*l.* a year, and have " To manage and let the estates belonging to the " corporation. To grant building and repairing leases. To see that the covenants in " such leases are duly performed. And to view the said estates in order to ascertain if any " encroachments have been made, and on all applications for leases to view the premises " attended by the City architect previously to treating for the same, to enable the " committee to form an opinion of the value thereof. To see that the rents reserved by " such leases are paid into the chamber of the City, which for the last three years have " exceeded 44,000*l.* a year. To grant leases of premises within the manor of Finsbury " holden by the corporation on lease from the prebendary of the prebend of Hilliwell and " Finsbury (one sixth part of the net yearly rents arising therefrom being payable to the " prebendary for the time being). And to see that the rents received by such leases are paid " into the chamber of this City, which for the last three years (after deducting the one-sixth " belonging to the said prebendary) have exceeded 11,000*l.* a year. To let the tolls collected

" at the several gates and bars of this City, which were then let for three years from " Midsummer 1841 at a gross rental amounting to 4,795*l.* per annum. To audit " artificers' bills. To audit the accounts of the various officers." They say, "We also " beg leave to report that the amount of income under our management or audit for the " last three years has been as follows:—In 1839. 71,939*l.* 15*s.* 2¾*d.*; in 1840, " 70,038*l.* 6*s.* 7¾*d.*; in 1841, 69,999*l.* 14*s.* 8¾*d.*" I have been myself upon that committee. I have gone there at twelve o'clock in the morning and have been there till five in the afternoon. I have gone out in all weathers for the purpose of viewing the estates before they are let, and the committee, consisting of the Lord Mayor, eleven aldermen, and twenty-nine commoners, are allowed 400*l.* a year, which upon an average is about 6*s.* 6*d.* for a dinner and a pint of wine afterwards. The Bridge House committee have an allowance of 300*l.* a year. In 1807 they expended 1,900*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*, of which the tavern expenses amounted to 1,162*l.* 10*s.* The property under their management exceeds 30,000*l.* a year, and like the City Lands committee they have a great deal to do. There are returns also from various other committees to the same effect. I have only further to say that with regard to any reform in the corporation the abominable Act of 11th George the 1st I hope will be repealed, and I hope it will be repealed upon the grounds stated by the Lords in their protests at the time when that Bill passed. There was a petition against its passing signed by many thousand inhabitants of the City, and all that they state in opposition to it have been realized, and so continue at the present moment.

7696. Reverting to the Irish society, does it appear to you that there is any necessity, when a visitation is made to the estates in Ireland, for so large a number as seven members going over for the purpose?—I should say not. Every gentleman, however, wishes to see the estates, and to know what is going on, and he gets a little journey into the bargain which is very pleasant. There is also an advantage in the tenants personally knowing their landlords to be present. They can make known their grievances (if they have any); I found great benefit in it. Many of the poorer tenants had never seen their landlords, and expressed their surprise and pleasure when we called upon them.

7697. Is there anything else which you wish to state to the Commission?—I wish to draw the attention of the Commissioners to the lieutenancy of the City of London. There is a very large sum of money collected in the way of rates as a "trophy tax" for the militia. The Lord Mayor is at the head of that commission, and claims the right of opening it whenever he pleases. Persons are put on who are totally unconnected with the City which, I think, ought not to be.

7698. Put in as commissioners of the lieutenancy?—Yes it enables them to wear a red coat, but they are totally unconnected with the City, and I do not think persons ought to be there and collect and distribute the funds of the citizens of London, unless they have some connection with it.

7699. How are they appointed?—They are appointed by the Crown by a commission, The Lord Mayor claiming the right of opening the commission, whenever he pleases, and nominating whom he pleases; so that when a Lord Mayor has any members of his family whom he wishes to be put into the commission and to wear a red coat, he opens the commission, and they are put in.

7700. Do the commissioners stand in the position of deputy lieutenants?—No, they stand in the position of Lord Lieutenant; the whole office of the Lord Lieutenant is put into commission.

7701. How is the troply tax imposed?—It is imposed under Act of Parliament, by the commissioners in the first place, and afterwards by the common councilmen of the respective wards. The order goes from the commissioners of lieutenancy..

7702. It is a sort of county rate, is it?—It is.

P. Richardson, Esq.

PHILETUS RICHARDSON, Esq. was further examined as follows.

7703. Is there anything which you wish to add to the evidence you have already given to this Commission?—I wish to make some observations on my former evidence in consequence of the evidence given by Mr. Scott on the 11th of January last, which I have seen. They arise upon Question No. 3629. At the latter part of the answer to that question Mr. Scott alludes to a paper called the Citizen. He says there, after mentioning that it was established by a man named Peel, which was the fact, "Mr. Toulmin Smith became the sole proprietor and editor of that paper." In my evidence I stated to you that I was employed professionally on the behalf of Mr. Toulmin Smith and Mr. Scott, and that they were the joint purchasers and joint proprietors of that paper. I wish to state that that is the fact. It is denied here, but it is the fact that Mr. Scott and Mr. Smith were the joint purchasers and joint proprietors of that paper.

7704. What Mr. Scott says is this, "The evidence upon that point is not strictly correct, "that I was joint proprietor with Mr. Toulmin Smith. I advanced a sum of money to "assist Mr. Smith in the object?"—That is not correct. Mr. Scott purchased the copyright of that paper jointly with Mr. Smith.

7705. Mr. Scott says he did not. Is not it a point that he is likely to know more accurately than yourself?—He employed me to pay the purchase money for the copyright of that paper on behalf of himself and Mr. Smith.

P. Richardson, Esq.

7706. Mr. Scott says, "I advanced a sum of money to assist Mr. Smith in the object." He may have done that without actually being a co-partner with Mr. Smith in the paper, may he not?—When I was called before you on a former occasion I did not know the object for which I was called, nor did I know till long after at whose instance I was called. I understand reports have been spread, with which I need not trouble you, which are totally unfounded and wholly ungenerous, and I do not go into them for many reasons; but I come here to-day to reiterate my statement, which I am prepared to prove. What I said was strictly correct, that Mr. Scott and Mr. Smith were the purchasers and proprietors of that newspaper. That statement I am ready to put in issue in any manner which may be suggested. Mr. Scott authorized me to come and state on the former occasion all I did say. When you asked me one question, I said I would refer you to Mr. Scott, who desired me to say that he would attend and give any further explanation you might desire. I complain that the fact of my having come here should have been made the subject of comment intended to be injurious to me, which has been done. I will only mention one other subject. It occurs upon Question 3638. In answer to a question of one of the Commissioners, Mr. Scott says, "The total sum, including a bill of costs due "to Mr. Toulmin Smith's solicitor, Mr. Richardson, who has been examined before you, "who raised a claim first against the officers and then against the corporation, which bill "was paid, without prejudice, under the advice of the law officers, was 280*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*" Now I can only say, that I never raised any claim against the officers in any way whatever. I never raised any claim against the corporation in any way whatever. Mr. Scott never paid me, as between himself and me, any bill of costs without prejudice. What he did pay me was this. It was a very troublesome matter; there were several documents prepared, and there was an action at law against Mr. Peel. He paid me two bills of costs amounting to 72*l.* It would only have been generous to state also that I offered to Mr, Scott to forego any charges, in consequence of the failure of the project and under the idea, that Mr. Scott was a loser by it. It appears however from that answer, that I made a claim against the corporation, then against the officers, and then they paid me 280*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* "without prejudice." That is entirely without foundation.

J. Turnley, Esq.

Joseph Turnley, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7707. You are chairman of the Navigation committee?—I am.

7708. How long have you filled that situation?—I have been only recently elected, 7709. How long have you been on the Navigation committee?—Three years.

7710. How long have you been connected with the common council?—Six years.

7711. Are you a trader residing in London?—I am a lighterman.

7712. Where are your premises?—The Custom House quay.

7713. Is the chairman of the Navigation committee always a gentleman connected with the trade upon the river?—No, not always; there are only two of us immediately connected with the trade.

7714. Only two members of the Navigation committee?—No; but there are other persons very conversant with that business who have been on the committee some years. The last chairman but one was a gentleman who had been connected with the sea for a great part of his life.

7715. Is there a disposition on the part of the Navigation committee, in selecting the chairman, to prefer some one of its members who has a practical acquaintance with the business of the river?—I think there are only two of us in the common council who are immediately connected with the water side.

7716. Do you not think it desirable that there should be a larger infusion of practical knowledge into the Navigation committee?—I think so if it were possible, but I do not think it is absolutely necessary that we should all be connected with the water side.

7717. Is it not an anomaly, at all events, that a committee appointed to watch such important interests as those of the navigation of the river Thames should almost entirely consist of gentlemen whose previous avocations have been of a totally different description?—Supposing there are not members belonging to the common council to fill such a position, they must be taken from some other source.

7718. Do you think it would be advisable to modify the constitntion of this committee with a view of obtaining more knowledge on peculiar subjects which are under its jurisdiction?—I think if you could get practical men, they would be better suited for the duties.

7719. Has any mode ever occurred to you by which that object could be accomplished?—No. I have heard suggestions; for instance, I read Mr. Powles's idea that we should have members of the dock companies. I think that would work very badly; they would be interested men, whereas the persons we now have are perfectly independent and there is no chance of any jobbery.

7720. It was proposed at one time, in a Bill which received the sanction of the City, that there should be an infusion of members appointed by the Government?—I think the Government officers would not work well with us. It was suggested that the Trinity corporation should send five or six members. I think, so long as you paid the members of the Trinity corporation, they would be among us; but I do not think they would give their time as members of the common council do. I was in attendance on the committee 82 days, for I will call them days, beginning as they do at 11 o'clock in the morning till after five.

J. Turnley, Esq.

7721. The officers of the committee, it is acknowledged, are very competent persons for their duties?—Very competent indeed. The harbour masters are first-rate men, all of them.

7722. The result of that state of things must be, must not it, that the Navigation committee naturally relies upon the judgment of its officers very much?—In some measure; but I give myself credit for knowing something, and I do not always fall in with the views of the officers, nor do the other members. They are all efficient men.

7723. Do not you think that the other members who have not the advantage you possess of having some degree of knowledge on these subjects must, to a certain extent, rely upon the advice of the officers?—They may, and there is no doubt they do in a great measure, but as I have said before, we do not rely entirely upon them. There are various points upon which you, not knowing at all or being connected with the water side, are quite as competent as myself to give an opinion. We are called upon to make grants for different purposes, You could go with me and I could point them out to you, and you would perfectly understand the case in a moment. Supposing a person comes up before us for a grant to drive piles or make a pier, we first ask for a plan, which is put upon the table, and we inspect it. Reference is then made to the sub-committee, the sub-committee go down and view the premises, and they request that all parties, that is to say, the parties more immediately concerned, and the neighbours right and left should be present, to put in any objection which they may entertain; but as far as we can, we endeavour to keep one line of embankment; there is a line laid down by Captain Bullock and Mr. Walker, which we endeavour to get the tenants to come out to.

7724. Do you think the condition of the river below bridge is satisfactory?—It has never been satisfactory so long as I can recollect, there have always been shoals, and there always will be.

7725. Are not those shoals becoming more inconvenient year by year, in consequence of the increased size of the vessels navigating the river?—Yes; I think that is very probable. Nearly all the shipping is worked by steam power, and I believe ultimately it will all be so.

7726. Is there a want of adequate funds to devote to the clearing of the shoals from the river, and other objects of the kind?—I think if we had more money at our disposal we could do a great deal of good.

7727. Do you think the want of those funds is a serious injury to the river?—No doubt of it.

7728. In point of fact at present, I believe the jurisdiction of the corporation over the river is not a source of profit to them in any manner, but rather the contrary?—Rather the contrary; beyond the tidal way it is a great loss to the City.

7729. Below bridge it is not a source of profit, is it?—Not at all.

7730. Are there any other observations which you are desirous of making?—Not on that subject. The Commissioners probably do not read much of civic matters, but I may mention that in June last I was elected one of the sheriffs of the City, which I most decidedly rebelled against. I would not serve for the reasons which I will tell you. There is in the City a man of the name of Rose. I was attending the Navigation committee on the 23d of June. He came in and put on a piece of paper that he wished to speak to me. I went to him. He said, "I am very sorry, Mr. Turnley, but I must elect "you sheriff to-morrow." I said, "It is very handsome of you, perhaps you will tell me "the reason.

7731. Who is Mr. Rose?—I believe he is in some way connected with the coal trade. He calls himself an agent, I believe. I told him I most assuredly should not serve, and there was another thing, that I would most assuredly not pay the fine, because I considered it was nothing but a rank robbery and imposition, and I would resist it upon public grounds. I happened to be a member of the Court of the Merchant Tailors' Company, and I presume he fancied I was just the man to plunder. He said, "Where shall you "be? I shall most likely wish to see you to-morrow." Three years before Sir John Musgrove nominated me, with three other gentlemen, to be put on the roll as fit and proper men to be elected to this office; he did so without my knowledge and without my consent. From that time to last June, I had been continually beseiged by this man Rose. He said, "Every year I must elect you." However, I kept my hands out of my pockets, and said: "While there is one alderman who has not served, he has a prior right "to be elected to the office." I said, "There is Mr. Alderman Wire, why not put him in?" He said, "As for David Wire, he will do what he pleases; he will go in when he likes, "and keep out when he likes." I believe he wished to go in then, and he was chosen after I had refused to serve. I did not pay Mr. Rose to keep me out, and the consequence was that I was put in or elected, when I found there was no alternative but to pay or to serve. I put in a memorial to the Court of Aldermen, praying to be relieved not only from serving the office but from the payment of the fine. I have been before them, and up to the present moment they have not put it into the hands of their solicitor; but I stand now in what I may term a state of jeopardy, as to whether I am to pay or not to pay. This I have promised them, that as they have put me into such a position, they may have my body, but my property they shall never have. After Mr. Rose had done me the honour to elect me, he did me the honour to send down the fellows who had elected me to be paid for doing it, they having been promised if they elected Turnley they should be paid by Mr. Rose or his agent. When the election was over, Mr. Rose left the hall without paying them; they therefore waited upon me. There were some hundreds of unwashed fellows came down for that purpose.

J. Turnley, Esq.

7732. You probably declined to pay them?—I did.

7733. In what capacity do you suppose Mr. Rose acted when he spoke to you in this manner?—I have not the slightest idea, any further than it appears to me that he conducts this election just as he pleases. If a person is named to the office of sheriff, Mr. Rose immediately waits upon him to know if he wishes to serve. If he does he is then told, "if he will pay Mr. Rose 50*l.* he will insure his election; if he does not "feel disposed to say yes, he is safe NOT TO BE ELECTED." On the contrary, if the gentleman refuses to serve, he is then told, "he, Mr. Rose, is very sorry, but does not see "how to keep him out, he having been nominated." Then, having frightened the man to his, Mr. Rose's, purpose, he tells him he will try what can be done to prevent his election, but it will be very expensive, say 40*l.* or 50*l.*; so that in both cases Mr Rose makes money. If he fancies you will not pay him, you are likely to be put into the office; but if you do pay him, he keeps you out of it. He came three years ago on my premises, and said, "I am very sorry, but I must elect you." I said, "I can get 300 or "400 men who will come and vote against me." He said, "What will that signify? I "have 900 men who will come up and vote for you, and there are 200 bankers' clerks "who come out at 1 o'clock to get their dinner; I will have them all in, and your election "will be carried to a certainty."

7734. Do you believe that this system of appointing sheriffs, for the sake of their fines, is at all countenanced by any persons of respectability connected with the corporation?—Not in the slightest degree.

7735. You do not believe that it is resorted to for the purpose of getting money by the corporation?—No. This man acts quite independently of the corporation; it is a business by which he gets a portion of his living.

7736. You think it is only made the means of annoyance and profit by the inferior agents?—That is all.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

WILLIAM JONES, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7737. What is your connection with the corporation of the City of London?—I have lived in the City of London ever since 1821, and I have been a member of the corporation from 1832.

7738. Are you engaged in any trade?—I am a solicitor.

7739. Do you reside in London?—I reside in Crosby Square, but I have a country residence in North Wales, to which I retire in the long vacation, when I can get out of London.

7740. Are you a common councilman?—I am, and have been for upwards of twenty years.

7741. Have you taken an active part in the business of the common council, upon their committees or otherwise?—I have; and I have felt it my duty to come here, seeing that a good deal has been said, I think unjustly, to the prejudice of the corporation, not with a view to extenuate or to excuse failings in which I think amendments may be made, but to do justice to the members generally, and to give you any information in my power respecting the several committees, and the Irish society, of which I have been a member. I have been in the corporation for twenty years, and in that time I have been on the General Purposes committee, on the Bridge House Estates committee, the Blackfriars Bridge Repairs committee, the Markets committee, of which I was one year chairman, the City Lands committee, the Secondary's committee, and the Law Bills committee; and I have been a member of the Irish society, and deputy-governor.

7742. In what year were you connected with the Irish society?—In the years 1843 and 1844.

7743. You have not been connected with it since?—I have not. There was a strong desire that I should be put on the society again, but the Court of Common Council considered that they could not depart from the terms of the charter; and, having fulfilled my service of two years, I was obliged to go off.

7744. Do the terms of the charter preclude re-election after an interval to this committee?—Certainly not. There are men ambitious to get upon the Irish society, and in the wards which we represent we do not wish to interfere with each other's turn or rota to be put on.

7745. Is it considered rather an object to be placed upon the committee of the Irish society?—It is most respectable, and I think a man would be desirous of belonging to it.

7746. Is it agreeable as well as respectable?—Yes. I see a gentleman present whose company we often have among us, and it is very agreeable.

7747. Have you a favourable impression of the management of the Irish society?—I have, unquestionably.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

7748. Do not you think that the expenses of management are somewhat large in proportion to the amount received?—I heard the questions with reference to that subject which were put to Mr. Anderton. I may say that the case bears no analogy to the management of a gentleman's estate of 8,000*l.* a year. It is a society which has important public duties to perform. Those duties are incessant; not by the committee or the society alone, but the officers are constantly in communication with Ireland. There is not a single thing done there with regard to leases, and the general management of the estate and business of the society, which is not submitted to the consideration of the society here. I think, therefore, that though the expenses are large, and might be reduced, it does not bear any analogy to the management of a gentleman's estate.

7749. Suppose a gentleman's estate were precisely of the same description?—In that case, if he did not himself act as secretary, and devote his entire time to the management of the estate, it would be impossible for him to do it, except at a very considerable expense. Whether the secretary is underpaid or overpaid I do not take upon myself to discuss. I see that since I was on the society his salary has been somewhat increased.

7750. Putting the whole cost of management together, a part of which is incurred in England and a part in Ireland, do not you think it is considerable, as compared with the gross rental of the property?—I do not think it could be much reduced. Up to 1831 the society rendered no accounts to the corporation or to the public. In 1831 there was a change in the constitution of the society. Up to that time it was thought that to be a member of the Irish society you must be a member of one of the twelve companies, and the twelve companies, being interested, (as no doubt they would be in any surplus income derived out of that management) divided the surplus income among themselves, instead of applying it, as now, to public purposes.

7751. Do you believe that, at this moment, the twelve companies, after the judgment given in the case of the Skinners' Company and the Irish society, are beneficially interested in any surplus?—That decision, as appears to me, amounts to this: the Irish society are not naked trustees for the twelve companies to manage the estate for their exclusive benefit, but they are in the nature of public trustees, to apply funds, in their discretion, for the benefit of the plantation, and if there be any surplus, then the twelve companies would, in my opinion, be entitled to it.

7752. Are you prepared to make that statement, now, as a lawyer?—I believe you will see that that is the effect of the decision come to in the case of the Skinners' Company.

7753. Do you believe that practically there ever could be a surplus after the public objects which the company is bound to attend to are accomplished?—I think it is possible after the payments of the debts which they have been involved in. With respect to the law expenses, no doubt they are enormous; but could the society have helped that, unless you mean to say that, as public trustees, they were to allow their property to be entirely taken away from them? An immense sum has been expended in the protection of their fisheries; for instance, the Marquis of Donegal and others used to claim a right to fish in Lough Foyle. He gave, or it was pretended that he gave, a licence to a parcel of paupers to fish in Lough Foyle; in consequence the Irish society were anxious that the magistrates on the spot should determine such cases, and as the question of right had been before, over and over again, determined in his favour in the courts of law, they applied to the magistrates to act summarily in the matter, but they answered, "No; these men claim a right, and we "cannot try that right." The consequence has been that the fisheries have been pillaged to an enormous amount, and the Irish society put to great expense in defending their rights. The same with regard to their advowsons. I have no doubt, had the Irish society presented to those livings when they had the opportunity, they might have retained them I do not mean to say that the livings are not now in more legitimate hands than the Irish society. There was also a long dispute with the Bishop of Derry with respect to 1,500 acres of land, which had, by some means or other, got into his holding. This, by a proceeding on the part of the society, was recovered back. In the case of the suit with the Skinners' Company, I believe the expense of that suit was about 8,000*l.* They were obliged to defend that suit, or they felt they could no longer be of any use to Ireland. I trust, now, however, that they have done with law expenses.

7754. Is any restriction placed upon the society with regard to the kind of public objects which they are called upon to aid, or as to the locality of them?—Decidedly; the locality of Londonderry and Coleraine.

7755. Must the improvements be in the borough or the vicinity?—The Irish society does not confine itself to the boroughs; it gives to charities and schools without the boroughs.

7756. You would conceive that all that part of Ireland which is called the plantation would be a fit object of their supervision and care in the promotion of charitable and benevolent objects?—It might be so; but I do not think it would become necessary, for the plantation having been divided, except as to the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine and the fisheries and ferries and the town lands, between the twelve companies, the twelve companies are so interested in the maintenance of their own proportions that they never make any claim upon the Irish society. I assure you that I have been there, and it is impossible to visit the several estates of the Cloth-workers, Drapers, Mercers, and the other companies, without admitting the great advantages which they must be to the country and the liberality with which as landlords they act towards their tenants; they are expending in point of fact almost the whole of their income.

7757. Do you consider that the decision in the case of the Skinners' Company and the Irish society did not determine that the surplus, if any, might not be divisible among the companies?—I think the effect of the decision is that it is divisible among the companies.

7758. Lord Lyndhurst in the House of Lords says, I think, "After they have satisfied "the purposes which purposes are entirely in their discretion, they have been in the habit "of paying over the surplus funds, in round sums I think it is stated, but however they "have paid over the surplus funds to the different companies in proportion to their "original contributions; but that depends entirely on the will of the society, I mean as "to the amount, they are to exercise their judgment as to what is necessary for the "performance of their public duties, and after they have satisfied those duties, after they "have applied to public objects what in their judgment in the fair exercise of that "judgment is necessary for those objects, then it is and then only, that the surplus which "remains subject to their discretion has been usually paid over to the companies. Now, "it is perfectly clear therefore, in this state of things, that they cannot be considered as "trustees for the private benefit of the companies. If they are public officers and have in "any respect neglected their duty they are liable to account, but they are not liable to "account to the companies." The Bill in question did not lie therefore, but you seem to think it did not follow from this decision that if there was really a surplus after performing their public duties, that surplus might not be properly divisible among the companies?—It would be so, I have no doubt. Up to 1831 the members eligible for the Irish society it was thought must be members of one of the twelve companies, and therefore they always elected those members in the Court of Common Council, but in 1831 that rule was departed from and every member of the court who was a freeman of London was declared to be eligible. The Commissioners will observe that it was at that particular time that a new view, as it were, was taken of the objects of the charter, and instead of dividing the money as they did among the twelve companies of which they were members, the society took a different view of the matter, and considered that they were trustees for the advancement of the cities of Londonderry and Coleraine, and the benefit of the plantation generally. From this time the annual accounts of the society have been printed and distributed, and the application of their income made public. I think the companies having taken the entire control and management of their respective allotments upon themselves, and having applied very large portions of those estates which were allotted to them for the advancement of public objects connected with those particular plantations, therefore have not needed any of the proceeds of the indivisible estates for those objects. They have never made any application, in my remembrance, for any aid from this indivisible fund towards any public objects or improvements within their respective allotments. I am not prepared to say that the indivisible fund would not be applicable to the purpose if required.

7760. When did this take place?—It took place a good many years ago. In consequence of that and of the corporation being in point of fact insolvent, the society before the Irish Municipal Act, and I believe immediately after that, made them an allowance. I see in the year 1841 there is an item, "Corporation of Derry towards the support of the magistracy, 820*l.*"

7761-2. That is the year after the Irish Municipal Act, which was in 1840?—Yes, if the Commission refer to the report of the Commissioners of Inquiry into the Irish municipal corporations, they will find all those facts disclosed with respect to their debts and obligations. This goes to the maintenance of a recorder and other officers in the town of Derry. I believe it is conceded with this view: If you, the Irish society, do not pay those officers, we cannot have the benefit of a recorder and other officials which are necessary for the maintenance of the peace and prosperity of the corporation, unless we levy a town rate, and a town rate would press upon our own tenants, that is, the tenants of the Irish society. If they had had to pay a town rate they would have complained to the Irish society and said, You used formerly to maintain this corporation, and now because you refuse, we are burdened with a town rate.

7763. Is there no town rate in those places?—Certainly not for this purpose.

7764. Do you know whether Derry is alone among the boroughs of Ireland in that respect?—Derry and Coleraine I think are alone. There is a sum included in that 700*l.* a year of 90*l.* 10*s.* Irish money, (now 80*l.* sterling), which was always received by them as the rent received from the Bishop of Derry, in respect of the 1,500 acres of land I have before alluded to and which, in consequence of a breach between the bishop and the corporation of Derry, and the disclosure of the facts by them to the Irish society, the society recovered back. They fancied that because the Irish society had so recovered back this 1,500 acres, they ought to have the benefit of it. The effect of that petition, I believe, was praying the corporation of London to interfere to compel the Irish society to give up that 1,500 acres of land to them, or to make them the allowance they asked for.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

7765. Does a considerable part of the town of Londonderry belong to the Irish society?—Indirectly, in consequence of the leases which have been granted.

7766. What proportion of the town may be said to be the property of the Irish society?—I do not exactly know. There is an immense quantity of it which is held upon perpetuity leases; then there are other portions of it on building leases, and other portions upon ordinary leases, which used to be for forty-one years. The perpetuity leases are very prejudicial to the interests of the society, and therefore they have been long discontinued, and whenever the society has had an opportunity of buying in the reversion they have done so. I went to Ireland with a deputation in the year I was deputy governor. There had not been a deputation for some time previously. In that year there was a deputation of the governor, myself, Mr. Alderman Hughes Hughes, the present Mr. Alderman Lawrence, Mr. Thomas Henry Hall, the chairman of the Improvements committee, and Mr. Collingwood, together with the secretary. I think we were about a month, and I may fairly say that I was never more fully occupied than I was during the whole of the days we were upon those estates. We gave notice that we should attend at the Town Hall at Londonderry at eleven o'clock on several days, to hear any complaints or applications which any parties had to make to us, and we sat there hearing those representations, and when we got home we talked of them, and there was not, I believe, a farm upon the estate that we did not visit, nor any subject of complaint that we did not go upon the spot to inquire into.

7767. Is Londonderry a flourishing town?—I doubt it. I mean no disrespect to the Irish character, but there appeared to me nothing that they would not desire the Irish society to do for them, but very little that they would do for themselves.

7768. Still, I suppose, there are a good many men of substance living in the town and neighbourhood?—I have no doubt a great many wealthy and flourishing people. There are two farms there that I think would be an ornament to any country, held by a Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington. When we were there we spent the sum of money that was voted for that deputation, which was 300*l.* We had to entertain public characters and agents, and all official persons during the time we were there, and I do not hesitate to say that we had each to dip into his pocket when we returned to make up the deficiency.

7769. With respect to that 700*l.*, am I right in considering that you treat it as a sum paid directly to the corporation of Londonderry by the Irish society, they not making any town rate?—Precisely.

7770. Which sum, in truth, if they did make a town rate you would be obliged to allow to your tenants in consequence?—I do not know how this would be. The recorder of Derry was appointed before the Municipal Act, and I know that the corporation of Derry refused the services of a recorder. We thought the recorder a necessary officer.

7771. You pay those officers, but you do not interfere with their appointment, do you?—The appointment of the recorder I think in old times used to be with the Irish society, but it is not now. It is now with the Crown.

7772. The Irish society obtains no patronage by those payments?—None at all.

7773. You say the Irish society has a pecuniary interest in making this payment, inasmuch as if they did not make it in this shape it would fall upon their tenants. Of course that argument would tell with much less force in respect to those tenants who had their property under leases in perpetuity, would not it?—I do not know how it would bear upon them. I know this, we were constantly importuned to grant the corporation the means of supporting themselves as a corporation. The society was anxious to meet their wishes, but they were never satisfied. I am quite sure that the discretion which the Irish society has used of paying those officers fairly was a wise one.

7774. The Irish society do not interfere in the local politics of the borough, do they?—Not now. They used, in old times, to say, "I nominate so and so, and I hope you will return him as member." They do not do that now. I observed that some questions were asked of a previous witness with regard to byelaws. Byelaws, under the charter, are subject to the approval of the Irish society. About the year 1730, or thereabouts, they sent them to the Irish society to be considered, and they would not adopt them, and there was a considerable resistance and difficulty in respect of them. Then, when the Municipal Corporation Inquiry took place they attempted to get rid of that obligation, but I believe it will be found by reference to the Irish Municipal Corporation Act that it was continued in the Irish society, and that after a considerable contest. The Lord Lieutenant has also a veto upon those byelaws.

7775. Can you state to us any public reasons which recur to you for the retention of this power?—I cannot.

7776. The power is never exercised, is it, now?—It is never exercised arbitrarily.

7777. Is it exercised at all? In recent years has the Irish society ever interfered to object to any byelaw passed by the corporation of Coleraine or Derry?—I think I am correct in saying that after the Municipal Corporation Act for Ireland passed the corporation of Derry submitted their byelaws to the Irish society, and that the Irish society approved of them.

7778. You do not consider this payment of 700*l.* a year or of any other sum to those municipal officers of Derry to be at all obligatory?—Certainly not. I do not believe that there is any legal instrument by which the society are bound to pay it, but I think they are legally liable to the 90*l.* 10*s.* before referred to.

7779. Do you believe that anything like a promise has been made on the part of the Irish society to continue those payments for some future years?—I know when I was in the Irish society we were constantly importuned to do these sort of things, and I believe the Irish society have since then thought it best to make the allowance. I cannot tell the motive, because it was after I was on the Irish society that this 700*l.* was granted.

7780. Is anything done of the same kind in the town of Coleraine?—I believe not, because the town of Coleraine has never applied to be incorporated under the Irish Corporation Act.

7781. With regard to the management of the Irish society, as connected with the English branch of it, do you think that any diminution of the expense might be fairly made?—Mr. Anderton was asked why they should have a house. The muniments belonging to the society from its first establishment to the present are kept in that house, which was built for that purpose. There was a fire some years ago in the Guildhall, and a part of the muniments were burnt, and after that they built that house for themselves.

7783. Do you know what the expense of building this house was?—I do not. The salary of the secretary was, in my time, 300*l.* a year, but it was thought that his duties had so much increased, that I believe they advanced him to 400*l.* a year. I think the expenses of the governor, deputy-governor, and the members of the society, are limited to 600*l.* a year. They cannot exceed that. Whatever number of meetings, therefore, they have, it must not exceed that. With reference to that subject, I should say that I think, from the judgments that were given in the House of Lords, it will be seen that the Irish society are not only to do everything they can for the promotion of this plantation, but they are to seek to improve the connexion between the two countries. There is a meeting once a month, which is called the court meeting. This must be regularly held. Other meetings are held between those periods. On the court day, after the business is over, the society dine together, and they invite the members of Parliament and other gentlemen connected with Ireland generally. I have never been either in the chair, or present when the governor has been in the chair, without some gentleman connected with that part of Ireland being present to partake of our hospitality. Speaking now in the presence of a gentleman who was our frequent visitor upon those occasions, I can say I have constantly heard him, and others, speak in the highest possible terms of the connection of the society with Ireland, and the advantages which it had conferred upon the country. When in Ireland, upon the deputation, it was really a matter of considerable difficulty to get through the business. Looking to the importunities, upon some particular points, which were brought to bear upon the society by gentlemen in the neighbourhood, and others, it was impossible to dispose of them to the satisfaction of all parties. I may mention the case of a farm that was about to come out of lease; it had been granted about forty years before, at a rental. A gentleman applied to us to ask us to renew the lease to him. We asked him under what title. He said, "My father bought "the lease of that farm twenty or thirty years ago, and I am now the immediate tenant "of the society. The farm has been greatly improved in that time." We then asked him who improved it; was it he, or the tenant in possession? We found it was the tenant in possession. We inquired, "Do you receive any improved rent upon the rent which "you pay the society?" He said, "Certainly." We then asked, "You say your father "paid a consideration for this lease?" He answered, "He did; and it is in respect of that "consideration that I now claim to have the lease renewed by the society." We then said, "Did not your father buy it as an investment for the time, looking forward to the "improved rent, which he has received from that time to the present?" You cannot imagine the difficulty we had to shake off that claim. Then there was the claim of the tenant in possession, which was a reasonable one, because, in addition to a rack rent, he had improved the property. It has been the object of the society for many years to get immediate tenants instead of intermediate holders, middle-men as they are called; and to give to the tenants in possession the advantages of any improvement which they have made to the property. I think great advantages arise to the society from a deputation going over every two or three years. When you are on the spot you have an opportunity of inquiring into circumstances, and of noting them down, which you otherwise could not have. I do not approve of the members going by themselves, because I think that must be prejudicial.

7784. It seldom happens, I presume, according to the system pursued by which no member remains more than two years upon the society, that any deputation goes twice?—Scarcely ever.

7785. Does not that system very much diminish any advantage which there might be in members going over there, and obtaining a personal knowledge of the estates?—There is no question about it.

7786. You say they can only remain two years in office. Might they be immediately re-elected?—There is nothing in the charter to prevent their re-election, but you must be one year off before you are re-elected.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

7th Feb. 1854.

7787. What is the reason, then, that that is not done?—That is with the Court of Common Council, when the election comes on. There are certain gentlemen who state, "I am as fit to be on the Irish society as Mr. Jones is." "No," it may be said, "Mr. Jones has had an experience of the past two years." It was proposed, in my case, to the Court of Common Council to re-elect me for two years more.

7788. There seems to be a much greater wish to be on this particular committee than any other connected with the corporation. Is not that the case?—I believe that is the case.

7789. How do you account for that?—I do not know how to account for that, except that we meet Sir Robert Ferguson and other gentlemen who are very pleasant to meet, and we have a rather more social party.

7790. It is connected with a good deal of pleasant travelling and agreeable company?—There is no travelling unless there is a deputation.

7791. Is not there generally a deputation?—There did not use to be.

7792. The last three or four years, has not there been a deputation every year?—Two or three years following there have been deputations, I know. When we went in a body to Ireland we were received by the authorities in Dublin. I think there is a tone and character to be given to the society which ought to be maintained on all occasions.

7793. When money is given for the purpose of a deputation, is it stipulated that they shall go as a deputation, or are they allowed to go individually or collectively, as they think fit?—When I went, and I know nothing of subsequent arrangements, the deputation were to meet. I had the purse in my pocket, and I should not have paid the expenses of any individual if they had not kept together as a deputation during the whole of the period that we were in Ireland.

7794. If they go individually can they perform any functions, or exercise any authority on the part of the society?—I really do not know.

7795. Are there any other points to which you are desirous of calling our attention?—With respect to the Court of Aldermen a great deal has been said as to the disinclination of men in a certain mercantile position in the City of London to become aldermen. My opinion is that that is entirely from personal motives and convenience to themselves. They cannot, or will not, or think they ought not, to devote the time which is necessarily required for the duties of the office of an alderman. I do not think the objection to becoming an alderman exists on the grounds which they have imputed to it, that it is derogatory to the character of a first-rate merchant to become one. With regard to the mode of discharging their duties as magistrates, I have been a member of the profession upwards of forty years, and I think I know something of the mode in which justice is administered, both by paid magistrates and unpaid magistrates in town and in the country, and I am prepared to say that with the experience which the aldermen in the City of London have of the world as practical men, from their business habits and from their information, they make unexceptionable magistrates in a commercial city. Though my friend Mr. Cotton rather induced you to believe that they were in effect stipendiary magistrates without the responsibility of being such, because they had clerks of an efficient character acquainted with the law to attend them, and intimated that they received their information by way of dictation, as it were, from their clerks, I do not think that is at all the case except where an intricate question of law arises, and it is useful to have the legal knowledge of the clerk. Looking to the matters which come before them generally, I think they are, from their habits of business and their good common sense, able and better able to discharge the functions of magistrates in the City of London than if you were to have paid magistrates; and although Mr. Cotton did draw a comparison in favour of the county magistrates, and did not think that they were so much in the hands of their clerks as the magistrates of the City of London, I entirely differ from him. I do not wish to say anything in disparagement of a country gentleman, but his habits are secluded as compared with men engaged in commercial life, and who have had a long intimacy with the world. I mean to say that the county magistrate is generally as much or more in the hands of the clerk at petty sessions than the aldermen of the City of London. I do not mean to say that there are not some very able men as county magistrates, but I think the magistrates of the City of London are unquestionably useful in their way, and unexceptionable in the mode in which they discharge their duties. I observe that some objection was made to Mr. Alderman Wire having sat the other day on a case where it was said his partner was solicitor, and the prosecutor his client. I do not know how that may be, but I know sufficient of Mr. Alderman Wire to believe that, if the case is explained before you, a very different view will be presented, and I think him incapable of sitting under such circumstances to adjudicate on the case.

7796. In the counties any person who has been an attorney, and wishes to retire from business, must have his name struck off the rolls in order to be a magistrate?—That is the case; for I am on the commission of the peace of the county of Merioneth, but cannot act as a magistrate while there because I am a practising attorney in London, and it is an inconvenience in my part of the country that that is so, because the magistrates are so few.

7797. Is not it provided in other boroughs besides London that the aldermen shall not act as justices?—I think the justices are appointed by the Privy Council. The Mayor for the time being is the magistrate under the Municipal Corporation Act, and they appoint a certain number of magistrates. Whether the aldermen shall be elected for life I think depends upon whether they are to be magistrates or not. If they are magistrates I think they ought not to be periodically elected. If they are not to be magistrates I think there may be less objection to their being subject to periodical election.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

WILLIAM JONES, Esquire, was further examined, as follows.

7798. Will you have the goodness to proceed with any observations which you wish to address to the Commission?—In my evidence on Tuesday I mentioned the several committees of which I had been a member. I observe that I omitted the Navigation committee, and the Consolidated committee; of those also I have been a member. Some observations have been made with reference to the appointment of the committees and the chairmen of the committees; I think it is only just that I should explain more particularly how the committees are appointed, what qualifies a man to be a chairman, and how the selection is made. I belong to the ward of Bishopsgate Within. The two wards of Bishopsgate Without and Bishopsgate Within, although under one alderman, are separate with reference to their members and the duties which they have to perform. We meet after the election on St. Thomas's Day to consider what committees are vacant, and who are the proper members to be selected for those committees, and we return the members' names who are intended to fill up the vacancies from our ward to the Court of Common Council. Questions have been asked as to the qualifications of the persons named, and their extent of information. I know in our previous arrangements we frequently give way one to the other, because that other is the most fitting person to be on the particular committee, as bringing more personal knowledge to the discharge of the duties entrusted to him. For instance, there is the Navigation committee, of which a great deal has been said. There is a member of the ward of Bishopsgate, who unquestionably is a man of experience and usefulness, I mean Mr. Deputy Peacock, who fills the chair in the Commission of Sewers. He has had a large experience on the Navigation committee, being a man who has much time to spare, and therefore I know he has been returned either twice or thrice, which would make in the aggregate a period of either eight or twelve years on that committee. It is solely because we consider that he has more time to give to the subject than the other members. After we have returned the name of the member to the court, it is for the court to say whether that member shall be put upon the committee or not, and any member present may object. According to the 38th standing order, no member is entitled to be on more than one of the following committees—namely, the City Lands, the Bridge House Estates, the Navigation, the Coal and Corn, and the General Purposes. No member can at the same time be a member of more than one of those committees, except in the case of one or two of the wards, who return only four members. Those four members have more committees than any of the members for any of the other wards have, in consequence of the smallness of their numbers. With respect to the qualification of the chairman, there is a standing order that no member can be a chairman of a committee who is not in his third or fourth year. The object of that is, that he may have an opportunity of making himself perfectly acquainted with the duties of the committee before he is called upon to act as chairman. In my experience a fourth year man is always preferred, if there is such a gentleman who will undertake the duties, and is considered competent to do so. The duties of a chairman are very onerous, and occupy an immense deal of his time. He has not only to attend the general meetings and to preside over them, but he has to attend all the sub-committees, and he has to attend every Court of Common Council to which he has a report from that committee to render, and there is scarcely one Court of Common Council to which the leading committees have not a report to present. He must be qualified in that court to maintain the view which the committee have come to, and to explain any matter which their report does not embrace, so as to give the Court of Common Council information to their satisfaction, that they may see that the committee have arrived at a right conclusion, otherwise the report is either rejected or sent back for further consideration. Therefore there is a considerable sacrifice of time required, and you must have men of some intelligence, capable of giving that information to the court which they require to have. It has occasionally happened that there is not one who is in his third or his fourth year. It was my lot on one occasion to be in my second year, when there were two in their third year. It was a question with reference to the markets which was particularly pressing that year upon the consideration of the corporation, and it was thought by that committee that my services during that year would be more particularly acceptable to the committee and the corporation; and they unanimously recommended an application to be made to the Court of Common Council, to suspend the standing order, in order that it might be so arranged. I mention that to show that we do not proceed to the election upon the mere grounds which have been alleged by (I am sorry to say) a late member of the corporation, namely, that the man is appointed who attends the greatest number of dinners, or some such frivolous ground. I give that statement the most unqualified denial, that any such considerations enter into the minds of the committee when they elect their chairman. In reference to the Navigation committee, I will mention that the selection of a chairman is always made from the most experienced persons. I had the pleasure of being there during a period when there were practical men on the committee. How often it happens that there are practical men I cannot say, but Mr. Phillips, who is a lighterman, and Mr. Turnley who was here the other day, are both of them practical men; and I had the pleasure of being on the committee with both. Mr. Mortimer also is a nautical man, having been in Her Majesty's service, and therefore understands something about shipping. With regard to myself, I have no pretence to any knowledge of such duties, but I fancied I was competent, upon the view which always takes place before the committee decide upon anything, to give an opinion whether it would be prejudicial to the public or a benefit to them, that such piles should be driven, or such embankments should be made. I think generally the committees work well. I observe in the evidence of Mr. Ambrose Moore he says, "If you wish to induce the "higher classes to take part in it, I believe it may be done by reducing the numbers. My "opinion of the higher class of the citizens of London is that they will be directors of "banks, directors of dock companies, and other companies, and they will attend fairly "to the business of those associations, but they do so as men of business; they do not "attend for the purpose of talking. If you reduce the numbers, and simplify the forms of "the corporation, I believe you will find that more respectable men will join it; just "as they have done in Liverpool and other large towns." I will not impute to Mr. Moore anything else than that he is entirely ignorant upon the question of the working of the corporation, in making those observations. I am myself a director of a company; I attend and am paid for it, and I draw that distinction between attending public companies as directors, and attending upon committees of the corporation, that the directors attend because they are well paid, and the members of the corporation attend because it is their duty to attend. With reference to the respectability of them, I certainly do not think it at all necessary to go into that question. When he speaks of the higher classes of the citizens of London he means, I presume, gentlemen who are very much occupied in business, and who are ever ready to make excuses for not serving any office or performing any duty in connection with the corporation of London; not, I think, because they have any personal objection to meet any of the members who now exist in the corporation, but because they have not the time to devote to it, nor the desire to do it. I observe in No. 3498, this question has been put to Mr. Ambrose Moore: "It has been "stated to us that a system of dinners in the Common Council is necessary, in order to "induce the attendance of the members. Do you believe that to be the case?" And that he answers thus: "Yes I do; that is because of the character of the men who are in office. If you "have a low class of men, as many of them are at present, you cannot wonder at the "circumstance." The allusion to these dinners appears to me to be a mere bugbear in the public mind, for the purpose of creating prejudice against and abusing the corporation. The meetings of the committees are very numerous in the course of the year. They have what are called their monthly meetings, at which some of them have those dinners. With regard to myself, I dine late, and I might therefore go home to dinner; but supposing instead of dining I had line money, I should take the line money and put it into my pocket and go home to dinner, as I frequently do when I do not receive line money at all; but I do not go home to dinner on those occasions because I have any objection to meet the committee at dinner. I think that the dinner is a very proper one, after the meeting of the morning, when so many of the members cannot go home to dinner on account of their having been occupied there; besides which the dinner is of a very simple character; they sit down at five, and I think if they went there for the purpose of the guzzling and so on, which has been so frequently alluded to in the course of this inquiry, it would hardly be believed that by half-past seven o'clock (as is the fact) very many of the members will have quitted the dining-room and gone home. I may also say that, in the committee, subjects upon which men must take different views must come before them. I have known that in the warmth of debate, and the honest expression of opinion in the morning, upon those committees, words have passed of a character calculated to create a coolness between those members, which at the festive board afterwards they have had an opportunity of explaining, and so making up for the difference in the morning, and for the coolness which might otherwise have continued to exist between them. I am decidedly of opinion, therefore, that there is nothing in the dining which is objectionable; and in reference to the attendance upon the committees, the members attend upon the unpaid and undined committees as punctually as they do upon those which have dinners. No doubt, the money which is expended in the dinners is beneficial in a commercial city, in as much as they give the tradesman some occupation and advantage. Those who know my friend Mr. Williams, the member for Lambeth, know that in figures he is very apt, but I do not think he always takes a correct view of them. I differed with him when he was in the corporation, on the subject of the Lord Mayor's expenditure; and I think when the mind of any person is fairly drawn to that subject, he would see that Mr. Williams, when he stated the mayoralty to be attended with an expense of 25,000*l.* a year, must have been very grossly mistaken. He said, with regard to the Mansion House, it was the great feasting place among the members of the corporation, and therefore they stand by it. I can safely say with regard to the members, that they have no reason to stand by it on that account, but they stand by it because it is a feasting place for others than members of the corporation. During all the period that I have been in the corporation, which is twenty years, I do not believe that I have dined more than twenty times at the Mansion house It cannot be, therefore, from any motive of that sort, that they cling to it. Mr. Norris in No. 3377, is asked "Would you make any other alteration with "regard to the Court of Aldermen—would you abolish it altogether as a separate "court?—He says, "I think it might be desirable that we should have aldermen continuing "to perform certain duties which now appertain to them, but I would at once take from "them the power of dealing with the funds in the manner in which they now do, "and I should withdraw the condition of a justice of the peace, from every alderman "who had not passed the office of Lord Mayor." I most cordially agree with Mr. Norris, in the propriety of taking the control of the cash from the separate jurisdiction of the Court of Aldermen and putting it under the united jurisdiction of the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council. With respect to taking the office of justice of the peace from them, I have already said that I think they discharge the duties of the office in an efficient and exemplary manner; and I have no wish, therefore, to take from them those duties. Mr. Norris is further asked, "Why would you make that distinction?" He says, "I concede it in some measure to the earnestness with which the aldermen "claim the distinction of administering justice. It is the most distinguished and most "honourable feature in the position of an alderman, and they cling to it with so "much earnestness, that without carrying out my principles to the largest extent and "depriving them of it all at once, I have thought, that with the smaller number of "aldermen, for I have said already that I would divide the City into twelve wards), about "half might be supposed to be those who have passed the chair; and those who have not "passed the chair I would have subject to periodical election." With regard to reducing the number of aldermen my opinion is, that if they are to act as magistrates, it is impossible that you can reduce the number with benefit to the City. I would, nevertheless, alter the wards so that still there should be twenty five wards with twenty-five aldermen, not by the proposed equal division; but I would deprive some of the small wards of their aldermen, and give the aldermen to the larger wards who are so indifferently represented in that respect. For example, there is the Lime Street ward; it is a very small ward. I would add that to Cornhill ward, and take the alderman from the Lime Street ward and give him to Bishopsgate Within, and so on, Bishopsgate Within and Without being a very large, and populous ward. As a matter of opinion, I would certainly not advise a reduction in their number, but that the wards should be more uniform in their extent and representation. In the ward of Bishopsgate Within, of which I am a member, there are a great number of very influential commercial houses, which certainly are not now represented, because they have no vote for common councilmen, nor for the alderman, nor at the common hall. With regard, therefore, to the extension of the franchise, I would desire to do that by all possible means. The Corporation have affirmed that principle, as a body, by the Bill which they proposed to Parliament. I do not know that it is necessary for me to deny, as chairman of the Markets committee, that in the year when I served, there was any such application of the funds, as my friend, Mr. Norris, has insinuated to this Commission. I attended in the performance of my duty, as chairman, very many days, during a long Parliamentary inquiry in 1845, over which Mr. Ormsby Gore presided, upon the subject of Smithfield-market. I can positively assure the Commission that not a shilling was spent by me in the conduct of that inquiry. I never even dined once at Bellamy's, much less entertained others there, or devoted one shilling that was under the control of that committee for any such purpose as that which Mr. Norris insinuated. With regard to improvements, I think they have been sufficiently explained. I can hardly believe that I live in the same City now that I did thirty years ago, when I look at the immense improvements which have been everywhere made in the City, not only in the abolition of offices and so on, but in the streets. And, though some of our friends in Marylebone, and elsewhere, would desire to partake of our fortunate position; in some respects, I dare say, they would not like to bear the land-tax which we, in the City of London, bear as compared with the Marylebone people. I pay, and have always paid, at the rate of two shillings in the pound; whereas, I believe, that in Marylebone, the land-tax is one-eighth of a penny in the pound.

Wm. Jones, Esq.

7799. What is the nature of that land-tax?—It is the ordinary land-tax.

7800. That land-tax is an incident of property. In the City of London, as elsewhere, the property has been bought and sold subject to it?—Yes, I do not complain of it; but, upon the tenant, it is a hard case to be subject to such inequality.

7801. That land-tax is considered in the rent charged to you for the premises you occupy, is it not?—The same answer may be given in reference to every tax. I inquire what a house is subject to in reference to taxes, what land-tax and what assessed taxes there are, and what the rate to the poor is.

7802. Still, is not there this distinction between the land-tax and the other Government taxes; that one is a fixed charge upon property, like tithe, and the property has been bought and sold, subject to that charge; and, in the case of the other Government taxes, they are a miserable impost, and are not considered in the purchase and sale of the property?—The amount of the land-tax arises from the City having been more populous than it is even now, and, therefore, our land-tax continues the same, or rather increases, by the decrease of the houses; whereas, in Marylebone, it was assessed upon a district where there were no houses at the time, and they had only their quota to make up.

Wm. Jones, Esq.
9th Feb. 1854.

7803. Is the land-tax in the City of London upon the City as a whole, and sub-divided upon the particular properties?—It is an aggregate charge upon the City of London, which is obliged to be raised, and that is sub-divided among the several parishes, &c. Then with regard to our tithes. I pay tithe in the parish of St. Helen, to which I belong. They do not, I believe, in Marylebone. We are very unfortunate in our parish, for I may say we pay double tithes. We pay first the tithe to the lay impropriator, who only allows the incumbent 20*l.* a year out of it. The incumbent cannot live upon 20*l.* a year, and therefore we are obliged to levy a voluntary rate for the maintenance of our clergyman.

7804. Is the lay impropriator a public body or a private individual?—An individual. It was alienated in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when the tithe was let at 70*l.* a year, subject to this annual rent charge of 20*l.*, to provide for the religious instruction of the parish. I should say if those tithes had remained in their integrity, they would now amount to 800*l.* a year but the tithes attached to much of the property have been redeemed by the owners and the impropriator paid the consideration.

H. L. Taylor, Esq.

HENRY LOWMAN TAYLOR, Esq. having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7805. What situation do you hold in connection with the City of London?—I am, at the present time, chairman of the Markets Improvement committee, to which committee is entrusted the erection of the New Cattle Market at Copenhagen fields.

7806. How long have you been connected with that committee?—Ever since its appointment in 1849. I was the originator of a motion in the Court of Common Council to consider the subject of the markets of the City generally.

7807. Are you a resident in the City of London?—My business is in the City; but my private residence is a few miles from town.

7808. What is your business?—I am a wholesale warehouseman, in a branch of the iron trade.

7809. Will you have the goodness to make any statement which you are desirous of bringing before the Commission?—I have been a member of the corporation for about ten years; and have taken a very active part in every matter of business connected with it. Upon my first entry into the corporation, I was appointed a member of the Markets committee; to whom is entrusted the entire management and control of the several markets in the City. Believing, from my observations, that the markets were not in the state in which they ought to be, and being fully impressed with the necessity of alterations and improvements in them, I originated the following motion on the 10th of October 1849, for the purpose of the appointment of a committee:—"That it be referred to "a committee to inquire and report to this court the area of the several market-places "within this City, namely, Smithfield, Newgate, and Leadenhall markets; and that the "committee do likewise inquire and report whether, in their opinion, any addition of "space or other increased accommodation is required in either of those markets, together "with an estimate of the expense of making such additions or alterations, as, in their "judgment, they may consider necessary; and that the committee do further inquire and "report whether it is expedient to make application to Parliament to raise the whole, or "any portion of the funds which may be required for the purpose, either by a reasonable "modification, or increase of the tolls, or otherwise, for the requisite powers to effect "those objects." That motion was carried in the Court of Common Council; and a special committee was thereupon appointed for the purposes contained in my motion. With the names of the committee, I think I need not trouble you; but, if it were thought desirable, I could do so with much satisfaction, because I am quite sure that the members composing that committee will bear the most favourable comparison with any of those witnesses who have given evidence before this Commission, and spoken disparagingly of the corporation of London. Upon the appointment of this committee, we took proceedings, for the purpose of ascertaining the requirements in regard to those markets. Hence arose the proposition for the enlargement of Smithfield market, which has been animadverted upon very strongly by some of the witnesses, who have censured the conduct of the committee in regard to the proceedings which they took, for the purpose of enlarging and improving that most important market. Complaints have been made, and I am anxious to take my share of the responsibility attached to the conduct of that committee, who were, in my opinion, justified in endeavouring, by every means in their power, to retain the market within the City of London; making such improvements as they considered essential and necessary for the extension of that area. In doing so, the committee resorted to the best means in their judgment to place the matter fairly before the public. At that time, it will be in the recollection of this Honourable Commission, that the Government were preparing a Bill for the purpose of the removal of Smithfield market. That is a question upon which I am most anxious to justify, not only my own act, but that of the committee with whom I have the honour to be associated; in the course of which, we thought it expedient and necesssary to take steps for the purpose of preserving our rights and privileges respecting the great central market; believing most sincerely that no site which could be selected for a Metropolitan Cattle Market, could by any possibility be equal to that particular spot. I was observing, that we were censured for some steps that we took in regard to the defence of that market, and for some expenses which were necessarily incurred, in endeavouring to place before the public our views, and to counteract some of the mistaken notions which were brought before the public by one portion of the daily press. I mean the Times. We know the great power of that paper, and that whatever course it takes, either approvingly, or otherwise, it has a very considerable effect upon the public mind. Fortunately, I may say, the other portions of the daily press advocated the plan proposed by the corporation.

7810. Do you mean universally, or partially?—Universally. I believe, the whole of the daily press, with the exception of the Times, was in favour of the view taken by the corporation. I hold in my hand a pamphlet, which was no doubt got up at the expense of the corporation, and paid for out of its funds; and, in my humble judgment, it was a most legitimate mode of applying them for the purpose of disabusing the public mind. I am not at all disposed to concede that the public opinion was against the market continuing there. I believe it was decidedly in favour of the retention, not of the present Smithfield market, with its admitted nuisances and inconveniences, but of the market upon the enlarged plan which we prepared, and which I believe Mr. Cornewall Lewis had an opportunity of seeing. The model of that plan is now in the library of the Guildhall; and, if it had not been troubling you too much, I should have been delighted to have placed it before you; and, I think, you would have agreed with me, that the plan proposed was a great improvement upon the existing market; and, perhaps, would have answered all the purposes of the present age.

7811. You mean an improvement upon Smithfield as it is?—Yes; inasmuch as the present market is distributed over an unequal area, while the new market was to have been enclosed. I am anxious to convince the minds of the Commissioners, that as trustees for the citizens, whose market Smithfield is by charter, we were only discharging our duty in endeavouring to do that which we believed was for the benefit of the public at large. If the impression, which has been endeavoured to be made upon your minds, is removed, as to our having acted improperly in the expenditure of any sum of money, by which we endeavoured to retain our market, I am content; but I am here willing to take my share of the responsibility of the course which the committee considered they had a right to adopt with regard to the expenses that were incurred.

7812. What actually was the nature of the expense of that description which was incurred upon that occasion?—Some expenses were incurred In Parliament in opposing the Government Bill; and not only in opposing that Bill, but expenses were necessarily incurred in ascertaining what was the real state of the public feeling, and endeavouring to counteract the powerful articles which appeared in the leading journal. I need not tell the Commission that that cannot be done without expense. To ascertain what the feeling of the constituency was, could not be done without employing parties to do it. The gentleman who gave evidence in the first instance was employed, and received a remuneration for the services which he rendered.

7813. You mean Mr. Acland?—I do. With regard to the public opinion, when I tell you that nearly 7,000 registered electors of the City of London signed a memorial to their representative, Lord John Russell, in favour of the corporation scheme, it is sufficient, I think, to satisfy your minds that the inhabitants of London were not averse to the alteration which we thought it necessary to make in respect to that market.

7814. When you say "London," you mean the City of London?—I do. I was asked, if the whole of the press were in favour of the corporation plan, with the exception of the Times. From the book before me, I find that the Daily News, the Morning Herald, the Morning Advertiser, and the Morning Post, each of them contained articles, in my judgment, far superior to those which appeared in the Times, much more to the purpose,—much more convincing, and, I think, much more genuine. Those members of the press advocated, not the retention of Smithfield as it is, but the retention of a central cattle market, with the improvements which we proposed to make. I shall not trouble you much with the evidence given by Mr. Bennoch, for I think sufficient has been already said to show you that much of what he said must be received with caution. In some passages I find he entirely contradicts himself, but I will not dilate upon them. It may be necessary for me to allude briefly to some portions of his evidence in order to justify the course which we have taken. In No. 1,226, he observes that "articles were written and sent to newspapers with a sum of money." That appears to me to be a charge against the public press. He is asked, "Do you mean that money was sent with the "article to induce the newspaper to insert it? Probably instead of its appearing as an "advertisement, the newspapers might be induced to allow it to appear as a paragraph. "Do you mean that the money was sent to the newspapers to induce them to do that? "I believe that to be the case. Can you prove it?—I shall be able to prove it no doubt, "I cannot myself, for I did not belong to the committee." I am prepared to state as a member of that committee, that such a proposition or idea could not have entered into the mind of any member connected with it. I feel quite certain that the respectable part of the press of London would have thought it the grossest insult possible, if any one should have offered them a bribe for the purpose of advertising the retention of the market. I think the Commissioners will see in a moment that such a proposition could never have been entertained, for I am sure if it had, instead of having the support of the paper, any one proposing it would have found a very severe article the next morning in exposure of the offer. And yet Mr. Bennoch says in the commencement of his evidence, No. 1154, that he appears before the Commission to speak to facts which have come within his own knowledge, so that one would have supposed he would hardly have made a charge of that nature without being perfectly satisfied that it was quite true. In No. 1181, the same witness, in allusion to the new market which we are about to erect, states that the market will not be finished for less than 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* How any one could have come to such a conclusion as that without any evidence to justify it, I am unable to conceive. The estimate of the cost of the new market at the present time is something like 343,000*l.* I have a model here in order to show the Commissioners what is proposed to be done by the corporation, because we are most anxious to stand well not only with the public, but also with the Government; and to justify the course we have taken in order to show that we are capable of doing that which has been complained we are not able do. This same gentleman tells you in No. 1182, that the corporation are so composed that they are not competent to grapple with any great question, that we are not able to manage the affairs which are entrusted to us. I will only refer you to the market, the model of which I now produce before you, in order to show that we have endeavoured to grapple with the question in the most comprehensive form; that we have purchased the largest portion of land which could be obtained, in compliance, I may say, with the experienced wish of Mr. Walpole, Lord Palmerston, and every other gentlemen who had any thing to do with this new Metropolitan Cattle Market. Having purchased so much land, we were yet anxious even to have obtained more, having been urged particularly to do so at the interview with Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Cardwell, a short time since. Our negociation for it has, however, completely failed, inasmuch as the freeholder would not part with it; and the only chance of our getting it is by a compulsory Act of Parliament. I believe, therefore, as regards the quantity of land we are carrying out the views of the Government as far as we are able. Then as to the outlay which is being made upon it, we are desirous of having a complete and perfect market. It has a space of fifteen acres in the centre, which is for the bullocks and the sheep, the area of the present Smithfield Market being only six and a quarter acres including the roadways through it, therefore the Commissioners will see that we have provided sufficient space for the purpose of a market I may say for centuries to come. Independently of that we have made ample provision for every other appurtenance belonging to the market, for slaughtering houses, and lairs, and such like accommodation. Therefore when it is charged against us, that we are incompetent, and that we do not take up anything in a comprehensive spirit; I think I may reply to that, that what we have been doing in respect to the market is a full answer to the charges which have been made against us in that respect. I shall be happy to afford the Commissioners any explanation in my power in regard to the market, or upon any other subject which they may desire to be informed upon. I feel that I have been acting as a trustee for the public in my character as a member of the corporation, and have devoted ten years to its service without any fee or reward whatever. I have given up a great deal of time to the subject of the markets, because I never undertake any duty without being willing to apply the whole of the energies at my command to it. I am generally one of the first members to attend and one of the last to leave. With respect to the large expense which we are going to, we are endeavouring to make that market suitable for all the purposes required, inasmuch as upon the land in addition to public and private slaughter houses, we are erecting taverns and public houses; seventy-eight acres is a very large space, and we think it better to adapt the land which we have for every accommodation in connection with the market. We have a space there for a hide market. Circumstances may arise which may render it necessary that the hide market at Leadenhall should be removed. At the present moment we hardly know what will be done; indeed, railways are being projected to connect the City with the metropolitan market. I have a plan here which refers to a scheme for the purpose of bringing foreign cattle from Blackwall to the market, and connecting also the Great Northern Railway with it. We have been applied to to know if we would dispose of part of our land for the purposes of this railway, but we are unwilling to part with any of it, believing that contiguous to the market there will be found sufficient room to have stations which would answer all the purposes connected with the market.

H. L. Taylor, Esq.

7815. Are you able to inform the Commissioners what is the estimate of the income which the City will derive from their property in the new market?—About 14,000*l.* a year.

7816. Upon what amount of capital expended will that income be derived?—About 350,000*l.*; it will pay about four per cent. There is also a scheme which has been submitted to Mr. Cardwell and Viscount Canning, for the purpose of bringing a railway to the Post Office, within the walls. From what I learn, if such a railway could be successfully carried out, it would be considered a great advantage by the Government. That railway would also be made available for the connection between the City and the cattle market, therefore, there would be a means of communication from the metropolitan cattle market to Smithfield, where we propose bye-and-bye to erect a dead meat market; Newgate market being, as we all know, a very great nuisance.

7817. Do you propose to erect a dead meat market at Smithfield?—On a part of the site of Smithfield 7818. On what part of Smithfield?—The subject is before the committee at the present time. The exact site is not quite decided. It has been laid down by Mr. Bunning, that it should be somewhere near Long Lane.

7819. About how much space would it occupy?—I am not sure what the quantity of land would be, but I should think about three acres.

7820. The present site of Newgate Market is probably not more than a quarter of an acre?—It is more than that.

7821. Has the City had under its consideration the expediency of appropriating Farringdon Market for the purposes of a dead meat market?—Farringdon Market appears to be situated in such an awkward position as hardly to be made available for it. It is not considered that Farringdon Market as it is, can be made available for a dead meat market; it is on an acclivity, and in its present form it could hardly be adapted for a dead meat market.

7822. Farringdon Market has cost a great deal of money, has not it?—It has.

7823. And it is now comparatively little used?—Just so.

7824. And it is an extremely good market; spacious and airy, and commodiously situated with good approaches?—The approaches I think are not good; the only good approach is Farringdon Street.

7825. Is not that approach a very good one?—It is.

7826. An unusually good one for the City?—I think it is a good one.

7827. What is the objection to appropriating Farringdon Market to a dead meat market, or what is the advantage of incurring the expense of making a new dead meat market, when you have one which is not used?—Farringdon Market is not considered by any one that I can learn, to be well suited for a dead meat market.

7828. On what account?—The situation of it would be one reason. The situation is peculiar, inasmuch as you have to go up a hill to get to it. The front of the market is in Farringdon Street. If you ever have been into that market, you would see that as at present constructed, it would never do for a dead meat market.

7829. Would not it be much cheaper to make such alterations as would adapt it to the use of a dead meat market, than to erect an entirely new one, keeping moreover Farringdon Market, from which very little benefit is now derived?—We think Smithfield would be more central, and more likely to succeed as a market. It is the most difficult thing in the world to move a market. The removal of the old Fleet Market into the new Farringdon Market, was a complete failure, it never succeeded; nothing is more difficult or uncertain than the removal of a market.

7830. Do you mean that the removal of Newgate Market to Smithfield would not be so distant as the removal of Newgate Market to Farringdon Street?—We have another object in view in the erection of a new dead meat market. We think if Leadenhall Market, which is also a meat market, could be removed to the same spot it would be an advantage. The poultry market is now at Leadenhall, and in addition to that they have a dead meat market. If we could bring them to one central spot, which should be in connexion with the railways, we think it would be an advantage to the public. When the present Smithfield Market is removed, we shall have a site there for such purposes as may be considered neeessary and proper.

7831. There is no doubt about the entire inadequacy of Newgate Market for its present purpose, is there?—It is the greatest nuisance we have, I think much more than Smithfield. I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to No. 1221. It is the evidence given by Mr. Bennoch, in which he makes a charge that I am rather anxious to reply to, because I feel that it attacks the character of members of the House of Commons. He proposes that some return should be made. He says, "When the return "is made which I have suggested, if it be your pleasure to order it, I believe you will "discover that in 1849 there was a very large sum of money expended in various ways, "some of it in dinners to members of Parliament to manifest their gratitude for the "assistance which the corporation had received in the House of Commons." I am cognizant of what took place in the committee. The only dinner that members of Parliament were invited to, was a dinner which it appears it is customary for the sheriffs to have at Bellamy's when they present a petition to the House of Commons, which, in this case, was against the Government bill, the expense of which dinner was 14*l.* 17*s.*; and yet it is stated upon oath by a witness, who says that he will only speak to facts within his own knowledge, that sums of money were spent in tavern dinners in entertaining members of Parliament in order to get their support. I declare that to be unfounded. Not one sixpence was ever spent by the committee in tavern dinners in the years 1849 or 1850, or in any other year until the last. In the last year, like other committees of the corporation, a sum of money was voted to that committee, and I need not tell the Commissioners that, in the business of the committee in the construction of this market, at some distance from London, much time is consumed by the members who attend to the duties. For many hours in the day we are engaged upon the business, and I think the trifling charge which is made for those dinners is not worth talking about. At the same time I felt it my duty to contradict the statement of Mr. Bennoch, which has not a shadow of truth in it. There must have been a great misconception on the part of the gentleman when he made such a statement. The Commission have been for many days engaged in this inquiry. The statements which have been made by many of the witnesses have been explained away. It would not be fitting in me to take up much of the time of the Commission; at the same time I could, I think, without any doubt satisfy your minds that those who made the charges against the corporation for incompetency and not being able to discharge the duties efficiently, made charges which were utterly unfounded, especially when I inform you that a project of Mr. Bennoch's (which did not meet with that favour in the common council which he anticipated and which he desired, namely, the erection of a new bridge) I believe gave him the idea that we were not competent to take up such questions. I need not say that projects proposed in a large body, such, for instance, as that of a new bridge, though they may appear desirable, are not always proper to be carried out at once. It has been stated by Mr. Bennoch, in a book which he has published, that it is quite enough for you to determine that a bridge is required; and after you have done so, then to see about the means for executing the work; but I apprehend it to be important before a public body takes up the question of the erection of a new bridge they should be somewhat satisfied of their means of being able to carry it out; because, if we determined upon the erection of a bridge, and afterwards found that we had not the means of doing it, nothing could be more clear than that we were incompetent to deal with such a question. During the time I have been a member of the corporation I have been upon most of the committees. I am now upon several of them; and as regards the nature of the business of any of them, either the Bridge House committee or the City Lands committee, or others of them, I should be willing to give you all the information you desire. Perhaps, however, you have had sufficient evidence upon those subjects, so as not to require any further information. At the present time I may say I am a member of the City Lands committee, which has the control of the City's estates, reporting to the common council from time to time the necessary and important part of the business. I am also on what is termed the Officers' and Clerks' committee, to whom is referred all matters connected with the officers whenever a vacancy takes place, so that they all undergo review. I am a member of the Orphan School committee; the committee for erecting the Wellington monument; the Markets' Improvement committee; the commission of Sewers, and also one of the four members of the corporation on the Metropolitan Commission.

7832. Do not you find it rather difficult to perform all the duties which are thrown upon you by belonging to so many committees?—I find that it absorbs a good deal of time.

7833. You say you are engaged in trade?—I am. I quite agree with the suggestion which has been thrown out that a smaller number of committees would be most desirable. I also feel from my experience that if the members were retained more permanently on the committees, and had fewer of them to attend to, they would make themselves more masters of their business than they do under the present system.

7834. It has been suggested to us that there would be a danger, if that system were adopted which seems desirable for the dispatch of business, that the business might get into the hands of cliques, and there would be less publicity and popular opinion brought to bear upon the subjects. Do you think there would be any danger of that happening?—I do not. I think the number may be reduced with great advantage, and if the members remained more permanently upon the committees I think they would make themselves masters of the business to a greater extent than they can now with the frequent changes.

7835. Does not this change of members, though inconvenient in many respects, produce this good effect, that the whole or the greater part of the members in the common council are considered to become more or less acquainted with all that goes on?—It necessarily gives them an insight into the general business of the corporation, but if there were fewer committees the business would be more condensed in those committees.

7836. Do you think other means might be found to ensure a proper control over those committees in the conduct of their business?—I have the greatest confidence in their judgment and discretion.

7837. In dealing with public money and public affairs there is always a proper degree of jealousy which ought to be exercised?—I think the larger body should have the entire controlling power, and the business ought not to be transacted by the smaller without being reported to the larger body.

7838. Do you think that the publicity of the proceedings of those committees, and the control of the common council, are not as complete and effectual as they ought to be?—I think they are. There is but little publicity given to the business of the committees. It is not considered necessary to give publicity to their proceedings, unless it is through the common council, where the reports are made.

7839. Do you think that the discretion left to the committees is too large?—I think possibly it may be more than it should be. I think that the business ought to be reported to the common council, and that they should have everything of importance before them.

H. L. Taylor, Esq

7840. Do you think that the committees act too much as executive bodies?—On some occasions I think they do.

7841. Do you think they have a greater control over the expenditure of the money than they ought to have without previous reference to the Court of Common Council?—I think the Court of Aldermen have.

7842. Can you, from your experience suggest to us any improvement which you think might be introduced which, while on the one hand it would diminish the number of members of committees which you seem to think would be desirable, on the other hand would afford any check or control over the conduct of committees, which you may also think expedient?—The check should be that their power should be more limited than it is now, and that they should report more frequently to the court before they carry anything into execution.

7843. I suppose, practically, a committee such as the Markets Improvement committee, has the entire control of the markets during the year of its appointment, and the common council very little interferes?—When once a matter is referred to them, to do therein as they think fit, it is left very much to their discretion; and perhaps it is more safe with a larger body than it is with a smaller; a body composed, as that committee is, of from thirty-five to forty members, may have left in their hands a greater control; but if the number were very much reduced, I think it would be more prudent that they should report more frequently to the Court of Commom Council.

7844. Do you think that the duties and responsibilities of the Court of Common Council, of the committees of the common council, and the City officers acting under the discretion of those committees, are sufficiently defined?—They are not properly defined. The institution is a very ancient one; much has been regulated by what has been the practice and the custom.

7845. Any confusion in those respects has a tendency to diminish the responsibility, has not it?—It has; but we have fortunately some very able officers. in whom we have great confidence.

7846. In proportion to the ability of those officers, and the confidence reposed in them, it would be well to fix responsibility upon them, perhaps?—I should be very sorry to find a committee handing the responsibility over to an officer. I think the committee should be responsible; but, at the same time, should look with confidence to the judgment of their officers.

7847. In many cases, while the general direction might be given to the committee acting under the common council, yet all the executive part of the business, and the responsibility, would be more properly in the officers, would not it?—They have the entire control of carrying out anything which it is referred to them to carry out.

7848. You think a committee does not interfere with the executive duties of the officers?—I think not. The architect is a very able officer; one of the most able officers, I think, that we have; he is a man who is not to be surpassed in his profession. I do not think there is any man we could find who would be equal to Mr. Bunning in the discharge of the multifarious duties connected with his office.

7849. Mr. Bunning stated to us that he was the architect and surveyor, as well as performing the duties of the clerk of the works for the City?—Both architect and clerk of the works.

7850. You have been connected with the City Lands committee?—Yes.

7851. Supposing it was the intention of the City to erect a great public building; do you think there is anything in connection of the architect with the City which would render it obligatory upon the City to consult exclusively the City architect for the designs and elevation of such a building?—If it was a building with which the corporation alone had to do, they would put it into his hands for the purpose of his producing plans.

7852. Suppose that such a misfortune should happen as that the Mansion House should be burnt down, and it was necessary for the City to undertake a building of that description, do you mean that the City would feel itself bound to consult exclusively the present City architect, and would not have recourse to the principal architects in London for advice upon such a subject?—I think, especially as regards the Mansion House, we have sufficient confidence in the judgment and ability of the architect to lead us not to refer it to any other person to produce plans for the erection of a new one.

7853. Without at all expressing the least doubt of the ability and taste of the gentleman who has been appointed City architect, do you think it right that a corporation, such as that of the City of London, should stand in that relation to any man, that it should not be at liberty to resort to many opinions, as well as one, upon a point of that description?—I do not think that the City are bound to resort to him exclusively. I think it is quite discretionary with the common council to employ the City architect or any other person, but I believe if Sir Charles Barry were the architect of the City of London, we should not think of applying elsewhere for an architect to produce plans for any public building connected with the corporation; we should have sufficient confidence in that gentleman to resort at once to him.

7854. Do you think it would be right to preclude yourselves by any arrangement or understanding, however eminent the architect might be, from taking the advice of many minds, instead of one, upon a subject of that kind?—There is no rule which would preclude us from doing so. We have the undoubted right if we please, to invite other architects to produce designs; but I feel quite certain that I am speaking the opinions of nineteen-twentieths of the corporation, when I say, that they have sufficient confidence in the judgment and ability of the present architect not to think of going elsewhere. It is the first occasion that the City have been placed in that position. It would not have been so with the late officer, because he was not ostensibly the architect; he was the clerk of the works and surveyor.

H. L. Taylor, Esq.

7855. Are all the markets of the City of London under the control of the Markets' committee?—They are. The Markets' committee is distinct from the committee of which I am chairman.

7856. Some of those markets may be considered not only City markets, but metropolitan markets, may they not; such as Smithfield Market, Billingsgate Market, Newgate Market, and perhaps others?—Yes.

7857. In dealing with those markets, either in the way of regulation, or considering questions with regard to their enlargement or improvement, has the Markets' Improvement committee ever felt itself impeded or hampered by that circumstance, that their constituency are merely a small portion of the inhabitants of the metropolis, and are not connected with the metropolis at large?—I do not think that their constituents would have any effect with them in inducing them to do anything but what was for the general good of the metropolis.

7858. In managing the markets of the City, do the committee look to the general interests of the metropolis, and not to the limited interests of the City?—Unquestionably to the larger object, the wants of the whole metropolis.

7859. You give that opinion with confidence?—Quite so. I think we should be justly charged with looking at the question with too narrow a view, if we merely looked at a market for the purposes of the City. The great emporium of commerce is the City of London, and we are anxious to retain all the trade within the City of London. Hence our great objection to parting with Smithfield Market. We know, where millions of money changes hands in a year, and, I may say that seven or eight millions per annum does change hands in Smithfield; if you take that to any other locality, it is an injury, to a certain amount, to the trade of the locality from which it is taken.

7860. Do you think that the interested persons, holding or occupying property in the immediate neighbourhood of Smithfield, had any influence upon the decision of the Markets' Improvement committee upon that occasion?—Not the least. That their interest was mixed up with it, and that they co-operated with the corporation there can be no doubt, because in the case of the removal of that market, which had brought to them a great deal of business, their means of existence much depended upon its continuance. Hence we had their co-operation and support for the retention of the ancient market.

7861. You think that their representations did not influence the members of the common council who served upon the Markets committee?—Certainly not. There was a very large preponderance in the common council in favour of the corporation scheme of enlarging the market and the minority were very few indeed. Whenever the question was before us, there was something like the proportion of 70 members to 7. When that is stated, it will show that there was a very strong feeling throughout the body of representations that we should endeavour to retain our market within the city.

7862. Is there anything else which you desire to state?—I am not aware that there is. I felt it my duty to attend here for the purpose of defending the conduct of the corporation from many of the charges which have been made against it. At the same time I am quite prepared to admit that an old institution like the corporation of London, requires considerable revision and improvement. I am one of those who have been a very strong advocate for the appointment of this Commission, in whom I have the greatest confidence. I believe that much good will result from their enquiries. I believe it will not be the object of the Commission to suggest those changes which will be objectionable. I have no doubt whatever that the measures recommended by the Commissioners will be beneficial to the citizens at large. It has been understood in the Consolidated committee, of which I am a member, that those who come here for the purpose of answering, as far as they can, the charges made against the corporation, should not at once propound any new scheme. I shall be quite prepared at some future time to suggest what I consider would be improvements in the constitution of the corporation of London. At the same time I wish to keep faith with those with whom I am associated. I have no desire at present to go into the question, but I am quite prepared to admit that alterations might take place which would be exceedingly beneficial.

W. Haywood, Esq.

WILLIAM HAYWOOD, Esq., was further examined as follows.

7863. Is there any explanation which you wish to give in reference to your former evidence?—I only attend to lay before the Commissioners certain statistics of the carriage traffic of the City of London, which have been previously asked for by them.

I beg to hand them in, (producing the same). I also beg to submit to the Commission a packet of reports upon the works of the Commission of City sewers, which will shew the annual progress resulting from the efforts which they have made for many years past in the various sanitary matters committed to their charge. W. Haywood, Esq. 9th Feb. 1854.

The same were delivered in.

7864. Do you wish to explain anything which was stated in your former evidence?—Not in my own evidence, but I wish to make a remark respecting the statement which has been made at 6696. The witness says, "I refer to a case reported in the Times of the 6th June, 1851. "'Mansion House—G. B. Mayne was brought before Mr. Alderman Wire, "'(sitting as police judge in the case,) in custody of Daniel Forrester, charged with having "'unlawfully attempted to obtain from the Monarch Life and Fire Assurance Company the "'sum of 118*l.* with a view to cheat and defraud the said company. Mr. Alderman Wire "'asked the prisoner if he had anything to say, giving him the usual caution, prisoner "'acknowledging his guilt, threw himself on the mercy of the court. Mr. Alderman Wire "'committed the prisoner for trial at the Old Bailey.'" "Now it must be observed here, "that Mr. Alderman Wire, who acted as judge in this case was at the same time the solicitor "to the Monarch Life and Fire Insurance Company; thus the judge to try the delinquent "who attempted to defraud the company, and the solicitor to the prosecutors was one and "the same person." A little further on he says, "I may mention that a partner of "Mr. Alderman Wire, Mr. Child was the solicitor who appeared at the Mansion House "to prosecute the case before the Alderman" The explanation which I wish to give is simply this, a warrant was issued by Mr. Alderman Hunter, upon the application of the secretary of the company, who came alone in the morning of the 3rd of June, and obtained that warrant. The warrant was executed in Devonshire, and the prisoner was brought up in custody on the 5th of June. On that day Mr. Alderman Wire happened to be sitting; it was the last case, and I sent round to ascertain if I could get another alderman to sit, knowing that he was connected with the company. I could not do so. It was then suggested that he should take just sufficient evidence to justify a remand. I myself examined the witnesss, and directly I began to examine the witness the prisoner put in a written statement confessing his guilt, which he had previously prepared. The case was then remanded till the following Saturday, namely the 7th, on which day Mr. Alderman Wilson sat, heard the evidence, and gave the prisoner the usual caution. The prisoner stated that the paper he had put in was the only answer which he had to make to the charge, that being a confession of his guilt. Mr. Alderman Wilson committed the prisoner for trial.

7865. Then this report is not correct that Mr. Alderman Wire committed the prisoner for trial on the 5th?—Certainly not, nor did he issue the warrant.

7866. Practically, Mr. Alderman Wire did not interfere in the adjudication of the case?—Certainly not, further than to remand the prisoner.

7867. He left the case to be settled by the decision of another alderman?—He certainly did.

7868. Is Mr. Alderman Wire a practising attorney?—He is.

7869. Is there any other alderman who is a practising attorney?—No other.

MR. WILLIAM RUSHTON having been sworn, was examined as follows. Mr. W. Rushton.

7870. What is the office you hold in the fellowship of porters?—I hold the office of paymaster and collector of metage, lastage, and fillage, and porterage.

7871. Are those two offices or one office?—One office.

7872. How long have you held that office?—I have held it twenty-seven years.

7873. How old are you now?—Sixty-eight.

7874. Your office has been described to the Commissioners by the title of corn shifter; is that a correct appellation?—We do not know the origin of the word, but that is what it has always been called. My grandfather held the office, my father held it; and I have been in the office under them for fifty-four years. I was elected by the Court of Common Council twenty-seven years ago, at the death of my father.

7875. What are your duties?—My duties are to pay the corn porters who assist in the measurement of the grain which comes into the port of London, which amounts to over three millions of quarters per annum; and once a month I pay such amount as the meters earn on corn work below bridge; and the City's portion which is called the City's metage. Whether those charges are collected or not, I pay them the last Friday in the month in full for every ship which is cleared.

7876. You collect the metage dues, and you also pay the porters?—Yes.

7877. And you collect the sum due to them from their employers?—Partly from the seller,—very much from the seller,—and partly from the buyers, who may live all over the kingdom.

Mr. W. Rushton.

7878. Will you describe to us in some little detail the process which you follow in paying the porters, and in obtaining the money from the sellers and the buyers?—The porters, as soon as they have done their work, present a ticket, resembling this piece of paper, stating how much work they have done, and also the name of the ship and captain on board of which they have done it. That is instantly paid, without any knowledge on my part whether it is correct or not. We pay it on the faith of the man being like myself, a fellowship porter, and his authority being constituted under acts of the common council. I consider that I am secure in paying any man who is a fellowship porter any charge which he makes. Those payments amount in the average of the last 24 years to upwards of 229,000 per annum. We call it a very small day's payment if we have not from 300 to 400 payments to make, and we used to have as many as an average of 800 payments a day, and often 1,000.

7879. Are the men paid by the day or by the piece?—By the piece.

7880. If a piece of work lasts several days, are they paid till it is performed?—They are paid every day for so much as they have done that day on board that ship.

7881. How do you make those payments to the men?—I have three offices: one in Horsleydown, for the convenience of the men who live in Horsleydown; then I have another office in Tower Street, for the convenience of those who please to go there; and I have a private office close by, in Trinity Square, for those men to come to who choose to come there. It would perhaps strike you that paying those men at a public house would be a wrong thing to do, but when I appoint these public houses, I take an undertaking from them, and keep them strictly to it, that they shall never ask a man to spend one farthing. They are bound to pay, and I furnish them the money to pay with in advance.

7882. How do you collect the money from the employers of those porters?—When a ship is cleared, the account is made up by the principal meter, not the working meter, but the principal meter in the office; he makes it up, and charges so much for the charges that apply to the corn factor, or the seller, leaving me to charge the buyer with his proportion. The corn factor pays me when I go and ask for it.

7883. Are the payments made regularly, or do you ever have losses?—I cannot say that there are not losses, but I believe it will be seen upon so very large a concern which involves an average of 59,321*l.* 5*s.* a year, the bad debts are not above 120*l.* or 130*l.* a year.

7884. How much commission do you receive for the trouble you have, or the expense to which you are put?—I am glad you have asked me that question, because it has been most grossly misrepresented. It appears by the act of the common council, that I am empowered to take one penny in every shilling from the earnings of the labouring porters. That amounts to something like 8 and ⅓ per cent. Out of this 8 per cent., the act of the common council allows me to appropriate 4½ per cent., which appears as if I got 4½ per cent at first view, but putting in the corporation's portions of the money collected for them, and all the other matters, I do not get 4½ per cent. Perhaps the commissioners would like to know what I actually have left for my own self after deducting the expenses of the office. I have had nine clerks employed; now the last five years I have had but five; the amount on the average of twenty-four years that I have received, does not come quite up to a clear three-fourths of a farthing in the shilling.

7885. That is a little more than two per cent?—I calculated it to be 1¼ (but find it 1½) and a fraction per cent. We apply to the corn factors for the amount of those charges, and with some few exceptions, I am happy to say they pay very well. The buyers we get payment from when we meet with them. Sometimes we write to them; my postage account for penny stamps amounts to 8*l.* a year.

7886. Have you seen the evidence given by Mr. Brown before the Commission?—No, I have not read it.

7887. Will you refer to the answer to question 4028 in Mr. Brown's evidence, and having read it, explain the statements there made?—The act of the common council which established me in my office said, that the fellowship should find sufficient funds.

7888. For what purpose?—To make all the payments with till the money was collected back again.

7889. What was the nature of the alteration which was made by the act of the common council in 1827?—The office was held by my father and grandfather by lease, paying an annual rent for the profits of a penny in the shilling to the Court of Rulers. It was thought advisable not to go on upon that system any longer, and an act of the common council was passed that at the termination of my father's lease, the corn shifter should be elected by the common council, and the Court of Rulers should find the money. They found me 7,000*l.*

7890. It is said that that is more than is necessary; is that the case?—That is not true, as I shall be able to show when I am called on. It will require me to look at the balance sheets, showing that I have had frequently 9,000*l.* or 11,000*l.* out, and I was myself obliged to find the surplus capital. Of course I do not let more money be idle than there is occasion for.

7891. Your statement is that the sum of 7,000*l.* which was advanced to you was not more than was required to carry on the business of the office?—I go further, and say that it was much less.

7892. Is that the sum required at present to enable you to make your payments?—Certainly not.

7893. Would not it be right that some portion of that sum should be repaid the fellowship?—Some portion of it has been repaid.

7894. How much?—Some few years ago the fellowship called upon me to return them 1,000*l.* I did so. At a more recent period the fellowship again called upon me to know whether I would part with some more of the capital. I then went up to their hall, as I am constantly in the habit of doing, and showed them that instead of calling upon me for capital I ought to call upon them. The court of that day were satisfied; their clerk was satisfied; and one of the rulers said, I wish you would try and oblige us with 250*l.*; we want to pay a bill for expenses in the suit of Combe and Delafield; it will save us from selling out stock. I said, whether I have 250*l.* more or less in my hands is a matter of very little consequence to me, you shall have it; and I wrote a cheque for 250*l.* That law suit, I should say, was gone into contrary to my advice and opinion.

7895. You have repaid, out of the 7,000*l.*, 1,250*l.*?—Yes.

7896. Has anything more been repaid?—No; but I have claims upon the court for payments which I have paid for them, and on their account. They have my bond; they have property of mine more than ample to secure them. The Court of Rulers at any time can call upon me to make restitution of anything that I hold that I ought not to hold. The Court of Common Council, who constituted me, can do the same, and there are open the courts of law if they required it; but my court of conscience will induce me to do everything I ought without going into any court whatever, whenever properly called upon.

7897. What is the meaning of your having received the sum of 87,000*l.* from the year 1827?—That is quite likely to be true, I having taken 87,000*l.* in the shape of deductions from the labour of those men.

7898. Would that sum include the portion which is paid to the corporation?—No; that includes the sum which is returned to the Court of Rulers for the benefit of their superannuation fund. After taking 4½ per cent. out of that amount, the remainder I return once a month to the Court of Rulers, whether the amount is collected or not. From that I deduct counting house expenses of all descriptions, and the net balance is what I get.

7899. What is the present state of the funds of the fellowship; are you acquainted with that?—It is much lower than it was. I am not quite acquainted with it. I fancy they have about 3,500*l.* left, and they ought to have had a great deal more.

7900. It appears from the statement which Mr. Lawrence made to this Commission that the annual payments which have been made by you to the fellowship have decreased from 1,694*l.* in 1841 to 770*l.* in 1851. What is the reason of that diminution?—It arises from the quantity of corn which goes into the docks, into which they will not let the fellowship corn porters go; therefore the dock companies have got a monopoly of the labour. They get it done for 1*d.* per quarter, and they charge from 2½*d.* to 3*d.*; that is a monopoly against the poor working men.

7901. Do you think that the porters belonging to the fellowship are generally poor working men, that is to say that their state is one of poverty and distress?—They are all respectable decent working men.

7902. Are they in a better condition than other porters who do not belong to the fellowship?—They get a little better pay than common labourers who wait at the corners of streets, certainly.

7904. Do you think they derive much benefit from being members of the fellowship?—It is a living for them.

7905. Do you think it is a better living than they would get if they were not members?—It is a little so; when a man is a little advanced in life he can do this work, which perhaps he could not do at his own trade.

7906. Are the prices paid by the importer of the corn to the fellowship porters higher than would be paid if the system did not exist?—No; if the system did not exist the trade would be at the caprice of the casual working men, who would only go to work if it suited their purpose. Supposing there were a job of 100 quarters to be measured they would go to it, if there were twenty they would not go to it, so that a small consumer would be at a disadvantage against a large one. I have at home an account of the gradations of the jobs which are done, and I find that a majority of them are under 50 quarters.

7907. If the fellowship ceased to exist, could the importers get their work done more cheaply than they get it done at present?—Certainly not.

7908. Would they pay more?—Always for small jobs they would pay more, and for large ones they would get it somewhat less.

7909. How is it that the present porters derive any benefit from this system?—I should think because it is an exclusive privilege which we have enjoyed of doing the work.

Mr. W. Rushton.

7910. You say that the trade get the work done cheaper under the present system than they would if the trade were open?—And much more to their satisfaction. I am intimate with all the corn trade. I know every man on the Corn Market, and with some few exceptions they wish the present system to continue. It is the only way to have justice done. I wish the Commission to understand that the act of measuring the corn is not one man's act alone. The porters are the people who measure the corn in conjunction with the meters. The porters dip the bushel into the bulk, and the meter follows with a scoop. The porters strike the bushel, turn it over into the sack and tie it; and they (the porters) hoist it out of the hold and deliver it. It is quite impossible for one man to measure the corn and put it up. Those are independent men, who can be bribed by no one to give more or less. No man who sends for a meter knows who will go to the work, and it would be impossible to bribe eight men.

7911. What was your reason for advising that the suit against Messrs. Combe and Delafield should not be proceeded with?—Because I thought it was too large an undertaking for our Fellowship Company, and they had better drop it than go to the immense expense which I then thought it would be, and the great expense I have now found it has been. I also had a notion that they did their business at Scotland-yard, which was a royal precinct, and that they would beat us on that point.

7912. Is there any other point you wish to explain?—I wish the Commission to observe that the prices for the labour is not arbitrary or invariable, nor are they fixed by the porters or meters. They have been, from time immemorial, and from time to time, settled by the common council, who were often (many of them) their employers. The Commission should also understand that the meters and porters are paid at the same rate per quarter throughout the whole port of London, from Staines to Yantlet Creek, whether the quantity be large or small. The effect of this is to protect the small buyers from the monopoly of large capitalists. The smallest buyer now pays no more than the fair proportion with the largest.

The attention of the Commission is also respectfully called to a report made by a Committee of the House of Commons in 1834, on the subject of the sale of corn by weight, commonly called Mr. Vernon's committee, in which the whole subject of the mode of measuring and delivering in the port of London was carefully examined, and the continuance of the system recommended.

D. W. Wire, Esq.

DAVID WILLIAMS WIRE, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7913. You are sheriff of the City of London?—I am one of the sheriffs.

7914. And one of the aldermen?—I am.

7915. How long have you been connected with the corporation?—Twenty-three years.

7916. Do you reside in London?—My office is in London. I do not reside there.

7917. What trade or profession are you engaged in?—I am a solicitor.

7918. Have you taken an active part in the business of the corporation since you have been connected with it?—From almost my first entrance into the corporation I have taken a very active part in the affairs of the corporation.

7919. Are you acquainted with the manner in which the election for sheriffs is conducted?—Yes, before I became an alderman I was under-sheriff five or six times.

7920. It has been stated to the Commission that some abuses have existed with regard to the system of fines; is that a subject which you have ever paid attention to?—I have paid great attention to it. I have endeavoured, as far as I have any influence, to prevent anybody from being elected as sheriff who was unwilling to serve.

7921. Have those endeavours been successful of late years?—In almost every instance.

7922. That practice is one of very old standing connected with the corporation of London, is not it?—It arose in this mode. Before the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed there were a great number of merchants in the City who were dissenters, and could not take upon themselves corporate offices. They were elected, and rather than violate their consciences they submitted to the fines.

7923. In very old times, I believe there is no doubt that it was made use of as a means of getting money, was not it?—I believe at that particular period it was; because it is stated that the larger part of the expense of building the Mansion House was paid out of the fines which were thus paid by persons who had been elected, and did not and could not serve. As far as my knowledge extends, since my connection with the corporation. I do not believe there has been an instance of any person having been elected for the sake of getting the fine.

7924. Considerable sums of money have, at a comparatively recent period, been received by the City, have they not, from the fines paid by persons appointed sheriffs?—No.

7925. What is the latest period at which any considerable sum was received from that source?—Certainly thirty years ago, I think.

7926. You are quite sure that at present there is no such practice prevailing?—Not only no such practice prevailing, but the Lord Mayor, instead of exercising a privilege which belongs to his office of nominating the persons to serve as sheriffs, who used to be put up on a list in the Guildhall, as among the eligible parties, has declined lately to exercise that privilege.

7927. Has your attention been called to some evidence which was given by Mr. Turnley, who described Mr. Rose going to him and threatening to return him as sheriff if he did not accede to his terms?—A. Mr. Turnley has made complaint to me recently, in very bitter terms, of his having been elected; but he had been upon the list as having been nominated a considerable time. What Mr. Rose stated to him I do not know, but it was prior to my election that Mr. Turnley was elected.

7928. Have you any reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement which was made, that a man in Mr. Rose's situation could find means to elect a person, against his will, sheriff of the City of London?—I think, if the parties themselves did not take any interest, and let the thing go, it might be done, because the common hall, unless some question of interest is stirring, is very thinly attended.

7929. Do you think the system of the election of sheriffs by common hall, as at present conducted, is objectionable?—Very objectionable; unless means are taken by the friends of the candidate who wishes to be elected, and by the parties who do not wish to be elected, it is very likely a man may be elected against his will, and consequently be subject to a fine.

7930. Have you any objection to state to us any alteration of the system of electing the sheriffs which may have occurred to you, which would obviate those objections?—There is a suggestion, which I make with a deal of diffidence. The liverymen not having attended to do their duty, if the constituency in the City be altered, that may induce the constituency to attend. Failing that, I think the election should be in the common council, who would avoid every possible abuse, and there would always be the names occurring to them of parties who would be willing to serve.

7931. This year there was considerable difficulty in respect to the choice of a second sheriff, was not there?—There was.

7932. How did that difficulty arise?—Of course it requires a great preparation for a person to take upon himself the office of sheriff. He must necessarily sacrifice a great deal of his time, as well as spend a great deal of his money; and, unless a party is previously prepared, when he is elected he hesitates about serving.

7933. What are the ordinary expenses of the office of sheriff?—The ordinary expenses of the office of sheriff are never less than 3,000*l.* a year. Of course it depends a great deal upon the ability and willingness of the sheriff to spend. Many have spent a great deal more. I shall this year have to expend more in consequence of my colleague in office declining to pay certain portions of the expenses, which are usually borne in equal portions by the two sheriffs.

7934. Are there any matters connected with the office of under-sheriff which are susceptible of amendment?—I think not. The rule with regard to the under-sheriffs is the same that prevails in all the counties of England, and I have never heard of anything objectionable in it whatever. The sheriff nominates his own under-sheriff.

7935. Is there any advantage in the connection which subsists between the shrievalty of the City of London and the county of Middlesex?—I think there is great advantage, because it is a popular election, and gives to the people the right of choosing their own sheriffs, which is a privilege which the City of London bought and paid for, and have exercised for 700 years, without any injury to the Crown or loss to the subject.

7936. Is there any advantage in making the shrievalty of Middlesex dependent upon the shrievalty of London?—I think there is, because there is an intimate connection between the City of London and the county of Middlesex, London being, as some say, a part and parcel of the county of Middlesex, the sheriff elected by the citizens of London has an opportunity of being of great service to the county of Middlesex; and, I think, in times of danger and excitement and political movements, the advantages of having the sheriffs of London the sheriff of Middlesex has been manifest.

7937. In what way does that appear?—I think the power and influence of the City of London have been brought to bear upon the county of Middlesex beneficially for both parties.

7938. Are there distinct under-sheriffs for the county and for the City?—Yes. The under-shrievalty of the City, I may say, is executed by the secondary.

7939. Is not that different from the practice of any other sheriff in the kingdom?—As far as regards London it is. In London, though the sheriff is primarily responsible for all the acts of his officers, yet, as the corporation appoint the secondary, they would indemnify the sheriff against any loss which might accrue to him from the neglect of his officer; but that is not the case with regard to the county of Middlesex.

7940. The same person acts virtually as under-sheriff for the county of Middlesex without removal. Mr. Burchell is that by an annual appointment?—Yes. The under-sheriff might take the business into his own hands, and do it. At one time, when I was under-sheriff, I thought of doing so, because I thought it would have been of great advantage that it should have been entirely under the control of the under-sheriff.

7941. Could you have done so in London?—No. I am speaking of the county of Middlesex. The appointment in London is in the hands of the corporation.

7942. The under-sheriff of London has but small duties to perform, has he?—The under-sheriffs jointly perform the duties. They relieve one another in their attendance;

but, in truth, one has nothing to do, except as attending upon his sheriff. The rule is, to swear only one of the under-sheriffs. The senior under-sheriff is sworn.

7943. What are the emoluments of the office of the under-sheriff?—I cannot tell what they are now. I can say what they were when I was under-sheriff. Upon the average, I think, I may say, they were about 1,000*l.* a year; but the amount varies very much. The first year I was under-sheriff, in consequence of the change of the law, which immediately took place upon my entering the office, nearly all the fees were taken away, and I was out of pocket.

7944. How many years were you under-sheriff?—Six. I do not mean six consecutive years.

7945. What alteration of the law do you refer to?—The abolition of the arrest for debt.

7946. Is it usual to continue the same under-sheriff for several years, or does the sheriff generally appoint his own under-sheriff, without reference to the previous tenure of office?—The sheriff appoints his own under-sheriff, without reference to the previous tenure of office. I happened to be under-sheriff because clients of mine were serving the office.

7947. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Goodman, respecting a case which you were stated to have adjudicated?—No. I know what case is referred to.

7948. Mr. Goodman has stated that you did not adjudicate in the case; but merely remanded the prisoner, and that he was committed by another alderman?—That is the fact. He was committed by Alderman Wilson.

7949. The principal fact in the original statement appears to be erroneous?—There are two facts that are wholly erroneous. It is stated, first, that I adjudicated upon the case; and, secondly, that my partner was conducting the prosecution, neither of which statements is true. The man was brought in custody while I was sitting for the Lord Mayor, upon a warrant which had been previously issued by Mr. Alderman Hunter at the close of the day. I could not then get another alderman to hear the case; and I heard sufficient to justify a remand of the man, he being then in the custody of the officer, having been brought up from Devonshire.

7950. The person admitted his guilt, did not he?—He persisted in putting in a written statement of the fact. There was evidence to show he had been guilty of the crime, and he admitted it.

7951. You remanded him; but he was finally committed by another alderman?—Yes.

7952. And you say the proceeding was not conducted by your partner, Mr. Child?—It was not. No person was employed, because the man persisted in admitting his guilt; and neither counsel nor solicitor were necessary. When the grand jury found the bill, he pleaded guilty to the indictment, and there was an end of the matter.

7953. Before you heard any evidence so as to justify a remand, had any attempt been made to get another alderman to come and take your place?—Yes. The case came on late; and we sent all over the City for the purpose. I should have been pleased to have found another alderman.

7954. Have you read the evidence of Mr. Gray?—I am perfectly acquainted with the case of Mr. Gray.

7955. Can you give us any information upon that case?—Mr. Gray came and asked me to support his petition, which he had presented to the common council. The common council, after having heard him upon the subject, recommended that a grant of 50*l.* should be given to him, beyond what other persons had subscribed that was given to him.

7956. His petition was that the estreats should be given to him, which would have been the case if the estreats had gone to the Crown, instead of to the City. Was not that so?—I do not think the Crown are in the habit of granting the estreats to parties who prosecute. I have never known an instance of it. Mr. Gray came and told me that he had made an application to the Home Office. I have no recollection of the subsequent conversation which Mr. Gray speaks of. I have a recollection of his coming to ask me to support his petition in the Court of Common Council, which I did, and which resulted in a grant of 50*l.*

7957. He speaks of a subsequent communication with you?—I had no correspondence with him to the best of my recolleetion, till after he had given his evidence before the Commissioners. Then he wrote me a letter, to know what had become of the fines. I must explain that the fines are set over, and it is two or three years after you are out of office before you know anything about them. A portion of the fines that year, I think, did not come into my hands till about a year ago.

7958. Are those estreats regular accounted for?—Yes. They are returned first by the sheriff or his officers to the Court of Exchequer, and what belong to the City are in technical language set over to the City by the officers of the Crown, and what belong to the Crown are set over to the Crown, and then they are recovered by a process, from the Court of Exchequer, directed to the sheriff, but it is three or four years after you are out of office before that is done. The secondary is paid by salary, partly made up of fees, and he has to account for every shilling of the money he receives, to a committee of the corporation, for the purpose of seeing whether or not he has received up to the amount guaranteed by the corporation, which is 1,000*l.* a year. The fees are therefore always accounted for, and the fines have to go through the first process I have mentioned. The fines are all returned by the officer to the Court of Exchequer; the officer of the Crown then apportions the fines to the different parties who are entitled to them by charter.

7959. Are you prepared to say that you are confident that if this had been a case in which the Crown had been concerned instead of the City of London, those estreats would not as a matter of course have been given to Mr. Gray?—I am not prepared to say that; I can only say, that I never knew a case in which the Crown have done so. I know a case in which the corporation having had a fine of 10,000*l.* set over to them, divided it among the parties who suffered from the delinquencies of the man who paid the fine.

7960. You do not believe that the Crown, as a matter of course, would have given that fine to Mr. Gray?—Not as a matter of course.

7961. You know the nature of the case of Mr. Gray. Do you believe if he had been dealing not with the City but with the Crown, he would have received that estreat?—I think if the Crown had known what was known to the committee, the Crown would not have given it to him. The City of London are in the habit of dealing most liberally with every person who has any connection with them or any reasonable claim upon them; they gave to the man 50*l.* upon his showing that he had been out of pocket 50*l.* and they thought the case would have ended there. Some long time afterwards, Mr. Gray applied to the corporation for those recognizances. I believe the money had been set over by the Crown, and distributed to the parties entitled to it.

7962. Mr. Gray appears to have acted a very useful part if his statement is correct?—I have not the means of stating whether it is true or false; it may be perfectly true, but I have no knowledge on the subject, and therefore cannot answer with respect to it.

7963. Do you know enough to state whether the whole matter was gone into in an equitable spirit on the part of the corporation, with a view to give him the money if he could make out an equitable case. Did the City of London act with as much liberality as the Crown would have done under the circumstances?—I think with quite as much liberality.

7964. Do you believe that full inquiry was instituted into the case?—I believe from the habits of the committee such an inquiry was held. I was not on the committee, and I cannot speak to the particular fact. The first application of Mr. Gray was a petition, which he asked me to present or support. Upon the statement he made, I did support the petition and it was referred to the committee. They heard Mr. Gray's state ment and went fully into it, and came up recommending that the court should give him 50*l.* There was then a subsequent application, a long time afterwards, respecting those fines. He had asked me upon one occasion, whether I had received the fines. I had not then received them, and did not know anything about such fines at the time.

7965. In the Court of Exchequer would the fine be set over to the City of London?—Undoubtedly.

7966. Into whose hands would it go when recovered?—Into the secondary's hands.

7967. And the secondary would have to account for it to the corporation?—Not to the corporation but to the City solicitor.

7968. You say he is paid by a salary; therefore it would be in truth so much money paid to the corporation, because they would otherwise have to make up his salary, to that amount?—That is the case, no doubt, so far as regards the fees of office, but I should say that the corporation does not put the fines into its own purse. Those fines are distributed among the parties entitled to them. I believe the fines are set over to the sheriff. The secondary does not receive them for himself; what he does receive for himself, are the fees of the office.

7969. Into whose hands would the money arising from the estreat of recognizances pass?—It comes first into the hands of the secondary. It is paid by him to the City solicitor, and then the City solicitor distributes it according as the parties are entitled to it. It depends upon the understanding between the sheriff and the under sheriff, as to whether the fines go into the pocket of the sheriff or the under sheriff.

7970. The City solicitor having the fines in his hand, would he pay them over to the sheriff, or to the under sheriff, or to the corporation?—To the sheriff.

7971. Then they do not get into the funds of the corporation?—No.

7972. If those estreats had been given to Mr. Gray, it would have been money out of the pocket of the sheriff?—Yes, or his under sheriff.

7973. Do you think that that is an advisable arrangement; you say that you think these estreats should be equitably regarded and given to any person who may have an equitable claim upon them; would not it tend to hamper the conduct of the corporation in that respect, when they were taking not their own money, but money which would otherwise have gone to their own officers?—I think the corporation would have paid the amount out of their own funds, if they had thought it a case which called for it.

7974. If the money had been paid by you to Mr. Gray, would it have been paid out of your pocket?—Certainly.

7975. In other places than London, in what position do the sheriffs and under sheriffs stand in reference to estreats?—Unless by particular charter or grant, they all go over to the Crown; they do so in the county of Middlesex, except that a portion of them goes to the dean and chapter of Westminster. The dean and chapter of Westminster have those which arise in connection with the city of Westminster.

7976. Are there any other points to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—There is one other point, I think, which I should wish to advert to.

D. W. Wire, Esq.

9th Feb. 1854.

My name was mentioned in connection with the Manchester Railway. A person came here and stated that being a member of the Court of Common Council, I took a very active part in promoting the Direct Manchester Railway, implying that I carried my professional character into the Court of Common Council. It did so happen in that case, that I was not employed professionally until just as the Bill was on the eve of going to Parliament, and in a great hurry the solicitor who was conducting the business came and asked me to take a portion of the line. That was for a period of six weeks. After I had been concerned in it, I neither opened my lips, nor took any part in the common council on the subject.

Mr. E. Harris.

MR. EDWARD HARRIS having been sworn, was examined as follows.

7977. What is your connection with the City of London?—I am a sworn deputy meter of the corporation. I beg to hand in the warrant under which I serve. (Producing the same.)

7978. How are you appointed?—I am appointed by the committee of Corn, Coal, and Finance.

7979. How are you paid?—We are paid according to the quantity of work we do, at so much per last, or per hundred quarters.

7980. Will you describe the manner in which you receive the applications for your attendance when any metage is required?—We have an office in Tower Street, which is the office for application for work to be done on board ship. We have other offices for work done in granaries; one at Horsleydown; one at Brooks's wharf, Queenhithe, and one at Alderman Stairs, just beyond the St. Katherine Docks. Our duties are to wait at the office. If an application is made, the meter takes the job according to his seniority. His duty is then to proceed wherever it may be on the river, or in the various docks within the distance that the corporation claim, and there to measure whatever quantity of grain he is required by the factor or buyer to measure; to keep an account of the same; to render an account to the Custom House officers for the satisaction of the customs; to sign or endorse the order upon which he works for the settlement of the freight; he gives a certificate to the satisfaction of the buyer and seller, which is evidence in courts of law; and he books the work finally at the office, so that a correct account may be taken and the collection made upon it, for all which the meter is held responsible.

7981. Is the measurement in the docks as well as in the river made by the meters?—Yes.

7982. Then though the porters are not admitted into the docks, the meters are?—Invariably.

7984. Do the meters measure every thing of which the amount is taken by measurement?—All grain.

7985. Do not they measure fruit and other articles?—Our court is for the regulation of the corn meters.

7986. You have nothing to do with any other description of meters?—No; we are corn meters exclusively.

7987. Your duties have probably increased of late years, though those of the porters have diminished?—Theirs have diminished in consequence of the ships going into the docks. Our work varies very much. Its amount depends upon the importations. Our work has diminished to some extent by the introduction of railways, because there we have no privilege; the charter of the corporation only including water-borne grain.

7988. Has the quantity of grain imported into the port of London increased of late years?—I do not know that it has. We have taken the average of five years, and we find the quantity generally measured by the persons in our office is 4,409,032 quarters.

7989. To what period does that go back: does it go beyond 1846?—From 1847 to 1852.

7990. You do not know what it was before 1847?—I do not. We have made the calculation, not for the purpose of being produced here, but for other purposes. The meters have made the calculations in order to refer to upon certain occasions when required.

7991. Has the amount been pretty stationary during those five years?—Yes; varying slightly.

7992. Of course that includes corn imported coastwise?—Yes, coastwise and foreign.

7993. Are the importers of corn coastwise generally willing that their corn should be measured, or do they submit to it as a tax they cannot avoid?—In some cases, with regard to corn consigned, they attempt to evade the metage dues. The right of measuring is frequently claimed as a privilege in such cases, and some litigation has taken place upon it, but generally when the grain is sold, there does not appear to be any difficulty about it. I mean when the transaction takes place between the buyer and the seller in London. By consigned corn, I mean, where corn is bought in the country, and is directed to a party in London, already measured. I have seen an account of Mr. Acland's evidence. He there states the situation of the working meters to be a very highly lucrative one. I wish to say that the situation is attended with very great risks. We have a very laborious duty to perform, and likewise the deleterious nature of the work inclines us to diseases, which sometimes bring us prematurely to be inefficient for labour.

Mr. E. Harris.

7994. But with regard to corn consigned, how do the parties ascertain that they have their correct quantities?—If they take it without the meter, they take it for the amount it is sent for, and therefore have no guarantee.

7995. Is it an unhealthy employment?—Yes; on account of the dust in the grain. In consequence of that there has been a fund established, which fund has been kept up and paid to out of the earnings of the working men. The meter's office, from the origin, has been a self-supporting place. Out of their earnings is paid the contribution to the fund, which reduces the actual earnings of the working men to a very low amount. Therefore it is not what may be described as a lucrative office, the men earning upon the average just enough to keep themselves a little respectable, and nothing further.

7996. Is it a kind of occupation which requires much practice to perform properly?—It does require practice, and sometimes great exertion.

7997. Is not it a simple operation which might easily be learnt?—It depends upon the capability of the parties. When we are found competent to discharge our duties, we are passed by the board of corn meters, who have the management of the office as a sort of delegation from the corporation of London.

7998. If this is a very unhealthy occupation, would not it be desirable that it should be performed by persons who are not employed the whole of the year in the same business?—The question is whether parties could be found who would have other occupations to fill up their leisure times with; it might be a matter of inconvenience; the work itself is not regular, sometimes we have a large quantity of vessels in and they require to be worked out in a very short time. Some few months ago we had, I suppose, about 400 vessels arrive in a very short space of time, that kept us employed for the space of four weeks to a great extent.

7999. Do you happen to know what the case is in other ports of this country where corn is generally imported? Is the work of measuring done by a class of persons who do nothing else?—I am not certain. I believe it is the invariable practice to have sworn persons to execute the duty, but I am not aware as to the mode of payment nor whether they do anything else beside.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

Thomas Lott, Esq.

THOMAS LOTT, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8000. Are you a member of the common council?—I am.

8001. Have you served on any committees of the common council?—I have.

8002. What committees?—The Coal, Corn, and Finance committee, and the City Lands committee.

8003. Is there any one of those committees with the proceedings of which you are particularly acquainted?—Not with one more than another. I was chairman of the Coal Corn, and Finance committee some years ago, and while there, one of the occupations of the committee was to deliberate upon petitions referred to the committee for grants to charities for benevolent purposes. I would state that, from the year 1781 to 1852, there has been 127,384*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* voted for charitable purposes.

8004. That is to say voted from the City funds?—Yes.

8005. What was the nature of those charities in general?—Mostly City charities, schools, dispensaries, hospitals, penitentiaries, new churches, alms-houses, infirmaries and others.

8006. Is there any other circumstance which you wish to mention?—Mr. Elliott in his examination on the seventh day at page 11 stated, "The aldermen have a preponderating "influence in all the committees. A committee of twenty-one members would have "among its number twelve aldermen or two-thirds. Those aldermen have also deputies "who are some of them members of those committees, and the alderman, directly and "through the influence of the deputy, exercises a great preponderating influence in any "case where it is his interest to exercise it." Having the honour of being one of the deputies, I beg to deny that most distinctly. With regard to the preponderating influence of the aldermen as regards numbers, a committee usually consists of twenty-nine instead of twenty-one. The aldermen do not very often come among us; when they do we are glad to see them; they are men of intelligence, and greatly conduce to the benefit of our deliberations. With regard to aldermen exercising influence through their deputies, I observe that it is no uncommon thing to see an alderman and his deputy ranged on different sides of the court, both arguing their own sides with equal energy. I have read the evidence of Mr. Morley, Mr. Mills, Mr. Deputy Harrison, Mr. Ambrose Moore and Mr. Turnley, and it is my opinion that the mala fide election of the sheriffs, nominally by the livery of London, has been established by their respectable evidence, and it is not desirable that the election of the sheriffs should remain any longer in the hands of the livery. The mode in which the sheriffs are manufactured is detailed very forcibly in the evidence of Mr. Turnley. It has been suggested that if a new constituency were created the evil would be remedied; but, as I believe the new constituency would consist of a great many wholesale men and merchants in the city of London, who prefer attending to their own business to taking any part in public affairs, I do not think that the evil would be remedied thereby. Nor should I wish the election to be placed in the hands of the common council.

Thomas Lott, Esq.

8007. How would you elect the sheriffs?—I have no other suggestion to make than that it should be placed in the hands of the Crown. I wish to say a single word on the subject of the Court of Aldermen. Having had occasionally to attend before them, in my professional capacity of solicitor and vestry clerk of several of the City parishes, I have had experience of their intelligence, of their impartiality in the administration of justice, and I should be very sorry to see them discontinued as magistrates, or to have the respectability of their position impaired by subjecting them to periodical election.

8008. When you say the Court of Aldermen, you mean the petty sessional court, in which the aldermen presided, do you not?—I am speaking of them now as magistrates presiding in the justice room. I will observe that, being men of the world, and men of business habits, to a certain extent their court has been a court of conciliation. I have seen people come there with very angry feelings, and each party, to a great extent, in the wrong, ; and I have heard advice given to them which has sent them away with better feelings towards each other. This has been occasioned by the circumstance of those magistrates having mixed with the world, and knowing how to deal with people of that description. I would also say a word with respect to the statements which have been made in regard to the aldermen attending the dinners of the corporation so frequently. We seldom see them with us on the occasions of such dinner. There is a description of dinners which the aldermen attend frequently, and those are charity dinners in the metropolis; and they generally leave behind them substantial reminiscences of their attendance in the shape of liberal contributions to the charity. It is stated that the clerk of the magistrates manages the man who sits on the bench. I would observe that that is not often the case. The aldermen prefer conducting the cases themselves. On a dry point of law they may apply to the clerk. Certainly, I think the two clerks, principal clerks, are more intelligent men than have ever before held that office. The Court of Aldermen have the power of taking securities from parties, to act as brokers. I think that those securities are too small in amount. I believe they have two sureties in 250*l.* each. I brought a case before the Court of Aldermen lately, in which a broker had absconded, and was a defaulter to the extent of 25,000*l.* Then, after my petition was brought in, asking the Court of Aldermen to proceed against the broker and his sureties, a great many other petitions came in with the same prayer. It appeared to me, therefore, that the security was insufficient. With regard to the committees of the corporation, supposing the number of members of the corporation be reduced, I think the number attending on the committees might well be reduced also. I think twelve members on each committee would be a good number; and I would suggest that all delegation of their powers to a smaller number, called select committees and sub-committees, should be abolished; but that those twelve men should be expected to turn to and do the work of the reference. I believe, from the circumstance of select committees being appointed, the smaller number having thus delegated to them the business of the larger number, there are many men of intelligence in the corporation, by this arrangement, excluded from select committees, who have not an opportunity of putting forth their powers to be useful in their position. If, therefore, the number be reduced, I think it would be a very good opportunity for reducing the number appointed to serve on committees. I would merely say one word with regard to the pageant on Lord Mayor's day. It has been occasionally eulogised, and as often disparaged by the public press. The only reasonable objection that can be made to it is on account of its impeding the traffic in the City of London. If it were found to act in that way to any great extent, it might well be confined almost wholly to the pageant on the water. The ridicule which has been heaped upon it has been through an endeavour on the part of the press to excite public feeling against it. I would observe, with regard to the main point of ridicule, the Lord Mayor's coach, the Queen's carriage, in which Her Majesty goes to open Parliament, so nearly resembles it as that it might be called its twin sister. Her Majesty being deservedly so popular, it would not answer the purpose of the press to attack that vehicle. I observed that Mr. Christy, on the 14th day, stated that complaints had been made of the removal of the street orderlies. Those street orderlies were appointed by the Commission of Sewers, and engaged for the very same purpose, at the suggestion of a Mr. Cochrane, to sweep with brooms and shovels every species of dust in the streets. As one of the Commission of Sewers, I may say that it was, on a petition of many of the inhabitants, among them being some who had, in the first instance, been petitioners for the measure, determined to discontinue it. It was thought that the dust which was occasioned in the streets by the constant removal of it caused so much injury to the goods of the shopkeepers that it was found necessary to discontinue it.

Thomas Lott, Esq.

15th Feb. 1854.

Wm. Hazlett, Esq.

WILLIAM HAZLETT, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8009. Are you an inhabitant of the city of Londonderry?—I am.

8010. Have you ever been connected with the corporation of Londonderry?—I have.

8011. What office have you held?—I held the office of chief magistrate.

8012. How long ago?—In the year 1842 up to 1844. I was elected senior alderman of the reformed corporation, and after serving for ten months I was mayor for twenty-six months following.

8013. Are you connected with trade in the town?—I am manager of a bank. Up to 1846 I was a merchant connected with business in Derry, and had been taking an active part in all matters connected with Derry for twenty-five years. I am now totally disconnected both with trade and with the corporation, and am not in a position that I can ever again be a member of that corporation.

8014. Has your attention ever been directed to the management of the affairs of the Irish society in Derry and its neighbourhood?—It has.

8015. We understand that a deputation has come over from the north of Ireland with a view of making some statement to this Commission. Is that the fact?—It is the case. I am one of the deputation.

8016. Will you state how that deputation has been formed, and with what view it comes over here?—It has been formed by a meeting of the tenantry as far as Londonderry is concerned. As far as Coleraine is concerned, which is the second town, they come here deputed by the town commissioners representing the corporation of Coleraine.

8017. The town commissioners are the municipal body of Coleraine?—They are.

8018. Of how many persons does the deputation consist?—There are eight gentlemen of the deputation.

8019. Do you consider that they fairly represent the views and feelings of the tenantry in the neighbourhood of Londonderry and Coleraine?—I believe they represent the feelings of the majority of them.

8020. Have you communicated with the other members of the deputation so as to ascertain their views on the subject?—I have.

8021. Will you have the goodness to state what are the views which you and your colleagues on the deputation have formed upon this subject?—My attention was particularly called to the relative position of the Irish society and the corporation of Derry, from the fact of having been obliged to inquire into those circumstances, in this way:—Up to the time that the reformed corporation came into operation the Irish society had paid the municipal officers, for reasons which I will refer to by and by, and when the reformed corporation came into operation they declined to pay them. I felt it was my duty as a member of that corporation, particularly when I became the head of that corporation, to inquire into the grounds on which we had claims upon that body. The result was this, that in the month of August, the first year of my mayoralty, I presented an address to the corporation stating my views as to those subjects. That was confirmed by them, and in the month of October of that year I came over with a deputation who waited upon the Irish society and made known to them those grievances or alleged grievances, in their own chamber. I can present the Commission with a copy of the original address to the corporation, and also that which was presented to the Irish society. They received us with every mark of respect and kindness, but nothing followed for several years.

8022. Was this contribution given in 1831 for the first time?—Yes. It was withdrawn in 1832 on the ground of the embarrassments of the corporation. In 1834 petitions were presented to the House of Commons complaining of the Irish society. On the 1st of August 1834, the society resolved to pay the corporate officers of Derry, and continued to do until 1841. On the passing of the Municipal Reform Act, although the society had expressed great anxiety for the reform of the corporation the society again withheld their grant. The corporation of Derry remonstrated, and presented to the corporation of London a petition, which was afterwards withdrawn. The citizens of Derry were again preparing to go to Parliament when the Irish society once more yielded, and are now paying 700*l.* a year to the corporate officers, and 500*l.* a year towards the improvements of the city. It will become necessary, in order to state the grounds on which we complain of the administration of the society, that I should give the Commissioners some short history of their connexion with us. I will endeavour to put it in the fewest possible words, but it may occupy more time than I desire. The plan of colonizing the north of Ireland originated with King James I. The origin of the scheme was in 1608, when the king thought proper to declare the precise nature of the project of plantation in Ulster as not for his own profit, but for the promotion of the public peace and welfare of the kingdom. In 1609 King James addressed peculiar motives and reasons, not to the general planters, but to the corporation of London, in which he says that the late ruinated city of Derry, situated upon the river of Lough Foyle, navigable with good vessels above the Derry, and one other place, at or near the castle of Coleraine, situate upon the river of Bann, are the best places for London to plant. It goes on to state "these towns His Majesty may be "pleased to grant unto, not only corporations, with such liberties and privileges for their "good government, &c., as shall be convenient, but also the whole territory and county "betwixt them, which is above twenty miles in length, bounded by the sea on the north, "the river Bann on the east, and the river Derry or Lough Foyle on the west, out of which "1,000 acres more may be allotted to each of the towns for their commons, rent free, the "rest to be planted with such undertakers as the City of London shall think fit." Thus it would appear that the original intention of the king was that 1,000 acres should be allotted to each of the towns, rent free. Then it goes on to say that His Majesty will be pleased to buy from the possessors the salmon fishing of the river Bann and Lough Foyle, and out of his princely bounty to bestow the same upon those towns for their better encouragement. In January, 1609, those propositions were converted into articles of agreement, and it was agreed that the City should pay 20,000*l.*, whereof 15,000*l.* was to be expended on the intended plantation, and 5,000*l.* for clearing of private men's interest. I wish to call the attention of the Commission to this, that it does not appear from any record that the Crown ever received any money from the corporation for this grant. On the part of the Crown it was a free grant, not one for which it received any payment. The money advanced was for the purpose of settling the plantation. The gentlemen connected with the society will be able to set that matter right if I am wrong. As far as any information in these books goes, it does not appear that any money was paid to the Crown. As far as they were concerned, it was a free grant, with the exception of 12,000*l.*, paid as a fine in the reign of Charles II.

Wm. Hazlett, Esq.

8023. Did not you say that the Crown undertook to buy those fisheries, and to give them to those towns?—Yes; it was a free grant; and many free gifts which were intended for us the society have intercepted. They are in possession, and have got both the fisheries. This agreement states that at Derry 200 houses should be built, and room left for 300 more, and that 4,000 acres next adjacent to the Derry should be laid thereunto, bog and barren mountain to be no part thereof. Then there are 3,000 acres to be laid to Coleraine. The 7,000 acres laid to the city of Derry and town of Coleraine, one to be in fee farm at the rent of 53*s.* 4*d.*, and the city of Derry and town of Coleraine and 7,000 acres of land to them are to be holden of the king in free burgage. Then the whole of the county is granted. The county has since been conveyed in divisions to the twelve companies who advanced the monies, and the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine are held by the society.

8024. When you say the companies who advanced the money, what do you suppose was done with the money which they advanced?—It went to building the houses in Derry. I see part of it is stated to go to buy men's interest.

8025. You do not think that the money was intended for the Crown?—I do not pretend to state more than the information I have. I bring it under your consideration, because I observe that gentlemen connected with the society have stated that money was paid to the Crown.

8026. According to your view, what was done with that money?—It went to the settlement of the property; it was expended upon the property, and they reap the fruits of it now. This (producing the same) is a map of the county of Derry, in which we have marked, perhaps not with absolute accuracy, the way in which it is divided among the twelve companies. The whole of that was conveyed to the society.

8027. Does the whole of the county of Derry belong to the companies?—Yes; with the exception of the church lands and some native freeholds.

8028. Does any of Antrim belong to the companies?—I believe the liberties of the city of Derry were taken off the county of Donegal, and the liberties of Coleraine are taken off the county of Antrim. With regard to these statements, which precede the charter, they have been used in all the suits of the society as explanatory of the charter. In all the suits with the Skinners' Company, they are set out and relied on on both sides as explanatory of the charter. I next call your attention to the circumstance that from the earliest establishment, even before the grant of the charter, King James was constantly complaining of the proceedings of the society; and on the 21st of December, 1612, he writes to Sir Arthur Chichester, complaining of the slow progress of the plantation. The words which he uses seem to confirm what I believe to be the fact, that he had not sought to raise a revenue from the lands in question. I need not trouble you with reading the letter, but it will be found in any of the proceedings of the Irish society. The king's dissatisfaction was communicated to the corporation of London, and they sent commissioners, who reported to the Common Council of London. After the articles of agreement were arranged, a committee of management was formed for the plantation, and hence the origin of the Irish society. They were first, as far as the records of the Irish society show, formed as a mere committee to carry out the proceedings of the common council; and subsequently they were incorporated by a charter, first of James I., and afterwards of Charles II.; and to them was conveyed the whole of this large property, both that part of it which was for the companies and that which we say was intended for the benefit of the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine. But the society, as such, never had any money to contribute, and never did contribute any to the original settlement. I speak with some diffidence, because I speak only of the documents before us; but as far as we know, the corporation of London never contributed anything to the establishment. The money was taken from the twelve companies, and to those companies was conveyed the entire of the county, we say as a compensation for the money which they had so advanced.

8029. You say the money was expended upon the property; to whom did the companies, according to your theory, advance the money?—The companies advanced the money, according to the information before us, to the corporation of London.

8030. What did they do with it?—They must have handed it over to the society, who disbursed it. We find them sending over several times, and that fortifications were erected and houses built, and a quay formed. In 1613 a charter was granted, dated the 29th of March, 1613. After enumerating the public and religious motives by which the king was actuated, it directs, "That the city of Derry and all the lands thereafter given, "be a county, to be called the county of Londonderry; that the town of Derry shall be "thenceforth called the city of Londonderry." It incorporates the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of Londonderry under the government of a mayor and common council, and grants powers to that corporation. I will then call your attention to the following words:—"And for the better ordering" (reading from the charter). The charter then makes a grant of the lands, and I do not think I need trouble you with it at present. The charter then grants to the corporation the power of electing a mayor, chamberlain, recorder, prothonotary, sword bearer, and six sergeants at mace, and also of electing sheriffs for the city and the county of Londonderry. I believe I am right in stating that with regard to the election of sheriffs, it is the only instance in which the model of London was followed. London appointed sheriffs for the City of London and the county of Middlesex, and the corporation of Derry elected sheriffs for the city and county of Londonderry.

8031. Do they do so now?—There are no sheriffs now for the city, and in the case of the county, the sheriff is appointed by the Crown, on the representation of the judges. Having appointed all its officers, there is no direct provision made in the shape of property for their sustenance. The whole of the property is conveyed, under whatever trusts it may have been conveyed, to the Irish society, those gentlemen who were to be appointed by the corporation of London as a society.

8032. Do you mean that no property was ever given to the corporation?—Not directly by charter. It would appear that they, the society, had the power of allocating the 4,000 acres assigned to them in some way which I will ask your attention to by and by. I need not refer to other clauses of the charter, because they do not bear upon the subject on which we come before you. I will briefly refer to the complaints on the part of the Irish society being still continued. On the 26th of March 1615, King James again writes to Sir Arthur Chichester, complaining of the proceedings of this society. "The corporation "of London, thus again called on by His Majesty, sent, in 1616, Alderman Proby, "governor of the plantation, and Matthew Springham, who was one of the persons "deputed on a former occasion, and gave them specific instructions, which are valuable, as "showing on what improvements the Crown and corporation were agreed." If you will allow me, I will show you the proceedings, which may answer your inquiry as to what was done with the money. Instructions were given to those gentlemen for the purpose of certain things being done in Londonderry. These are the instructions from the common council of London to their commissioners in going over to Ireland, and the answer of those commissioners. According to my view, these prove that there were considerable duties which the common council thought they were bound to perform at that time; and this must have been the means of a considerable expenditure of money. I trouble you with those proceedings as an answer to your inquiry, what was done.

8033. Was that before the conveyance to the Irish society, or subsequently?—One of them was before, and the other subsequently. One of them was before the charter, and the other subsequent to it.

8034. The one before the charter was not to the Irish society, was it?—Those are instructions as to what was to be done with the plantation. Their committee were acting before that time, or the common council was acting through some instrumentality.

8035. Not as the Irish society?—Not as the Irish society. In the answer to the second of those instructions, in 1616, we find the commissioners report to the king that Derry had already, out of the 4,000 acres, 3,217 acres; and for a free-school they had allotted 300 acres, which Mr. Springham had promised to build at his own charge. You will see my object in asking your attention to these items by-and-by. We find, in the year 1623, the corporation of Londonderry made a complaint to the commissioner for Irish causes, that out of the 4,000 acres, directed by the charter to be laid to Derry, only 1,500 acres had been apportioned to the corporation towards the maintenance of the mayor and officers; and that these lands were insufficient for that purpose, not being worth 60*l.* per annum. They have increased very much now, for they are worth 2,400*l.* The king complained, through the privy council, at this time, in 1624, and some of his complaints I will refer to, not troubling you with them all. One is the insufficiency of a quay at Derry; and then come some of the duties which would require the expenditure of some of this money; among others, the building of 300 houses, and that the 4000 acres should be passed to the citizens at reasonable rents, to be holden in free burgage. It appears by this, and more particularly by what is said as to Coleraine, the king expected that those tenements were to be conveyed to the citizens in free burgage. In referring to Coleraine, he says they should be conveyed for ever, "and the houses of the town," that is Coleraine "and the 3000 acres allotted by His Majesty to the use of the townesmen, "to be passed to the same townesmen and their heirs for ever, by severall and rateable "proporcons at reasonable and easier rates, to be holden of that corporacon in free "burgage." The answer made by the corporation of London is this, "touching the granting of the 400 acres of land" (reading the same).

Wm Hazlett, Esq.

8036. Can you briefly state to the Commissioners what are the grounds of complaint which exist with regard to the Irish society?—Our first complaint is with regard to the 1,500 acres that are now in the hands of the society, that they should be in the hands of the City.

8037. Upon what do you found that claim?—Upon the answer of the society to King James. The Irish society are the nominees of the corporation of London, and, as such, the corporation of London, we think, should see they do their duty.

8038. Can you show that they have been guilty of a dereliction of duty?—I think they were appointed originally as trustees for that colony. We say that they were incorporated for the purpose of protecting and promoting the interests of the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine. Therefore, in the first place, independently of any possession or any title we might have as under them to these lands, they were bound to provide, under the charter, for the sustenance of the corporation of Derry, and for other matters connected with its municipal prosperity. Our view with regard to the 1,500 acres is this: that if it were their duty, in the first place, to have given us such sustenance, it was clearly their duty, we having possession of them, to protect us in that possession. The way in which those 1,500 acres of land came into the possession of this society was this: the Bishop of Derry, in the time of Charles I., became possessed of the land from his own influence with the Crown.

8039. Was it a grant from the Crown to the bishop?—Yes; the charter of the Irish society and of the corporation of Derry was annulled by the Star Chamber. The Bishop of Derry got into possession by letters patent. The corporation unfortunately had a lease under the bishop. When the lease expired they applied to the Irish society for assistance, the bishop not renewing. The Irish society did assist them, but instead of returning the lands to the city of Derry, as we say, as their protectors they were bound to do, they took possession of these lands, and kept them themselves. We lay down this proposition, in the first place, that the Irish society were trustees; they were bound to allocate their funds with such discretion as they could exercise for the benefit of the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine. Such being the case, our impression is, if they were bound to do that, they were bound to have protected us against anybody in possession of the lands which had been assigned to us.

8040. I suppose if there had been a legal claim you would have prosecuted them?—I do not think the city of Derry has any legal claim. The Crown had certain intentions in granting this property to the Irish society. Those intentions have not been carried out.

8041. Those 1,500 acres have at last got into the possession of the Irish society, having been at one time intended for the corporation. In the mean time the bishop got them?—Yes; but the corporation held under him. They were never out of possession till they made this application to the Irish society.

8042. Was the whole of the arrangement settled by Act of Parliament?—As between the bishop and the society. There is a clear reservation of any corporate rights, if there were any. The rights of the Crown and the rights of the corporation, if any, are reserved. There is another matter of a smaller nature, which will occupy but very little time, and I will bring it before you in the words of the municipal commissioners for Ireland. You will have observed, by what I have read, that bog and barren mountain were reserved in the charter as to the city of Londonderry belonging. The Irish municipal commissioners refer to the transaction which took place with regard to that in these words: "The corporation from the earliest period," (reading the same). We think, however, there might be a question of title of that nature, yet, as between the society and us, they having been appointed trustees for us, were bound to protect us. Both those were instances in which the Crown could assist us though we could not assist ourselves.

8043. As I understand you, you think the Irish society have enforced claims which may have been raised against the corporation of Londonderry in a way inconsistent with that higher obligation which they have of taking care of the well-being and prosperity of the town of Londonderry?—Precisely so.

8044. Are the Commissioners to understand that this payment of 1,200*l.* a year to the municipal officers of Derry, and for improvements, has been at all contingent upon claims made by the corporation of Derry upon the Irish society in reference to those disputes?—I have no doubt it was so.

8045. It appears that the Irish society, though they have enforced their legal claim with regard to the property, have nevertheless made this allowance out of their funds for public purposes connected with the town of Derry. Do you think that has been a wise course or not?—I think the allowances made in the way the Irish society make them to the corporation of Derry are extremely objectionable in point of principle.

8046. Why so?—Because they maintain the control of a body residing in London over a corporate body in Ireland quite inconsistent with that freedom which free men ought to exercise.

8047. Do you think it would be better for the Irish society to spend their revenues, whatever they are, for the good of the town, but to leave the citizens to pay their own corporate officers?—I do not know why, if it was intended that the corporate officers should be paid from funds in the possession of the county, they should not be paid from them.

8048. You mean if you cannot get the property yourselves, it is as well that they should make those payments out of it?—I think the property ought to be laid out for such purposes as are most advantageous to the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine; and inasmuch as the corporate officers must be paid, I do not see any better mode of appropriating a certain portion of their funds than by paying them.

8049. What are the officers of the corporation who are paid by them?—The mayor of Derry, the recorder, the town clerk, and the sergeant at mace.

8050. Is the mayor a paid officer?—Yes; he receives 300*l.* a year. During my mayoralty I received nothing.

8051. Is that usually the case in Irish corporations?—I think the practice is various. In Dublin he is paid I think.

8052. Is Derry a flourishing town?—It is a rising town.

8053. Do you know what the rental of Derry is as assessed to the poor-rate?—I dare say some gentleman who will follow me will be able to answer that question.

8054. Does the corporation of Derry make any borough rate?—Yes.

8055. To what purposes is that applied?—To the general purposes of the corporation; they are now relieved from the payment of the corporate officers.

8056. Is there a borough goal?—No.

8057. What are the expenses defrayed by the corporation, other than the salaries of the officers paid by the Irish society?—They have the sewerage of the town, the supply of water, and the supply of gas, &c.

8058. Those are managed by the corporation, are they?—Yes.

8059. Do you happen to know what the amount of borough rates in the course of a year is?—They are limited, I think, to 4*s.* in the pound.

8060. What is the character of the Irish society as landlords in regard to the management of their property?—I take very great exception to their conduct as landlords; we object to the short tenure they give, and we object particularly to the standing order which they have that no lease be granted in perpetuity, and that no determinable leases be renewed till within three years of their expiration.

8061. What is the tenure by which house property in Derry under the Irish society is generally held?—The greater part of the city of Derry and that part of the neighbourhood is held by leases for lives, and for years, renewable for ever.

8062. Were those leases granted in the early times of the society?—They were granted in 1766. They were granted in consequence of the then governor coming over to Ireland, finding that through the system they had pursued of granting short leases and refusing to renew till they were nearly expired, the town was nearly in a state of ruin, and unless they adopted some such course as this, the town would be removed in all probability either to Straburn or lower down the river.

8064. That is under the Act?—Yes; the position in which we stand is this, here is a society who take everything of the kind to the House of Lords; they tell us this is to go to the House of Lords, and no individual is able to cope with them. The question is whether being trustees, and the prosperity of the city of Derry being one of their objects, they ought to employ their public purse to give such a sum of money for exacting forty or fifty years' purchase for renewals, which do not injure their interest, and do not take away from anything they now have, but which benefit the tenants in the same way as ecclesiastical leases benefit them. As the church submitted to such an arrangement as this, I do not see why the Irish society should use their funds to carry a case of this kind to the House of Lords.

8065. Can you state what was done with regard to the leases of town property under the Irish society?—The system is not to renew till within three years of the expiration of a lease; that was under a standing order.

8066. When was that standing order passed?—In 1847; we complain of that as completely stultifying any efforts to establish manufactures: though a large portion has been conveyed, a considerable portion near the quays is still in the hands of the society. It is fatal to the establishment of manufactures if a man purchases property with twenty-five years, or fifteen years, or ten years to run, and finds that no proposition for renewal will be listened to till within three years of the expiration.

Wm. Hazlett, Esq.

8067. You complain that they do not exercise that power in regard to granting leases in a way that would be most advantageous to the town?—Yes; for example I have made inquiries in several towns and I find in the town of Liverpool, though the corporation grant leases for seventy-five years only, the propositions for renewal are constantly listened to; so that when a man makes improvements he is practically able to keep up his term by making such applications, the full term of seventy-five years. What we complain of is that the Irish society refuse to listen to propositions of that kind, in consequence of which persons are deterred from establishing manufactures in such a way as they otherwise would do. Then again, with regard to the expenditure of the funds, I would call your attention to their own accounts, and ask whether as trustees they are justified in expending money as they do. During the last ten years they have spent 22,000*l.* in law expenses. I took some trouble a few years ago to analyze their accounts for thirty years; I took the classification from a plan of their own; we do not think that certain gentlemen acting as trustees were entitled to take in ten years 4,900*l.* as fees to their own members.

8068. What are those fees?—The society themselves, I suppose, can better explain that. I believe they charge for every attendance they make.

8069. That is part of the expense of management?—Yes.

8070. You complain that the expenses of management bear an undue proportion to the income of the society?—We do; and that in expenses of deputations and of entertainments and fees to their own members, a very large sum of money is spent which ought to go to the benefit of the property.

8071. It has been represented to us that considerable advantage arises from those deputations going from time to time to Ireland and communicating personally in matters relating to their property; do you believe that to be the case?—Indeed I have very great doubts of it. There is a gentleman who will follow me to whom I would refer you on that subject, and also with respect to the agricultural property of the society; he is their tenant, and can bring that subject before you better than I can.

8072. Is there much purely agricultural property under the Irish society?—There is little but those 1,500 acres.

8073. Have you ever turned your attention to any practical remedies which have appeared to you desirable to be applied to the existing defects?—I do not think that the Irish society ever can be serviceable to us as they are at present composed or constituted; they are composed of gentlemen who reside in London, and many whom I have met with seem to think that what is good for London is good all the world over. They have large avocations of their own to attend to; they meet together and discuss these matters; they pay very little attention, I have reason to believe, to their agents, and decide matters upon which if they know much it is certainly very extraordinary. Then again we object to the mode of their constitution: twenty-four gentlemen are assembled round this table, of whom twelve go out every year, and they are not eligible for that year at least for re-election. I have had the pleasure of meeting a good number of the members, and I never met with any persons who seemed more anxious in many instances to promote the well-being of the colony; I have listened to a good many promises, and I had hopes that something would be done, but those gentlemen went out of office and mixed with the mass, and we never saw them or heard of them again. Twelve new gentlemen are appointed every year to assemble round this table, and appointed, I fear, not exactly because they are most competent, but because they desire to be upon it. There is a pleasant run in summer to see the country.

8074. Is not it the case that, generally speaking, the property of the companies of the City of London is well managed, and, at least, as prosperous as estates in the same part of the country which belong to private individuals?—I think so. There necessarily must be an injury to any kind of property from the want of a resident landlord; a resident landlord can do many things which companies cannot. But looking at the face of the country, I should say that their estates are well managed.

8075. Generally speaking, they have been liberal landlords, and promoted improvements?—Yes; upon that subject again I would refer to Mr. Babington.

8076. Do you think that the Irish society have behaved with less liberality, as trustees, than the companies of the City of London have as landlords in the north of Ireland?—I do. If the Irish society had a proprietary interest, such as the companies have, then I think the conduct of the Irish society ought to be considered liberal, because then we should have no right to discuss those expenses, which, I think, are objectionable; but we should have the right to look with gratitude to those grants which are made, and which for the amount of income may seem large. If, on the other hand, they are trustees, and bound to manage the business economically for the interest of the trust, we are at liberty, and not only at liberty, but it is the duty of all persons who wish well to that district of the country, to find fault with those expenses, which, we say, are not such as trustees ought to indulge in. According to my calculation 60 per cent. is expended in management.

8077. With regard to the standing order, in respect to the renewal of leases, what is the date of that standing order?—1847. There is some difficulty in conveying to English gentlemen the difference between our tenantry in the north of Ireland and the tenantry here. The course pursued in those cases ought to be judged of, as I respectfully submit, not according to the views which are held here, but according to the usages of that country.

Wm. Hazlett, Esq.

8078. Is what is called "tenant right" applicable by custom to property in the towns?—There is always a regard had to the party who has built the houses and expended money upon them.

8079. Do you suppose the Irish society pay as great a regard to that, as would be paid by a judicious and well-disposed landlord in an English town?—I cannot speak to the usages in English towns. I understand in the City of London, not the least regard is paid to any expenditure which a man may have made; but with regard to country districts, in all cases, with us the usual mode of valuing them is to value the land with its improvements, but to leave the houses the property of the tenant. In 1713 a similar standing order existed in the society; there are several orders made for not granting longer leases than 41 years, and for having the lettings publicly advertised, disregarding all applications by the tenants to renew. The result was that, in 1766, the town was going to decay, and, according to the evidence of the society themselves, they found it absolutely necessary to change their proceedings and grant leases in perpetuity.

8080. You spoke just now of the disadvantage of lands which are held in mortmain, not having a resident landlord; do you think that it would be for the benefit of the county of Derry if the whole of the property of the Irish society, and all the property of the companies was sold, and the proceeds invested for the benefit of the trust and the benefit of the companies as they exist, and the land set free in the hands of private purchasers?—I think it would be a great advantage to the country to have the land set free. I have never turned my attention to the effect which might be produced in the case of the companies, because the same complaints have not existed. With regard to the towns, it would be a great advantage if some scheme could be adopted similar to the ecclesiastical scheme of leases, by which a tenant would be enabled to obtain his land, paying the full value in perpetuity, and then let the lands be sold or otherwise, as might be deemed best. I think the Crown, having given those lands for public purposes, should in some way see that they are appropriated to those purposes and that the society is incompetent, from its constitution, to undertake the management.

8081. Is there anything else that you wish to state?—Not to-day. Perhaps to-morrow I may be allowed, adopting the view which has been thrown out by the Commissioners, to state shortly anything further which occurs to me.

A. Babington, Esq

ANTHONY BABINGTON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8082. What situation do you hold connected with the town of Londonderry?—I am land agent for several properties in the counties adjoining; I am stamp distributor for Londonderry.

8083. Do you live in Londonderry?—I live three miles from Londonderry, on the lands of the Irish society.

8084. Are there any statements which you desire to make to the Commissioners?—The tenants have found the inconvenience of the management of the Irish society. I have been intimate with many members of the deputations who have come over to Ireland, who have often expressed to me the difficulties they were under from the constitution of their body. Half of them retire every year, and even many of those who have come to the country to gain information have been obliged, having got some information, to retire, and could not apply it to the wants of the locality. Some of them perhaps, are not as good judges as members of the companies, who have resident agents, and are in constant communication with them.

8085. Are you speaking of the other London companies?—Yes; I believe they are not fluctuating bodies, but they are appointed and hold their estates for life, and some of them manage them themselves. Others have sub-let them; and they are occupied, some by resident landlords and others by non-resident.

8086. You mean that they have let them on perpetuity leases?—Yes; and others are terminable leases, which will be out in a few years. The deputations visit the estates at times; and from my own experience I would say, that sometimes they do appear to take a great deal of pains and gain a great deal of information; at other times, as appears from their own reports, they have spent only part of a day in Londonderry, having been nearly a month away from London. They arrived late in the evening and left early the next morning. That was in the year 1825. I have their own report here. We have no doubt experienced kindness from most of them and they show a great disposition, while among us, to listen to all we have to say, and to make arrangements which will be suitable for the plantation. We make applications to them in writing. Some deputations have favoured us with much kind consideration; at other times we get rather a short refusal. We may be unreasonable, but I think if there was a little more pains taken it would be better.

8087. Is it the habit of the deputations to decide points when they get over there, or do they wait until they return to London?—They wait till they return to London. They report to the court, and that is generally made the ground for any change in what we had understood they were going to do for us.

A. Babington, Esq.

8088. Are these deputations ever accompanied by the London secretary?—He has avoided them latterly. I have sometimes seen him there.

8089. Who do you suppose is the officer with whom the management of the estate principally rests; is it the Irish agent or the London secretary?—I believe the London secretary, from all the information I can get.

8090. If the London secretary has this authority, do you think that it would be desirable that he should visit the estates occasionally?—It might be of use. He is an officer for life. He could obtain more valuable information, from time to time, than gentlemen who have only a year, and sometimes two years, for the purpose. They generally seem to have an anxiety, when they come amongst us, to apply English customs to everything; and we are of opinion that does not work well in Ireland. With London capital and London experience people can manage better to make more of their time and their money than we can. We go on a little slower, being anxious to follow in their steps as well as we can. We think, as the society are trustees, their visits cost a great deal of money.

8091. Do you think the whole system of management rather expensive for trust property?—I do; very much so. I manage some estates myself; and I think my employers would be very much dissatisfied if I put them to an expense of much above 5 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the whole management.

8093. It seems to be the general principle to promote education and charity, and to assist the municipal institutions of Derry?—My answer is, that they receive full value for their landed estate. The receipts have been between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* a year. The property is let on short leases generally, and in thirty years they have not spent any money to improve it, except giving a sum of money for a school upon it.

8094. You think, looking at the management of the property as property, it is not judiciously exercised?—No; they give charities to other gentlemen's estates. I see by their returns, and by their own report, with respect to the companies' estates, that on three deputations they thought it their duty to inquire what the other London companies were doing. The companies seem perfectly willing and able to supply sufficient funds to support their own schools. In one instance, the Drapers' company have given 6,000*l.* to build a church, and 5,000*l.* to build markets. The Cloth Workers have been doing something in the same way. The Mercers have built a very handsome church; and I observe, in their distribution to schools and charities and Presbyterian houses of worship, on applications being made to the Irish society, they have given away money, which should have been disposed of for the city of Derry and the good of the plantation, on various importunate applications in the county of Donegal and Antrim to some extent, and in several parts of the county of Londonderry, when the London companies are very able and willing to support their own.

8095. Was not it the case that the trust was originally instituted for the benefit not only of the town of Londonderry and its immediate neighbourhood, but also with reference to all the property held by the London companies?—I believe, from the information I can obtain, that the whole county was granted to them; and they divided it among the London companies.

8096. Do you understand this trust to have been instituted for the sole benefit of the town of Londonderry and its immediate vicinity, or that the trustees are bound to look to the general benefit of the whole plantation instituted at that time in that part of the north of Ireland?—Divisions have been made to those London companies; and, in my opinion, they have so judiciously disposed of those funds, that we have a right to look to the Irish society to support the Londonderry district, and certainly not to neglect or injure it.

8097. You do not mean to put it on the ground that, under all circumstances, Londonderry would have an exclusive right to the proceeds of this property; but, as the rest of the plantation is sufficiently provided for by other means, under the circumstances, you think, it ought to be given to Londonderry?—Yes; that is my opinion.

8098. Are you acquainted with the state of the rural property of the Irish society?—I am.

8099. What is the extent of that property?—It is called 1,500 Irish acres, about 3,000 English.

8100. What is about the rental of that property?—Between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* a year. In my memory, I do not recollect any money of any kind, belonging to the Irish society, being laid out upon that portion of their property.

8101. Into about how many holdings is that property divided. Is it much divided, or is it held in large holdings?—It is a good deal divided. There are forty or fifty tenants on it.

8102. Is it the habit of the Irish society to erect the farm buildings upon that property, or are they erected by the tenants?—By the tenants.

8103. Has that been the case as far back as your memory extends?—Yes.

8104. Are the repairs done by the Irish society?—None.

8105. Is any draining or any improvement done upon the land by the society?—None. In the year of the famine, there was a piece of bog cut out, which they reclaimed. I refer to the evidence given by one of the deputation here. I observe, that he said the people were set to work. There was a bog-field reclaimed by the Irish society in the year of the famine. They employed some persons upon it. In the course of a few years afterwards, the tenant was obliged to throw it up, he could not keep it at the rent.

8106. In this case, supposing that the land is granted upon liberal leases, would it be necessary that the Irish society should themselves undertake any outlay upon it, or might not it be left to the enterprise of the tenants?—The principal part of them are not able to do it.

8107. Do you complain of the leases not being granted upon terms which are encouraging to the tenants to improve?—Two or three have been given of that description I suppose the deputations would explain that. The improvements stipulated in those leases have been carried out handsomely. I will here mention, that Mr. Moore and myself obtained leases some years ago. I did not intend to advert to any individual case, but I think I cannot help it from the question which has been asked. There are three tenants in those 3,000 acres, who got sixty-one years' leases. In the year 1832, I got a sixty-one years' lease from the Irish society. They bound me to lay out 750*l.*; and they gave me seven years to do it. I did it within the time; and got a certificate from their agent that I had fully performed my contract. Having a larger farm than I at first intended to hold upon my hands, I wished to lay out a much larger sum, and I went on laying out a considerable sum of money. I had laid out above 6,000*l* upon it. I have memorialized the society at times for an extension of the lease. They always treated me very civilly when they came over to the country; and approved of my buildings. The last time I applied to them, I stated the case very strongly; and said as they were trustees for the plantation, as I had laid out so large a sum, I would take it as a favour if, having spent so many years in making the improvements, they would make up my term to my original grant of sixty-one years. The answer I got from their secretary to one of memorials was this:—"January 1847. Milton Lodge .In reply to your memorial, I beg "to inform you, that the Honourable the Irish society have come to the following "resolution:—"That a new lease be granted to you for fourteen years, to commence "from the expiration of your present term, at the rent of 162*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.*" I then paid 112*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.*, upon the distinct understanding "that a clause shall be inserted for the "tenant's right to be waived or given up; and the whole of the buildings thereon, or to be "placed thereon, with all the improvements on the land, &c., are to be the exclusive "property of the Irish society at the expiration of the term." This was rather a damper to myself and some of the neighbouring farmers. At the time there was an appearance of the Legislature interfering about substantial improvements. I think that tenants have a fair claim for substantial improvements. I do not know any landlord, or any of the twelve companies, or any landed proprietors I am acquainted with, who has ever charged any tenant for any house built by him, or any sum expended by himself in buildings. When the leases are out, or any change is to be made, the landlord sends his surveyor and values the land. I have to mention another case, which, in my opinion, retards improvement and outlay of money on the property of the Irish society. Doctor Miller, a resident and physician in Londonderry, purchased a farm some years ago, with the approval of the Irish society. He made application for extension of his lease, to enable him to erect a dwelling-house and good farm buildings. They agreed to give a sixty-one years' lease, on condition of his expending a large sum, I believe, 1,600*l.* They now decline to give sixty-one years lease of his entire holding, but have offered him sixty-one years of only twenty acres, and twenty-one years of the remaining portion of a farm of considerable extent. This proposed arrangement stops improvement. The tenant cannot, in justice to himself, expend so large a sum on a holding of twenty acres. When the lease granted of the short term of the largest portion has expired, he must either be content to hold the smaller quantity, with buildings much too extensive erected on it, or submit to a new valuation on the improved state of the land, to the benefit of the landlord and not the tenant.

8108. Is it the common practice of landlords in the north of Ireland not to erect buildings or make improvements of any kind upon the property?—The landlords do not erect buildings generally; but, I have known some of the companies assist tenants, either building the houses themselves, or providing a certain portion of the expense of the materials; the tenants doing the labour.

8110. In what respect has there been a difference?—When I commenced this farm, there were two town lands on each side of me out of lease. They report that the houses were in a wretched state, very filthy and dirty. At the end of their report, they seem to say, that they have done an advantageous thing by increasing the rent-roll of the Irish society: letting the land to gentlemen for twenty-one years, who would save them that expense. It was handed back to the society at the end of the time; no money having been laid out. The houses are miserable, the farms ill cultivated, and not sixpence spent in draining. Other landlords, to my own knowledge, have encouraged their tenants by draining. That seems to be of great advantage to the tenant. He then gets an allowance of from ten to twenty or twenty-five per cent., when he is paying his rent. He then holds that land which is so much improved by draining, at the same rent he held at before; which enables him to come forward on better terms the next half year; and so the improvement goes on to great advantage of both landlord and tenant. I am sorry to say, we have nothing of the kind going on with us. The Church Temporalities Bill enabled the Church land leases to be converted into perpetuities. There are two portions of them very near the City of Londonderry. Those persons have been able to get perpetuities from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, paying a standing rent to the bishop at a very moderate purchase. The general price is two years and a quarter, between the Church land lease of twenty-one years, and the perpetuity lease. There are very respectable buildings being erected on both sides of the water; but, from the Irish society's standing order, I am afraid there is no chance of improvement on their property at present.

A. Babington, Esq.

8111. Do you think it would be for the benefit of the county of Derry if all the property of the Irish society and the separate companies were sold, and the proceeds invested?—I do. I think if the tenants could get a sufficient tenure, they could very much improve on the property. The society have given several reports of the management of the companies; they very much approve of their management; and I am quite certain had the same gentlemen who concurred in those reports remained in office, the same improvements would have been carried out on their own property.

8112. Do you believe that private proprietors would expend as much money upon the property as the Irish society and the companies expend?—They might easily expend as much as the Irish society, for they have expended none in my neighbourhood on the quarter lands. They appear to me to wish to turn everything to money. There was an application made for land for water-works. The Irish society fancied they had a right to the same price as any individual. The tenants were paid for their holdings, and the Irish society were paid to the full extent of their reversionary interest; so as to railways, and also the cemetery which was proposed the other day, they obtained the full value of their reversionary interest.

8113. Do you believe it would be for the benefit of Londonderry and the vicinity that this property should be sold and the money invested, and the proceeds administered for those public purposes, to which now the income of the property is applicable?—I do. If these gentlemen were permanent, I have no doubt things would be better done. They have built a good house for their agent, and have called it Government House. By our industry and employing the people, the rates have been kept very low, to the advantage of the property. Mr. Moore and myself holding large farms, have employed the people to advantage. During the time of the famine, ours was the only barony in the county in which no sessions were held. We did all we could to employ the people, and the Irish society were called on only to a very small extent to assist us.

8114. Do you draw a distinction between the property of the Irish society and the property of the City companies, in regard to their effects upon that part of the country?—Yes; from the constant resident agency in the latter case, and also because deputations coming over are able to apply themselves steadily to their duties. Unfortunately, though some of the gentlemen of the Irish society have the greatest anxiety to help us, they are changed immediately, and we have not the benefit of their kindness or advice.

8115. The agents of the City companies have lived in great harmony with the most respectable inhabitants of the part of the country with which they have been connected, have they not?—They have. I have stated in the former part of my evidence that landed proprietors generally were not in the habit of charging their tenants for their buildings; the Irish society in some instances have done so. One of the tenants in my neighbourhood was encouraged to lay out 100*l.* in building a farm house, upon which the Irish society charged him 5*l.* per annum. That went on for three years; it was on a strong remonstrance afterwards remitted; but the man had paid 15*l.*, which he has never received back. Another tenant was charged 25*l.* for some buildings and machinery put up by him.

I. Colquhoun, Esq.

ISAAC COLQUHOUN, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8116. What situation do you hold?—I am a solicitor in the City of Londonderry, and general agent.

8117. Do you reside in Londonderry?—Yes.

8118. Has your attention been turned to the position of the Irish society with reference to the town of Londonderry?—Yes; very much so, from my position as a solicitor and land agent to some of the properties.

8119. Are there any observations which you desire to offer to the Commission?—The constitution of the society, which has been brought before you by the witnesses, who have been examined, I think, you must see yourselves, is very objectionable. It throws the entire government of this plantation into the hands of the London secretary. Of course, the members, from time to time, must receive their information from the secretary. I wish to mention some circumstances; one, particularly referring to the injurious effects of the standing orders upon the welfare of the City of Derry.

8120. Do you mean the standing order with regard to the renewal of leases?—Yes agent for Judge Torrens, who holds a small property in the City of Derry. When

I became agent, a part of it was an orchard, that had been in lease to an under-tenant of the Judge's, and the lease expired some time about 1842. Judge Torrens held a lease from the London society, for forty-six years, from March 1835, of which there would be now twenty-seven years to run. He projected two streets, one called Chamberlain-place, and the other Harvey-street. He applied to the London society, from time to time, for an extension of the lease, in order to enable him to expend a sufficient sum of money in erecting good houses. These applications generally received very laconic answers—sometimes a mere verbal answer, and the effect has been that a very minor class of houses has been built upon those two streets, which, perhaps, may last for the remainder of the term of about twenty-seven years. The operation of this rule appears to me to be very injurious to the improvement of the City of Derry. Another case, is one of a similar nature, though, I think, one of greater importance, because, as showing the extreme illiberality of the society. The tenant, under this lease, asked only what evidently must tend to the mutual advantage of both landlord and tenant. He asked only for an extension of his lease to the tenant who might be in occupation at the termination of his tenure and who had expended his money on the holding. This property had been the butter market of the City of Derry; but in consequence of the changes of the markets by the corporation, this butter market fell into the hands of the lessee under the lease. It is in a very prominent position in the City of Derry, at a place called Waterloo-place, which is a very rising part of the City. Mr. Beresford is the lessee, and he memorialized the Irish society, and after stating the term for which this lease was held, of which there are twenty-seven years to come from March next, he only requested them to undertake to grant to the tenant who might take the premises, and lay out his money upon them, an extension of the lease; the tenant, at the expiration of Mr. Beresford's lease, becoming a tenant of the society, at the ground rent which he was now to pay for it. The consequence of their refusal has been, that on one end of this plot of ground, (as I have said in a most prominent situation in Derry), is a shed, now converted into a butcher's shop. The other end of this ground a painter and glazier has taken a small portion of, to put up a house. If the London society had complied with the prayer of this petition, by granting to the tenant, so expending his money, and in possession, an undertaking to extend his lease for sixty-one years, after the expiration of Mr. Beresford's lease, good and valuable houses would have been built, to the improvement and beautifying of the City, instead of the miserable huts which, I suppose, will now be raised upon it. I bring forward those two cases in reference to the injury which this standing rule does to the City of Derry. I should now like to bring forward a case or two to show the grasping propensity of the Irish society. I am the land agent and the law agent for Mr. McCrae, who was a respectable merchant in the City of Londonderry, who has improved more upon the Irish society's estate than any other tenant upon that estate. This old gentleman happened to take from the Irish society a small triangular piece of ground, upon what we call the Strand, which is a very improving part of the City of Derry, in the year 1832. He bound himself to build a certain number of houses, of a certain class. His circumstances altered, in the meantime, from some mercantile occurrence. However, he was always able to meet his engagements, and he is now a gentleman retired from business, with a large house and quay property in the City of Derry. Circumstances occurred at this particular moment which rendered it almost impossible for Mr. McCrae to perform his covenant with the Irish society, and build those houses, which were, I believe, to be six in number. He built three of the houses. He invested the sum of about £474 in so doing; and in payment of rent for the period, he held this ground, which was to him profitless. The Irish society brought an ejectment for non-fulfilment of that covenant, and took the houses from him. They got 300*l.* for the houses, which he had built with his own money, from a Dr. Morton, a very respectable gentleman, and put this 300*l.* in their pocket. At all events, Mr. McCrae never saw any of it. He memorialised them from time to time, without effect. They ejected him from the houses, and so far as Mr. McCrae or I know to the contrary, applied the money to their own use. Mr. McCrae, in August, 1844, memorialised them again, asking them to refund to him even a portion of this money, which he had so expended; but they refused his application. I was unfortunate enough myself to relieve the society, at one time, of a predicament which they had got into with a Mr. Williamson. Mr. Williamson held a small house in the City of Derry, running back to the wall. This was a disputed property, between persons of the name of Young and the society. Mr. Williamson agreed to give Mr. Young the sum of 250*l.* and to become the tenant of the Irish society, at 1*l.* per annum. He was unable to fulfil that agreement, and he came to me and asked me to take it off his hands. I consented to do so, and Mr. Fletcher, the then local agent of the society at Derry, wrote me this letter: "I am in safe receipt of your cheque for 250*l.*, being a consideration for a sixty-one years' lease of the premises, lately held by Mr. Williamson, under the heirs of Dr. Young, and now in the possession of the Honourable the Irish society; the agreed rent for the said term of sixty-one years to be 1*l.* per annum. I believe it was fully understood between us that you "are to improve the premises by "an erection of a new house fronting the east wall, which is to be set back sufficiently to "make a square with the coign of the houses above it on the one side, and with that "of the Wesleyan minister, below it, on the other." I agreed with an architect for the building of this house, and I asked the society's agent to come and inspect the foundation, and to approve of it. He directed the foundation to be laid in the way he wished it, and the architect went on with his building. The first erection which had been made he disapproved of, and it was taken down. After the house had got up a considerable way the agent found fault with the position of it. The society then refused to complete the arrangement with me as regards the house, but the result was a paltry addition of 2*l.* a-year to my rent. It was not that they cared so much about the building of the house on any particular site. Here is their letter:—"In reply "to your communication relative to your premises, held under the Honourable Irish "society, between the east wall and Rosemary Lane, I am directed by the society to "inform you, that they will be willing to accept a rent of 3*l.* per annum, and permit the "house on the east wall to stand as built by you." So that they have got by this objection, which I do not like to style a trick, an addition to their rental of 2*l.* a-year That, I think, I have a right to complain of. I asked the deputation, who were sitting within two minutes' walk of the house, to come down and inspect it themselves, and if they thought I had not erected the house properly, I was quite willing to abide by their decision; but they refused to come. I happen to be the owner of a moiety of one of those old leases. In the year 1767, perpetuity leases were granted, of which you have heard to-day. By those leases a sum of three guineas was to be allowed to the secretary for preparing the leases and the counterparts. I applied for a renewal of that lease in 1832, and they furnished me with a renewal of the lease according to a new form which they had prepared, which obliged the tenant to pay those three guineas every seven years, as the secretary's fees. I refused the lease, for I said that they were bound to prepare the lease themselves. They submitted, for I do not think they could well avoid it, and they gave me a lease according to the terms of the original lease, which, I believe, is the only one held upon the estate. They prepared this lease themselves, and gave it to me without any costs. Now the system pursued generally, with regard to the tenants upon the estate, is this:—They not only charge them with three guineas every seven years, but they also charge them for preparing those leases to the amount of from six guineas to 10*l.* for every lease. I think that is taking an advantage of the tenants. There is a case of a Mr. Munn, who is one of our most respectable merchants in the city of Derry, I feel desirous to bring under your notice. He was, and is, a very enterprising merchant. He was very anxious to establish spinning-mills, or a spinning-mill. He brought a deputation of the society in the year 1836, to see his premises, that they might inspect the ground, and see how favourable it was to the erection of spinning-mills. The deputation of the society, in their report of the year, say—"We received a memorial from the Flax Spinning-mill "company, through Mr. Barber the secretary, praying for the grant of a site within, or "contiguous to, the city, for the erection of machinery. We are not aware of any vacant "spot at present; but if an appropriate place can be pointed out, which is in possession "of the society, we recommend that it be granted them on easy terms, as the establishment "of such works would afford employment to many poor persons, and would, in other "respects, be desirable in Derry, or its immediate neighbourhood." Mr. Munn, having such a spot, applied to the society for the extension of his lease. He had at that time only 26 years to run; however, the immediate tenant of the Irish society had a much longer term; Mr. Munn being a sub-tenant. The society told him, if he could possess himself of the interest of their immediate tenant, then they would grant him an extension of the term. I was agent for the gentleman who was the proprietor of this property. Mr. Munn applied to me, and I sold him the property for 2,700*l.* Mr. Munn possessed himself of this property; he expended a considerable sum upon it—7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.*, perhaps—in erecting upon it a spinning establishment. The deputation from the society, in the year but one following, that was in 1838, reported thus:—"On "the memorial of John Munn, for an extension of the lease of the premises which he "held under the Society, of which 43 years are unexpired, we visited the premises, and "find that he has expended a very considerable sum of money in building flax-mills, "where a great number of adults and children are employed. He is about to add very "considerably to those buildings, by erecting work-rooms, &c., so that a much larger "number may be employed. We, therefore, recommend that his present term be extended "to 61 years." Up to the present time Mr. Munn's applications to them have been treated with slight, I may say, with contempt. He sometimes gets a verbal answer, and sometimes a very laconic written answer, from the Irish society, to the effect that his application cannot be entertained.

8121. When communications are made by persons connected with the property to the society, are they generally made in writing to the society in London, or to the resident agent in Derry?—Generally by a memorial to the society in London, sent through the agent in Derry.

8122. Has the agent in Derry any discretion given to him in deciding small points?—Not the slightest; everything is referred to London; the agent in Derry receives the rents and accounts for them. I believe he has no more power than I have.

8123. Has not he the usual power which a resident agent has with regard to the property?—I do not think he has even the power of recommendation.

8124. Are you acquainted with the power which the Irish society has, with reference to confirming the bye-laws passed by the corporation of Derry?—Our bye-laws must be submitted to them.

8125. Have you found any practical inconvenience or evil to arise from that control? —I cannot say. I. Colquhoun, Esq.

8126. Do you think it objectionable in point of principle?—Certainly. 15th Feb. 1854.

GEORGE FRANKS, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows. G. Franks, Esq.

8127. What connection have you with the town of Derry?—I am a citizen of Derry. I am a solicitor there.

8128. Have you any statement to make with respect to the Irish society?—I have with respect to the payment of the Irish society to the corporate body, after repeated solicitations, of the 1,200*l.* a year. I do not think you have been put in possession of the circumstances under which that occurred. The circumstances, I think, will show you that it was under a very unconstitutional coercion on the part of the society that such an arrangement was made. By the passing of the Irish Municipal Act the effect was to abolish the Court of Mayor and Recorder, which had been previously in existence, whose proceedings were conducted, in some instances, according to the course of the common law, with long pleadings and all that sort of formality, but had latterly become almost in disuse in consequence of the Civil Bill Court of the assistant barrister being in existence, having a concurrent jurisdiction in actions by civil bill, with a simpler mode of proceeding. When the Corporate Bill was passed there was a provision in it, that it was in the option of the citizens, if they thought fit, to continue such a jurisdiction to apply by petition to the Lord Lieutenant, and thereupon they were to intimate what salary they would pay the recorder, and if the Lord Lieutenant approved of it the recorder was to be appointed. It was discussed in the corporation whether it would be prudent or wise for this then apparently insolvent corporation to undertake such a thing, or whether any practicable benefit could result to the City from the continuation of such a court, seeing that they had other courts of concurrent jurisdiction that would not saddle them with any expense.

8129. Was there to be also a Court of Quarter Sessions?—Yes.

8130. If you petitioned for it?—The corporation did. But we had a concurrent Court of Sessions held in Derry as frequently as that court would be before the assistant barrister, a lawyer unconnected with Derry. I was examined by the corporation as a person who had long experience as a solicitor about the practical effect of the Mayor and Recorder Court, and the utility or inutility of continuing it. I gave my opinion then, and I still adhere to that opinion, that the continuation of that court was quite useless for any practical purposes; that all the advantages to the citizens could be as well obtained by that other court of concurrent jurisdiction without any expense; and it would be a most absurd thing for the citizens to saddle themselves with the expense of a recorder, whose salary, according to the Municipal Act, must be paid by taxing the citizens, who already felt the taxation grievous enough. Subsequently to that this negociation occurred, I understand, in London. The mayor has already stated that he remained in office some time after the Municipal Act, and did his duty without any salary. However, the gentlemen appeared to think that it would be much better to get something in support of the magistracy, and I understand they applied to the Irish society. The Irish society then made terms with them that if they would undertake to petition for a recorder they would contribute a certain sum to the magistracy and the support of the City, but they bound themselves in no way to continue that support. It was dependent upon their will and pleasure, and if the corporation or the recorder, who might then or hereafter be appointed, should displease the Irish society there was nothing to prevent their withdrawing this grant, which they say was purely gratuitous, and which they were not bound to make. That, I submit, is a practical instance of the working of what the English Commissioners alluded to as to the inconvenience of having a governing power over a civil community or a local corporation, which in its inception was intended to be independent. You will see by referring to the charter that great privileges were granted to the mayor of Derry. It was contemplated evidently that he was to support some state; he was given a mace bearer and sword bearers, and not only that, but he was granted the privilege of being associated with Her Majesty's Justices of Assize in the City of Londonderry, and actually to take precedence in the commission in the City of Derry of Her Majesty's Justices of Assize. All those things must necessarily have required a considerable provision for their support, and would be a mere mockery without such a provision to have conferred such privileges; and I cannot bring myself to understand on what principle the Irish society say there was no obligation on them; that it was at their good will and pleasure to give this 1,200*l.* a year. I am putting out of consideration the old documents, which we contend would show that they had occupied the property that was evidently intended for that purpose. I think you will find that King Charles the Second would not have granted a charter, contemplating an outlay for all those civic pageantries which were evidently contemplated there, unless he had been impressed with the idea that there was some fund applicable to the support of that magistracy, or, if there was not, it was the part of the Irish society, not as a favour, but a part of the duty of their trust to provide an ample fund for the support of the dignity of the mayor of Derry, the sheriffs of Derry who were to be appointed by him, and those different civic officers that were pointed out by the charter.

8131. Did the City of Derry petition for a recorder?—Yes. In consequence, as I say of this coercion, that the Irish society would not give them a farthing unless they chose to elect a recorder. The sensible people of Derry thought it was a useless expenditure, but the Irish society interposed as the governing body.

8132. After the Irish society had so said that they would grant this money, and yet at their will and pleasure only, so as not to bind themselves to give it in future; knowing that, did the people of Derry petition for a recorder?—Yes; and there is a recorder now appointed, and if the Irish society should take into their heads, which they can at their will and pleasure, to withdraw the grant, I do not see how the citizens could save themselves from being taxed to supply his salary, which they have pledged themselves to the Lord Lieutenant to furnish. By the Charter of Incorporation the citizens of Derry have the power of electing a representative to parliament. We see by their own reports that the Irish society did in former times take upon itself to interfere with the independence of the citizens there, and dictate to them who should be their candidates. Even in modern times, though persons disclaim being guilty of such a thing now, in this particular recent instance there was a great interference with the civic affairs in dictating to them the appointment of a recorder.

8133. The Irish society does not interfere in the election for members of Parliament now, does it?—No.

8134. It has been stated to us that they do not interfere in any manner; do you believe that to be true?—I believe they do not in the City of Londonderry. With respect to the renewal of leases and their liberality on that subject, I cannot agree with what has been said. I know instances myself in which they have exhibited great illiberality. About two years ago there was a deputation over here on other matters, who waited upon the solicitor for the Irish society. A number of those perpetuity leases are grants of houses with acres attached, the acres are a rural portion, intended originally as farms to the houses, the houses being in the city. Since that time those acres have passed into different hands; some sold their acres, and only retained a portion of the premises in their leases. A variety of very obsolete covenants that were introduced into the leases were inconvenient in the transmission of property or making out the title. We applied to the society, thinking that there would be no difficulty in getting grants in fee, like any other landlords, to say whether they would modify those leases in such a way as to be more suitable to the existing state of things. The Commission will observe that in most of the covenants of the leases, there are some of the most absurd things in the world. Some of the leases are confined to houses, yet they preserve in them covenants that they will not cut turf on the premises. Another is that they will not erect any mill on the premises. That, we think, is unsuitable to the present time, when steam mills and others are very necessary for mercantile purposes. Those prohibitive clauses were all included; but in addition to that, in those leases comprising the rural portions, those rural portions happen to be in different districts, under the management of the Poor Law Union; so that in one district there may be a poor rate struck of 2*d.*, in another district there may be no poor rate struck, while in the City there is a poor rate struck of 1*s.* When you came to pay your rent, it became very difficult to allocate the portion of the poor rate. One district pays nothing, one pays 2*d.*, and another pays the great bulk of it. We represented that to the solicitor and others. He heard us very patiently, and seemed to assent to the reasonableness of our observations; but he said that there was some leading lawyer who must be consulted, and he had no opportunity of interfering. Since that time I understand the answer has been that if we show them they are compelled to make those alterations, they will do it. We should say in Ireland that there was no great liberality in that. We ask them to modify their leases to suit the present time; and the way we are met is, show us that a court of equity will compel us to do it, and then we will do it. That we should say is an Irish mode of granting a favour. With respect to an individual case; I applied on the part of a Mr. Lacky to get a grant in fee, according to a printed form which had been prepared on the part of the Irish society, retaining the present covenants, which are unsuitable to the present time. Mr. Lacky thought it was unnecessary to make any objection to it, and he asked them for a renewal on their own terms. The answer he received was that, inasmuch as part of his premises that is the acres included in his lease of the City tenement which had been underlet, were out of repair; that he had thereby forfeited all right to any grant, and they would not grant it. The part they fixed on was what is called the gazebo, or stand-house of the race ground. The Irish society assented to the passing of an Act in which the race course and the stand-house are declared to be vested, or under the control of the corporation of Derry, and thus dedicated for public purposes; and this very statute is referred to and made part of the case of the Irish society in their suit with the Skinners' company; and this was the only part of the premises comprised in the lease of Mr. Lacky that they could fix on as being out of repair—that very gazebo which they had virtually in this Act of Parliament, at least, embarrassed Mr. Lacky in obtaining any control over. I apprehend, in the teeth of that Act of Parliament, Mr. Lacky might have been embarrassed very much if he had attempted to take it down or repair it.

8135. Are you prepared from the consideration you have given to this subject to suggest

G. Franks, Esq.

any practical course which you think it would be expedient to take in regard to the position of the Irish society, which would be advantageous to that part of Ireland with which you are connected?—I would remove the power of the Irish society to interfere in the appointment of officers of the corporation of Derry, and oblige them to give a permanent fund "for the support and good government of the city," to use their own words, the support of the civic officers. I think especially they should put the recorder in such a position as to be independent of any influence whatever.

8136. In your opinion any payments made by the Irish society towards the salaries of the municipal officers should be obligatory and not optional?—Exactly so. I can easily imagine a suit before the recorder, where the rights of the public and the rights of the Irish society may come into question; and that, although his decision might be just, still if in favour of the Irish society, popular opinion may think justice has not been done.

8137. Do not you think it would be desirable that some system should be devised by which the citizens of Derry should make a rate to pay their own officers, as is done in other places?—Yes; if the Irish society are not bound under the terms of their charter to do it themselves. With respect to renewable leases, the suggestions I would make would be, if they had not the power of altering those obsolete covenants, to apply to the legislature to authorize them to do so. I think there should be a power somewhat similar to what has been already alluded to in the Ecclesiastical Temporalities Act, to divide those rural portions at the option of the tenant from the city parts, so as not to make the landlord of the city portion answerable when he has long parted with the rural portion, for the default or rent of the occupier of the part so parted with; of course, so apportioning the rent so as to give the landlord full security.

8138. It has been suggested by one witness that it would be a great advantage to the town if all this town property of the Irish society were sold, and that in reality it would improve the town more than any system of management. Is that your opinion?—Certainly; we have the experience of the Incumbered Estates Act. It has created a new class of proprietary, who take a pleasure in spending their money and improving their estates; they have it as an inheritance; the house descends from one generation to another.

8139. Do you think a measure like that would have a great effect upon the prosperity of the town of Londonderry?—I am convinced of it. It would create an independent proprietary in Derry, and tend to the advancement of the people in a variety of ways.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M.P.

Sir Robert Alexander Ferguson, Bart., M.P., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8140. You are member of Parliament for the city of Londonderry?—I am; and have been for nearly 24 years.

8141. You reside in the neighbourhood of the town?—I reside within about a mile of the town, on one of the perpetuity leases of the Irish society.

8142. You are, of course, well acquainted with the situation of the Irish society, with reference to that part of the country?—I am well acquainted with the situation of the property of the Irish society.

8143. Are there any points upon which you desire to offer any information to the Commission?—Some points were referred to in Mr. Anderton's evidence, in reference more particularly to the litigation between the Irish society and the Bishop of Derry. The litigation between them arose from proceedings which took place before granting the charter, when the Crown intimated to the corporation of London that it would bring up the right of presentation to the livings in the county of Londonderry, and grant them to the corporation of London. There was no evidence that the Crown had ever done so; but for, I believe, nearly 200 years this litigation had been going on occasionally as vacancies occurred in the livings. At last, in the year 1843, the Act which had passed ten years before for England, has extended to Ireland; it put a limit of time in contests respecting livings, except as to suits commenced before 1845; and so the Irish society instituted suits for all their livings. At the same time they were contending for one of the livings which was the subject of the verdict of a jury in Dublin. The action was tried in Dublin, and the jury found in favour of the bishop. The case was taken to the House of Lords, and after a solemn argument there was decided in favour of the bishop, and that put an end to all those suits. Of course the other suits which they had brought were on that judgment discontinued, and not, as Mr. Anderton seemed to think, from the stubbornness of the Irish juries in not finding for Englishmen. The fact is, both the foreman and the majority of the jury were holding under the Irish society by terminable tenures, and if either fear or favour could have influenced the jury, the effect would have been in favour of the Irish society. The jury were then made the subject of the most vituperative abuse, which the foreman was very anxious to bring before the Court of Queen's bench; but unfortunately he wrote a letter himself, abusing The Times for the leading article inserted, and the Court of Queen's Bench thought that having done so, he was not entitled to any relief from them. There is another question which was touched on by him, with respect to the free school. It was a part of the fourth proposition by King James to the undertakers in the six counties, that "in each county "there should be one free school at least for the education of youth in learning and "religion." When he made this arrangement with the City of London, and granted to them the whole of the district comprising what was then the county of Coleraine, and part of Tyrone, and the cities of Derry and Coleraine, which were outside the district between the two rivers, he seems to have expected from them that there should be a school. The parties sent over by the corporation of London also expected that there was to be a free school. In the extracts which have been read, it appears that Mr. Springham promised to build a school, and he says they had allotted 300 acres for the purpose. We find, in looking to the property of the Irish society, there is a small portion of that property, two townlands as we call them, which lie within the district between the two rivers. There is a strong impression that those were intended for the school; that, as such, they were reserved out of the division of the county among the companies, and that even if there were no legal obligation under their agreement with the king to support a free school, there was a moral obligation from their being in possession of that property.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M.P.

8144. Upon what does that impression rest?—From papers produced during the proceedings against the Irish society by the Skinners' Company, we find that they were called on in 1624, which was ten or twelve years after the granting of the charter, to find the 700 acres which it was said had been reserved for a school. The reply is, they hope the 700 acres will be found, because they wish to get rid of the subscription they pay to the school; but the 700 acres never were found, nor is there any allusion to those 300 acres. We only, therefore, suppose and believe that that was the district intended for a school. In the time of King James, and again in the time of Charles the First, they are called on to find those 700 acres for a free school. In their reply, they do not say they are not bound to build a school; they only lament they cannot find the property for the purpose. The same thing took place in the different reports which were made by the committees of that body to the Irish society in 1781, in 1794 and in 1801, in which they deny altogether that they are the founders of the school they are called on to assist. They gave 40*l.* a year among the masters, and they stated that they "repelled the "suggestions of their being founders, by stating the said school to have been originally "erected by the bishop and clergy of Londonderry, in pursuance of the statute of the "12th of Elizabeth, and that it was afterwards repaired by the bishop and corporation "of Derry, and that when the school was afterwards rebuilt by a contribution of "the inhabitants, this honourable court had refused to join therein." That is their statement, that this was not a school for which they were liable. Now we know that this was a royal school, because the appointment of the master was in the Crown till the year 1808, when the bishop and clergy and parties in the neighbourhood were prepared to come forward and support it as a diocesan school, and the appointment of the master was then transferred to the bishop, and by a private Act of Parliament, the premises on which the school stood in the town were to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the building a new school in the immediate neighbourhood. Now while the Irish society were holding this language, and refusing to give more than an annual subscription, the Bishop of Derry gave 1000*l.*; the county of Derry presented 3000*l.*; the Goldsmiths', the Salters', the Cloth-workers' and Mercers' Companies, with Mr. Harvey and Mr. James Alexander, two merchants connected with Derry, all gave handsome donations. The annual subscriptions gradually diminished, and after 1831, when that change took in the appointment of the Irish society, finally ceased altogether, and since that, the Irish society have come forward. In 1846, when the address was presented to Mr. Anderton, they raised the payment from 140*l.* to 280*l.*, and now, with their exhibitions, it amounted last year to 430*l.* But the complaint respecting this, as everything else is, that it is merely a payment at their pleasure. If this is a payment which the school has a right to, it ought to be given to it as a right, and the parties should know what they have to depend on. It is now continued merely as a gift at pleasure, and with reason or without reason, they may at once stop the payment, and there is no remedy whatever while the trustees are obliged to enter into very considerable engagements.

8145. Do you suppose that it is competent to the Irish society to make a grant in perpetuity for the endowment of a school?—I believe they are not only competent, but they are called on to do so as a part of their trust.

8146. Is this school now deficient in funds for its adequate support?—Very deficient in funds for its support or for the repair of its buildings.

8147. Is it a school which is extensively useful?—It would be so. There is a very fine house, which is not one-fourth filled. There is everything there except funds to enable it to carry on competition with the royal schools of Armagh and Dungannon, Enniskillen, and Lifford, which are all round it, and are supported by public funds. The school estates left at that time in the different counties consist in Armagh of 935 plantation acres, producing 1,469*l.* a year; in Tyrone 2,381 acres, producing 1,547*l.*; in Fermanagh 3,435 acres, producing 2,142*l.*; in Cavan 590 acres, producing 557*l.*; and in Donegal 5,390 acres, producing 491*l.*; while in Londonderry there is nothing but this gratuitous payment of theirs. Those funds enable the royal schools not only to pay the masters, but a considerable sum is expended in exhibitions, so that there is a double weight against Derry in that respect.

8148. Do you think it would be for the benefit of the town and county of Derry if the whole of the landed property of the Irish society and of the London companies were sold, and the proceeds invested according to the original trusts?—In order to answer that question I must separate the London companies from the Irish society. The London companies furnished the funds from the outlay of which the Irish society derive their income; the London companies furnished the funds from which the towns of Derry and Coleraine were first built, and the general expenses of the plantation defrayed. The London companies, in so doing, paid from time to time very large sums. They have got estates which they have held from the first, according to the promise that was given to them, that this district should be given to those to whom the corporation of London would give it as undertakers. As undertakers they have acted, and I look upon it that we have no more right to touch that property than to touch the property of any other undertakers who went over there and obtained property at that time. With respect to the Irish society I think the case is altogether different. The Irish society are strictly trustees for a particular purpose, the purpose of the plantation, and if they had a surplus in their hands, after performing what they are called on to do by their charter, I think they would be bound to give it among the London companies, who gave them the funds. It is therefore impossible, at least it is very improbable, that the Irish society ever will have a surplus in its hands; it cannot, therefore, discharge the duties of a landlord. I think, considering the manner in which it is elected by the corporation of London, and that those parties remain on it only for two years, it is impossible that it can manage the property beneficially either to its tenants or to the community. The constant change which takes place brings it to a perfect impossibility.

8149. Do not you conceive that the expenses of management would take precedence of the purposes of the trust?—The expenses of the management and the expenses of the works under the trust being fully carried out, then I think they are bound to divide any surplus among the companies, supposing there to be a surplus.

8150. Would not the duties of a landlord come under the head of expenses of management?—Not what I call expenses of management. The duties of a landlord in this country are supposed to be that he provides for the farm proper buildings, and everything of that kind. I do not think there are funds in their hands which ever could enable them to do that.

8151. Supposing those expenses take precedence of the purposes of the trust, what would be the case then?—I do not think they would have funds in their hands. You ought to purchase all the tenants' interest now particularly, as they wish to go upon the system adopted in this country, namely, that the whole of the improvements by the tenants are to belong to them at the termination of the lease. Now, as long as the system continues in Ireland, that a person having land to let, lets it at the bare price of the land, and the tenant has to build the houses, erect all the fences, and make the draining, I think the landlord should not be allowed to take possession of those buildings, and everything, without giving him any remuneration at all. It is, in my opinion, exceedingly unjust, and I do not see that the Irish society could get themselves out of that predicament.

8152. You think they would not be justified in managing the land as it is managed in England?—I do not think they would have funds for it after providing for the objects of their trust.

8152a. Do you think that it would be a breach of trust?—No, not a breach of trust.

8153. That is rather on the assumption that they are bound to divide any surplus among the companies?—Yes.

8154. The House of Lords cautiously avoided giving any decision upon that point?—Yes; but there seems to me a fair and equitable case for saying, that as those companies supplied their funds, any surplus should go among them. With regard to the Irish society, to show their difficulty in carrying out their trusts, I may mention that in the year 1733, they began with a standing rule that they would not renew any lease till within three years of its term of expiry. We find, a few years after, that in 1765, Alderman Alsop goes over to Derry as governor, and he reports to the Irish society that the whole of the town was in a state of ruin, and that they must, for the rebuilding of it, grant perpetuities. I contend that that shows that the Irish society have not power of doing their duties, because if they had they would have been enabled themselves to have re-built at that time. In the "Origin of the Irish society," the grant of these leases in perpetuity is very slightly alluded to, and almost all we learn about Alderman Alsop's report is in the case of the Skinner's Company in the House of Lords. It clearly appears to me that the society are not able to carry out their trust, and therefore the prosperity of the town and of the district requires that something of the same kind should be done with respect to them as was done in the case of ecclesiastical property and in the case of Trinity College of Dublin. Those two great corporate bodies were placed in this position, that the tenants were authorized to come forward and say: We require a perpetuity; we are willing to pay our present rent, and our present fines as rent, and if there be anything else to be paid for in reversion make your claim, and if it is too large we will go before the Privy Council to settle it. We know in every part of Ireland this has taken place, and that the Trinity College Act, passed the year before last at the wish of the tenants, and the Church Temporalities Act, passed twenty years ago, have been productive of the greatest possible advantage, and I think, for the sake of the prosperity of the district, that ought to be the course taken in the case of the Irish society.

Sir R.A. Ferguson Bart., M P.

8155. You confine your recommendation to the property of the Irish society only; you do not include in it the property of the companies?—No. The companies have dealt with their property as property of individuals; some of them have been sold, one property is held under a terminable lease, and in others the tenants hold directly under them, the leases having fallen out.

8156. Do you think if such a measure as you have adverted to became law it would meet the whole state of the case, and that nothing more need be done in regard to the Irish society?—I think there must be a definition of what its trusts and its duties are. Reference has been made to the corporation of Londonderry. The corporation of Londonderry is now holding under them 700*l.* a year at will for the payment of officers, and 500*l.* a year for improvements. I think it ought not to hold those grants under them at will. If the corporation have a right to it they should get it, the right should be declared. They ought to be an independent body, for I maintain that since that 1,200*l.* a year was granted they have been treated in a manner in which those trustees ought not to have treated them. The first instance that I will state is in reference to the supply of water to the town. An inquiry was made about the increase of the city of Derry. By an extract which I obtained a few days ago from the clerk of the Poor Law union in Londonderry as to the increase of the city of Derry, it appears that the valuation of the city of Londonderry, in December 1849, amounted to 35,973*l.* upon the one bank of the river, and 6,973*l.* upon the other. In December 1853, the amount was 38,267*l.* on the one bank, and 7,470*l.* on the other, making an increase of 2,831*l.* That is not entirely an increase of new buildings, because this does not include wastes, and therefore there may have been more houses occupied in one year than in the other, but the increase of the town in that way made it necessary that the corporation should take steps for two important purposes; one was the supply of water, which was taken from the bishop's domain. That was not in the Irish society's ground, but it passed through the Irish society's ground, watering two or three meadows, and supplying what had been a distillery, but which was out of work, turning a thrashing machine on its way. The demand of the Irish society, when the corporation began these waterworks was to the amount of 5,000*l.* The matter went to arbitration, and the arbitrator, after long consideration, gave 510*l.*, and that 510*l.* they have taken out of the improvement fund for the city of Londonderry. That was for their reversionary interest, there being a lease of twenty-eight years against them of the distillery, &c. We were also obliged to look out for a cemetery, and the corporation of Derry bought all the tenants' interest and then went to them, and they, at first, required them to pay 1,500*l.* for this field, for which, if I am rightly informed, their tenants were paying them 14*l.* a year. Unfortunately the corporation had been so much employed in sewerage and other matters in the town that they had allowed the powers of taking by compulsion to expire, so that they could not go to arbitration, but after long bargaining, they were forced to give 1,000*l.* for it, and to pay the under-tenants' rents for the remainder of their term. I think that shows that they are not dealing with that liberality which they ought to do towards a town circumstanced as Derry was, of which they were in fact trustees.

8157. Even with the best intentions, must not it sometimes be a very difficult thing for the Irish society to reconcile their duties as owners of property with their duties as public benefactors?—I do not see what difficulty there can be in reconciling their duties as owners of property with their duties as public benefactors, when the corporation took this property for the benefit of the town.

8158. It has been suggested by one witness that the best thing the Irish society could do for the town would be to get rid of all its property, and employ the funds so raised simply as benefactors; are you of opinion that that would be a useful course?—I do not see the advantage of the society selling the rent, getting twenty or twenty-five years' purchase for it, and lodging it in the funds, where they would not get three per cent. I think the mode which I have suggested, namely, of their taking the same course as followed in the case of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in the case of Trinity College, would meet all the objects; and if the Government afterwards chose to permit them to do what I inferred from his speeches that the late Sir Robert Peel would have done had his life been spared, namely, to settle in some other part of Ireland, a new field of usefulness would be opened to them.

8159. At present I believe a great part of the income of the Irish society is absorbed in expenses of litigation and management?—We consider an enormous part, and we consider that their litigation is not fairly carried on.

8160. Do you not think that it would be desirable that some mode of simplification should take place, which would obviate that evil?—I think if there were grants in fee-farm, in that way it would simplify it.

8161. If the property were sold and the profits invested in the funds, there would be no expenses of management?—No.

8162. Do you think three per cent upon twenty-five years purchase of the present, property would yield a larger sum than the net proceeds of the rental of those estates, subject to the present charges of management?—If the charges of management are to go on in the proportion they did between 1817 and 1847, 3 per cent would be a very good bargain for them, and there are valuable reversionary interests that would bring in much money. With respect to the litigation in which they have been engaged about the perpetuity leases, I think their mode of proceeding has been very unfair as regards their tenants.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M P.

15th Feb. 1854.

The Act of 1849 for the conversion of the leases for lives renewable for ever, into a tenure in fee was passed with great opposition on their part. When the Bill passed, the tenants applied to them that they should fix a form of lease, and grant them those tenures in exchange for renewable tenures, to which they replied that they would not deal with their tenants in a body, but that they would deal with any individual. It is necessary to state that owing to their former litigation they were, as nearly as we can make out, about 10,000*l*. in debt, and their security was not worth a rush. We then wished to deal with them as individuals, and they put us off from time to time, sometimes discussing the question as to what provision should remain in the leases and what provision should not. It appears that the leases were granted in the year 1767; the leases then having 28 years to run, they added to the leases, in the shape of increased rents and in the shape of renewal fines, something about 37 per cent, and they took credit to themselves that, so adding it, they were to look for nothing more from their tenants. Unfortunately, when the lease was granted, all sorts of clauses were put into it. Some of them might have been required in the former determinable leases, but were quite inapplicable to a grant in fee, such as that there should be no new road opened; that they should relieve them from all the penalties under the Timber Acts, which Acts had been repealed 20 years before, and all kinds of vexatious clauses were put into the leases. We applied that they should make one form of lease for the town and another for the country, as they were in different electoral divisions, liable to different poor rates; and as the "dozens of acres" as they were called, which were granted at the time of the plantation, in order to give a person residing in Derry a place to feed his cow on, had passed into separate farms. They refused, however, to leave anything out except the clauses about grinding at their mill, which they could not well keep in, for there was no mill; and they then handed us back this printed form of lease, and at the same time a printed form of commutation of fines into an annual rent. Things went on quietly till in June last, when they had paid off all their debt; and then, and not till then, they said, we require from you three years' improved value on your property, whatever the property is worth. The question had been raised before by Lord Donegal and taken to the House of Lords, where he abandoned it; and upon the first inquiry of any tenant for a renewal, proceedings were commenced in the Rolls Court, which they have announced their intention of taking to the House of Lords. I contend that, under the former decision of the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls distinctly told them that they considered they were trustees for somebody or other and were liable to be called to account, though not by the twelve companies. The same opinion was given by Sir James Eyre, the Recorder of London, at the time of the granting of these leases in 1766. I need not read the case about these leases, but the opinion being short I will read it, "I am of opinion that the society have sufficient power "to adopt the proposition of perpetual renewable cases, in case they should think it a "benefit to the Estate committed to their care, to grant such leases." From the mode of wording that opinion, Sir James Eyre treats them entirely as trustees of a property committed to their care. The question which they have raised before the Rolls Court is, that they have the whole power over this property, and therefore have the right to receive something under the 5th clause of the Renewable Leaseholds Conversion Act. At the time they must know that they are trustees, and therefore the granting those leases, having accomplished the end for which they could as trustees exercise such a power, namely, the rebuilding of the City of Derry, and the town of Coleraine, they have no power further to grant the fee. Their only power of making those grants in fee, was under the Act, and therefore they were not entitled to anything.

8163. I suppose you do not mean to contend that it would be right to transfer any portion of this property, which is trust property, to the tenants of the Irish society?—Certainly not; I propose that the tenants of the Irish society should pay the full value whatever it is, partly in rent, and whatever difference there may be, in money.

8164. Though you think it for the public advantage, that the Irish society should be liberal landlords to their tenants, you do not mean to claim on the part of the tenants, from the Irish society, any peculiar privileges or advantages which would interfere with the general right which the community have to the advantage of the proceeds as largely and as full as they can be made, of the entire property?—No; but from the fact of their being in possession, and having expended such large sums of money upon the buildings, I think they should have the right of preemption, nothing more.

8165. Do you believe that those deputations which the Irish society are in the habit of sending over to Ireland are useful?—There is no doubt that deputations of the kind would be very useful if it were not for the constitution of the society. But the evil is that the members of the society fluctuate so exceedingly. They learn very little about it during the first year, the second year they come upon a deputation, and then they have not above a couple of court days to serve after that deputation has reported.

8166. It has been stated by other witnesses, that practically the control and management of the affairs of the society rest principally with the London secretary. Is that your impression?—It depends upon the extent of the interference of the governor. My opinion is that they rest with the secretary.

8167. Is the governor changed frequently?—He is elected annually, but I have never known him changed when once elected.

8168. Do you believe the governor takes personally an active part in the management of the affairs of the society?—I have known the society under three different governors, and some of them did take an active part in it. The governor however, must be an alderman, he has his aldermanic duties; and the duties of his ward, and he has his own business to attend to, whereas the secretary is always there and has nothing else to do and he must be the governing party, practically speaking.

R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M.P.

5th Feb. 1854.

8169. Is the governor in the habit of going over to the estates?—The present governor has gone over very frequently. My impression is, that the other governors did not go over as governors.

8170. Are the affairs of the Irish society of a very complicated kind?—Every Irish proprietor's affairs are of a complicated kind in dealing with a large tenantry. The questions of tenants' arrangements and tenants' rights are more complicated than any person without experience can form any idea of. If any person can imagine an Irish property changing its landlord every year, they can form an idea how overwhelmed the Irish society must be every time a new man goes over in meeting the applications made to them.

8171. Do you believe that the tenants which the Irish society have in the town of Londonderry are worse off in their relation to their landlord than tenants in Belfast?—The tenants of the Irish society living upon terminable leases in the town of Derry, are much worse off than those of any other proprietor whatever, whose estate I have ever known. They are worse off, not as regards their personal comforts or their expenditure, but they are worse off in the manner in which they are treated, and the uncertainty in which they are as to how they will be treated should anything happen. They cannot form the most distant idea why a thing is granted to one person, and why it is refused to another. A person in my own immediate neighbourhood, living upon part of their property, which at one time was under the corporation, had been for a long time memorializing them either to let him build, to give him a lease, or that they should build and that he would give them a per centage upon the building. The Irish society have given up for these last two or three years the practice of sending over deputations, but they send over what they call visitations. Five or six of their members, as many as their agent's house will hold, come over, go through the estate, examine it, and look at everything and talk with everbody. This man came when they were engaged upon this visitation. He thought he had made a favourable impression. When they went back this year, at the first court held after they went back, he got an answer to say, that having considered his memorial and the proceedings upon it, they had come to the resolution to give him a notice to quit. The man was in a great fright at this, and he came over to London to the next court. When he came to the court, instead of a notice to quit, they made some arrangement for building his houses, and sent him back again. I have heard the arrangement to be that they would lay out a certain sum of money in building the houses for him, but he was to hold them without any tenure whatever; so that this man was to work at the farm without a tenure, and with the distinct understanding that he was to be allowed nothing for his manuring, &c.

8172. You stated that you thought the present relation between the Irish society and the corporation of Londonderry objectionable. Is there any course which you can suggest by which it could be put upon a more satisfactory footing?—I think it might be settled and defined. If the corporation have a right to support they should get it.

8173. You think they should be put in a situation of independence?—Yes. We know, from the first, it was considered that the corporation had a right to a fair sum for the support of the magistracy. In their first proceedings, there was a certain district called the Fifteen Hundred Acres, allotted to the corporation; when the proceedings in the Star Chamber were suspended, the charters of the Irish society and the corporation being both in one, the Bishop of Derry, Raphoe, and Clogher, who was then chaplain to Lord Wentworth, got himself first appointed sequestrator, by which he got his hand over this property, and then he obtained a grant of those lands. The corporation were then in his power, either as sequestrator, or as having a grant of them. An Act of Parliament having passed, to enable bishops to grant terms of sixty-one years, they took a lease under him for sixty-one years, at 50*l.* a year. When that lease was out, the Bishop of Derry refused to renew the corporation; and the town-clerk of Derry, Mr. Moggridge, had been over with the society, and then at the expiration of the lease the society took steps to repossess themselves of it. The question was taken to the Irish House of Lords; they decided in favour of the bishop, and gave their orders to put him in possession. The mayor and the sheriffs resisted; they were taken into custody and carried up to Dublin. The Irish society appealed to the English House of Lords, and then was passed the Act of Queen Anne, which has a very extensive reservation at the end of it, "Saving, nevertheless, to "the Queen's most excellent Majesty, and to all and every other person and persons, "bodies politic and corporate, their heirs and successors respectively, (other than the said "Charles Lord Bishop of Derry and his successors, and the said society, and their "successors,) all such right, title, interest, claim, and demand whatsoever in, to, or out of "the said premises, as they, or any of them have or hath, or might claim in, to, or out of "the said lands, tenements, fishings, and premises, or any part thereof, as if this Act had "never been made." When this society got into possession, they wished to get a lease from him in that way; but after a considerable questioning as to the terms, the society at last said—We will give you a lease upon certain terms, provided you put a clause in it, stating that you will never claim under any other title but that of our lessees. Upon that the corporation said, " No, we will never give any such engagement ; we will break off the negociation." Then the society let it to individuals, binding them to defend their rights. These proceedings for the recovery of 1,500 acres were immediately after the siege, when the town was in ruins, and the corporation were struggling to rebuild it. I know, as having been a member of the old corporation, from the old books, in the year 1789, the corporation of Derry was quite independent ; not only was not it in debt, but it had lent money. In 1790, there passed an Act of Parliament, under which the corporation took upon themselves a great number of those duties which I contend ought to be performed by the society ; one was the building of the bridge. They got from the Irish society a grant in fee of the right of ferry, provided they built and kept up a bridge ; and they did more, they submitted to an Act of Parliament which made them bare trustees for that purpose, and were to have no gain for it. They took upon themselves the building of the quays, which was the duty of the Irish society ; and they also took upon themselves the supplying the town with water. The consequence of undertaking all these matters was that they got extremely into debt. When they were very much in debt, the leases under the Irish society, in the year 1820, dropped, and they then insisted upon the corporation raising their rent from 40*l.* a year to 500*l.*, thereby depriving them of the means by which they they had been enabled to support the magistracy and do these other matters. They did that, throwing aside altogether the provisions of an Act of Parliament which had passed four or five years before, by which the corporation of Derry were bound to pay to the government 750*l.* for the advance to repair the bridge, and to find 1,000*l.* a year towards the fund for building a new bridge. On making that arrangement with the Irish society, the parties entirely overlooked this engagement, and made no arrangement for carrying it out. The society put on them a rent which they could not pay, and the consequence was, that after struggling on a few years, the whole of their property was sold by the sheriff.

8174. I understand you to have suggested that a certain payment in aid of corporate purposes should be secured to the corporation out of the property of the Irish society. Secondly, that the principle of the Acts which have passed, with regard to tenants under estates of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and with regard to Trinity College, should be applied to the estates of the Irish society. Are there any other suggestions which you are prepared to state to us, in order to put the whole thing upon a proper footing?—I do not know that I have anything else to state, except with regard to the election of the Irish society themselves.

8175. Do you think if those two things could be secured, and supposing the internal constitution of the Irish society were made as efficient as possible for the management of their estates, everything which the inhabitants of Londonderry and its neighbourhood require would be met?—If those two points were secured, I think the inhabitants of Londonderry and its neighbourhood would be satisfied.

8176. What alteration would you propose in the constitution of the society?—It is very difficult to make an alteration in the election of the body if you keep up its connection with the corporation of London, which is itself an elective body. The property of the companies is well managed for this reason ; being associations in which the members remain for life, they study the management ; but if the corporation is annually or triennially elected and this body is annually or triennially elected by them, the same thing must go on, and the officers must be the real ruling parties.

8177. You consider the fluctuating nature of the Irish society to be its present evil?—I consider it to be fatal, and I do not see how you are to alter it if you retain its connection with the corporation of London.

8178. Would it be better to have an independent body unconnected with the corporation of London?—I think it would be better to make the tenants and parties there independent, and then you might arrange the corporation in any manner you thought fit, I do not know by whom the independent corporation is to be appointed ; I do not wish to see the property vested in the corporation of Derry ; I do not think a corporation in Ireland, with the attention which Irish property requires, can give satisfaction.

8179. What would be the effect of a corporation elected for life by members of the twelve companies?—A corporation elected for life by members of the twelve companies would certainly take away some of the disadvantages as to the absolute question of management, but I doubt how it would act. The twelve companies contend that they have no public duties at all.

8180. They have some knowledge of the subject have not they?—They have some ; they may have a certain knowledge of their own property, but that is derived by reference to their own agent.

8181. They are included in the same charter?—The grant of their lands is included in the same charter, but that was only as undertakers. The companies are not mentioned in it.

8182. On the whole you see nothing preferable to the present mode of election, by the corporation of London?—I do not pretend to recommend anything preferable. I see nothing worse than the present mode.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M.P.

15th Feb. 1854.

8183. Might not the time of service be increased?—How can that be if the parties are compelled to go out of the society when they leave the corporation of London.

8184. Might not you give a power to the corporation to elect persons for ten years, and would not that be an improvement?—It might be, I do not say that it would.

8185. That would be an alteration that would meet your objection about the fluctuating nature of the body?—To some extent.

Adjourned to to-morrow at one o'clock.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

D. McGonegal, Esq.

16th Feb. 1854.

DANIEL MCGONEGAL, ESQ., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8186. In what manner are you connected with the borough of Coleraine?—I am an inhabitant and solicitor there, and I am secretary to the Commissioners of the borough.

8187. What Commissioners do you mean?—The Municipal Commissioners of the borough.

8188. Are there any observations which you are desirous to address to the Commission?—There are. If the Commissioners will allow me to read a few sentences from the report of the case made by the society in the House of Lords, in the year 1839, it will make my evidence more easily understood. "The property was granted to the society; and vast "privileges were conferred on them, in the words of the charter, 'for the better ordering, "'directing, and governing all and all manner of things for, and concerning the City and "'citizens of Londonderry and the county of Londonderry, and the plantation to be "'made within the said City and county of Londonderry, and other businesses belonging "'to the same.' The Irish society set up no claim to any beneficial interest whatever in "the property; but allege that, by the charters the rents and profits of the ferries, fisheries, "and town-lands are applicable, in the first instance, to the furtherance of the general "public objects of the plantation, under the supervision and at the sole discretion of the "society; and that the companies have not any right to demand a division of any part "of such rents and profits among them. The uniform course of proceeding has ever since "been, for the society to appropriate the rents and profits of the ferries, fisheries, and "town-lands, at their sole discretion, to the maintenance of the general operation of the "plantation, including everything which tended to the support of the corporations of "Londonderry and Coleraine; the maintenance and government of the towns and of "the port of Londonderry; the support of the Protestant religion by means of churches "and schools; and by contributions to public charities, and otherwise to the fulfilment of "what the society conceive to be the distinct objects of the charter." Bearing that in mind as the foundation of the society, the people of Coleraine complain very much of the manner in which the Irish society have managed the funds entrusted to them. They entirely deny the statement that they are expended in support of the corporations of Derry and Coleraine; inasmuch as the society have, in fact, done nothing for Coleraine for many years within the memory of any person living, except giving some trifling sums towards the repairs and building of churches, meeting-houses, their own school, and the like, and some small enclosures which they made on part of the slob.

8189. Does the Irish society give any assistance in the way of money to the corporation of Coleraine, in the same way that they do to the corporation of Londonderry?—None whatever; on the contrary, they have refused, or at least not complied with, several applications made to them by the Commissioners for aid to make water works, which were very much wanted in the town, to sewer and flag the town and make several other improvements.

8190. To what extent have the Irish society property in the town of Coleraine?—About 3,000*l.* a year.

8191. What is the general tenure by which that property is held?—A great deal of it is from fisheries which they have let on short leases, and also on lives renewable for ever. Other portions are on short tenures.

8192. Is there much on short tenures?—A good deal.

8193. House property?—Yes.

8194. Does this property constitute any large proportion of the whole town of Coleraine?—The whole town of Coleraine did belong to the society, but they have granted away a considerable portion of the town to parties on lives renewable for ever. As I stated before, the Commissioners erected gas works on a piece of ground which they leased from a gentleman of the name of Lyle, in perpetuity. Adjoining, or I should rather say surrounding the rear of that, was a small strip of ground, part of the ancient ramparts of the town and which was required for the gas works; they applied to the society to give them the same tenure of this small strip as the other. The society said, surrender your lease of this strip, (pointing to a plan) and we will grant you a lease of sixty-one years at a rent of 6*l.* a year; (they only paying at present 2*l.* 10*s.*, and have a lease for the life of Lord Castlereagh,) with a covenant that you shall always use it for public purposes. The Commissioners thought that so very unreasonable that they declined.

8195. Did you resist this as a matter of principle, or because you thought it of any great consequence?—I give it as an instance of the conduct of the society towards the people of Coleraine, that they are seeking more than any private landlord would exact.

8196. What is the extent of the ground?—It is a mere strip of 40 or 50 feet in width, running partly round a piece of property which the Commissioners hold for the benefit of the people of the town, and which they hold in perpetuity. The people of Coleraine think that they are a very grasping, illiberal, and unpopular body of men. As an instance of that I may mention the case of a Mr. Galt, a gentleman in the neighbourhood, from whom the society took forcible possession of a part of his property. He was forced to bring an action against them, and after going to a considerable expense they were obliged to pay all his costs, and pay him for his land.

8197. Does the Irish society subscribe to any schools or charities connected with Coleraine?—They do. I have a memorandum of the receipts and expenditure connected with Coleraine for the last seven years. It will show that in seven years commencing the 10th of February 1846, and ending the 5th of February 1853, the whole amount in schools and charities of all descriptions, during which I should say the famine occurred, was 4,510*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* In those seven years they received out of Coleraine, after allowing for their agent and poor rates, &c., 18,272*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* Out of that 4,510*l.* they only gave, when applied to for aid to assist the poor during the famine, the small sum of 25*l.* The gentlemen of Coleraine put their hands in their pockets, and supported the poor themselves, and assisted in distributing the food. During that same seven years the expenditure in law, in deputations, and to themselves at meetings in London, amounted to 10,390*l.*

8198. What is the extent of land which the Irish society own in and near Coleraine?—As to the exact extent I cannot give it in acres.

8199. Is it considerable?—It is.

8200. Does the whole town of Coleraine belong to them?—They are the lords of the soil of the whole town.

8201. Does any rural property belong to them?—They have a little rural property in their own hands, but not much.

8202. Have they a valuable fishery connected with Coleraine?—They have a valuable fishery connected with Coleraine, which was granted to them along with Lough Foyle, for the benefit of Coleraine and the city of Londonderry, for their better encouragement; that is distinctly mentioned in the "motives and reasons" of the King for giving them the grant. They also claim the slobs on the west side of the river Bann. On that side, it is believed by the people of Coleraine, they have no right whatever. Part of the property there is leased to a very enterprising gentleman in Coleraine, a Mr. Gribben. He commenced to improve on those slobs, but they came in a short time and forcibly threw down his improvements, and owing to having public funds at their disposal to defend and prosecute actions, he was afraid to go to law with them.

8203. What was the nature of their claim? Did they claim the ownership of the soil of the river?—Yes, and the slobs where the tide ebbs and flows.

8204. They claim the ownership of the soil between high and low water mark?—They do.

8205. Do you know upon what that claim is founded?—Upon their charter.

8206. Is it granted under any name in the charter?—The ground soil of the river; on the side I speak of it is church land, and it never was forfeited.

8207. If there are owners of the bed of the river, it seems this must have been an encroachment upon their property?—It is a fresh-water river, but at this particular part the tide ebbs and flows.

8208. Why did the maker of this improvement think that he had a sufficient interest in the land between high and low water mark to erect any fixture upon it?—Inasmuch as it adjoined, and, he considered, formed part of the church lands, he having leased this particular part adjoining, though he had a right to go down as far as he could.

8209. He thought that as occupier or lessee of the adjoining land he had a right to make erections upon the bed of the river, between high and low water mark?—Yes; they also stopped up the passage to an ancient well. The inhabitants have lately been obliged to force an entrance to it.

8210. Where was the well situated?—In a part of their property. The passage had been used for a great many years. They endeavoured to deprive the people of Coleraine of the well, by shutting up the entrance to it.

8211. They stopped up the way to the well?—Yes.

8212. The well remained, but they forbade the public having access to it?—Yes.

8213. That was a question of right; why could it not have been tried?—I state that as an instance of the manner in which the Irish society have treated the people of Coleraine.

8214. Has the corporation of Coleraine any property?—Yes; there is no corporation at present, it was dissolved by the Municipal Corporation Reform Act; and the property vested in the commissioners under the 9 George 4, c. 82, for lighting, cleansing, watching, &c.

8215. Is their property considerable?—About 600*l.* a year, including tolls.

D. McGonegal, Esq.

8216. In land?—Yes. It is about three miles from Coleraine.

8217. Reverting to a previous instance which you mentioned of the alleged grasping conduct of the Irish society, if they have a legal right to the soil of the river between high and low water mark, can it be taken as a proof of grasping upon their part that they throw down erections made upon it without their leave?—I think it can; because they have never endeavoured to make that land of any advantage to the town or to themselves; it has been allowed to remain an eyesore to the town, in fact it is a common nuisance, and the moment a gentleman commences to improve it they stop him. The people of Coleraine complain that they have taken the commons which originally belonged to the people of Coleraine from them, a part of which was a bowling-green for the amusement of the town. They have taken that, and let it to a gentleman for private purposes, thereby depriving the town of what they consider their ancient rights, and the ground they had for public amusement. They also complain of the manner in which they deal with the tenants with respect to leases. Several parties have refused to build upon sixty-one years' leases, which are the only ones they will grant, and consequently the premises are lying idle. The improvement of the town is retarded in consequence.

8218. Is this property upon which the refusal takes place to grant extended leases waterside property?—Not all of it.

8219. What would be the proper duration, in your opinion, of a building lease in the town of Coleraine?—I think there should be every encouragement given to persons to improve, and, in my opinion, it would be for the advantage of the town to grant leases in perpetuity to encourage buildings for manufacturing purposes, and so on, and that good substantial buildings should be made.

8220. Do you think it would be impossible to obtain good houses unless leases were granted in perpetuity?—They will not be built to the same extent. There may be occasionally some good buildings in business situations, but generally they are not of as good a description as they otherwise would be.

8221. Is Coleraine a prosperous town?—Yes.

8222. Is there any manufacture there; any large mills, or anything of that description?—Nothing; and I believe it is partly owing to the want of a long tenure.

8223. There are no large mills in Coleraine?—None, except two corn mills.

8224. Is the milling trade extending itself at Coleraine?—It is rather extending.

8225. Is there any linen trade there?—Within seven miles there is. The gentleman to whom I referred just now has a linen trade, and has a great many weavers at work in Coleraine.

8226. Do you believe that part of the property now held in the hands of the Irish society, of which long leases are not granted, is peculiarly adapted for manufacturing purposes, and that manufactures would be likely to spring up there if the tenure were altered?—In the present position of the town perhaps it would not be the case on those particular spots. The Irish society have a holding in their own possession. The tenant occupies it from them without any lease, and it certainly is not creditable to the society or the town. The man has been obliged to take other premises to carry on his trade; he is a cabinet maker. I mention these instances in consequence of having heard that a deputy-governor had stated that the perpetuity leases could be known by the bad state in which the property appeared to be.

8227. Are you prepared to say that it is the other way; that that part of the town of Coleraine which is under perpetuity leases is more flourishing, and has more substantial buildings than that which is under a short tenure?—Most decidedly; there is no doubt of it whatever. With respect to the part which has been built on and held at short leases, the houses would have been much better had the leases been longer. The people of Coleraine would be anxious to get rid of the society altogether. They think that they have wasted the funds, and that they are incapable of managing them to the advantage of the neighbourhood.

8228. Do you think it would be for the benefit of the town of Coleraine if all the property of the Irish society were sold, and the proceeds invested?—Most undoubtedly. In saying that I do not only give my own opinion, but it is the general feeling of the inhabitants of Coleraine.

8229. Is that opinion founded upon the facts which you have mentioned?—Those, along with others.

8230. Your statement is that the general opinion of the people of Coleraine is, that the influence of the Irish society over their town through the property which they hold is not beneficial, but injurious?—Decidedly.

8231. Do you state with confidence that that is the prevailing opinion?—Undoubtedly. I think it is nearly a unanimous one on the part of the people of Coleraine.

8232. Have the people of Coleraine ever expressed that feeling in any authentic way?—Not by a public meeting, but they do so in general conversation.

HUGH BELLAS, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows. Hugh Bellas, Esq.

16th Feb. 1854.

8233. What is your connection with the town of Coleraine?—I have been an inhabitant of the town of Coleraine for nearly forty years.

8234. You are a merchant?—Yes; a general merchant.

8235. Have you ever been connected with the municipal government of Coleraine?—I have been connected with the municipal commissioners of Coleraine for twenty years, and have been their chairman for three years.

8236. Do you hold that situation at present?—I do not. When I was chairman of the commissioners we applied to the deputation by memorial and personally in the town of Coleraine.

8237. You mean the deputation of the Irish society?—Yes. Mr. Davis and the governor were present. We applied for aid to supply water to the town, but we did not succeed in obtaining any grant.

8238. Are the town rates heavy at Coleraine?—Under the Act of the 9th of George the Fourth we cannot levy more than 1*s.* on houses above 20*l.* value; 9*d.* on houses above 10*l.* value; and 6*d.* on houses above 5*l.* value. That is the only municipal rate in the town.

8239. Do you levy the full rate?—We do not at present. When the corporation went out of office we obtained from land above 500*l.* a year, and from tolls about the same amount. Out of that sum we abated half of the rate; the interest of the money that was left upon the property is paid also out of that, and the officers connected with the late corporation are paid compensation out of the funds derived from the lands and tolls.

8240. A complaint has been made to us that the Irish society have not been willing to afford pecuniary assistance with sufficient liberality for objects connected with the local expenditure of the Commissioners of Coleraine; do you believe, looking at the state of the town and the amount of the local burdens, and supposing the Irish society ought to spend a certain sum of money on Coleraine, that would be the best way in which they could spend it?—I believe so. We hold that they are trustees for the town of Coleraine, and we claim a certain proportion of their funds, which they do not contribute.

8241. Is your complaint that you think they do not give sufficient in amount for Coleraine, or that they do not give it in a proper manner?—They do not give anything for municipal purposes; for religious and educational purposes they have given several donations; they have given sums of money for building churches; and, with respect to the free school, they support that school at an expense of about 150*l.* a-year. I was on the committee of the school for twenty years; it is very efficiently managed, and I would say that the funds that the Irish society give are principally the salaries of the master and the mistress; the other portion of the allowance, for the supply of books and matters connected with the school, is very illiberal. The poor children have to provide their own copy books. The committee have applied frequently for funds, and the money given for that purpose is not sufficient for the school itself.

8242. Without entering into the question of the sufficiency of the amount contributed by the Irish society to Coleraine, do you think it would be a violation of their trust if the Irish society thought that the best way of spending whatever money they did devote to Coleraine, was by giving it, not in relief of the local rates, but leaving them to be paid by the inhabitants, giving the money to the support of other public objects connected with the town of Coleraine, which would not be an aid of the local rates?—I think they are bound to contribute to the municipal purposes of the town.

8243. Do you conceive that the Irish society have a discretion in giving whatever sum of money they ought to devote to the assistance of a community like Coleraine, in such a manner as they think best, or that they are bound to give the whole or a part of it towards the specified object of relieving the inhabitants from a portion of their local rates?—I think they are bound to give it for municipal purposes as trustees. We maintain that they are trustees, and that they ought to give a portion.

8244. You mean strictly municipal purposes, distinguishing them from educational or religious purposes?—Yes. I mean a part of their funds for that object.

8245. Why do you say that you think you have a strict claim upon them for municipal purposes?—We conceive that the land which was given to them was given for civil and religious and municipal purposes. With respect to the leases which are granted on lives renewable for ever, I think they have had a most beneficial effect upon the town of Coleraine. I know, of my own knowledge, that several gentlemen have laid out large sums of money upon those leases; 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* have been laid out. I bought one of those leases, and gave 450*l.*; and I intend to build upon the ground, laying out about 1,000*l.*; so that long leases have had a most beneficial effect.

8246. Is the greater part of the property of the Irish society held under those long leases?—The greater part is held under long leases. The business part of the town is principally held under those long leases.

8247. Is that the result of those long leases having been granted for the purpose, or is it that it is more formed to be the business part of the town from natural circumstances?—I believe it is from natural circumstances.

8248. Is that the part of the town nearest the waterside?—No. It is the main streets. There are but few exceptions to those houses being on long leases.

Hugh Bellas, Esq.

8249. Is there any valuable waterside property in Coleraine?—Strictly speaking, the waterside property belongs to the Clothworkers' Company. I was chairman at the time that the Commissioners applied for a renewal of the portion of land which was spoken of just now. I think that the Irish society acted very illiberally in asking 6*l.* a year for a strip of land, which is not worth five shillings, in my own opinion.

8250. Can you express any opinion as to what you think would be the best course to pursue with respect to the property of the Irish society, looking to the interests of the town of Coleraine?—I think the best course to pursue, would be to sell the property, and devote the receipts to the advantage of the town.

8251. You mean the house property?—Yes; principally the house property.

8252. Did you hear the statement of a former witness with regard to the general feeling of the town as to the influence of the Irish society?—The opinion of the town, generally, is, that they are very illiberal landlords.

8253. Is the general opinion of the town that their influence is not a beneficial one?—I think the principal part of the opinion of the town is, that it is not beneficial.

8254. When you say that they are illiberal landlords, do you mean that they are illiberal towards their tenants, or that the management of their property is not conducive to the general interests of the town?—The management is not conducive to the general interests of the town.

8255. I suppose, this being property held for public purposes, you would not contend that any sacrifice should be made of the property for the benefit of the tenants, except so far as that benefit is conducive to the general interests of the community?—Certainly not.

S. Wright Knox, Esq.

SAMUEL WRIGHT KNOX, Esq. having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8256. What is your connection with the town of Coleraine?—I have lived in Coleraine all my life. I am a solicitor there. I was town clerk of the late corporation; and have been continued as town clerk by the present Commissioners.

8257. You have heard the statement of the other witnesses. Have you anything to say in addition to what they have said?—I quite agree with the general statement of those witnesses. I have little else to say. The general impression is, that the influence of the society is not beneficial regarding them, either in the nature of landlords, or as trustees. My own opinion is, that it is inconsistent, in a great measure, with any expectation of liberality from them, in their character of landlords, to consider them as trustees of a public fund. I think it is impossible for them to act with any great liberality towards their tenants, and, at the same time, to act faithfully in the execution of their trusts.

8259. You do not mean that the whole of that sum should go to Coleraine itself?—Derry has from 7,000*l.* to 8,000*l.* a year; 7,00*l.* goes to corporate purposes, and 500*l.* towards public improvements. We certainly complain that we have no corresponding donation or benefit from our rents.

8260. Supposing that the Irish society ought to devote a certain sum of money every year to the interests of the community at Coleraine, do you believe that the money would be best spent in the relief of the local rates by helping to pay for objects which must necessarily be defrayed from those local rates rather than by leaving the ratepayers to pay their local rates, and devoting that money to other public objects which would be left undone unless the society assisted in doing them?—I think it is very probable that if proper discretion and economy were used, those funds might be as well expended for the general benefit of Coleraine as in diminishing the rates, which I, for one, cannot complain of. I do not think that a one shilling rate is one to be complained of as a heavy burden.

8261. The local rates are not excessive at Coleraine?—They are not.

8262. Then the complaint really is, that the Irish society do not contribute enough for the general benefit of the community, rather than that they do not assist you to support what may be strictly called municipal burdens?—I think, as far as the trustees are concerned, that it is the principle; and, I think, it must necessarily be so as long as the system is pursued, of what I may call foreign government—the governing body being in London. A deputation coming over to spend one single day in Coleraine, will cost 500*l.* That is what we consider to be an unjustifiable waste of a trust fund.

8263. Perhaps the support given by the Irish society at Derry to the municipal institutions there may be a cause of the complaint on the part of Coleraine why it is not done in the case of Coleraine?—Not only that; but we say, the society have got 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* a year from the Derry property by their own published accounts. They dispose of that to Derry as they please. We say, here, under the society's own hand they admit having 3,000*l.* a year from Coleraine; and, we say, the amount which they lay out for the benefit of Coleraine is much smaller than they ought to expend; whereas, we think, their expenses of management are much too large.

S. Wright Knox,

8264. What is the general amount given every year for local purposes connected with Coleraine by the Irish society?—I take this from their own printed reports for the last five years. They admit that in 1842 the Coleraine rents were 1,680*l.*; the fisheries 3,500*l.* I take 1,500*l.* of that as the proportion of the Coleraine fishery; making 3,180*l.* for 1848. All the charges that I can see, which I think are properly applicable against that fund, are, 39*l.* 18*s.* for a house, which the former witness spoke of; poor rates 130*l.*; Bishop of Derry's rent 50*l.*; making 220*l.* as the amount of annual charges. Upon the commons which had belonged to the corporation, but which had, by some means, got into the hands of the society, they erected a school; that school, it has been stated, costs 130*l.* or 140*l.* a year; and, no doubt, there are other small sums of 5*l.* or 10*l.* in the neighbourhood, many of them not upon the estate, some of them as far as Bush Mills, near the Giant's Causeway, on Lord Antrim's estate, totally unconnected with their own. I make the whole amount of subscriptions, 375*l.*; and donations, 196*l.*, as taken from their own published accounts. The proportion of the agent's fees for the Coleraine rents of 3,000*l.*, would be 150*l.*; making 941*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* for that year. The balance in the society's hands after those deductions, would be 2,238*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, in favor of the trust fund for that year. In the next year, they give credit for 1,711*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, Coleraine rents. 1,500*l.* I propose as the Coleraine proportion of rent for fisheries; making a total of 3,211*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* There are the same average charges, leaving a balance in hand, as I say, unaccounted for, as far as the trust fund is concerned, of 2,260*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, for that year; and amounting, in the five years, to the sum of 10,963*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*

8265. How is that money applied, according to the account of the society?—The balance of Coleraine rents is mixed up in the general account with the Derry rents; so that it is not easy to say that the balance is accounted for; but it is partly made up of incidental expenses, paid to members of the society for their attendance at meetings and salaries to their officers, law expenses, &c. The balance we claim for the five years, say 1848, 1849, 1850, 1851, and 1852, on account of Coleraine rents, as I have said, appears to be 10,963*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*; from which are to be deducted law and incidental expenses, and necessary expenses of management, not including agent's fees for receiving rents; they being allowed in the credits to the annual amount of 150*l.* in my statement.

8266. According to your statement the sum received in the year which you refer to was about 3,000*l.*, and the sum applied to the town and the neighbourhood about 940*l.*; you say the balance was 2,238*l.*?—I say in the balance there is an average of 500*l.* a year charged to the members of the society in London for their own fees. I submit that as trustees that is a totally unjustifiable charge a trustee cannot charge a trust fund with his own personal expenses, nor his trouble either.

8267. Is the income from the town and neighbourhood of Coleraine about 3,000*l.* a year?—Yes; including what I consider a fair proportion of the fisheries rents for the Coleraine fishery.

8268. Are the expenses about 1,000*l.*?—As far as their printed account goes, that, as the balance is, as I say, squandered in London, and under the head of incidental expenses, of which I cannot discover the items, as they do not appear in a printed account.

8269. It appears that there is a balance of about 2,000*l.*, which comes from the town and neighbourhood of Coleraine, which is not expended in that town and neighbourhood?—I think so from their own printed accounts.

8270. Do you believe that the whole of that 2,000*l.* is expended in the cost of management?—They carry forward a balance in the treasurer's hands of 1,300*l.*; that is carried forward to next year, and it might be 900*l.* in the next. It must be spent in some way in management.

8271. The society show no surplus, do they?—They have not done so latterly.

8272. The whole of the money is expended somehow or other?—Yes.

8274. Do you think that the result of that system is owing to mismanagement on the part of the trustees, or that it is the necessary consequence of having a governing body in London to manage estates in the north of Ireland?—I think it is owing to both in a great measure. There is a great deal of mismanagement and an enormous expense in having the governing body 500 miles distant from the property.

8275. How would you propose to remedy those evils?—Taking the property at the same rate of purchase as the Goldsmith's property was sold at, I should think, being chiefly head rents, it would sell at from twenty-eight to thirty years' purchase. Even taking it at twenty-five years' purchase at the present rate of the funds, I think the income arising from the sale would be equal to the 3,000*l.* a year at present received.

8276. Are the head rents upon the leases in perpetuity?—Yes.

8277. Is there much of the land of the Irish society let upon perpetuity leases?—According to their account in the year 1851, the septennial fines were 1,154*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* I apprehend that is the amount of the rents under leases held in perpetuity; the remainder of the 3,000*l.* is made up of the determinable holdings and rent of fishery. According to the estimate of the value of the property, secured as it would be, I think the produce of it would yield an income fully equal to the present rents, and that it could be administered, instead of at the average cost of sixty per cent., at no greater cost than other trust funds.

S. Wright Knox, Esq.

8278. I suppose that the property under perpetuity leases does not cause much expense?—The agent appoints two days to come to Coleraine, in the first week in June to receive the first half year's rents, and again in the first week in December to receive the other. I believe he gets the entire year's rents in those four days. The entire rents of the estates I should think taking for granted that the Derry rents are received as easily, could not occupy him a fortnight in receiving.

8279. I suppose the other part of the property, not held in perpetuity leases, may be of a more complicated nature?—It is not so in Coleraine, I imagine they have no actual rural property in the liberties of Coleraine, which is not held on perpetuity leases.

8280. You do not think that the house property which is held under short leases gives rise to any very complicated system of management?—None whatever. With regard to the value of the perpetuity leases as compared with determinable leases, I hold in my hand a lease which was granted to my father, it was a lease for either twenty-one years or sixty-one; twenty-one years if he only repaired the premises, which were small cabins in the town, and sixty-one if he would build a certain description of house set forth in the covenant of twenty-four feet high. My father, who had laid out upwards of 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* upon perpetuity leases, refused to lay out a shilling upon the property, and surrendered the lease in 1841; he would not expend his money, and that is the general feeling of the people of Coleraine. My brother has laid out about 3,000*l.* lately, in building handsome houses in Coleraine. He stated that if he had not purchased it upon a perpetuity lease, he would never have laid out a shilling of his money upon it.

8281. Sir Robert Ferguson stated in his evidence yesterday, an opinion that it would be a great advantage to Derry, if the principles contained in the Acts of Parliament which have lately passed in reference to the estates of Trinity College, and the church temporalities, were applied to the property of the Irish society in Derry; do you think that with reference to Coleraine it would be advantageous to pass such an Act?—I have no doubt of it whatever. I have made several purchases of church leases and bishop's leases, and it is quite evident that there is an impetus given to improvement by the improved tenure.

8282. You think the principles of those Acts would not have too much a tendency in the case of trust property, to give an advantage to the tenant at the expense of the value of the trust property?—I think the contrary. I think it would increase the value of the trust property.

8283. You have no fear that the property would diminish in value under the operation of such an Act?—I think it would be very much increased, both the trust fund and also the beneficial interest of the tenant. I think both interests would be increased in value.

8284. Do you think it would be for the benefit of Coleraine, if all the property of the Irish society were sold, and the proceeds applied to the benefit of the town?—I do.

8285. What is your chief reason for entertaining that opinion?—I think there would be much more improvement going on in the town. If I purchase my own rent I should be much more disposed to make improvements than if I have to look up to a head landlord, who has the means of giving me annoyance. In Belfast I received some rents. I was concerned for some persons who employed me there in purchasing the fee under the Marquis of Donegal; we purchased the fee in the Encumbered Estates Court, and gave twenty-seven years purchase for it, in both cases the parties were perfectly satisfied; both those cases were leases for two lives renewable for ever, with certain renewal fines.

8286. You heard the statements of the previous witnesses on the subject of the feeling of your town with respect to the Irish society; do you agree in those statements?—Most unequivocally. With Mr. Bellas, I waited upon a deputation of the Irish society, to show them the claims we had upon them. We were very graciously received and certain hopes were held out, but from that hour to this they have not been carried out.

8287. Do you believe in the description which the previous witnesses have given as to the general feeling of the town respecting the influence of the Irish society?—I do. The general impression of the town is, that they are not encouraging landlords, but quite the reverse. I cannot recall to my recollection a single instance of their giving the slightest encouragement to any improvement in the town of Coleraine, or the slightest favourable answer to any demand that was ever made, either by the tenants individually as tenants, or by the town commissioners as representing the town.

8288. Has the society any general agent in the town?—No; the agent comes over from Derry, and appoints two days for transacting business in June, and two in December.

8289. Are you not of opinion that, with proper arrangements, a single resident agent could do the business for the society both as regards the property at Derry and at Coleraine?—I think they would have to change their system before he could do that. I know Mr. Green very intimately; there cannot be a man of kinder manners in the world, but he appears to me to have no more influence or authority to express an opinion with regard to the slightest thing than I have; he is a perfect automaton.

8290. That would not probably be remedied by the appointment of a resident agent at Coleraine?—I do not see, as far as that is concerned, that we have any right to complain, further than that the mere expenditure of a gentleman living with us as a resident landlord is always an advantage.

8291. How many inhabitants are there in Coleraine?—About 7,000. The present Commissioners are elected triennially by rate-payers, occupying houses rated at 5*l.*, or upwards. There are about 400 of them.

8292. Does the Irish society interfere in political contests in your neighbourhood?—They have done so some time ago. I see 3,000*l.* charged in the case of one election. I believe the candidate was Alderman Thorpe, the then governor of the society. We think it would be much better expended in building a higher class of school, founding libraries, and assisting in local improvements.

8293. It has not been the case of late years, that they have interfered in party politics?—I do not know that they have. In fact, they have no political influence. As long as they thought they could succeed, in any way, they tried it.

8294. I suppose if they chose to exercise influence, they might, like any other landlord, have some influence in politics?—They are so unpopular in Coleraine that I do not think they could do much. The present governor has been over. I do not know whether on any notion of that kind.

8295. Is there anything else which you wish to state to the Commissioners?—With regard to the deputations coming to Coleraine. I have lived in Coleraine during the last forty years, and I think it is the merest farce that could possibly be performed. I have here a narrative of an excursion to Ireland of one of these deputations.

8296. What book is that?—It is a book, stated to be "A Narrative of an Excursion to Ireland, by the Deputy Governor, Two Members of the Court, and Assistant Secretary of the Honourable Irish Society of London, 1825."

8297. Does that profess to be written by one of those persons?—By the Deputy Governor.

8298. Have you reason to believe that it was written by him?—I have not the slightest doubt of it. My object is to bring before the Commission the mode in which what we call our Trust Fund is spent. The result I may state to be this. This is a book of 100 pages, and there are not six pages devoted to the affairs of the Irish society. Out of twenty-five days they only occupied three, from the 29th of June to the 1st of July, upon their own estates. The charge for that deputation, in their accounts for that year, I believe, is 340*l.* We do not think that is an expenditure which ought to have been incurred under the terms of their settlement, which was for the promotion of the religion, civility, and morality of the people.

8299. Do you consider that a fair sample of the ordinary manner in which their deputations and visits are conducted?—Another deputation came, and they only remained one day in Coleraine. To say that they came for the purpose of viewing and examining the estates is absurd. Mr. Anderton said it was a very pleasant run over to the country. We consider the deputations anything but useful. They have not an opportunity of inquiring into the estates. Another deputation, I believe, cost 790*l.* The statements contained in that report may be very poetical; but, as far as any useful result arises from them, I think they are not an unfair sample of the deputations of the society in general.

8300. When those deputations come to Coleraine do they, themselvee, decide points, or do they merely receive information, and postpone their decision till they go back to London?—The latter in every case I am acquainted with. They never give the slightest opinion on any case, nor return any answer. In the case in which we waited upon them, to assist in the water-works, they held out very fair promises, but from that time to this, we have never got any assistance from them. Our complaint is, that there ought to be a larger fund applicable to those purposes. The navigation of the river is also very much neglected, and could be greatly improved. They claim to be owners of the bed of the river, and we think they ought to take some pains about it. Also, we think they ought to maintain a higher class of school. The school we have is a school for the poorer classes. It is a school for teaching reading and writing, and sewing to little girls. There is no grammar school, nor classical school. When a new Court House was to be built in Coleraine, last year, there was one site upon the Irish society's property, which was considered an eligible one, and an application for it was made. I understand that no answer was returned to the application, and the consequence has been that this handsome building is now in course of erection on the Clothworkers' property, on the opposite side of the Bann. The National Model School was built upon the property of the Clothworkers' company. The new Academical Institution, which is being established, is also to be built upon the Clothworkers' property, half-a-mile out of the town, the Clothworkers having given the site, and five acres, at a nominal rent. I think there has been more money expended on the Clothworkers' estate, within the last three or four years, both with regard to public buildings, and the improvement of the property, as far as the tenants' interests are concerned, than by the Irish society, perhaps in 50 years, on the Coleraine property.

S. Wright Knox, Esq.

8301. Are the London companies generally popular in the north of Ireland as landlords?—I think they are. My brother is agent for two of the companies. He is agent for the Clothworkers' company, whose property extends along the western banks of the river; and certainly, since they became possessed of the estate, in January, 1840, as well as I remember, on the death of Colonel Jackson, a very great portion of their rents has been expended in improving the tenants' holdings. Very large sums have been spent. A splendid hotel has been built in Coleraine, at their expense alone, and an entire street built, and now they have an estimate to lay out, as I understand, about 4,000*l.* more in building handsome houses, all on the opposite side of the river.

8302. What is the duration of their leases?—They have granted very few leases, because all their improvements are made by themselves. I believe, in the case of the hotel, they laid out upwards of 2,000*l.* The tenants are allowed for every shilling they expend in drainage. I understand from the agent that if they bring a certificate from the company's land surveyor that they have spent 10*l.* in draining, and the rent is only 8*l.*, they have a receipt for their rent and they get 2*l.* in money.

8303. You have expressed the opinion that the Irish society are often placed in a difficult position, from their double capacity of owners of property and administrators of a trust fund, which is for the purpose of the public benefit in Coleraine?—My own opinion is that they are inevitably placed in that difficulty as trustees; any trustee must be so placed. There are not, perhaps, any rents which are more easily received in England, than those of the Irish society.

8305. Still trustees are more likely to expend a large portion of their surplus revenue upon the estate than if they were not trustees?—In theory you would say so; but we find in practice it is precisely the reverse; from my own knowledge of the Clothworkers' company, for whom I am solicitor, I do not think the entire law expenses of that estate have amounted to 15*l.* a-year, since they got it in 1840, though they had the entire reletting of the whole of their farms. There is more expense and more litigation in the Irish society's estate than with any other, and I look upon it, it is because they are trustees, and it costs them nothing to fight those battles.

8307. Trustees having no interest in the property are reckless about litigation?—Their own accounts lead me to that conclusion, where 33,000*l.* appears to have been in litigation in twenty years. Also I think a proprietor naturally takes greater interest in the parties whom he looks on as his tenants and who look up to him for protection, and for a certain kindly feeling to a much greater extent than where the party is acting merely in the character of trustee.

8308. Do you think it would be for the benefit of Coleraine if the Irish society held their property discharged of trusts?—If they adopted the system that the companies do certainly it would be very beneficial; but at present there does not appear to be any prospect of that. If therefore they were relieved from the trust, I think it would be very desirable. It is a property which is at a great distance from those who manage it, and about which they do not take, and perhaps cannot be expected to take, much interest. With regard to Mr. Gribben's case, my father and co-partners let him a lease after they had obtained the fee under the Church Temporalities Act; he came to an agreement with my father for a lease; he first offered him a term of 99 years, but he refused to lay out his money upon it. He said he must have a longer term—I believe 999 years' lease. It was thought advisable to grant it to him at the small rent of 6*l.* a-year, the same rent that was paid before, for the same holding on a determinable lease; the property was bounded by the Bann. This man wishing to have the advantage of his lease, and to increase the ground for spreading his yarn, built his wall a few feet beyond where it had been before. I suppose the bailiff of the society, who lived on the opposite side, saw this improvement going on, and he communicated with the agent, and the means the society took to assert their right was to employ a parcel of workmen with crow-bars who levelled the wall. Mr. Gribben did not like to go to an expense in a matter that was of very little value to him, but my opinion was that he had a perfect right to build there because these were church lands, which never had been forfeited. And I see in the report of the Irish society it was specially mentioned that the temporal lands were the only escheated lands to James I., and he only proposed to grant the temporal lands of the county of Coleraine, as it was then called. This wall which was being built did not do the society the slightest harm. The embankment a little further down the river juts 40 feet further into the river than this. This was merely a flat slob that only the full tides could rise to. In the case of Mr. Galt, he had let a field which was joining the fishery at Cranagh, near

Coleraine: he holds under the Irish society by perpetuity. The Irish society's tenant of the fisheries required the accommodation of a road; he applied to Mr. Galt's ancestor; he got this road upon paying 20*s.* a-year for it; he paid the rent as long as he was the tenant; when it fell into the Irish society's hands the road continued for two or three years. Mr. Galt had been abroad; when he came home he claimed it. I complained of this as the mismanagement of the society with regard to their instructions to their agent. It was a piece of ground that was not worth more than a pound a-year. Mr. Galt is one of their most extensive tenants, and pays them nearly the highest rent. He demanded possession of this piece of ground; they refused to give it. After a great deal of negotiation he was obliged to bring an action against them. He first built a wall which they in their usual style levelled to the ground; he re-built it, and they levelled it again. He then brought an action of trespass; they contested it till we were ready for trial, and then they struck, paid us our costs, paid Mr. Galt for the value of the land, and had to pay a very large sum to their own solicitor for costs. I give this as an instance of gross mismanagement and waste of the trust fund, but it cost them nothing. If it had been any private gentleman's property, his agent would have gone there, and there could have been no dispute on earth about it. He would have arranged it without any expense to his employer. It was not worth 20*l.* a-year to any mortal. With regard also to that piece of ground for the gas-works, we supply the gas to the public lamps, and do not ask any profit upon it; besides that we supply it very cheaply to individuals. For this small patch which surrounds the gas-works, which I do not think any man in Coleraine would give 5*s.* a year for, they demanded 6*l.* a-year for the lease, and required that it should be kept and preserved entirely for public purposes. Now, if they had been giving it at a nominal rent, they might have said,—"As long as you have it you must use it for public purposes," but it is a monstrous thing to say that a landlord is to charge his tenant the utmost farthing, and yet impose those terms, that it must be occupied as he pleases. We consider that it is very illiberal treatment to a body composed of twenty-one of the principal inhabitants of the town, and naturally brings the society's conduct in very unfavourable contrast with that of other landlords. There is scarcely a landlord there who would not have given it readily for the purpose on better terms.

8309. Two courses have been suggested to the Commission with regard to the property of the Irish society; one is, that it should be all sold and the proceeds invested, and that they should be applied to the same purposes to which the property of the society ought now to be applied; the other is, that facilities should be given to the tenants of the Irish society to exchange their tenure for a perpetuity tenure, in the same manner as is now done under the Trinity College Act and the Church Temporalities Act, together with other alterations. Which of those two courses do you think would be the expedient one?—I do not see that they are very different. If you sell them as they are at present they will produce a large sum. In the other case, if you allow the individual tenants to purchase their respective interests, still a large fund will be produced. In either case I think a very large value would be obtained for the Irish society's present interest, and if such were realized by either mode, I think 10 per cent. would be quite sufficient to distribute and apply that fund, whereas according to the accounts under the present system the expense averages at least 60 per cent. If the fund were properly applied either course would be a great advantage to the trust.

8310. And to the community?—Yes. I think it is impossible that gentlemen, living in London, can properly deal with property of that kind there, any more than twenty-one commissioners in Coleraine could arrange the affairs and manage the property of the London corporation.

8311. Has the Irish society any jurisdiction in Coleraine with regard to sanctioning byelaws, or anything of that kind?—No; no power of that kind is possessed by them at present. They certainly exercise no power or influence over the governing body of Coleraine now.

8312. Is there anything else which you desire to state to us?—With regard to the renewable leases; I was employed by one of the tenants, and, in fact, I believe the only one yet who has been able to obtain a fee-farm grant from them under the Act of Parliament. Under the original leases, in 1767, the renewal fines were payable septennially; every seven years an additional year's rent was paid, and a fee of three guineas was reserved to the secretary in London, upon the grant of each lease, and two counterparts. The leases now are for twenty-eight years and two lives. From some of the society reports, I believe the renewals are only made out once in twenty-eight years. It is for twenty-eight years certain and two lives, with a fine payable every seventh year; but renewals are not actually made out or granted every seventh year. The payment of the fine considered is sufficient, under the covenant of the original lease, to preserve the title, and at the end of twenty-one years or twenty-eight years, when you came to take out your renewal, three guineas was to be paid. However, the society introduced into the first or subsequent set of renewals, which was granted probably twenty-eight years after, that upon payment of a year's rent every seventh year, and also three guineas as the secretary's fee every seventh year, the term should be renewable, thereby increasing their rental by three guineas every seventh year, and imposing that additional penalty upon those tenants who hold by renewable leases, instead of charging them only when the leases were actually prepared and taken out at the end of the twenty-one years. In the leases which I succeeded in getting the other day for Mr. Hazlet, I went to the agent in Derry—the last septennial payments were payable at the September gale of 1851—the three guinea fee was paid, though no renewal was asked for or granted. When we came to take out our fee-farm grant last week in Derry, Mr. Hazlet was charged eight guineas a piece for his leases, though he had paid the three guinea fee two years before, and had paid the three guineas each preceding seven years; so that he has paid six or nine guineas upon each lease, besides the eight guineas charged for each fee-farm grant. He was charged those fees, and on coming to settle last week they charged him, (he having paid his rent regularly under a renewable lease,) the additional commuted rent; that is the proportion of the septennial fine in addition to the rent he had paid, and they charged him two years' proportion of the three guineas, the fee for making the renewals, though they had charged him three guineas on each lease, in 1851, as secretary's fees besides. We consider that that is a contrivance for mulcting the tenants of their money, which no public body and no private individual, that I am aware of, would think of attempting. They charge the septennial fine every seventh year; they charge the three guineas as the fee to the secretary for doing nothing; and they charge, when you come to take out your renewal, ten or twelve guineas; besides, one of Mr. Hazlet's leases is at the rate of five shillings Irish, or four shillings and sevenpence halfpenny English a year. Every seventh year he has had to pay his four shillings and sevenpence halfpenny, and three guineas as a fee to the secretary for nothing. Now he has got his fee-farm grant of that, he has been charged eight guineas costs for that, independently of the three guineas which he had been septennially paying over and above the stamp duty, and fees to his own solicitor; and he has been charged the two years' proportion of that three guineas since 1851, though he had a receipt for his rent in his pocket.

8313. When you speak of the secretary, do you mean the London secretary?—Yes.

8314. How can this be done legally, if it is against the conditions on which the original lease is granted?—The cause I take to have been simply this: these leases are all prepared in London, and though the tenant has to pay for them, they will not allow the tenant to employ his own solicitor to prepare them; they insert, therefore, what covenants they please, the tenants feeling their inability to resist.

8315. What is the date of the alteration of which you complain?—I do not know the date of its first occurring.

8316. The practice of which you complain is one of old standing?—It is. There have certainly not been more than two or three sets of renewals since they granted them, in 1767, to the present time, so far as I can ascertain. The renewal fine being paid, there is no equity against the tenant. We complain that they have by this means added to their own income, at the expense of the tenant, and contrary to, and in direct violation of their own proposal, as contained in their secretary's letter of the 30th day of August 1766, when they first granted these renewable leases, to save the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine from being absolutely ruined, as appears by their own published report.

8318. If those payments were remitted now, the only effect would be to make a present to the tenant of the money?—Certainly.

8320. I suppose the property has changed hands very often, subject to this rent, has not it?—It has done so in all cases. With regard to the tenure of the leases, the same opinion has been expressed by the Derry deputation; and I consider it most injurious to the property and to the interests of the tenants that no application will be received for the renewal of a determinable lease till within three years of its expiration. It is calculated to prevent the outlay of money, and improvements upon the property.

8321. Is the property held by the Irish society under the two descriptions of tenure mixed up together?—It is in many cases mixed up together. One complaint that we have is, that what we called the corporation holdings, that is the commons which belonged to the corporation, the old court house, and some small tenements which were leased to the corporation for forty-one years, have been usually renewed to the corporation as a public body; but in 1820 I think the lease expired, and the society then refused to renew the lease, took the commons of the town into their own hands, and have let them out to private tenants, I believe, all on determinable leases.

8322. Have these commons been inclosed?—The school which Mr. Bellas, the last witness, has mentioned, has been built upon the property. The bowling green they have let to a private individual, and receive the rent. The corporation and the town get no benefit further than that the trust fund, if it be one, is increased by those rents.

8323. Does the population of the town of Coleraine get any means of enjoyment or recreation from those commons?—No, not at present.

8324. When they were in the hands of the corporation, were they used for public purposes?—The bowling green was so used.

8325. Was that a public ground?—Yes; a man was kept in charge of it, but the country people came and used to play bowls there. That is now all converted into the private property of the society.

8326. Did the Irish society ever give any property to the corporation of Coleraine?—Not that we have ever been aware of. There is no doubt that the corporation have 500 acres; but it is not situated within the parish of Coleraine, except a small corner of one of the townlands; nor is it surrounded by the Irish society's property; and, we believe, from a report of their own, that it was obtained from Sir Randall M'Donald.

S. Wright Knox, Esq.

8327. Is not it known, with precision, in what manner the corporation of Coleraine became possessed of this property?—In a letter to Mr. Church, the society expressed their surprise "that the corporation of Coleraine should have been enabled to make grants and "dispositions of lands, seeing that it did not appear by the corporation charter that any "lands were thereby granted to them, nor do they find that the corporation were possessors "of any lands or holdings in or about Coleraine, by or under, any grant from the society, "except the court-house and the gaol, and some wastes in the town and suburbs, with "several cabins and cottages erected thereon, which they held by lease, which would expire "at Lady-day 1733."

8328. What has become of the court-house and gaol?—They have been let and houses built upon the site. We think, under those circumstances, the funds are extremely badly managed, most wastefully squandered, and the law expenses alone amounting to 33,000*l.*, in twenty years, in illegal fees to the members of the society as trustees, and in those tavern expenses which have amounted in twenty years to 7,000*l.* We see that that is nominally discontinued in the list now, in consequence of the proceedings in the case of the Skinners' company. I may state that we should have been better prepared with the case, but we were only appointed as a deputation to come forward here, upon last Friday evening, at an evening meeting of the Town Commissioners, who are elected by the rate-payers of the town.

8329. Was the opinion of the Town Commissioners unanimous as to the necessity of appointing the deputation?—The meeting was unanimous. We must give forty-eight hours' notice of a meeting of the Commissioners, and it was only on hearing that the Derry deputation was coming, that they thought it was important that we should also appear here.

8330. Was the attendance of the Commissioners numerous?—It was much as usual. The Board consisted of twenty-one, and I believe, there were eleven present.

8331. Were there any general instructions given to you as to the course you should take in making statements here?—They desired us, at a previous meeting of Commissioners, to prepare a report, detailing whatever we considered to be the points of which we should complain. We drew up a short report of that kind, showing the amount of annual rents, and the amount which we considered was properly brought to the credit of the fund.

8332. Is there anything else which you wish to state to this Commission?—The society are patrons of the living of Coleraine. It appears from the history of the church that it was built by the society in 1613. It became necessary, within the last two or three years, to enlarge the church. An application was made to the society for funds. It was looked upon as their church, and after a good deal of negotiation they consented to subscribe a sum of 300*l.*, if the parishioners would raise 500*l.* In consequence of that the rector came round the parish to his friends and acquaintances and raised the necessary sum. The society then consented to subscribe their 300*l.*, to this church, which we consider their own. The work was commenced, and before it was finished an expense of 1125*l.* or 1127*l.* was incurred. What the rector seems to complain of is this: that when he was called on to pay this money the society refused to pay their subscription, till they had a certificate that the church was completed and ready for public service. He was called upon by the contractor for the work, and threatened with legal proceedings if he did not pay. We consider that this is a very ungracious proceeding, and the rector had actually to raise the 300*l.* on his own security, to pay this subscription of the Irish society's in the mean time.

Wm. Haslett, Esq.

WILLIAM HASLETT, Esq., was further examined as follows

8333. Is there any addition which you wish to make to the evidence which you have given to this Commission?—With regard to the charge of three guineas for the renewal of leases, the clauses in the society's leases are of such a nature as to throw a great deal into the power of the society. In illustration of that I will state one case with which I had something to do. It is the case of a house tenement, with land attached, held at a rent not much exceeding ten guineas under the society; there was, I am sure, as much as 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* laid out upon the City portion of the premises, but because one small house on the land was out of repair we were kept without a renewal for several years. I wish also to bring before you another case with which I have been connected, which I state rather with a view of showing how the business of the society is managed, than with any idea that the case which I now mention can by possibility be persevered in. In the year 1836 a clergyman of the Presbyterian congregation, in which church I worship, applied by memorial to the Irish society for a piece of ground on which to build a school.

Wm. Haslett, Esq.

8334. Is this in Derry?—Close by Derry, within two and a half miles; we have not a copy of the memorial; I asked the secretary for it to-day, but he could not in the discharge of his duty give it to me without the consent of the court. The answer to the memorial, addressed to the Rev. William M'Clure, is in this form: "My dear Sir, I have "the pleasure to inform you that the society have granted the prayer of your memorial. "I have directed Mr. Beresford to allocate what ground you wish. I presume "Mr. Stephenson has ere this called upon you and pointed out the ground, which I hope "will meet your approbation." The ground was pointed out, the school was built, the society subscribing to it, and the funds were obtained under the auspices of the congregation. And a very good and efficient school has been established. It is now under the control and management of the Board of Education in Ireland. The Rev. Mr. McClure is the patron of the school; he is in correspondence with the national board. A master has been appointed, and the school is as efficient as any school under the national board. The master has deserved and received the hightest testimonials, and is receiving the highest salary of any schoolmaster under similar circumstances from that board. We were very much surprised some time ago on getting, not a direct communication, but hearing through the agent casually that they had granted the school to another body altogether without any intimation to the party with whom Mr. Davis had been in correspondence. Mr. McClure had been paying the insurance, and treating it in every way as the patron of a school would do. Yet without any communication with us they have received rent from another party for it, and directed that other party to take charge. Another Presbyterian congregation has been established in the neighbourhood, and they (the society) have thought it better to hand it over to them. We say they had no right whatever so to do. True we had no lease, but they have served us with no notice to quit. No courtesy has been extended to us in any way; no communication whatever has been made to us that the society intended to take it away; no fault has been found with the management, nor anything of the kind. In reference to our position and the questions which the Commissioners have been asking as to the disposition of those funds, and how far they ought to be applicable to municipal purposes, I was going on yesterday, when you thought I was pursuing a subject which was not within the scope of your inquiry, to show how we became possessed of the property, and how we have been dispossessed by the society; not with any view that you could remedy it, because at law the evil has certainly gone beyond the reach of any remedy except this—that I hope to impress upon the Commissioners that these facts with the words of the charter, and of the articles which preceded the charter, forms a primâ facie case, showing that the corporation of Derry are entitled to some substitute for the 1,500 acres for the common holdings and for the sheriff's mountain, which have been taken from them. I may say that the Municipal Commissioners for Ireland examined into these matters, and commented upon them with considerable severity.

8335. You suppose those transactions to which you have referred constitute the ground upon which the society now makes that allowance for municipal purposes in Derry which they do not do in Coleraine?—Yes. Coleraine has its own property, and is independent because of that property. Then, with regard to the subject of the remedies to be adopted for the future, I would respectfully suggest that the plan of granting leases in perpetuity upon the same basis as ecclesiastical leases are granted in Ireland, is not at all inconsistent with permitting the sale of the property to tenants either before those perpetuities are completed or after. In Coleraine the quantity of leasehold property is much smaller than it is with us. The question as to leasehold property with us is a very important one, much more important than it is in Coleraine. We have all the property pointed out yesterday which is in the state deecribed. In 1613 or 1616 at the time of the original allocation of land to the uses of houses in Londonderry those 1,500 acres, the sheriff's mountain, and the common holdings, were in possession of the corporation. Therefore the society had not the power of allocating them as they have done in Coleraine. In 1766 when the plan of leases for lives renewable for ever was adopted, the society carried it out in reference to the original allocation; the consequence was that a large amount of land in Derry and the neighbourhood is in a different position from that which is about Coleraine, that is to say, the quantity in Coleraine is very small compared with ours. It would be most important to those gentlemen who have made improvements in those properties, or who might be disposed to make improvements, to give them, in the first place, the power at a fair rate of commuting for perpetuities, and, in the second place, to enable those who are able from time to time to purchase and allow the money to be invested. I would respectfully submit, therefore, that both plans might be carried out at the same time. Legislation for Ireland for several years past has been directed to the purpose of making tenures as simple, as easily transferred, and as easily divided as possible. The whole policy of the Irish society on the other hand has been in an opposite direction; they give no facility for the division of their leases; they give no facility for turning them into fee-farm grants. You have heard of the difficulties which they have thrown in the way, and when I referred to those difficulties yesterday it was not for the purpose of referring to a matter which is before a legal tribunal, but for the purpose of showing the terms on which the leases were granted, namely, that by granting those leases the society precluded themselves from the benefit of all future improvements, and having received thirty-seven per cent. as increase of rent at the time as a consideration for so doing, it seems very ungracious in them to ask a sum of money for those renewals equal to twice the purchase of the fee of the society's interest in those leases, retaining at the same time the full amount of rent, fines, and fees to which they are at present entitled. £2,500 is all the rent they derive from those leases, but they ask a sum which their own counsel states amounts to from 100,000*l.* to 150,000*l.*

ISAAC COLQUHOUN, Esq., was further examined as follows.

8336. Is there anything which you wish to add to your evidence of yesterday?—I mentioned yesterday that certain houses had been taken by the society from Mr. McCrae, and sold to Dr. Morton for 300*l.* I wish to say that those houses were never taken down, but are still standing. The society have made use of them. I wish also to mention a circumstance that occurred shortly before I left Derry. Mr. Munn's son and Mr. Munn himself took an active part in bringing the complaints of the citizens of Derry before this Commission. Mr. Green, the society's agent, waited upon Mr. Munn, junr., with a view, as I thought, to frighten him and his father from taking any part. They came to my parlour together, and I said to Mr. Green, "Are you coming with a view to benefit us, "and to give us some information that will prevent us from getting into difficulties with "the society; or are you coming to make use of whatever information we may give you "on behalf of the society?" or words to that effect. He replied to the effect that he would make use of the information we should give him. He alluded to a clause in all the society's determinable leases to the effect that the lessee shall not alienate the land without the society's consent; that Mr. Munn had alienated a portion of the land held under such a lease to a railway company, which Mr. Munn and I considered was mentioned to intimidate him from coming forward against the society. I mention this, as I think the subject was introduced by Mr. Green with a view to intimidate. The corporation of which I am a member have been influenced, I think, to remain at home (though I believe we have their good feelings with us) in consequence of this 1,200*l.* a-year, which it is in the society's power to take from them when they please. If it were not for that circumstance I am quite satisfied you would have the mayor and a large portion of the corporation here as a deputation. With respect to the alteration which Mr. Knox has mentioned to-day in the lease with regard to the secretary's fees, I may mention that I was fortunate enough to refuse to take a renewal of the original lease according to the new form which I had seen. In consequence of my refusal the society gave me a lease according to the old form, without charging other costs than the 38*s.* for secretary's fees, and I believe it is the only one upon the estate. I scarcely expected it, because I thought I should be met with a threat of litigation on the part of the society; however they did not litigate with me but gave me the renewal according to the old form.

8337. When was this?—About twenty-two years ago. I also wish to mention that Mr. McCrae, for whom I am agent, holds a lease of lands in perpetuity, that is, for lives renewable for ever. He also holds another lease of lands adjoining, which is a determinable lease. The Presbyterian meeting-house and some very good houses stand upon the property which is under the perpetuity lease; whereas upon the determinable lease they are small, poor houses, which will scarcely last to the termination of the years for which it is held. I mention that to show that by the rules which the society adopt the progress of valuable improvements is entirely stopped in Derry upon the society's leasehold property.

Adjourned to to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE in the Chair.

J. Humphery, Esq.
17th Feb. 1854.

JOHN HUMPHERY, Esq. having been sworn, was examined as follows.

8338. You are an alderman of the City of London?—I am.

8339. How long have you filled that situation?—Between eighteen and nineteen years.

8340. You are at present governor of the Irish society, are you not?—I am at present, and have been so since 1843.

8341. How are the governors of the Irish society elected?—According to the charter, the governor must be an alderman of London. He is elected in the Court of Council assembled in February in every year. The new members of the Irish society are also elected, the governor being the first who is elected, and it has been the practice for years to re-elect the governor. He is sworn in with the deputy-governor and the other new members of the society upon that occasion.

8342. Is it the practice to re-elect the deputy-governor?—No. The deputy-governor is elected in the second year of his membership. The Court of Assistants go to a ballot for the deputy-governor at their last meeting in February, and whoever gets the majority of votes is recommended to the Court of Common Council to be the deputy-governor for the year ensuing, and the party is generally elected at the recommendation of the assistants of the Irish society.

J. Humphery, Esq.

8343. Is it the habit of the governor to take an active part personally in the management of the affairs of the Irish society?—Yes; ever since I have been in that office I have invariably been at their meetings; last year there was not a single meeting at which I was not present, both of the courts and of the committees.

8344. What are the provisions of the charter with respect to the other members of the Irish society?—The charter calls upon the Court of Common Council to elect five aldermen and eighteen members out of the commonalty of the City of London. They were formerly appointed from the twelve chief companies; but subsequently that has been altered, and they now elect from all the companies, and also from the freemen of the City of London, the assistants to the governor and deputy-governor of the society.

8345. They hold their offices for two years?—Yes. The charter says half of them must go out every year, and they are not re-eligible till a year has passed. There is nothing to prevent their being then re-elected. And it so happens that gentlemen connected with the corporation having heard a great deal of the Irish society wish to belong to the society. Therefore it does sometimes happen that they do get re-elected.

8346. How often do those committees of the Irish society meet?—There are two committees, one is the law and parliamentary committee; that committee is formed at the beginning of the year of nine members and the governor and deputy-governor. If there are any solicitors in the society they are always put on this committee. The persons on this committee are considered those most conversant with law and also parliamentary business. This committee does not change. The same gentlemen remain upon it all the year. Then there is a sub-committee, consisting of eight members with the governor and deputy-governor, who consider every memorial and all other matters connected with the business of the society. That committee is partly changed every month; I believe half the committee go out and an equal number are put on, who meet every month or oftener if required.

8347. What is the usual length of sitting of those committees?—Sometimes two hours or three hours and more.

8348. Once a month?—Yes, and oftener if the business requires.

8349. What is the nature of the business they transact?—They take all the memorials of different parties connected with the society's estates, &c., into their consideration, and they go through all applications for money, for donations, and for any improvements in buildings, drainage, railways, bridges, churches, chapels, &c., &c., that may be required.

8350. I suppose the business chiefly consists in such small details as arise in the management of an estate?—Yes; sometimes it is more irksome to go through them than at other times, on account of the various and unaccountable applications made. There are many memorials requiring things to be done which the society cannot go into at all. With respect to the 1,500 acres, we had that subject before us for a number of days; and in the years 1847 and 1848 the corporation of Derry sent a memorial with a deputation to the society respecting claims which I thought we could not receive until it was ascertained that the deputation had full power to enter into such an arrangement as might be mutually agreed upon, so that no dispute might afterwards arise on the part of the corporation of Derry. The deputation went back to Ireland and returned with the following document, sealed by the corporation of Londonderry, viz:—"Council Chamber "Corporation Hall, Londonderry, 22nd January 1848; Alexander Lindsay, mayor. "The mayor having informed the council that whilst lately in London, he had several "interviews with the honourable the Irish society respecting the claims of the corporation "upon that body, and that the governor of the society had informed the mayor that "the court of the honourable the Irish society had agreed, that provided the mayor of "Derry should come fully authorized by the corporation of Derry to put an end to all the "disputes alleged to exist between the two bodies, the society would be prepared to enter "into a negotiation with him, acting on behalf of the corporation of Derry: It was "resolved by the council that the deputation appointed by the corporation on the 23d of "November last be requested to proceed to London, to confer with the honourable the "Irish society on behalf of the corporation of Londonderry; and in the event of such an "understanding being agreed upon as shall be satisfactory, the deputation or such of "them as may find it convenient to go, be and are hereby authorized and empowered to "settle all disputes between the two bodies, and adjust all claims of the corporation upon "the honourable the Irish society, and finally settle, confirm and ratify the same, in "witness whereof the seal of the corporation is hereunto affixed," which is witnessed by William Gregg, the town clerk of Derry. We had a number of meetings with respect to that subject and without going into all the arguments pro and con., we agreed at last to the following resolution, which was signed by myself, the deputy governor, and all the members of the Irish society present, and also by the four gentlemen who came from Derry authorized with that document. "At a meeting of the deputation from the corporation of Londonderry, appointed under the seal of the said corporation, dated the 22d "day of January 1848, to hold a conference with the honourable the Irish society, with "full powers to act on behalf of the said corporation, in respect of the pending differences "between the society and the corporation, a copy of the resolutions passed by the "court of the society, was read in the following terms:—'At a court of the honourable "'the Irish society, held in the Irish chamber, Guildhall, London, on Monday the 31st day "'of January 1848. The Mayor of Londonderry, (Alexander Lindsay, Esquire) Alderman

Seal.

" 'Pitt Skipton, Alderman Mehan, and Town Councillor McArthur, being a deputation " 'from the corporation of Londonderry, appointed on the 23d day of November last,
" 'attended and produced an order under the seal of the said corporation, passed on the " '22d day of January 1848, authorizing the said deputation to act for and on their " 'behalf. The mayor and deputation having been heard, it was resolved: That this " 'court, having taken into consideration the communication made to the society by the " 'mayor and deputation of the corporation of Londonderry, is willing upon the " 're-establishment of the recorder's court at Londonderry, to grant and to recommend " 'the society from time to time annually to grant from its funds the sum of 700*l.* towards " 'the payment of salaries to the officers of the corporation and recorder's court, namely
" '300*l.* to the mayor, 200*l.* to the recorder and the officers of his court, and the remaining
" '200*l.* to be applied from time to time subject to the approval of this court; and also " 'will consent to the power of attachment exercised by the recorder's court being altered
" 'so as to be made applicable only to parties who are removing out of the country, if such
" 'be the desire of the majority of the inhabitants of Londonderry. It was also resolved:
" 'That this court would consent to the Londonderry Improvement Bill being passed,
" 'provided the rights of the society are properly reserved and protected, and clauses " 'introduced for the due protection of the society; and will assist the corporation of " 'Londonderry on the Bill receiving the royal assent, in carrying out the objects of the " 'Bill by a grant of 500*l.*, to be annually proposed to the society, in aid for effecting the " 'improvements contemplated by the Bill.—Signed by order of the honourable the Irish " 'society, John Davies, Secretary.' The deputation having duly considered the foregoing " resolutions, it was resolved: 'That, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon us by " 'the said corporation, we do hereby agree that all differences between the said society and " 'the said corporation shall be finally ended and determined upon the terms contained in " 'the said resolutions; Resolved: that a copy of the foregoing document, signed by the " 'members of the deputation, be transmitted to the Irish society in exchange for an " 'authenticated copy of their resolutions, to be preserved by each party as a lasting " 'memorial of the terms on which the said differences have been finally arranged.'
"Dated at London, the 31st day of January, 1848," and signed by each of the deputation. That was the arrangement made between the corporation of Londonderry and the corporation of the Irish society, and from that time to the present we have fulfilled our engagements with them.

8351. Do you consider that agreement as pledging the Irish society to this grant?—I do.

8352. Do you believe it to have legally that effect, or does it merely constitute an equitable claim upon you?—As the Irish society is constituted I do not believe there would, on their part, be a moment's hesitation in paying the money. From my knowledge of the corporation of London and of the 130 members elected to the Irish society since I have been governor, I can speak positively of the deep anxiety always felt to fulfil their obligations; and though this grant may be said to be, from time to time, subject to the approval of the Court of Assistants, I feel quite sure that they would always feel themselves legally and equitably bound to pay the 1,200*l.*

8353. Do you suppose this agreement was made between the Irish society and the corporation of Derry on the ground that there was reason to believe that the corporation of Derry had, in equity if not in law, some claim upon the Irish society?—There is no doubt the society felt they had a claim in equity upon them Being trustees, as they are, for the benefit of that part of Ireland, the society believed, and still believe, that there was an equitable claim upon them for the benefit of the corporation.

8354. Do you mean that there was no other equitable claim than that which was derived from the circumstance of Londonderry being a large town in the district which the Irish society was bound to take care of?—Formerly the corporation of Londonderry was part and parcel of the corporation of London. Their byelaws were sent up to London to be approved of by them.

8355. Do you think the business of the 1,500 acres had anything to do with this agreement for the payment of this stipulated sum?—Partly. They had been for years claiming those 1,500 acres, although we always showed, by the Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Queen Anne 3 & 4, that they had no legal claim in any way or shape whatever. However, they have always tried to put their claim forward, and we considered that the only way of getting rid of this claim, which had been settled 150 years ago, and that we might not have continual memorials and complaints respecting it, was to endeavour to settle it amicably.

8356. Do you believe that that constituted the main inducement to make this grant of 1,200*l.*—Yes; and also a wish to come to a harmonious understanding with the corporation of Derry.

8357. You have made no agreement with the town of Coleraine to devote a stipulated sum for public purposes there?—None whatever. I will now state what passed when those gentlemen arrived at Londonderry. To show that the town council were not alarmed at the idea that this was to be only annually voted, at the first town council held at Londonderry, Mr. Lindsay being the mayor, it was moved on the 11th of February 1848, by town councillor Miller, seconded by alderman Baird, and resolved unanimously: " That this council think it due to the honourable the Irish society to record, by a vote " of the corporation, their great satisfaction that the disputes for some time past so

" unhappily existing have been terminated, and that in such a manner as to exhibit the " good feeling and the liberality of the society, and to lead to the reasonable expectation " of the speedy improvement and prosperity of the borough. Signed, Alexander " Lindsay, Mayor." This resolution was remitted to us after the deputation returned to Londonderry, and we have not heard any complaints since; now and then some people are apt to complain without cause. Sir Robert Ferguson told the Commission that we made a claim for 5,000*l.* in the case of the water-works. It is quite true, as he knows as well as any man in Ireland, that claims are made for compensation before committees of the House of Commons to a much greater extent than it is anticipated the parties will ever get. Our water mill there was to be greatly injured by taking away the water. The corporation gave our tenant who held the lease under us 1,500*l.* for his interest in the water, and at the end of his term we shall be deprived of the greater part, if not the entire of the water of the mill. I think there are about twenty-nine years of the lease to run, and they gave us 510*l.* So in the case of the cemetery, they took away from us near seventeen acres of land in the best part of Derry, producing a rental of near 50*l.* per acre, and it will produce a large revenue to the corporation of Derry, it being a public cemetery. We asked 1,500*l.*, not the full value of it; they said they should not mind giving 1,100*l.*, and I suggested to the court that they should take 1,000*l.*, it being for public objects, and 1,000*l.* was accepted and paid. We immediately put that 1,000*l.* out to interest, to do what? What we never had an opportunity of doing before, because we had been in debt until the present year, namely, to pull down all those horrible mud cottages which are filled with large families, of the most wretched description, and to lay out 1,000*l.* every year to rebuild all those poor people's cottages, that the society may have model cottages throughout their estate, as an example to the county, and that we may give them the opportunity of living in a different style to that in which they now live. We could not do that before, because when I came into the society, in 1843, there was owing of money borrowed about 15,000*l.* Sir Robert Ferguson has said that we borrowed it without any security, but, thank God, if we did so, we have been enabled to repay the same with interest. We have paid all the law expenses which were owing when I came on to the society, to the amount of nearly 20,000*l.* The great point is, what is the society doing now; and what have they done since they got out of debt? They only got out of debt last year; they paid off their loans and their solicitor's bills, and they do not now owe one shilling; and whilst doing this they have never forgotten their obligations to all their charities and their schools, &c. They have not reduced one of them, but have still kept them up, and considerably increased them; and, now coming into our rental free from debt and law expenses, we shall be enabled to confer greater benefits in improvements, schools, &c., &c., both at Coleraine and Londonderry. To show that we wish to do that, I will mention a little circumstance connected with the bequest of Mrs. McGee, a lady in Dublin, who left 20,000*l.* to establish a Presbyterian college, for the education of young men in preparation for the Christian ministry of the Presbyterian church in Ireland.

8358. When was that?—About eight years ago. She left this sum of money to erect a Presbyterian college in the north of Ireland. There were three trustees, Dr. Dill, Dr. Browne, and James Gibson, Esq., a barrister at Dublin. They considered whether it should be at Belfast, Coleraine, or Londonderry. The Belfast people were very anxious to get the college there; so were the people of Londonderry and Coleraine. They asked the inhabitants at Coleraine what they could do to help them to build this college. They came to us, and asked us what we could do. We said we had no land in our possession that we could give them, but we would agree to give them a sum of money. They, the trustees, could not get sufficient of the inhabitants of Coleraine to make it so valuable to them, and they then went to Derry, and said to the inhabitants there, "What can you do for us?" The inhabitants of Derry, I believe, came forward rather liberally, and the trustees then came to the Irish society, Sir Robert Ferguson, I believe, being at the head of the deputation of the trustees and others. After urging the matter, they said, "What will you " do? Here is a splendid improvement which may be made in Londonderry; we are going " to build an immense Presbyterian college." After hearing the whole of the statement of their case, we agreed to give them fifteen acres, not to exceed twenty acres, of land, at the end of the town, near the cathedral. That they seemed inclined to take, but after going back they found it was not in a situation that they should like; and they said, "No, that will not do for us; cannot you give us some other land?" At last we agreed to give them twenty acres of land down by the lower part of Derry, more suitable, as they said, and more convenient to the town, as the town was increasing in that direction. We said, " We will give those twenty acres pointed out by you, in Penneburn, in this way. There " are some gentlemen who have determinable leases upon those lands, from whom we are " receiving somewhere about 30*l.* a year, and which we agreed to give to the college to the " end of the lease term, which expires in the year 1881; we shall then come into possession " of those twenty acres, and you shall have it, for ever, at a small nominal rent, provided " you build your college there, and keep it for college purposes." That was agreed to; they went away perfectly satisfied, having agreed to make arrangements with the persons that held the leases on those twenty acres. About three or four months ago, they came back to us and said, "Now we are in another difficulty; we cannot get possession of this land. " There is some little difficulty about the present occupiers; they are not able to convey to "us as we anticipated," therefore, they said, they had made, what I think was rather a foolish bargain. They have bought land on the opposite side of the road, of a Mr. Gilliland, and given a large sum of money for it. I believe they gave 1,800*l.* for less than seven acres, and rent about 20*l.* per annum; and they wanted us still to convey to them the twenty acres of land, that they might use it for the benefit of the college. We had agreed to give them 30*l.* a year, for the whole term of our lease, say 1881. It was then suggested that as we could not agree to give them that land, I think the deputy-governor recommended that we should give the trustees a sum of money instead. I think it was 500*l.* But I thought that was not sufficient, and I suggested that we should at once recommend to the county to give them 1,000*l.*

8359. Instead of 30*l.* a year?—Yes. They went over to Mr. Gibson, and he thought they were wrong in not endeavouring to get possession of the twenty acres of land. They afterwards sent us a letter, thanking us for the grant; and they are to receive 1,000*l.* when the building is completed, according to the plan shown to the society. There is no doubt when they get the building up they will not remain satisfied with this 1,000*l.*; they will come to us to get a yearly donation out of the funds of the society; but at present they are quite satisfied with our giving them 1,000*l.* in aid of the building.

8361. When any small point arises with regard to the detailed management of the property, by whom is that point decided; is it decided in Ireland or sent over here to be decided?—If there is anything which they require, either in Derry, Coleraine, or any part of the county, they memorialize the society; and that memorial is sent to our agent Mr. Green, in Derry; he reports upon it, and gives his opinion in writing upon every memorial that comes, whether he thinks it is advisable to entertain it or whether he thinks it unadvisable, and that report, when it comes to London, the committees go into and form their opinions. Generally speaking, though, we rely a good deal upon his (Mr. Green's) opinion, at times we do not agree therewith.

8362. Is any discretion at all left to him upon trifling points?—I do not know whether there is any discretion. I think he has some discretion, but I think he would not like to do anything without first consulting the society.

8363. When those questions come over here involving details of the management of the property, by whom are they in fact decided in London, is it by a numerous committee?—The committees are not numerous, as I before said. The Law and Parliamentary committee consists of the governor, the deputy governor, and nine of the members; the sub-committee consists of the governor, the deputy governor, and eight of the members.

8364. Is it this committee often by whom those small points are considered?—They are sent up to the secretary, and the secretary lays them before the committee when they meet, and they are discussed and decided on. The committee state what their opinion is to the court, and the court ratifies or not the report of the committee.

8365. Has your London secretary any knowledge of the management of landed property, or of your Irish estates?—I do not know that he has much knowledge of landed property, but he knows all the property which belongs to the society; he knows whereabouts it is situated, and the condition of it in its different localities.

8366. Are you in the habit of consulting him with regard to those improvements, which arise, involving the details of the management of your estates in Ireland?—Yes; he is consulted. It was said the other day, that he was elected for life, that is not so. The secretary and the general agent in Ireland and all the other officers are elected annually. The secretary is consulted very much certainly by the members, with respect to the whole of the society's property in Ireland.

8367. Do you yourself happen to have much knowledge of the management of landed property?—I have some little amount of landed property which I have managed in this country, also a considerable amount of house property.

8368. Have you sufficient personal acquaintance with the Irish estates to be able to form a judgment yourself upon those points when they arise?—I think I have.

8369. Where do you think really and practically the decision lies in London upon those points when they come over. It is hardly possible with regard to the management of a landed estate, that there should not be some person who follows the matter up and takes a general view of the subject; is that done by your London secretary, or by whom is it done?—That is rather a complicated question. It was very properly said here, that that the society are a moveable body. If we get a society to understand the claims of the parties and they afterwards go out in February and new ones come in who may be prejudiced in some way against the opinions or decisions of the former members of the society, that being so, sometimes little difficulties arise in the management of the affairs of the society. We have a surveyor in Ireland, who is annually elected; he advises with Mr. Green, our agent, upon all matters relating to the estates.

8370. I suppose almost as a matter of course, you follow the advice of your resident agent and surveyor with respect to small points of detail?—I think, generally speaking, we do so. Mr. Green is a very kind-hearted man and I dare say, sometimes he gives an opinion in favour of the tenants, more than the Irish society think is required; we do not therefore always agree with his recommendations. For instance, Sir Robert Ferguson mentioned one of our farms held by Mr. Osborn, who holds 150 acres of land as a tenant at will, and he pays us 179*l.* a year. His house, barns, and the whole of his farm buildings and offices are very much out of order, and our surveyor and agent reported that they ought to be rebuilt by the tenants, who would have to borrow the money of some parties to build, &c. Mr. Osborn, not having money at his command to rebuild as we liked, and we wishing to have the farm house and buildings properly erected, so that they might be a pattern to the neighbourhood, and show that the Irish society in future intended to have all their farm buildings, &c. &c., to be so erected that they might be a credit and ornament to the county, after a good deal of pro and con he came to London. and we agreed with him in this way. We said, "Mr. Osborn, we will first of all give you all the draining "tiles which are required to drain your farm, and we will pull down the whole of your "buildings and rebuild them all for you. The surveyor says it will come to from 1,100*l.* to "1,200*l.*; at any rate whatever it comes to we will have an estimate, and you shall super- "intend the whole of these buildings with our surveyor. Having given you the tiles and "laid out 1,154*l.* or 1,200*l.*, we will increase your rent for twenty-one years, from 179*l.* to "230*l.* a year; you may have it either upon lease or as a tenant at will." He agreed with us; and seeemed, as I thought, exceedingly satisfied to think that he should have made so good a bargain, to have a new house and farm buildings, &c., and 150 acres of land for 230*l.* a year. Sir Robert Ferguson, in his evidence before the Commissioners, says that he, Mr. Osborn, was very much dissatisfied, and considered that he was very badly used. Now this opinion I cannot agree with; he also disputed our right to expend our trust money on farms or buildings.

8371. You stated that you considered the prospects of the Irish society were very good?—I think at the present moment they are so, being out of debt.

8372. You are free from debt?—Yes; we do not owe one shilling, and we hope to have a considerable surplus yearly, which we intended to expend in the improvements of the property in the county of Derry, which comes under our trusteeship.

8373. What do you expect will be the annual gross income of the Irish society for the next few years?—We brought over a balance last year, which must not be considered in our present rental. Our rents during the last year in Coleraine, and in Derry and its liberties, have been about 7,060*l*; the slob reclaimed, 794*l.*; the fisheries, 2,271*l.*; that is rather more than 10,000*l.* a year.

8374. Do you anticipate any material reduction in the expences of management which have heretofore taken place with regard to those estates?—Formerly the expences of management were much greater than they are now; and I am of opinion that they might still be reduced.

8376. Do you contemplate any expenditure for legal expenses in this year?—There are always expenses for law.

8377. Do you know what will be the probable expenditure under that head for the current year?—We have only one case before the courts, the case of the perpetuity leases. The society came to a resolution that they would take the best opinion they could get, whether they should pass any more perpetuity leases into fee farm grants without compensation, according to the 5th clause 12 & 13 Vict. c. 105. I think therefore we may put down the law expenses at about 300*l.*

8378. Does not even the sum of 2,000*l.* appear to you a very large expenditure for the management of a trust fund of this description?—I have no doubt of it; but considering the low rents and the immense extent of property under the management of the society, the case is altered.

8379. Are you able to suggest any means by which that could be diminished?—I am not aware of any, unless you had all your establishment in one place.

8380. Substantially the government of the society is in London, and not in Ireland?—Yes; it is so provided in the charters of James and Charles.

8381. Your principal establishment must be in London?—Yes; if you have a body of twenty-six gentlemen forming a society like this, they expect to receive some small remuneration for their attendance, and they are paid to a certain extent. For instance, whenever we meet at a court I get 1*l.* for my attendance, and ten shillings on each of the committees. What I have received averages from 18*l.* to 30*l.* a year. The deputy governor has nearly as much; the amount of line money paid last year to all the members was about 204*l.* The next point is the salaries of our officers, they seem to be only the other large amounts which could be reduced.

8382. It would not be desirable to under-pay them, I presume?—You would run the risk of those gentlemen jobbing in some other way if you did.

8383. It has been suggested that, in order to avoid this great expense it would be desirable that the property should be sold, the proceeds invested, and the interest of the money administered in the same way as the proceeds of the estate are. The proceeds would be received in the way of interest, and the funds of the society would, therefore, go further?—I have heard that suggested; and I have heard all the gentlemen who have given evidence say that it would be a benefit to that part of Ireland. I disagree with them entirely upon that point. If we were to put up the whole of our property in Ireland for sale of course, there would be many competitors with them for the property they wished to purchase. The property could not be sold by the society without public competition. They (the tenants) would get different landlords than they now have, who would exact every shilling of rent from them. In the case of Mr. Babington and Mr. Moore, who have each a lease, with forty-one years to come, I do not think, if these farms were sold, they would be able to get renewals upon such good terms as they could from the Irish society.

8384. You are now speaking of the interests of the tenants, not of the community, for the benefit of whom this fund was originally instituted?—I do not think they could be sold to produce as much money at three per cent. as would enable the society to confer all the benefits which it now does on the community, for which the society was created.

8385. Do not you think that if the expenses of management were altogether saved, as they would be under such arrangements, the net sum to be distributed for public purposes would be larger?—I do not think that the whole of the expenses could be saved. I should think you must put down at least one-half for the expense of management in Ireland, so that the trust might be fulfilled.

8386. Another suggestion has been made to the Commissioners, that the system which has been applied to ecclesiastical property in Ireland, should be made applicable to your property, and that the tenants should have the power of obtaining their land in perpetuity. What do you think of that suggestion?—I think the society would be disposed to give, to persons really anxious to improve the property, as long leases as they could. If it was for the benefit of the towns of Derry and Coleraine, I am of upinion that the tenants ought to have long leases, and would have them. It is, however, quite a different question if the tenant asks for a lease in perpetuity. Many leases of this sort were formerly granted; I believe nearly the whole of Coleraine and a great part of Derry is at this moment leased in perpetuity, and the society think that the parties, generally speaking, have not carried out the covenants; and as the society has not itself power, under leases in perpetuity, to make the proper improvements, the consequence has been that the improvement of the property has not taken place to the extent which the society could have wished to see.

8387. A complaint has been made with regard to the water-side property at Derry, which is stated to be particularly applicable for the erection of buildings of commercial importance, that owing to the refusal of the society to give an adequate length of tenure, that property is not in as good a condition as it otherwise would be. Have you any observation to make upon that?—There is our tenant, Mr. Munn, who holds a lease of that description; but it is such a mixed property, part houses and part old warehouses, called water-side premises, of a very bad description, that the whole of it ought to be pulled down and rebuilt in a substantial and proper manner. I have no doubt, if he would do that, the society would give him a long lease, at a moderate rent. But on bad property a long lease ought not to be granted, unless very stringent clauses are introduced to compel the parties to pull down and rebuild in a substantial and uniform manner. The warehouse he has built as a spinning-mill, is one which I should not be allowed to erect on the City property in London. Having a lease for sixty-one years or ninety years, it ought to be done in a substantial and architectural manner. In Belfast there are buildings of that sort carried up in a very spirited manner. The answer is, "We in "Derry have not money, and cannot do it here." What I should like would be to see the city of Derry copy the buildings in Belfast.

8388. Do not you think if the property is well situated and the tenure is permanent, that property, either in the hands of the present proprietor or some other proprietor, to whom he would part with it, is sure to become valuable, and sure to produce improved buildings?—I am sorry to say I have not seen any valuable buildings, on long leases, belonging to the society, except in the case of Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington; they have improved their farms, and put buildings on them which are creditable to them and creditable to the whole of the county.

8389. Is there any of this property on the water-side, which is actually now held under a permanent tenure which is neglected?—Mr. Munn has a long lease. He first of all wanted a sixty-one years' lease. He thought we were inclined to give longer leases, and he raised his idea up to ninety-one years, upon terms to which we could not agree. The society, I am sure, are quite willing to give Mr. Munn a sufficient term, upon which he might improve his property at the water-side, if so inclined.

8390. A great complaint has been made to us respecting the rule introduced of late years by the Irish society, not to allow a renewal till within three years of the termination of the lease. What is the reason which induced the society to adopt that rule?—There was an old standing order made in 1832, and printed and published in 1847, the object of which I presume was to improve the property as much as possible and to prevent jobbing. As new members of the society are admitted, a tenant who has a lease expiring in ten or fifteen years becomes known to them, and prosessing a desire to make great improvements, obtains by a little management a renewal of the lease long before it expires, and thus jobbing goes on. Speaking, however, from my own experience, I am sure that the society has been and is prepared to grant long leases if they are assured of the improvement of the property.

J. Humphery, Esq.

8391. Have longer leases actually been given in the case of improving tenants?—Yes; Mr. Moore's first lease was forty-one years, and the society added twenty years to it; that is the case with a farm which he holds, he having built a new house and new buildings upon it, and he now wishes for a further term of twenty years.

8392. Is that much the case with house property in Derry?—I am not prepared to say with respect to house property.

8393. Does not it seem to you, that that rule if constantly acted on would be an effectual bar against all improvements in the hands of a tenant?—I think it would, but I say that the society is prepared now, and has been ever since I have been upon it, if a man has a lease with ten or fifteen years to run, to grant him such an extension of his lease as would give him sufficient opportunity of repaying himself for the money which he has laid out.

8394. Do you think that that disposition of the society has been sufficiently known in Derry to induce those who may take advantage of it to do so?—I think not. It is difficult to get the twenty-six gentlemen who compose the society to agree at all times to long leases. The majority carries everything of that kind.

8395. Do you mean that there would be a discussion and a decision on each particular case, but that they would not act on any general principle?—They would discuss every case.

8396. Would they act upon a general principle?—I think they would if any man could show that he had a house in Derry, the lease of which had ten years to run out of sixty-one years or whatever term it might be, and that he intended to pull down the house and improve the property for the benefit of himself and also of the city of Derry, they would give him a sufficient lease to do it.

8397. If that is so, is not it most desirable that that disposition should be generally known in Derry, and acted on steadily in all cases, not as a matter of favour but as a matter of principle?—Yes; but suppose the society have a house in Derry, with twenty years of the lease to run, at the end of that lease the house would be worth to them 100*l.*, per annum instead of 30*l.* or 40*l.* per annum. The tenant, however, says "I have twenty "years to run; I wish you to increase my lease to sixty-one years," but he does not wish to pay us any more rent. The society would naturally say "We do not think we can consent "to give you a further extension of the lease on the present terms."

8398. Do you think that the corporation of London has any beneficial interest in the property of the Irish society, or that it is purely a trust property to be administered for the good of the north of Ireland?—My own opinion is that it is a trust property, to be administered for the benefit of the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine, and also for the maintenance of the protestant religion in the whole county. We never look merely to the city of Londonderry and the borough of Coleraine, but we invariably give donations throughout the whole of the county, for the purpose of building chapels or endowing schools for the education of all classes. With respect to the free school, which has been spoken of, we pay towards that 430*l.* a year; we keep a school also at Coleraine, where we give the master 65*l.* per annum, and the mistress 40*l.* per annum, and other sums to the school amounting to upwards of 250*l.* a year.

8399. Complaint has been made, on the part of the inhabitants of Coleraine, that they do not receive a fair share of the funds you have to distribute; have you any observation to make on that subject?—I do not think that that complaint can be justified by the facts, for nearly the whole of Coleraine is on perpetuity leases, and therefore we have no power to improve the property. With respect to the fisheries, I may mention that Sir George Hall paid us, when he had them, 1,250*l.* per annum., and he under-let and mortgaged them. At the expiration of the lease we took them into our own possession. We found out that Englishmen were not the best people to manage Irish fisheries. We now let them to Mr. Robert Allen for five, seven, or ten years. He pays us 2,325*l.* a year. With respect to the difficulty which the society has in dealing well with Irishmen, I wish to mention how we have been obliged to pay for law expenses. Our solicitor in Dublin we have paid a large sum to, for fighting the battle about the advowsons of the bishop of Derry. After paying him 3,000*l.* and some hundreds, we received a bill from him up to 1842, for 5,762*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*, that was the balance of his account against us. He had deducted all the money out of pocket. We thought it was an enormous sum of money; and to show you that it was so, after a long dispute, he at last agreed that we should pay him 3,000*l.* in discharge of this 6,000*l.* bill, which we paid him; and he gave us a receipt in full for his account up to that time. That shows the difficulty we have in defending our rights in Ireland.

8400. Do not you think that property involving all this litigation is an unfortunate possession for trustees to hold?—Having been in possession for so many centuries, I should say not; and I do not think that any one could better manage our estates, being so large, than the society does.

8401. Do you believe that the Irish society has exercised the same degree of caution in avoiding litigation, as a private proprietor would?—No, I do not think they have. When I became governor, in 1843, they would, I think, have got into an expense from 8,000*l.* to 10,000*l.* more in the advowson's suits, if I had not set my face resolutely against it, and with the support of the then society, put a stop to litigation.

8402. Do you think the affairs of the Irish society are now clearer, and that you may fairly look forward to not being involved in this continuous litigation in future?—I think at the present moment nothing could be better than the position of the society. We are now out of debt, and we are in a position to do all the good contemplated by the charter, and all that we can possibly do as trustees. If the expenses of management were reduced, the money saved would also go to the improvement of Londonderry and of Coleraine.

8403. You have one important law suit at this moment going on, have not you?—Yes. That law suit was the consequence of the decision of the majority of the court to try whether they could not obtain some benefit from the perpetuity leases being converted into fee farm rents. It was carried by the majority of the society that they should obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, which led to this law suit, and we have this morning received a letter from our solicitor to say the Master of the Rolls has decided that we have an equitable right in these leases, and that it will be referred to the master to decide whether the society is entitled to a large or small sum for compensation. I hope that that suit may still be amicably settled. I do not quite agree with my brethren upon this matter, but I still think it might be amicably settled.

8404. You are aware of the original objects of the society, as laid down in the charter of King James; to what extent do you consider that those objects have been satisfied up to the present time?—At the time that part of Ireland was confiscated to the Crown, the money that the corporation of London required to erect and build the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine, the companies were compelled to find the money, which was paid to the City of London, and the City of London created the city and town. After that was done, the London companies required some return for the money so advanced; and there was a distribution of the lands between the twelve companies; they divided the whole of the country into twelve districts, one of which was given to each of the companies. Some of the companies gave long leases; others, I believe, gave leases in perpetuity; some short leases; and some sold their right. After apportioning their allotments of land in Londonderry, the charter gave to the corporation of London the right to the city of Derry and borough of Coleraine, with the fisheries, and certain other things which they had to manage in trust, to the benefit of those two places.

8405. To what extent do you think that the original objects of the trust imposed upon the Irish society have been satisfied and fulfilled?—I suppose the original object was to create and improve those two towns of Derry and Coleraine, and to encourage the Protestant religion in those two places, so as to establish the Protestant faith throughout the country. In the first instance, the Scotch and English settlers were exceedingly rigid in the profession of their faith, and the Roman Catholic was almost prohibited from possessing any church or chapel in the country; but as religion has become more tolerant, they now erect churches and chapels indiscriminately with the members of the Presbyterian church and the Church of England.

8406. Does the Irish society give any contribution towards Roman Catholic chapels?—Generally speaking, it does not. Latterly, however, we have not restrained ourselves entirely from giving to Roman Catholic chapels and schools.

8407. Are the tenants of the society exclusively Protestant?—No; generally, but not exclusively.

8408. There is no preference given to one religion over another in the choice of tenants?—No, not at present. I dare say formerly there was, but I do not think it would be the case now. If we had a farm at libert v and a Roman Catholic were to offer for it, I think we should take his case into our consideration, without reference to the question of his religion.

8409. Do you conceive that the original objects, as expressed in the charter of James, have been substantially fulfilled?—I think they have.

8410. Were you a member of the Irish society at the time when the suit of the Skinners' company was commenced?—I was not.

8411. Can you state what were the circumstances which gave rise to that suit?—To the best of my knowledge they were these: The society, instead of laying out, as I have ever contended they ought to do, their surplus rents and profits in the improvement of the city of Derry and the borough of Coleraine, unfortunately had accumulated a sum of money, which they divided among the twelve companies, about 500*l.* to each company.

8412. At that time was the society in debt?—No, they got into debt since then; but, as I before said, we are now free from debt.

8413. At the time they made the division among the companies, they had a surplus beyond their debts?—Yes; which surplus I contend ought never to have existed. I contend that the surplus which they have every year should be expended in the improvement and benefit of those two towns. The Skinners' company, finding that no further surplus was coming, brought an action, and said that we, the Irish society, were merely trustees for the companies.

J. Humphery, Esq.

8414. That action was brought in consequence of the discontinuance of the practice of dividing the surplus among the companies?—To a certain extent. The corporation, moreover, threw open, about twenty-two years ago, the election to the Irish society. Formerly, and for centuries before, the governor and assistants must have been members of one of the twelve companies. They found that in practice they had not a sufficient number of men in the corporation belonging to the twelve companies, and then the corporation threw the election open, and said "we will not agree that the twelve companies shall have "possession of the Irish society," and they allowed any person to be elected who was a member of any other of the City companies, or a freeman of London. That continues to be the case up to the present day. There are some members of the society now who do not belong to any company at all, but are only freemen of London.

8415. Was that alteration made by a change in the practice, or by any resolution of the Court of Common Council?—By a resolution of the common council.

8416. The decision of Lord Langdale, confirmed by the House of Lords, was to the effect that the Irish society were trustees, only for public purposes?—Yes.

8417. Did that decision make any alteration in the practice with respect to the distribution of the surplus among the companies?—No; when Lord Lyndhurst had given his judgment in the House of Lords, I immediately said "this certainly confirms my "opinion that the surplus money that we have from rents and other sources in Derry and "Coleraine, must and ought to go to the benefit of those two towns, and it ought not to accumulate, to be given to the companies at all; because, if it does accumulate, the "companies would claim the surplus."

8418. Should not you think yourselves at liberty, if there were preferable objects, for disposing of your funds in other parts of the Irish plantation, to give a portion of them to those other places?—We do so.

8419. It has been alleged that you have given money out of the plantations which were originally instituted; for instance, in the county of Antrim. On what ground was that done?—We may have done so now and then. Poor Presbyterian clergy may have come to us and applied for a donation for building or improving a chapel. We have taken that into consideration, and at times given donations for those purposes.

8420. You do not consider that to be beyond the fair powers entrusted to you?—I do not think so. It may be said that we have no right to expend a shilling out of the county; but when you come so near the borders of the counties of Antrim and Donegal, we think we may do so on good cause being shown; Derry having been taken out of Donegal, and Coleraine out of Antrim.

8421. According to the present practice, the whole of the annual income is distributed for the benefit of the Irish plantation?—Yes.

8422. No portion is intended to be applied to the benefit of the twelve companies?—None, as far as the present Court of Assistants are concerned. I cannot answer for what any other Court of Assistants might do.

8423. Those are the present views of the governing body?—Yes; that the whole of the income should be appropriated for the benefit of the County of Londonderry.

8424. Do the Irish society conceive that they are justified as trustees, in erecting buildings on their property?—I think so. That is my opinion. Sir Robert Ferguson says that it lies out of our trust; that we have no right to do so. We are going to erect farm buildings for Mr. Osborn, our tenant, of a character which will show to other parts of Ireland what the the society can do. If Sir Robert is right we have no power to do that. We are also going to demolish some shocking places, where there is an accumulation of filth and wretchedness beyond all idea, and to drain and lay out the district and build model cottages for the people who live there. If Sir Robert is right we have no power to do that also, but must let the poor people remain in their present wretched state.

8425. What has been the practice of the society with respect to its agricultural property. Has it ever erected buildings, or made repairs or drained?—No; the tenants get their property at rents which should enable them to do it themselves. They have their farms generally on long leases and on very moderate terms, and they ought to lay out their money according to the covenants of their leases. Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington have laid out a great deal of money for improvements in their two farms.

8426. Has it been the practice of the society, in respect to its agricultural property, to expend anything in buildings, or repairs or draining?—Not to any extent, in my time. We have not had money.

8427. I suppose it is quite clear that the common council have no power of applying any portion of the rents of the Irish society to any purpose, either relating to the corporation or any other?—None whatever.

8428. Has any attempt ever been made by the corporation, to interfere with the disposition of the funds of the Irish society?—None. With respect to Mr. Alderman Alsop, a sort of idea has run through the corporation that Mr. Alderman Alsop, and some members of the twelve companies, and others, received a pretty good compensation for all these perpetuity leases; it was a sort of job that was perpetrated. A dream has run through the society that there was a quid pro quo.

J. Humphery, Esq.

8429. Even supposing the transaction was a corrupt one at the time, has it not been beneficial to the town of Derry, that so much of the town has been held under perpetuity leases?—I do not think so. I should have given them good long leases, which would have afforded them a sufficient opportunity to gain all their money back, but I would not have given a perpetuity lease.

8430. The Irish society do not meddle in politics, do they?—They have not done so in later times.

8431. They did in former times, did not they?—On one occasion I hear from a witness that 3,000*l.* was put down as having been spent in an election at Coleraine, when Mr. Alderman Thorpe was a candidate. I could not have believed that the society would have done any such thing.

8432. Do you believe it to have been the case?—I enquired whether it was so, and I am told that a sum less than 1000*l.* was taken out of the funds of the society, and expended in Coleraine.

8433. In what year was that?—About 1830.

8434. Was Alderman Thorpe governor of the society at that time?—He was. With respect to Mr. Babington's farm, he desires to show that we have used him very ill. Mr. Babington has a good long lease at a very moderate rent, and if Mr. Babington were to say to the Irish society, "Whatever the value of my farm is now, will you give me a "longer lease," I am quite sure the society would be prepared to renew his lease from 40 years to 61 years, provided he would pay the increase value, if any, of the farm from the end of his present term. I do not think the society would give him a 21 years lease at the same rent; but if at the end of 41 years he would pay the improved value of the farm as it is now, I have no doubt the society would consent to it. Dr. Miller has been mentioned also. He has two farms, one his uncle's and one his own. He wished to have the two farms put together. When I was over there, I suggested that if the farms were put together, the society would be inclined to give him a 61 years lease. Dr. Miller, like all other gentlemen in Ireland, the moment he thought he could get a 61 years lease, said, "I cannot take a 61 years lease; unless I have a 99 years lease, I will not take it." I said, "I do not think the society will give you a 99 years lease, but they will be inclined to "give you a 61 years lease," and they were inclined to give him one, but he would not accept it. When he found he could not get a 99 years lease, he memorialized us last year, and said he would take a 61 years lease. Then the society said, "No; we cannot agree "to that, you shall have 20 acres of land to build upon for 61 years, but the remainder "you can have at the present value for 21 years." Then he considered himself very much aggrieved, and said that we did not give him an opportunity of improving the property.

8435. Do not you think that it would be desirable that, as far as possible, the management of the society should be conducted on uniform principles?—You cannot conduct all properties upon the same uniform principle. There is always something to prevent your doing so. There is no doubt if it could be conducted on uniform principles, it would be better.

8436. Do not you think that a want of uniformity may be produced by the varying nature of the body which has to decide these questions?—I think the body would be better if they remained longer upon the society. I think they should remain at least four years. I think it should be even longer than that.

8437. Would you reduce their number?—I think the number might be reduced. I think the present number is too great.

8438. Under the present system, is not it the case that in each particular instance you have to decide, there is scarcely any opinion which you can rely upon very much, except that of the Irish authorities, the surveyor, and the resident agent?—Yes. I think the society, as a body, pays some little deference to what I suggest; and at times they pay a good deal of deference to our secretary.

8439. Are you able to judge very well of the character of a tenant living in Ireland; must not you form your opinion very much from the agent?—I know them all pretty well. I have been often there, and I know all the tenants, and understand their wishes and their wants. If I had individually the management of the property, I would undertake that they would be all happy and contented under my management.

J. S. Wortley, M.P.

The Right Hon. James Archibald Stuart Wortley, M.P., was further examined as follows.

8440. Are there any observations which you wish to address to the Commission in reference to the Irish society?—There is only one point to which I wish to refer, as it has been alluded to in the course of the evidence, and it throws some light upon the position of the corporation with reference to the Irish society. The Commissioners have heard that there have been from time to time complaints made with regard to what is called the 1,500 acres. I find that an application was made to the corporation in the year 1834, and a threat made at that time of a petition to the House of Commons. Whether that petition was ever presented or not I do not know, but I believe no committee was appointed, and no inquiry took place; but at that time I find a statement was drawn up in two columns, in one of which appeared the substantive petition, and in the other appeared the answer; and if the Commissioners wish to see that document, it affords a statement of what was the answer to all those allegations at that time.

J. S. Wortley, Esq. M.P.

The same was delivered in, and is as follows:

OBSERVATIONS upon a printed Paper, which has been extensively circulated, and which purports to be a Copy of a Petition about to be presented to the Honourable the House of Commons from the Inhabitants of Londonderry and its vicinity, against the Honourable the Irish Society of London.

PETITION.	OBSERVATIONS.
1. That a Charter was granted, in 1613, by King James the First, incorporating a part of the Common Council of London, by the title of "The Society of the Governor "and Assistants, London, of the New Plan- "tation in Ulster," and granting to that Society (commonly designated as the Irish Society) almost the entire of the City and County of Londonderry.	1. The incorporation of the Honourable the Irish Society first took place in 1613, under King James the First, under the title of the Governor and Assistants, London, of the New Plantation in Ulster, within the realm of Ireland, in consideration of the aid which the City of London gave to the Crown in suppressing the rebellion in the north of Ireland, headed by Tyrone, and for the purpose of establishing a Protestant Colony in that country. It was afterwards re-incorporated in 1662 by Charles II.
2. That by the same Charter the Corporation of London was also incorporated, with power to elect a Mayor, Recorder, two Sheriffs for both city and county, Magistrates, &c., &c., but no lands or funds were granted to them for the support of the Magistracy, or to defray the necessary expenses of the Corporation.	2. The Charter names the first Recorder, and provides that the King shall name all future Recorders.
3. That in the "motives and reasons" brought forward by His Most Gracious Majesty, King James the First, to induce the City of London to undertake the Plantation, he proposed that 1,000 acres be allotted to each of the towns of Derry and Coleraine for their commons, rent free, and that the Salmon Fishing of the Rivers Bann and Lough Foyle should be purchased by his Majesty and bestowed upon those towns for their better encouragement, and in the agreement entered into on the 28th January, 1609, the second article specifies "that four "thousand acres lying on the Derry side, "next adjacent to Derry, should be laid "thereunto, bog and barren mountain to be "no part thereof, but to go as waste for the "City."	3. All these were granted to the Irish Society by the Charter, on whom also devolved the government of the two cities, the corporations being declared to be local managers under the Society.
4. That soon after the granting of the Charter almost the whole of the county of Londonderry, then producing not more than 1,800*l.* per annum, was divided among the twelve Companies of the City of London, who had contributed 60,000*l.* towards the Plantation, and the Irish Society retained the City of Derry and Town of Coleraine, with the lands adjoining, and the fisheries (which last alone produced above 800*l.* a year) for the general purposes of the Plantation, and the support of those towns, over the corporation of which they had considerable powers, by means of the veto on their bye-laws granted them by charter.	4. The Charter gave to the Society the veto on all the bye-laws and acts of the Corporation of Derry.
5. That it appears by the answer of the Society to the Privy Council, in 1624, that they had then granted to the Corporation of this City, 1500 acres for the use of the Mayor and other officers. These 1,500 acres, comprising the Quarterlands of Molenan, Ballyoughery, Termonbacca, Killea, Creevagh, and Ballynagowan, situate in the liberties of Derry, north-west of the river Foyle.	5. These 1,500 acres are part of the 4,000 acres granted to the Society in their Charter, nd were leased at any easy rate by the Society to the Corporation of Derry, who, in return for such kindness, combined with Bishop Bramhall to deprive the Society of this property, and gave over the same to the Bishop, reserving to themselves only a profit rental of 90*l.* 10*s.* Irish.

PETITION.

6. That the Charter of the Society was forfeited for various neglects, and these lands passed, by Royal Grant, into the possession of the Bishop of Derry, and the Corporation were obliged to take a lease of them from the See, and, at the expiration of that lease, they gave the Society every assistance to recover those lands, believing it was the intention, as it was the duty, of that body, to restore them to their original purpose: the Society, however, have ever since kept possession, though in the Act of Parliament terminating the dispute between the Bishop and the Society there is a special reservation of all other rights, whether of corporations or of individuals.

7. That these lands now produce the large rental of 1,700*l.* per annum, while the Society pay to the Corporation the small acknowledgment of 90*l.* 10*s.* Irish.

8. That the Society granted to the Corporation leases, for terms of years, which afterwards increased much in value, in consequence of the large sums of money which had been expended on them; of this improvement the Society took advantage, and made it a pretext for increasing the corporation rent from 42*l.* to 600*l.* annually, thereby depriving them of the funds by which they had paid the expenses of Watching and Cleansing, and part of the expense of Lighting the City of Derry; for all which purposes a heavy assessment is now levied off the inhabitants thereof.

OBSERVATIONS.

17ht Feb. 1854.

6. The Bishop, by the aid of the Corporation of Derry, having unjustly got possession of these lands, refused, at the expiration of their lease, to grant them a renewal. The Corporation then discovered their fraudulent conduct to the Society; by letter dated 30th January 1693. (See Appendix A.)

7. The Society took steps to recover their property, and having succeeded, it was settled by Act of Parliament of Queen Anne in 1704 (See Appendix B). The Corporation of Derry requested to have a clause inserted granting to them the 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum, independent of the will of the Society. This the Society refused (see Appendix C.); yet, as a matter of grace and favour, the Society have allowed the Corporation of Derry this 90*l.* 10*s.* to the present day. The Corporation afterwards requested the Society to lease these lands to them; this the Society refused from experience of their former conduct, and preferred letting them to the brave Defenders of the walls of Derry, many of whose descendants occupy them at the present day.

8. The Society, soon after their incorporation, independent of the 1,500 acres beforementioned, also leased to the Corporation other important properties, lands, dues, tolls, &c., at rents nearly nominal, for the support of the magistracy, &c., and renewed them from time to time, at or before their expiration. In 1808, twelve years before the leases granted in 1759 expired, a negotiation took place on a proposition made for a renewal on the part of the Corporation, when a certain increased rent was mentioned as the rent to be paid after the expiration of the then existing term; but no final arrangement was made. In 1819 a Deputation went over to Derry from the Society for the purpose of bringing this negotiation to a conclusion, by finally arranging the rent to be paid by the Corporation to the Society, under leases to be granted from 1820. On inquiring fully into the circumstances of the property, and finding that several of the holdings had been leased in toties quoties to members of the Corporation and their connexions, the Deputation reported the same to the Society, who refused to include such leases in any renewals to be made, inasmuch as the benefits to accrue would not go in aid of the Corporation funds, for which purpose they were originally granted. (See Appendix D.) In addition to these toties quoties leases, the Deputation found that all the other then existing leases, though without a toties quoties clause, yet were granted for the full term of their existing interests to members of the Corporation, or their in-

9. That upon part of the land so demised, were built the quays of the said City which the Society, as your petitioners contend, were bound to add to and increase as required, as will more fully appear by the instructions delivered to the Deputation in 1615, and their Report.

10. That the Society totally neglected to build the additions necessary to such quays; but, anxious to save themselves any expenditure thereon, joined in an application to the Irish Parliament in 1763, whereby was obtained a sum of 4,590*l.*; and also joined afterwards in procuring the passing of 30 Geo. III. chap. 31, whereby the Corporation of Derry were empowered to levy a Tonnage Duty of all vessels frequenting the Port; and under this Act above 15,421*l.* have been collected and expended in additions to the quays, thus causing an outlay mediate connexions. The value of these properties had been much increased, and, indeed, was very large; not by the outlay of the Corporation (for they had not in their corporate capacity expended one farthing on them), but by the expenditure of those persons who were lessees of the Corporation or their sub-tenants. The Deputation thus finding that the Corporation were likely to realise a large additional rental from the outlay of others on the before-mentioned properties, considered the Society were entitled to a proportion thereof; but they decided on regulating the increase on the principle of leaving the Corporation an income fully adequate to all their wants, and acccordingly required from them an account of all their annual outgoings, which was handed to them. It contained the account of their debts, the interest payable annually thereon, the salaries of the chief magistrate and other officers, pensions, &c., and having estimated the annual value of the various holdings upon a scale acquiesced in by the Corporation, and which was afterwards fully realized by the lettings, they deducted not merely the computed amount of their annual outgoings, but made a handsome allowance of several hundred pounds per annum for contingencies, and fixed the amount of the increased rent out of the residue. It is a well-known fact that, so far from the Society depriving them by such increase of any existing funds from which the expenses of watching, &c., had formerly been paid, the annual revenues of the Corporation from these renewals were materially augmented. That this arrangement was deemed at the time highly liberal and beneficial by the Corporation appears by their declarations and addresses to the Society, together with the compliments they paid to those deputed to arrange the business, at the time of presenting them with the freedom of their city; and that they proved so appears from the large sum (near 40,000*l.*) these beneficial leases granted by the Society produced in 1831 under all the disadvantages of a forced sale under an execution.

9. The Society were not bound under any obligation whatever to build quays; they originally granted the Corporation sufficient landing places, being all the ground between the London and Chichester bulwarks, but which the Corporation of Derry converted to their own profit by leasing for building purposes.

10. The quays were chiefly built by parliamentary grant, as fully detailed in Report of Select Committee of the House of Commons on Acts relating to the Derry Bridge, &c., printed 22d July 1833, to which reference is made. The profits which the Corporation realized by the wharfage, quayage, and cranage leased to them by the Irish Society at 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d. per annum*, were far more than adequate, during the existence of the former lease, to have reimbursed them for any and every expenditure which they could have made.

of 20,000*l.* to the benefit of the Society or their lessees.

11. That the Society have, in like manner, neglected the various public duties required of them, such as the endowment of the free school with lands, the building of Markets, &c., which last the Corporation were obliged to undertake, and by their profuse expenditure thereon, and on other public works, have become so reduced in circumstances that they have no means to support the magistracy of this City; and yet the Society, though deriving great emoluments, as well from the improvement of such corporate property as from the general increase and improvement of the City and its vicinity, have peremptorily refused to grant any assistance whatever towards the support of the magistracy.

12. That from the nature of their constitution the Society is incapable of rendering any permanent benefit to this country, as it is composed of merchants and tradesmen in the City of London, whose business require their constant residence therein, whereby they are, of course, ignorant of the local circumstances and wants of the inhabitants of this district, and besides, being elected for only two years, cannot possibly acquire the information proper to qualify them for the due discharge of their duties;

OBSERVATIONS.

J. S. Wortley, Esq. M. P.

17th Feb. 1854.

11. The Society were not called upon to grant lands to the free school, but their liberality to that institution is well known. The ground upon which the markets were built was granted by the Society at 1*l. per* year to the Corporation on the condition of their building the markets upon the same, according to a plan proposed by themselves; the tolls being applicable to defraying the expense thereof, to the which purpose they should have been applied long before they were, but were otherwise appropriated by the Corporation. There is no doubt the expenditure of the Corporation of Derry has been most profuse, both before and subsequent to this arrangement: but it was not upon the markets nor any other beneficial works or buildings which they were obliged to erect, but on such unnecessary buildings as the large Public Rooms in the Old Market Place, and other such expenditure, that they have been brought into their present difficulties. In October and November 1831 the Corporation of Derry sent a Deputation to the Society to solicit pecuniary aid, stating to them that the sale of the Society's leases to the Corporation by their creditors had left them without funds to support the magistracy. After repeated conferences with the said Deputation, which consisted of Sir Robert A. Ferguson, William Boyd, and George Hill, Esqrs., the Society consented to vote 750*l.* for one year, for the support of the magistrates, officers, &c., agreeable to Resolutions passed 3d November 1831 (see Appendix E.), and in reply received the thanks of the Deputation (see Appendix F.) The Society granted it for one year only, because a Deputation from their body was to visit Derry in the following year, and would be able to inform themselves thoroughly as to the embarrassments of the Corporation. The Deputation visited Derry in July and August 1832, and went most fully into all the circumstances of the Corporation: they also convened a meeting of the landed proprietors, &c., on the subject of the Bridge. The proceedings of such Deputation were printed and published; the Deputation, under all the circumstances of the case, considered it to be their duty to recommend to the Society not to grant the Corporation any further pecuniary aid until they became emancipated from their debts. The Society came to a resolution to that effect. (See Appendix G.)

12. The Society are annually elected agreeably to the Charter, and whether the colonization of the County of Derry from the City of London, and the different ramifications of the plan prescribed by the charter were theoretically wise, is not a matter to be argued at the present moment; it is obvious it has been practically beneficial, and the present state of that county, which is the most peaceable and orderly in its conduct, and is an example to be pointed out to all the other parts of Ireland, plainly and, accordingly, it appears by the accounts printed and published by them, that in the course of the nine years ending March 1833, they have received no less than 77,000*l.* from their estates in this country, while not more than 8,000*l.* have been expended in it —a sum not equal to the amount divided among the members, or expended by them in taverns.

13. That this sum is stated to have been expended on schools and public charities; yet your petitioners believe and confidently assert, that no sum has ever been expended by them to improve the farm-buildings or houses of the tenantry on their estates.

14. That your petitioners had hoped that all these subjects would have been inquired into before the Corporate Commission lately issued, but have learned with astonishment that the agent of the Society, by their directions, declined answering to the Irish Commission any questions relative to their property or duties, and that the Society have not given any information to the English Commissioners on those subjects.

15. That your petitioners are the more pressing in bringing this matter under the consideration of your Honourable House, hoping that the contemplated changes in the constitution of corporations will tend to make them more efficient.

16. Petitioners therefore pray that your Honourable House, either by a Select Committee, or in any other manner that to you may seem best, will institute an inquiry into the Constitution, Funds, Expenditure, and Duties of the Irish Society, with a view to ascertain whether the property committed to their superintendence should not be applied to the support of the magistracy, and their obligations towards the City of Londonderry generally, which may tend to promote the further improvement of the City, and a diminution of the local burthens of its inhabitants.

OBSERVATIONS.

shows the benefits which have resulted from it. The present unfortunate state of the Corporation of Derry is certainly an exception, but it has been clearly shown not to have been produced by the Society, but by their own profuse expenditure and gross misapplication of the funds confided to their management. The nine years account referred to, instead of 8,000*l.*, show that upwards of 35,000*l.* have been expended in Ireland by the Society.

13. The Society let their lands upon such easy rents, and upon such leases, as to make it the interests of the tenants to build.

14. No prior instructions were given to the General Agent, or sought by him; it was on his own responsibility that he refused to be examined until he received directions; he then informed the Society he had been applied to to be examined by the Irish Municipal Commissioners; they directed him to say the Society were an English Corporation, and that if the Society were to be examined, it should be before the English Municipal Commission, which was then sitting in London, where all the books and papers were. The Governor of the Society waited on the Commissioners, and offered them every information they might require, which they declined.

15. The Society do hope that Government will introduce such a measure of Irish Municipal Reform as will render the Corporation of Derry efficient; and not permit a repetition of such gross mismanagement as has reduced them to their present unfortunate position.

16. The Society, being conscious of having always acted correctly, do not object to any inquiry being made into their conduct; at the same time they deprecate the idea of any committee being appointed upon the ex parte allegations and inaccuracies contained in this petition. There is no doubt but that the Corporation of Derry have been mainly instrumental in getting up this petition; but as it purports to be the petition of the Inhabitants of the City and its vicinity, they ought to be reminded that extreme care has been taken, from the earliest days by the Society, to render them accommodation and protection. They provided for them ground whereon to build within the fortilage, gardens in the perches under its protection, and farms sufficient for all their household purposes, protected between the City and the fort of Culmore; and they afterwards granted them leases in perpetuity at rents that may now be termed nominal; and also the inhabitants must know the large sums annually granted to public institutions for education and charities; and the readiness with which they have at all times granted donations for public buildings, places of worship, schools, &c.

May it please your Honours, Londonderry, 30th January 1693.

This poor little city, by the many hardships which in all times (since its being built) it suffers and conflicts with, seems to have some fate peculiar to itself; and not to speak of past times, we are now but just crawling as it were out of a wreck, and likely by a new billow to be again overwhelmed.

From the building and name of Londonderry it had very little to support its magistracy or public affairs, &c., but what your predecessors bestowed upon it; and, of all their favours, the lands by them laid aside for the use of this Corporation was, as the most useful and convenient, so most beneficial, for those lands furnished the citizens with fire and water, grazing for horse and cow, and the tenants thereon, on all occasions furnished us with labourers for all public and private works by sea and land. On those lands our youth and children disported, and the aged walked and rid to refresh themselves; and on some of those grounds the militia and garrison on all occasions mustered and disciplined; and, in short, on those very lands our city and suburbs stand, and the perches are parts thereof.

They are reputed 1,500 acres, but are not so much, except bog and barren mountain be reckoned as part, and such by the letters patent to the Society, and first articles of the Crown, ought to be cast in as waste.

Our present title to these 1,500 acres is by lease from the See of Derry, determinable the 14th July next, and the bishop resolved not to let us be his tenants, but will choose others, as we have very good reason to believe; and then we shall want all conveniences, and so be forced to dispense with, or at least purchase them perhaps at such excessive rates as the Bishop's tenants please to impose, which may be such as few can pay; and so also the citizens must dislodge.

Your Honours, if you consult your own right, may have it in your power to prevent those evils to us and at the same time to advantage your own interest; for it is certain that, by the same letters patent whereby he claims the lands about the town, he may as rightfully claim every house in it; and Bishop Bramhall's lease to this Corporation shows that he understood it so.

We have, as a memorandum enclosed, sent you a hint of the case relative to these 1,500 acres, and how this See first became interested in them, to which, with what else lies before you for farther information, we humbly refer to your Honours; and do most humbly and passionately beseech your Honours to give us your advice and full direction in this matter, which we shall punctually observe and follow.

We remain your Honour's most humble and faithful Servants,

(Signed) James Lermox, Mayor,
John Harvey,
John Crookshanks, } Sheriffs.

Act for settling certain Rights between the Bishop of Derry and the Society. 1704.

Whereas several disputes having formerly arisen between the Bishops of Derry and the Society of the Governor and Assistants London of the new plantation in Ulster within the realm of Ireland, and the same are still depending between Charles Lord Bishop of Derry and the said Society, concerning the right of certain parcels of land and other tenements, and concerning the right of several fishings and tythes of fishings in the rivers of Bann and Loughfoile, in the County of Londonderry and in the Counties of Antrim, Tyrone, and Donegall, in the Kingdom of Ireland, which have caused great trouble and charge to the said Bishops and Society, and been the occasion of great heats and animosities among several of the inhabitants of the said counties: Now, for the settling and quieting all difference between the said See and Society and for remedying the said inconveniences, and for preventing the like for the future, the said Lord Bishop of Derry and the Governor and Assistants of the said Society do most humbly beseech your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said Governor and Assistants London of the new plantation in Ulster within the realm of Ireland, and their successors, shall and may for ever hereafter have, hold, and enjoy, to their own proper use and behoof, all those several quarters or parcels of land called or known by the names of Termonbacco, Mollenam, Ballygan alias Ballygowan, Ballywirry alias Ballyougry, Creevagh, and Killeigh alias Killeagh, and sometimes known by the name of the fifteen hundred acres, and by some called or known by the name of Termonderry, or by what other name or names the same or any part thereof be called or known, situate, lying, and being in the county of Londonderry, in the county of the city of Londonderry, or one of them; and also all that fishing called the Gull or Gut near Ballynass, together with the wear and mill of Ballynass, with the appurtenances, and the small piece of land thereunto adjoining and heretofore enjoyed with the same, containing by estimation two acres and a half more or less; and also all the fishings and rights of fishings; and also all and all manner of tythes of fishing belonging to the said Bishop, or see of Derry, of what nature or kind soever, in the rivers of Bann and Loughfoile, within the county of Londonderry, or of or in any other rivers, waters, or fishing places within the said county of Londonderry, or in the counties of Antrim, Tyrone, or Donegall, and which have at any time heretofore been claimed or enjoyed by the bishops of the said see of Derry for the time being; and that the lands, tenements, fishings, tythes of fishing, and all other the premises subject to all former charges, issues and payments, charged or chargeable upon any of the premises, or upon the said Bishops of Derry, for or in respect of the same, be and are hereby vested in the said Governor and Assistants London of the new plantation in Ulster within the realm of Ireland, and their successors, and shall be held and enjoyed by them against the said Bishop of Derry and his successors, and all persons claiming by, from, or under them or any of them. And for a full and ample compensation to the said Bishop, and his successors Bishops of Derry, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid that the said Bishop, and his successors Bishops of Derry for ever hereafter, shall have and receive, and shall be seized in the right of their said bishopric, of and in one annuity or rent charge of 250*l.* per annum to commence from the feast-day of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, 1704, payable quarterly at the four most usual feasts or quarterly days of payment in the year; that is to say, the feasts of the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist, Saint Michael the Archangel, the birth of our Lord God, and the Annunciation of the blessed Virgin Mary, by even and equal portions, at the mansion-house belonging to the said Bishop of Derry, situate in Londonderry aforesaid, issuing out of, and chargeable and charged upon, all and every the premises hereinbefore mentioned, and all other the messuages, lands, tenements, fishings, tythes of fishings, and all other the estate whatsoever of the said Governor and Assistants London of the new plantation in Ulster within the realm of Ireland, situated, lying, and being in the said province of Ulster in the said kingdom of Ireland. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that when and as often as the said yearly rent of 250*l.* or any part thereof shall be behind and unpaid by the space of thirty days next over or after any of the said feast-days whereon the same ought to be paid as aforesaid, that then it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Lord Bishop, and his successors Bishops of Derry, into all or any of the premises charged or chargeable with the said rent to enter and distrain, and the distress there found to take and carry away; and in case the arrears then due, together with all the costs and charges of taking and keeping such distress, shall not, within five days after the taking the said distress, be fully paid and satisfied, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Lord Bishop of Derry, and his successors Bishops of Derry, to sell and dispose of the goods and chattels so distrained, and thereout pay all the said arrears then due, and the costs and charges of such distress and sale, for non-payment thereof, rendering the overplus to the owner or owners of the goods and chattels so distrained; and in case no distress or not sufficient distress shall be found, that then it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Lord Bishop of Derry to enter into and upon all and every or any part of the said premises, charged as aforesaid, and to hold the same, and to take and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to his and their own use, until thereout and thereby he and they shall be fully paid and satisfied for all arrears of the said rent, together with all damages, costs, and charges which he or they shall be put to, by reason of such entry, for non-payment of the same. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the fee and inheritance of and in one large mansion-house, with the scite of the same, commonly called the bishop's house, with the gardens, orchards, stables, out-houses, and all other the appurtenances thereunto belonging, now enjoyed by the said Charles Lord Bishop of Derry, under a certain rent, payable to the Society, and situate in or near the said City of Londonderry or liberties thereof, from and after the determination of a lease thereof now in being, purchased by the said Charles now Lord Bishop of Derry, shall be and are hereby vested in the said Lord Bishop of Derry, and his successors bishops of Derry, for ever, and shall for ever hereafter be held and enjoyed during the said term, by him the said Charles Lord Bishop of Derry, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and from the determination of the said term, by the said Lord Bishop and his successors, free from all payments to, or claims or demands of or from, the said Society and their successors; saving, nevertheless, to the Queen's most excellent Majesty, and to all and every other person and persons, bodies politic and corporative, their heirs and successors respectively (other than the said Charles Lord Bishop of Derry and his successors, and the said Society and their successors) all such right, title, interest, claim, and demand whatsoever, in, to, or out of the said premises, as they or any of them have or hath or might claim, in, to, or out of the said lands, tenements, fishings, and premises, or any part thereof, as if this act had never been made.

REPORT of the Committee of the Irish Society, to whom it was referred to inquire into the Allowance of Ninety Pounds Ten Shillings to the Corporation of Derry, presented to the Court of the Irish Society, held the 27th day of July, 1714.

To the Honourable Society of the Governor, &c.

WE of the Committee of Accounts and Correspondence, whose names are hereunto subscribed, in pursuance of an order of this Court made the 24th day of May last, have made examination into the grounds and reasons of the allowance of Ninety pounds ten shillings, annually paid by the Society to the Corporation of Londonderry; and, in order to our more clear and full information of that matter, we have looked back into the first constitution and settlement of that Society, as also into the late proceedings and controversies between the Society and the Most Rev. Father in God Doctor William King, the present Lord Archbishop of Dublin, late Bishop of Derry, during his incumbency in the said See of Derry, in relation to the 1,500 acres of land adjacent to the said City of Londonderry, and have perused two manuscript writings, drawn by Mr. John Mogridge, deceased; the one entitled "An Historical Narrative of Matter of Fact as it is in the case between the Lord Bishop of Derry, plaintiff, and the Governor and Assistants London, &c., defendants;" the other entitled "Animadversions on the Bishop of Derry's pretence to some lands of the City of London's near Londonderry," entered in a folio book, whereon is this inscription, "Mogridge's Works;" the said historical narrative is in page 36 to 37 of the said folio book, and the said animadversions are on page 98 to 195 of the said book; by which the Society's right and title to the said lands, called the 1,500 acres, are clearly and largely set forth and derived.

J. S. Wortley, Esq M. P.

We observe that by the Act of the 25th of King Henry the Eighth for the Dissolution of Monasteries, the said lands became forfeited to the Crown, as part of the Abbey of Columkill; that several surveys were taken, and particularly one, called the Grand Inquisition, was taken at Derry in the beginning of King James the First his reign, A.D. 1609, pursuant to a commission issued to inquire into the escheated lands in Ulster, addressed to Sir Arthur Chichester, the Archbishop of Dublin, Bishop of Derry, and other bishops and lords of the Council, Lord Chief Justice, Attorney General, and Surveyor General, for the better distinguishing and ascertaining the Crown lands from the lands belonging to the Church, by which inquisition the said lands are found to be a part of the lands and inheritance belonging to the Abbey of Columkill aforesaid, and vested in his said Majesty King James the First, by the said Act for the Dissolution of Monasteries.

That, by the articles entered into between the Crown and the City of London, dated the 28th January 1609, it was agreed, inter alia, that four thousand acres of land lying on the Derry side, next adjacent to the City of Londonderry, should be laid out and granted to the Society.

That, in pursuance of the said articles, letters patent, dated the 29th day of March, in the eleventh year of the reign of his said Majesty King James the First, were passed at Westminster, in which the hill on which the City of Londonderry is now built, and four thousand acres of land next adjoining to the western part of the city (whereof the said lands called the 1,500 acres were a part), with several other lands, &c., were granted to your Society, who, by virtue of the said grant, became seized in fee of the City and County of Londonderry, and particularly of the 4,000 acres of land adjoining to the City of Derry, and soon after set out and assigned the said 1,500 acres to the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of Londonderry, at a small rent, for support of the magistracy of Londonderry, who accordingly entered, and by themselves and under-tenants quietly enjoyed the same under the title of the Society till the 13th year of the reign of King Charles the First, without any interruption or claim whatsoever of the then Bishop of Derry, or any of his predecessors.

We find that, in or about the year 1625, the Lord Wentworth was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that Dr. Bramhall went over to Ireland as chaplain to his lordship; and that in the year 1630 divers informations were sent from Ireland against the Society, by the instigation of the said Dr. Bramhall, and several crimes and breaches of articles were charged against the Society; whereupon and after several proceedings had been taken in the Star Chamber, a sequestration was issued, and the County and City of Londonderry was seized into the King's hands, and the said Dr. Bramhall, then Bishop of Derry, was was made the chief, if not the only sequestrator for the Crown.

And in the year 1657, in the 13th year of the reign of the said King Charles the First, the City of London being then in some disfavour with his said Majesty, his said Majesty, in the beginning of November, in the said 13th year of his reign, ordered a scire facias to issue against the Society, for a pretended breach of covenants in the letters patent, and rules of plantation; and in Hilary term following, before the Society could be heard to make their defence thereto, judgment was entered against them by default, that the said letters patent should be void and cancelled.

We further find that the said Dr. Bramhall, then Bishop of Derry, by his interest at that time with his said Majesty, and by and with the connivance of the City of Londonderry, prevailed with his said Majesty, by letters patent dated 4th August 1637, in the said 13th year of his reign, to grant to him the said Bishop and his successors several lands and tenements belonging to the Society, whereof the said 1,500 acres were part; which grant was made about six months before judgment was given against the Society on the said scire facias, when the Corporation of Derry was in the actual and peaceable possession thereof, under a title derived to them under the Society, and when the King had no title or estate in the lands granted, so that the said afore mentioned letters patent were ipso facto void.

J. S. Wortley, Esq. M.P.

That in the said grant made by the said letters patent to the said Bishop of Derry, there is a reservation of the yearly rent of 90*l.* 10*s.* payable out of the lands aforementioned to the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of Londonderry, and their successors for ever, which is the first rise or foundation for the said Corporation's claim or pretence to the said annual payment or allowance, and is built as well on a void grant (as before is set forth) as on an unjust and fraudulent design and contrivance in the then Corporation, in conjunction with the said Bishop, to deprive the Society of their just rights; and the same is made manifest by a certain lease which the said Bishop made to, and was accepted, by the Corporation of Derry, dated the 11th June 1638, whereby the said lands, called the 1,500 acres, were intended to be demised to the said Corporation of Derry, for sixty years, to commence from the 14th July 1634, which was four years before the date thereof, at the yearly rent of 50*l.*; at the expiration of which lease, which was in the year 1694, the Corporation of Londonderry discovering to the Society the fraudulent contrivances and practices before mentioned of their predecessors and the said Bishop Bramhall concerning the said lands, the Society asserted their just and lawful right and title to them, which occasioned divers law-suits, and very great contests between the said Dr. William King, the present Archbishop of Dublin, then Bishop of Derry, and the Society, which continued until the Right Rev. Dr. Charles Hickman succeeded him in that see, between whom and the Society a happy agreement was made, confirmed by Act of Parliament in the year 1704, and about which time we find, by a letter from the Corporation dated 28th July, 1704, to the Society, that the said Corporation did humbly sue and request that as the Society had hitherto allowed that Corporation 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum out of the 1,500 acres for the support of the magistracy, walls, gates, and defence of their rights and privileges, they would please that the same might be ascertained to that city, by some clause in the Act of Parliament then intended to be passed for settling the agreement between the Society and the said Dr. Charles Hickman, then Lord Bishop of Derry. To which said letter the Society, by their answer of the 26th September following, inter alia acquaint them that they had no reason to expect that the society should at that time more particularly declare themselves, or comply with their request in their said letter of the 28th July, in relation to the ascertaining or settling the said 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum therein mentioned, independent of the Society; but that whilst they promoted the Society's service and the real welfare of the city of Londonderry, the services during the memorable siege of Londonderry should not be forgotten.

And afterwards the said Society, by their letter of 2d February following, in answer to three letters from the said Corporation of 14th October, 5th December, and 16th January preceding, assured the said Corporation that whilst they continued their endeavours for promoting the Society's service, and the real interest and welfare of the said City of Londonderry, they should not entertain a thought of withdrawing the allowance of 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum, given by the Society for the support of their magistracy. Whereunto the said Corporation, in their reply dated the 23d of March next following, return the Society their most hearty thanks for the assurance they were pleased to give them of the continuation of the 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum for the support of the magistracy, and again assured the Society that no people should more zealously and heartily promote and maintain the real interest and welfare of the said City, nor more cheerfully act in the Society's service, than they should at all times, when there should be occasion or opportunity.

From all which foregoing matters it evidently appears that the said 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum, allowed by the Society to the said Corporation of Londonderry, had its first rise from the fraudulent contrivance and practice between the said Bishop Bramhall and the then Corporation of Londonderry, and by that means came to be inserted in the said Bishop's before-mentioned letters patent of the 13th of King Charles the First, which were void for the reasons hereinbefore mentioned, and also that the said Society, when the said Corporation of Londonderry made their application to them upon passing the said Act of Parliament for settling the differences depending between the said Dr. Charles Hickman, late Lord Bishop of Derry, and the Society, to have the said allowance settled on them by the said Act without dependence on the Society, did not think fit to grant the same, but were only pleased to promise the continuance thereof to them during the pleasure of the Society, and the good behaviour and endeavours of the said Corporation for promoting the Society's service, and the real interest and welfare of the said City of Londonderry. All of which we nevertheless submit to the judgment of this Court.

Those leases were Cloughlast, leased to Thomas Lecky; Springtown, to Alexander Lecky; and a large plot of ground near the Cow Market, leased to the ancestor of Mr. Justice Torrens; all of which were valuable interests. A lease had also been granted in toties quoties to Mr. Alexander Lecky of the tolls of the Ferry, which contained a clause of renewal toties quoties till a bridge was built over the Foyle ; this lease rendered it his interest, and that of his numerous connexions in the Corporation, to prevent that accommodation to the public, lest he should be deprived of this valuable interest ; this lease became void by the Bridge Act, but it was probably more from the desire of another party to get rid of it than any feeling of civic duty in the Corporation of Derry that the building of the bridge was owing.

RESOLUTIONS of the Irish Society on the allowance to the Magistracy of Derry, passed 3d November 1831.

RESOLVED,—That the Irish Society will sustain for one year the expenses (not exceeding 750*l.*) prayed for by the Corporation for the support of the magistracy, on the condition that immediate measures be adopted within the succeeding year for decreasing the tolls of the bridge to the scale of the year 1800, so as to benefit the whole community trading to Derry, as well as the whole province of Ulster ; and that the same he paid half yearly.

Resolved,—Also, that this Society cannot view with indifference the non-residence and inefficiency of some of the members of the Corporation of Londonderry ; and, in offering pecuniary assistance to the Corporation, this Society express their desire that these evils be speedily cured by the removal of all those who from inability or absence, have ceased to be efficient ; that thus the Corporation of Londonderry may be restored to the vigorous state contemplated by the Charter. This Society also conceive the Recordership is an efficient office, and ought to be filled by a resident officer.

NOTE of the Deputation from the Corporation of Derry to the Irish Society. 1831.

The Deputation have the honour to receive a copy of a Resolution passed by a Committee of the Society, and confirmed by the Court on the 3d instant, whereby the Society have granted a sum of 750*l.* for the support of the magistracy of Londonderry for one year, on certain conditions stipulated therein.

The Deputation accept gratefully the aid which the Society has thought proper to afford the Corporation, though limited to the duration of one year, in the full hope that, if the Corporation fulfil the expectations of the Society, it will prove the forerunner and foundation of a more permanent endowment.

To find that the Society has recognised the principle that the magistracy of Londonderry is placed under their care and protection is alone sufficient to impart confidence to the Corporation, and to animate them in the discharge of the duties for which they were created.

The Deputation will feel it their duty, upon their return to Derry, to impress upon the Corporation and on the public at large, the great importance of this Resolution, as proving that the Irish Society will not suffer the Corporation to fall, so long as it can be sustained with benefit to the community.

The Deputation will further impress upon the Corporation the necessity of meeting the wishes of the Society in relieving the public from the pressure of local taxation, and will lend their own best endeavours to devise some plan which, without injuring the rights of creditors, and thereby working great individual mischief, may best effectuate the objects of the Society.

The Deputation respectfully receive the suggestions of the Society towards effecting a reform, in the Corporation ; and feeling that the Society has spoken in the language of patrons and, friends, they will represent to the Corporation the propriety of adopting such reform as shall prove themselves worthy of the Society's continued pr oection.

The Deputation cannot take leave of the Society without expressing their sense of the patient and laborious attention bestowed upon their affairs ; of the diligence and perseverance by which difficulties were met and overcome ; and of the courteous and hospitable reception which has distinguished their visit to the parent city.

To the Honourable the Irish Society.

RESOLUTION passed at a Court of the Irish Society, held 17th September, 1832.

And, inasmuch as we find that the Corporation of Londonderry have not funded the respective sums of 500*l.* for the year 1831, and 500*l.* for the year 1832, towards the building of a bridge pursuant to their engagement heretofore made with the Society, it is resolved that in future no sum whatever be allowed by the Society towards the support of the magistracy ; as we consider the said Corporation to be so involved in embarrassment that they cannot be of any efficient service to the public till they become emancipated from their debts, and reincorporated upon a better system. And we recommend that, in such case, it should be assimilate to the Corporation of the City of London.

J. S. Wortley, Esq. M.P.

—Then came the municipal inquiry, first in England and then in Ireland, in the year 1837; and subsequently came the Municipal Reform Bills of the two kingdoms, both of which interferred with any further proceedings about this matter. It was not till 1847 that the corporation of Derry came again with complaints to the corporation of London. They then presented the petition to the common council, which I now hold in my hand. The statement they made on that occasion in reference to the 1,500 acres is this; namely, after setting out the usurpation of the Bishop of Derry by the assistance of the Star Chamber under Charles the Second, they go on thus: "These lands continued "in the possession of the corporation of Derry until the expiration of the said demise." That is, they took a lease under the Bishop of Derry, notwitstanding his usurpation; he being powerful, they yielded and took a lease under him. Then it appears that when that lease expired the Bishop of Derry refused to renew it; and this is the way in which they stated it: "These lands continued in the possession of the corporation of Derry until the "expiration of the said demise, which was shortly after the period of the siege, when the "corporation applied to the society, then reincorporated, to aid them in resisting the claim of "the bishop to the lands in question; and after a long course of litigation, the matter was "at last set at rest by an Act of Parliament passed in 1704, establishing the rights of the "society as against the bishop, but reserving the rights of the corporation of "Londonderry." That reservation, I should say, is a mere general reservation; and such a reservation is of very little value unless it specifies something which it reserves. What its effect would be here would be a very fair question of discussion. Then the petitions states that, "The Irish society having thus obtained possession, which they could not "have done without the strenuous support of the corporation of Londonderry, refused "to recognize the rights of the city of Derry; and to this injustice the citizens, not having "yet recovered from the losses sustained during the siege, were compelled to submit; "but the Irish society offered to let these lands to the corporation of Derry if that "body would renounce all claims thereto, except that which they would derive from the "lease; and on the refusal of the corporation to accept a lease on those terms, the society "have since paid to them the annual sum of 90*l.* 10*s.* before referred to." So that this is the statement; that in the year 1704 after the passing of that Act of Parliament, which settled everything between the Irish society and the bishop, those lands passed into the possession of the Irish society; and from some reason or other the corporation of Derry were obliged to acquiesce at that time, and they have since received 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum from the society. When this petition was presented to the common council the petitioners thought that body had the power of rendering them redress. Nothing can be more conclusive to show how distinct the Irish society is from the corporation than the course of proceeding which then took place. The petition from the mayor and corporation of Derry was presented on the 25th of February 1847. The usual motion was immediately carried upon its presentation, "Resolved and ordered, that the petition be printed, and a "copy sent to every member of this court, and the consideration thereof adjourned; and "that in the mean time the petition be referred to the City solicitor, to advise with "counsel as to the proper course to be pursued." Then, on the 12th of April, that having been done, it was again taken into consideration by the Court of Common Council; and then there is this entry, "Mr. Solicitor attending in his place did this day deliver "into this court a report in writing under his hand, with the opinion of counsel "in relation to the petition of the mayor and corporation of Londonderry, which "was read." The opinion of course was also read. "Resolved, That a committee "be appointed to investigate the allegations and matters contained in the petition "of the corporation of Londonderry respecting the Irish society, and to report "thereon to this court. Committee appointed accordingly." Then there are the names of the committee, beginning with the Lord Mayor and four aldermen; the committee consisting of the principal gentlemen belonging to the corporation. The usual course was then taken; and, in the course of time, the committee made their report to the common council of what had happened. It is a long report; but the effect of it is this:—that they met and communicated with the Irish society, and informed them of the petition which had been received; that the Irish society thereupon met—that they resolved to attend the committee by a deputation, attended also by counsel, to meet the complaints which were made on the part of the city of Londonderry. The committee met with the expectation that the corporation of Derry would come represented by the Mayor and others to attend that committee. However, when the corporation were ready, or the committee were so prepared to receive them, they received a letter from Derry, of the date of the 6th of May 1847, to this effect. It is from Mr. Prichard, who was then town clerk of the City of Derry:—"At a meeting of the sub-committee the "following letter from Mr. Prichard to the City solicitor, intimating the intention of the "agent of the city of Londonderry not to attend your committee on the subject of their "petition, was read as follows:—"'Irish society, Sir, The city of Derry having "'petitioned the corporation of London, the petition was submitted to Mr. Turner, (that "'is the present Lord Justice Turner,) Mr. Martin, (that is the present Baron Martin,) "'and Mr. Lloyd, (a gentleman of great distinction at the Equity bar,) for advice as to "'the powers of the Court of Common Council. The city of Derry are advised that the "'corporation of London have not power to rectify the subject matters of the petition, "'and that it would, therefore, be unnecessarily wasting the time of the Court of Common " ' Council to attend them. Mr. Crawford, of Derry, was to have been in London on the " ' part of the city of Derry to attend the Court of Common Council; but, acting under " ' such advice, he will not now be in attendance on the first of May; and, I hasten, at " ' his request, to inform you of the same, to prevent inconvenience to the Court of " ' Common Council.'" I bring this before the Commission for these purposes. First, to show that there was every disposition on the part of the corporation of London to entertain these complaints and investigate them, as well as perfect readiness on the part of the Irish society to meet them fairly; and also to show that the corporation of Derry were advised, at that time, by the highest authority, in perfect conformity, I believe, with the opinions which had been given to the corporation of London, that those two bodies are distinct. Though there may exist some visitorial power in the corporation of London, yet, when the members of the Irish society are once appointed, the corporation cannot interfere, and cannot regulate their proceedings or redress any grievance which there may be.

J. S. Wortley, Esq. M.P.

8441. What is the power which is possessed by the corporation?—I am really unable to say. If the Irish society were to be guilty of any direct infraction of their charter, there may rest in the judicial body of the corporation some power to rectify such an abuse; but it has never been put in practice, and I am unable to define what their powers are.

8442. You do not think that it affords any practical means of redress for any misconduct on the part of the Irish society short of some complete breach of trust?—I am of opinion that it does not; and I have brought these proceedings before the Commissioners to prove it. Here, though the corporation were willing, and the Irish society made no objection, the parties themselves were obliged to repudiate the interference of the corporation, because they were advised that it would be futile.

8443. I suppose there would be this power in the Court of Common Council, that if they had the impression that members of the society had misconducted themselves, they could refuse to re-elect them?—The governor is elected annually; they might refuse to re-elect him. With the exception of the recorder, who is permanent, the other members are elected to serve for two years, and are re-eligible only after an interval of a year. There have been various occasions on which propositions have been made in the Court of Common Council for an alteration in this constitution. With respect to the complaint, that the members are compelled to retire as soon as they have made themselves acquainted with the interests and duties of the society, frequent attempts have been made to alter the system, but it has been found to be impossible, owing to the terms of the charter. A gentleman has been, within a few days, elected to the Irish society. One of the members of the common council thought there was an objection to that gentleman being on the society; and gave notice of a motion to rescind that election. In my capacity of recorder, I was obliged to advise the Lord Mayor that this gentleman could not make the motion, because the common council, having already made the election, they could not rescind it, or put any other person in his place; that they were, in point of fact, functi officio.

8444. This state of things can only be altered by an Act of Parliament?—That is the only means of altering it.

8445. I suppose you are yourself unable to take any very active part in the affairs of the Irish society?—I stated on a former occasion, that though I was a permanent member of the Irish society, my other duties were so multifarious, that I had not time to devote to the affairs of the society; and I rather consider myself to be placed there for the purpose of being specially summoned when any difficulties occur. Since I have been on the society, I have been very kindly invited to attend; but I never have been specially summoned; and, I think, with the exception of two occasions, I never have been present.

8446. Would they consult you before any law proceedings were instituted?—I should rather have expected that they would, but I have not been consulted.

8447. Whom do you suppose they do consult?—On the last occasion, with respect to the perpetuity leases, they took a course which was unexceptionable. They took the opinions of the first men in the profession, and they added, " We wish you to advise not only upon " the point of law; but also as to the course which as trustees you think it right for us to " pursue." I have seen the opinions of counsel so taken in which they say that the society would not be justified in not enforcing their rights. To illustrate the position in which the recorder stands with reference to the Irish society, I wish to call your attention to what took place in the society itself, with regard to the proceeding of 1847. A deputation from the corporation of Derry appeared several times, and the result was that there was a negotiation. Though the society could not allow that there was any claim to the 1,500 acres, yet at the same time they felt that there was a claim upon them for assistance. It appeared that the affairs of the corporation of Derry had become very dilapidated, and they were without resources to maintain their courts or improve their town. They were going to Parliament for an Improvement Bill, and required assistance in that way. The result of the interview was that there was a negotiation for some settlement, by which the society should give them some assistance; and they should take that in lieu of their claim. One object was, that there should be a recorder appointed, more particularly with a view to maintain the custom of foreign attachment which prevails in London, and which prevailed also in Derry. The Court of the Assistant Barrister, which I believe is mentioned by one of the gentlemen as being sufficient for all purposes, would have been sufficient for all except the administration of foreign attachment. The inhabitants of Derry were of opinion that it was desirable to maintain that custom which could only be done by maintaining a recorder. The result was that the Irish society agreed to give them 700*l.* a year, towards maintaining their corporation and paying their officers, and 500*l.* a year towards the improvement of the town. The question then was how that was to be done? The corporation of Derry pressed very much that it should be done by some permanent arrangement. A complaint has been made that the grant is made only from year to year, and it suggested that that was done for the mere purpose of keeping the corporation and the inhabitants of Derry in the power of the corporation of London; but I am anxious to show that it was not done with that view, but done under the obligation of the law, from which the society could not escape. Upon that occasion Mr. Recorder Law was then in office; he was called upon to assist the society in those deliberations; but unfortunately in the middle of them he was taken ill; he promised however to send his opinion in writing, which I now have before me. It is dated "Eaton Place, 31st January, 1848." It is addressed to Alderman Wilson, who had been requested to see the recorder and to communicate with him. This is the language in which he speaks; "Looking to the nature of the "public trusts of the society, and their permanent objects and the present state of their "finances, I think it would be highly improper to charge the estates in perpetuity and to "grant to the corporation of Derry, the power to encumber or alienate such rent or other "charge. The 700*l.* proposed to be given year by year to the support of the mayor, "recorder, and other corporation officers of Derry, does not fall within the above "objection. Secondly, I think, after a careful review of the state of the finances of the "society and the debt incurred by legal expenses and from the other causes, it will be "right to determine with caution, what sum the Irish society can at present spare in aid "of the corporation or city of Derry and of the improvements contemplated there; but "the Irish society must not bind themselves beyond the current year, or at most two "years in advance, and must not consign to others the management of their funds, nor "delegate to others the trusts that are confided to themselves." They acted, therefore, upon that opinion of the recorder, which, without having had an opportunity of considering it as he had, I see no reason to think I should have differed from. The terms of the resolution are, "that the court will, in each year, recommend the society to grant the sum of 500*l.* and 700*l.*" and though they were thus advised that they could not bind themselves beyond two years at most, I think it would be a gross breach of faith if the society did not annually propose that sum and do their best to pay it over. If it be thought desirable that the city of Derry should receive these sums from the Irish society, it may be a great question whether Parliament might not regulate it and make it permanent; I only wish to show that it was not with the motive which has been alleged that it was done, but that it was under the obligation of the law that they refused to make it permanent. I may take this opportunity of saying that I certainly feel, as regards my own position in the society, that if I were called on to advise them, it would be much less agreeable to have to consult with a body of so fluctuating a character, than if it were permanent. I cannot help concurring with the gentlemen who have said that a more permanent board would be a much better means of carrying on the affairs of the society.

8448. You are doubtless aware of the decision of Lord Langdale and of the House of Lords in the case of the Skinners' company?—I have the same knowledge of it, that the Commissioners have, from having read the report.

8449. Do you conceive that there is any doubt that those two decisions have estalished the point, that the twelve companies have no beneficial interest in the income of the Irish society?—That is my impression undoubtedly.

S. Wright Knox, Esq.

SAMUEL WRIGHT KNOX, Esq. was further examined as follows.

8450. Is there anything which you wish to add to the evidence which you gave yesterday to the Commission?—A question that was asked me by the chairman yesterday was; "Whether, "if the septennial fee of three guineas charged to the secretary were now remitted, that "would have the effect of diminishing the trust fund." The answer as taken down was, "That "it would;" but that answer was given under the impression that in the septennial accounts which were furnished, the three guineas was included in the rent account. I have had an opportunity last night of examining the account as published by the society, and the amount credited on it is 1,154*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, which is precisely the amount of the septennial fines alone, independently of the septennial fee altogether; so that if that three guineas fee were remitted for the future, it would not diminish the trust fund as it is clear it never was introduced to the credit of their account, but was suppressed, to the extent of 800*l.*, every seven years.

8451. You have heard the statement which has been just made, have you any observation to make upon it?—It is quite true that leases in perpetuity every seventh year are renewed. We then claim, according to the lease, one year's rent of the parties holding perpetuity leases. They pay us two years' rent every seventh year, which amounts to 2,515*l.* and odd. The secretary receives three guineas for his fee at the renewal of those leases, for which he does not account to us at all.

8452. Is that in addition to his salary?—Yes.

8453. Can you state what the average amount of his receipts under this head is, in addition to his salary?—I think there are about 255 leases in perpetuity, and they have to be multiplied by three guineas, which will make about eight hundred and odd pounds every seventh year, being an addition of about 112*l.* per annum to his salary of 500*l.*

JOHN EBENEZER DAVIES, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows. J. E. Davies, Esq.

8454. Have you heard the statement which has been made with respect to these fees?—Yes.

8455. Those fees are received by you?—Yes; they are to be received by the secretary.

8456. What are your emoluments under that head?—Every seventh year the fees amount to 800*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

8457. That must be added to your salary?—It is not part of the salary, it is not included in the 500*l.* a year.

8458. That makes your salary about 600*l.* instead of 500*l.* a year?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P. in the Chair.

23d Feb. 1854.

8459. Have you any observations which you wish to address to this Commission, in addition to the statements which you have already made?—I have.

I think it right to say that I have not been getting up any case for the corporation in my capacity of City solicitor. It was thought more respectful, and more correct to allow the witnesses to come spontaneously; and not to prepare any case in the form in which matters of this kind are sometimes got up. No witness has been previously examined by me; and every gentleman, both member and officer, has presented himself spontaneously, according to the requirements of the Commissioners, freely and independently, to state every circumstance upon which inquiry might be made. The committee are now of opinion that everything that they should desire to offer to the Commission may be considered as satisfied; but, if there is an officer or member of the corporation whom the Commissioners would desire to have examined, he will at once present himself. For myself, the committee have given me authority to appear here, not as a member, and not in the character of an officer, but as a former member of the Court of Common Council, for the purpose of making a statement of facts within my knowledge, or circumstances connected with which I have become acquainted in examining the books of the corporation. Having regard to the economy of time, and of expenditure in printing, I have put into writing certain statements, feeling that I could compress them better into a short space than if I permitted myself to depend entirely upon oral evidence. If the Commissioners desire to examine me upon any part of those statements, of course I am open to vivâ voce examination; or, if now, or at a future time they wish for any documents to sustain any fact which I state, such documents shall be furnished; but, I desire to avoid loading your minutes with unnecessary evidence; therefore, when I state a fact that I have acquired from the books, if the Commissioners, either now, or at any time require the document to sustain it, I have the books here, and will either refer to them now, or supply extracts at any future time.

I am principally about to address myself to the statements contained in the document read by Mr. Recorder; commencing with page 371 of the printed evidence, which I have divided into paragraphs. To some of those paragraphs I shall merely refer; stating that I have nothing to add to the evidence which has been already given. Others of them I shall feel it necessary to comment upon, or to state facts in reference to them.

C. Pearson, Esq.

23d Feb. 1854.

The first paragraph refers to the receipts and revenues of the corporation. I have made it my business to qualify myself to speak in round numbers as to the accuracy of the statement in this respect. The average of the last seven years has been 190,000*l.* a year; of which sum 44,000*l.* has been produced by the City rents; 5,000*l.* a year by the Finsbury rents; and 14,000*l.* a year by the Conduit mead and other outlying property. The fixed charges referred to in that paragraph, I find by the average of the last seven years, taking the same average as the receipts, amount to 138,000*l.* a year. I proceed to the second paragraph. In Mr. Pulling's evidence respecting the Thames, (1947,1948) he conceives that a considerable portion of the revenue of the corporation is derived from the embankment of the Thames in Thames Street, after the fire in London, contrary to the duties of the trust; and he applies his statement to certain very large warehouses that must have attracted the attention of all persons passing that way. Now, I state, upon my oath, that this is entirely a misapprehension. We have no such rents from land that has been so embanked from the Thames. We have two very large properties there. One of them is one of those leviathan warehouses, Crawshay's; and the other is the great mill at Puddle Dock. The mill at Puddle Dock is built upon the site of an ancient laystall. The ground was purchased by the corporation for 2,700*l.* in the early part of 1700. The other property, upon which Crawshay's warehouse is built, was belonging to the corporation, for how many centuries before, I do not know; but we find it in the earliest of our books, which is anterior to the fire of London. It was in the corporation at that time. There are to each of those properties small easements, in the shape, I think, of piles driven for mooring craft. They yield a rent to the corporation also of 5*l.* a year; but, the rent in respect of the easements, is carried, and has been carried for many years to the navigation account; and is expended for the purposes of the improvement of the river; and is not in any way mixed up with the rental of the City's estate. The same witness, in the same sentence, suggests, that a portion of the revenue of the corporation is derived from buildings on Smithfield; and then states, very boldly, that everybody must know that it was a very much larger space formerly; and he refers to a sentence in the Act for the rebuilding of London, which requires certain pent-houses which had been erected there to be pulled down. I have examined some old maps, and I find that it is a complete misapprehension; that Smithfield has not been circumscribed in its area by buildings erected by the corporation or by any other parties, since the fire of London. On the contrary, I find by one map, as late as the year 1560, that the area of Smithfield was even less then than it is now; the corporation having, during the last half century, purchased considerable properties, at the expense of, I think, 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.*, which they have pulled down, to enlarge the area of Smithfield. We have no property there that will in any shape answer the description; and I state, on my oath, from the examination of the maps, that I am quite satisfied there is no foundation whatever for Mr. Pulling's supposition. There is a trifling correction which I wish to make to the City's statement in that paragraph. We say, that the rental fund of the navigation does not exceed 1,100*l.*, that is true; and the amount is about 800*l.* now. In consequence of the litigation with the Crown, some persons refuse to pay; and, being small sums, I have not thought it right to incur the responsibility of bringing a number of actions for small rents of that kind, while the greater question is at issue. The rental, therefore, is wasting away; and if the suit were to last, what might be the end of the rents I do not know; but, certainly, they do not now amount to 900*l.* a year. On paragraph three I have nothing to say. I think that the matter has been sufficiently discussed by other witnesses; and I do not desire to offer any observations upon that paragraph. In regard to paragraph four, which relates to the freedoms, I make the same observation. I think my own evidence and the other evidence that has been given, afford a sufficient confirmation of the statement there contained. It is not my intention, therefore, further to refer to it. I make the same observation upon the fifth paragraph, except so far as it partly relates to the sixth. I should say, of those two paragraphs together, that Mr. Pulling has laboured under a mistake in supposing that we have no legal right to admit to the freedom of the City, excepting through the instrumentality of the livery companies. Under the provisions of one of our charters, the whole commonalty are entitled to admit persons to the freedom, without the introduction of the livery companies. If non-freemen are introduced by the companies, then they may be admitted at the Hustings Court, or by the chamberlain, upon redemption; but if they have not a certificate of character by belonging to a company, then they can only be admitted by the whole commonalty. The common council, now being held to represent the whole commonalty, have claimed and exercised the power of admission. As to the seventh paragraph, which relates to the coal dues, I respectfully should suggest that Mr. Remembrancer's written statement upon that head affords all the information that it is susceptible of; and I have nothing to add to the observations made. I make the same remark on the eighth paragraph, which relates to the metage. I have nothing to add to the statements that were made. The case now is for argument in the House of Lords, and I expect it on in a few days.

8461. What case is that?—Combe's case.

8462. I thought we were told that that was hung up?—There was a general indisposition to move it. I do not know whether what has passed here has led to the officers of the House bringing it out and putting it into the paper; but it is there, and it is now to be discussed as a pure matter of antiquarian learning, for the Orders of the Court of Chancery are so changed, that the result of the determination can have no effect on any future case; and as the corporation will not enforce the claim under such circumstances, it cannot for any possible utility be argued. I now come to the ninth paragraph—the costs of the mayoralty. The representation made by the corporation in their statement is, that the report which was referred to by several of the witnesses, and was by them taken as conclusive of the fact, that the cost of the mayoralty was 25,000*l.* a-year, had been examined by the common council and disallowed. A gentleman who writes in the newspapers says that we state it had been "examined," omitting the word "disallowed," and infers from that that it is a very absurd answer to the charge. I will occupy very little of the time of the Commissioners in disposing of that charge of 25,000*l.* a-year. A witness who appeared before you, who was the author of that report, stated that some members of the court had disputed its accuracy. I have before me the minutes of the court, dated the 23d March 1836, in which every one of the items constituting that sum, is analysed; and I think the amount was abundantly disproved; at any rate, it was disproved to the satisfaction of the Court of Common Council; and they passed resolutions reducing every one of those charges that was properly susceptible of reduction, not only making the reduction, but giving their reasons for it. The first charge is 5,322*l.* in the report, as being a portion of the cost of the mayoralty. That sum is thus dealt with by the court. It proposes "that the sum of 2,125*l.* be "substituted for the sum of 5,322*l.*, the former being the estimated annual value of the "Mansion House, calculated according to its assessment to the ward and parochial taxes, "as settled upon an appeal; which assessment being 1,500*l.* per annum upon a rate "ranging between two-thirds and three-fourths of the actual value, will give 2,215*l.* as "the rack rent." Then it goes on to say that it has reason to doubt whether it ought all to be charged to the mayoralty, because sometimes part of the Mansion House is used for other purposes; but it has put down 2,125*l.* instead of the 5,322*l.*—the latter item having been compounded of a seven per cent. charge upon the cost of the Mansion House and its improvements, from the commencement of its building. Now, if we were to estimate the charge of royalty by the cost of all the palaces, and put seven per cent. on from their first foundation to the present time, as part of the annual charge, we should certainly look very differently at monarchy from what we are in the habit of doing. The next item—and it is only to two items that I will call your attention, although the other items are some of them dealt with in a manner that shows that they are also excessive, is 3,763*l.* a-year, the amount for what are called the offices of the household. Now those gentlemen, though called officers of the household, are annuitants and persons holding places created a century ago, and sold by the Lord Mayors of that day. In the year 1819 (I speak of this from my own personal knowledge), feeling what a discreditable state of things this led to, the common council bought up their places, giving to them fixed annuities for life and certain payments in money, in commutation of the emoluments which they had purchased of the Lord Mayors 100 or 150 years ago. We obtained in respect of that arrangement a considerable revenue; for instance, the collection of the fish market, which now falls into the revenues of the corporation and is accounted for by them. These sums of money thus charged to the debit of the mayoralty, I think the Commissioners will see can have no place there. If they ought to be there, on the credit side of the account should be the interest upon the money paid for these places when they were purchased a century ago; or at least on the other hand ought to be put to the credit of the mayoralty, the revenue that we derive from that arrangement by which we have bought up those places. If that were to be done, instead of its being 3,763*l.* to the debit of the mayoralty, there would be a considerable sum to its credit. The Commissioners will, therefore, perceive that in two sums alone we take off 7,000*l.* from the charge to the mayoralty. I will not persecute the Commissioners by going in detail through the other items; suffice it to say, that I have no hesitation in concurring in the opinion (from my long knowledge and experience of the corporation) that the statement regarding the cost of the mayoralty, as given in by the previous witnesses for the corporation, is a correct one. I moved for a committee myself in the year 1830, to inquire into the subject. The committee had before them the accounts of eight gentlemen who had served the office of Lord Mayor, from them or from their executors, and from these accounts, I have no doubt of the truth and accuracy of the statements that have been made, that the amount of the receipts of the Lord Mayor certainly does not in any year, under any circumstances, exceed 9,000*l.* The tenth paragraph relates to the charges of the committee. I have examined the books myself, and I have no hesitation in saying that the statements contained there are true. The eleventh paragraph relates to the officers. I feel that I should not do justice to myself and to the corporation, if I did not personally vindicate ourselves from the imputation which is cast upon the corporation and some of its officers, by the assertion (as an evidence of the spirit of nepotism in the corporation) that so many of the officers have been common councilmen or were related to or connected with the members of the court, leaving it to be inferred that we were improperly selected or overpaid. It is true that there are several officers who have been common councilmen, though not so many as the witness stated; he was mistaken in the number. Three of the gentlemen that he supposes have been common councilmen, have not; the proportion of common councilmen is very small; I think there is about ten per cent. of the officers who have been common councilmen. As to the relations or connections of common councilmen, it would be difficult to find anybody in the City of London, of any mark or respectability, that was not a relation or connection of a common councilman; their number and their station naturally place them in such a position, that if you seek a competent person, you will find either a cousin or a nephew or some relative or connection of a common councilman; so that it is impossible, I submit, to the Commissioners, dealing with the facts fairly, to draw the conclusion which the witness endeavoured to draw. Now I am surprised, I confess, that that gentleman should have made those statements; and to be perfectly just and impartial, he includes me with them. That gentleman has been long employed by me.

C. Pearson, Esq.

8463. Whom do you mean?—Mr. Acland; I do not disown him; he was called "Pearson's Ferret;" that is the name he goes by in the City, and a very good ferret he is; and I am sure if there had been a mouse eating a piece of unauthorized cheese-paring in any corporation cranny, he would have found it out. But the fact is, that his instincts are so strong that he finds a scent where there has been no vermin for centuries, and he fixes upon circumstances of bygone years, and attempts to fasten them upon the present corporation. Mr. Acland was in my office, and had the run of Guildhall. If there had been anything wrong, Mr. Acland would have found it out, and Mr. Acland would have stated it. He has manifested here no indisposition to tell all he knows. All I can say is, that when I heard of his employment, in a most confidential part of the corporation business, I was pleased. Although he was not recommended by me, as Mr. Remembrancer rather thinks, yet, at the same time, I should not have hesitated to recommend him. I believe that nothing but what was honest was intended to be done by the corporation; and believing Mr. Acland to be an honest man, I should not have hesitated to recommend him.

8464. Are you speaking of the opposition to the Smithfield bill?—I am; a very confidential employment, and also as to the Citizen paper.

8465. Had Mr. Acland anything to do with the Citizen paper?—I mean to say that Mr. Acland had a vast deal to do with it; and by his evidence he has told that he purchased the copyright of it. I think he might have told you that he purchased it for the sum of one shilling. I think he invested to the extent of one shilling of capital in the purchase of that valuable property. I feel it my duty to take my share of the blame, if any blame is due to the conduct of the corporation with regard to the Citizen. I will state the facts within my own knowledge. The corporation thought it necessary to endeavour to find some mode of communicating to the public intelligence connected with its own affairs. I was consulted, with the other officers. It is always better, in speaking of a transaction that has gone by, to refer if you can to a document written at the time, because it brings your mind back to the precise facts. I have looked at my report to the committee upon the subject. In that report I advised them, not upon the propriety or expediency of such a measure; but I advised them, if they thought it right to avail themselves of any organ of communication to the public, to take care to do it openly and avowedly, and to avoid either the literary or the pecuniary responsibilities of a newspaper; and I recommended it to be done in this form; for the corporation to make some arrangement with a man of ability and competency to have a part of the paper allocated to the City business in the Citizen, in which all our reports and business might be marshalled and connected together by a leader, indicating the objects and intentions of those proceedings. My reasons for recommending such a course were these: Every town in the country of any consequence has a provincial press. In London we have no provincial press; we have a national press, but the absorbing interest of national affairs entirely engrosses the attention of the readers. We have, therefore, no provincial press.

8466. No local press?—No local press. Having, during the forty years that I have been connected with the corporation, considered that the powerful and chastening influence of public opinion was of the greatest value in regulating the affairs of the corporation, I have always endeavoured to ventilate its proceedings and expose its affairs to the public gaze; and I thought that this would be a good mode of doing so. I may state to the Commissioners what I think they have heard before, that we pay 900*l.* a year, or thereabouts, for the printing of the Newgate Calendar, containing a report of the proceedings of the sessions. It did not appear to me that, valuable as it was a century ago, when there were no newspapers conveying such intelligence, certainly there could be no reason for now spending 900*l.* a year in publishing the Newgate Calendar; which I believe rarely, if ever, gets its leaves cut open, when the newspapers of the day do publish the proceedings. But I thought that if it were to be retained; if there were a weekly paper dedicating one sheet to that object, it would answer all the purposes of an official register, at the same time that it would open a channel, at a less expense, to the corporation for communicating general intelligence. The Commissioners heard the proceedings that took place in regard to that paper. I was surprised to learn that the entry in which the sum was charged was not so clear in the corporation books as to communicate to the public what was the real nature of the transaction. I fear that my report rather forcibly led to that mode of dealing with it, because the corporation were threatened with bills in Chancery and actions, with regard to the pecuniary responsibilities arising out of the publication of the paper; and I think it not at all improbable that the committee, feeling that I had so strongly recommended them to avoid all pecuniary responsibilities, desired that their connection with it should not be avowed, not if the arrangement had been concluded; but, seeing that it failed, and that the parties connected with it threatened to file a bill in Chancery to obtain some pecuniary remuneration, it was not thought desirable to announce it, as the transaction would probably otherwise have been announced.

C. Pearson, Esq.

8467. Am I to understand the plan of business to have been that the City should look to the paper for a full report of all its proceedings, but that it should have nothing to do with the editorial part of it?—Nothing more than that in the Citizen the corporation of London should have its half allotted to it, or whatever it might be.

8468. Do you mean like the official portion of the Moniteur in France?—Yes. I was anxious that they should keep that marked and broad distinction; that they should not be responsible, beyond the official portion, either for the literary or for the legal liabilities of a newspaper, or for the pecuniary liabilities.

8469. But do you consider that it would have been very easy to have conducted a newspaper in that way; a newspaper depending very much upon the support of the City in some form; and yet that the City should have entirely disconnected itself, and not have been held in any way responsible to the public for the arguments and general language contained in the newspaper?—Perfectly. I believe that it might have been conducted in partibus without the slightest difficulty, or the slightest chance of the corporation being involved, either in its literary or in its pecuniary responsibilities.

I am requested by Alderman Finnis to make one observation, which I think is pertinent here. A witness before you imputed to him that he had shrunk from serving the office of sheriff, and had caused another gentleman to be elected; and that he had obtained a fine of 100*l.*, a share of the 600*l.*, which, it was insinuated, had moved him to take the course which he had adopted, 8470. To what are you referring?—I am referring to Mr. Mills's evidence. I cannot speak to the number of the question, but only to its effect. The imputation there is, that Alderman Finnis shirked the office; and that he obtained 100*l.* of Mr. Mills's money out of his 600*l.*, by getting Mr. Mills preferred before him, and taking part of his fine. The citizens know Alderman Finnis too well to suppose that that could be applicable to him; the Commissioners may not. But I may state to the Commissioners that he did not receive a shilling, and could not have received a shilling; because the title to receive the 100*l.* would have been, if Mr. Mills, instead of being elected, had been satisfied with nomination, and paid 400*l.*; therefore, by getting him elected, as it is suggested, Alderman Finnis, instead of getting the 100*l.*, lost it. It is the very reverse of the supposition. I do not impute to Mr. Mills any improper intention, but it is a hard conclusion for one gentleman to draw of another when the facts do not sustain it. I should make a remark also in regard to Mr. Sheriff Croll. A witness said that he offered ten shillings for a ticket or something of that sort, implying that Mr. Croll had been corruptly engaged in getting himself elected sheriff. Now I can personally contradict that statement, so far as Mr. Croll is concerned. Mr. Croll was at Edinburgh at the time. I, at the instance of the Lord Mayor, in rotation, requested Mr. Croll to stand, he being connected with the City; and he said, if he thought it would be acceptable to the aldermen with whom he should be associated, and if the livery would present him with a requisition, he would stand; but that he was going to Perth, his native city, to receive some honours there, and that he could not be in town; upon which I requested him to be at Edinburgh on the morning of election, and that I would, by telegraph, communicate to him whether the aldermen and a considerable number of the livery would desire it. I telegraphed down to him with the requisition, and a statement of who had signed it. He telegraphed back to say that if, under such circumstances, he was elected, he would serve. So far from his having had anything to do with getting himself elected, he served at the request of the aldermen, and certainly without the slightest disposition on his part to be guilty of any irregular practice for the purpose of obtaining the office. Some of the witnesses have spoken here of supposed corrupt arrangements between sheriffs and under-sheriffs; and the gentleman to whom I have before adverted (of whom I do not wish to speak unkindly, for he has been a very excellent agent to me; I had always a high opinion of him) charges that attornies in the Court of Common Council became sheriff-makers and that some persons have been frequently under-sheriffs. I dare say I am one of those pointed at. I do not know why I should take it to myself, as it is not deserved, but I am capable of stating facts connected with it; and I shall do so, therefore, with the permission of the Commissioners. I was twice under sheriff. I was under-sheriff to Mr. Raphael; I was under-sheriff to Mr. David Salomons. I was one of the parties who took proceedings, in the year 1819, to prevent gentlemen being fastened upon as sheriffs for the purpose of fining them. I think as much as 10,000*l.* had been exacted from gentlemen in one year, two or three years before that time. I was one of the parties who, in the common council, moved that the amount of the fines should be applied to charitable purposes, and should not go into the corpus of the corporation revenue, in order to take away the disposition to fine persons who did not desire to serve. Having done that, I was natually anxious that we should not be without sheriffs, and I frequently have interfered to induce gentlemen to serve the office. When Catholic Emancipation passed, I was anxious that the corporation should carry out in practice the principle of the measure by the admission of a Roman Catholic gentleman qualified for the office; and when

Mr. Raphael applied to me to know how he could use some portion of his fortune in advancing these liberal sentiments, I recommended him to become sheriff; but I, upon my oath, state that neither directly nor indirectly was any stipulation made, nor did any conversation take place between us as to who was to be his under-sheriff. It was not until after he was elected sheriff that he invited me to accept the office. He did so without any previous arrangement; and he in the handsomest manner conferred upon me all the privileges, and advantages, and emoluments of the office, without the slightest bargain of any sort or description. The same feeling induced me to assist the friends of Mr. David Salomons, when they were desirous to promote a gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion, and asked Mr. Salomons to become sheriff. Neither Mr. Salomons nor the gentleman who had requested him to stand, had the slightest conversation with me upon the subject of the under-shrievalty. When he was elected, he did me the honour to confer the office upon me; and not only gave me all the fees and emoluments, but knowing that they were then falling off in amount, he made me a present of 500 guineas besides. I should state, with regard to Mr. Raphael, that I undoubtedly expected to be under-sheriff at the time that I paved the way for his being sheriff; and it was so stated by one of his friends at the common hall openly, avowedly, and publicly before the electors, that in electing him as sheriff, they were in fact paving the way for my accession to office. No conversation between Mr. Raphael and me, directly or indirectly, ever took place, but the livery perfectly understood that that would be the result.

A subject which I think has been interesting to the Commissioners has been the accounts of the corporation. I am not going to embark in that question. It must not be supposed that the accounts of the corporation appear in no other form than is shown in the blue book shown to the Commissioners. When the corporation complete any of their great undertakings, they publish a much larger book, containing the most minute detail of every part of the expenditure; and it is submitted to those who have an interest in the matter, I mean the Treasury or the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, or those parties who have an interest in controlling, or correcting, or revising the expenditure of the corporation in public improvements; and it is brought down so close that it gives, in proportions, the amount of the cost of the property, the amount from the sale of old materials, the amount of the expenses paid to claimants in the shape of law costs, the amount of the expenses paid to surveyors, to attornies, to officers of all kinds of the corporation, and down to the minutest portion of pence. I will send one of those reports to the Commissioners, and I think that, if they will trouble themselves to look over it, they will find it a document most creditable to the corporation in regard to the manner in which they present their accounts upon every undertaking that is committed to their charge.

8471. You do not mean to express an opinion that the accounts of the City may not be kept with greater simplicity and clearness than they now are?—I have no doubt that the accounts of the City may be kept with greater clearness and plainness; and that it has been an endeavour to accommodate new circumstances to old rules of accounting that has prevented them from taking that form which they otherwise might. But I can state, in reference to the account to which I have just alluded, that this is the report of a select committee of the House of Commons: "They are satisfied, from the documents laid "before them, that every judicious alteration and every principle of economy has been "applied by the corporation of London that was consistent with the attainment of the "great public objects with the execution of which they were entrusted. They also think "it incumbent on them to declare, that having had occasion to inspect the various and "complicated accounts which the management of so extensive a concern indispensably "required, and which were produced with a laudable readiness; it appears, after full "investigation, that all the details both of the revenue and of the expenditure are kept "with an accuracy and checked with a vigilance which reflects honour upon all who have "any part in the superintendence of the fund."

8472. What is this fund?—The Improvement Fund that was committed to the corporation. Under all circumstances, whenever they have been entrusted with the execution of any work, and have applied to Parliament for assistance, Parliament has always referred it to a committee, and this is the report of one of the committees upon the investigation of their accounts. These observations apply to extraordinary accounts, not to the usual and general accounts of the corporation revenue.

I now proceed to the fourteenth and last topic. I am afraid that I shall hardly satisfy the expectations of the Commissioners in dealing with the desired brevity with this part of the case; and I must entreat of them to give me a portion of attention, which nothing but what appears to me to be the great importance of this question could possibly permit me to ask of them. I have put into writing portions of my statement, in order that I may not wander from the points; and if the Commissioners will indulge me, this shall be the last topic on which I will offer any remarks. I now ask leave to narrate facts connected with what, in my opinion, is the most important charge made by the accusers of the corporation, as affects its present position and future destiny. This charge will be found summed up with the mildness of language becoming a document from a public body in the 12th marked paragraph in the City's statement:—"Sixthly, It is said that "the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and common council during the present century have been "and are shopkeepers; that they are greatly inferior to the corporators of former times, in "rank, respectability, intelligence, and public spirit; that they are unfit for their positions, "and have been regarded with disrespect by the citizens." To these charges the corporation have contented themselves with modestly replying in page 81: "We deny "that there is any foundation for the assertion so often made, in terms more or less "disrespectful, that the corporation as a body are inferior to the corporators of former "times in the qualities essential to fill with honour and usefulness the position they "occupy." While the "City's statement" was in course of preparation, I desired to have the charges here referred to copied from the printed evidence ipsissimis verbis, in order that they might be severally and word for word grappled with and refuted. I was overruled by what, I suppose, was the better taste and kinder feelings of those who were responsible for the document, and the substance instead of the words was given. This delicacy of feeling has met with but a sorry return. Two of the witnesses whose evidence was thus referred to, have, I am informed, complained that their statements have been unfairly represented in this document. To avoid the imputation of garbling the evidence which I intend to adduce facts to refute, I respectfully request leave to read the quotations to which this part of the "City's statement" refers; pledging myself to lay before the Commissioners a series of facts, which will prove in the most unequivocal manner that every one of these important charges is entirely destitute of foundation. It may, perhaps, be suggested that such charges are rather matters of opinion than matters of fact; but when opinions are assumed to be deduced from facts, and are presented on oath to a tribunal like this Commission, for the purpose of producing important results, they may obtain with the multitude the character of facts, and they must be dealt with accordingly. So far as opinions are concerned, the difference between those which I shall express and those which they are intended to answer is this; mine are derived from and based upon facts which I will prove; whereas, for the opinions of which I complain, no facts have been offered; or where they have been they tend to disprove the opinions they are adduced to sustain. It should be recollected that these offensive statements have already been sent throughout the world through the medium of the public press. I have them before me printed in the usual form of an appendix to an official report; and they will, I presume, be laid before her Majesty's ministers and both Houses of Parliament as materials for future legislation. Whatever may be the recommendation of the Commissioners and the decision of Parliament on the matters on which the Crown seeks information; in my judgment, no corporation, however pure it may be, can usefully continue to exist as an instrument of local government, if it permits such charges as these to remain as uncontradicted evidence in a Parliamentary document under the seal of a Royal Commission, executed by men whom (as I hate even the appearance of flattery) I will not attempt to characterise. The Honourable Commissioners will, from these preliminary observations, appreciate the deep importance which I attach to the issue which has been raised by these statements, and it is manifest that the witnesses and the Commissioners must have thought such statements important and relevant to the present inquiry or they would not have been made. The first witness, who is an election agent, acting professionally in the matter, at the bidding of a body of unnamed individuals, ought not, perhaps, to be too nicely scrutinized. But the fourth and eighteenth and the twentieth witnesses are directors of the Bank of England, and the second and tenth witnesses are wholesale dealers. It is from their evidence I am about to read quotations, and I am convinced from their character and station they must have considered their statements and their opinions immediately relevant to the inquiry; they could otherwise be only looked upon as casting wanton and gratuitous insults upon men in authority, who, in every valuable quality are not inferior to themselves. I know the evil of overloading with documents a printed report; but I am sure you cannot but feel the consequence of which it is to a body of men who, in some form or other, are to hold authority, or at least to hold up their heads in society, to vindicate themselves; and it is impossible for them to do so unless these facts are dealt with. I will take the liberty now of reading the statements as they occur. I think you will see that if they are to go before Parliament, they should go with a thorough and entire answer.

The Commissioners intimated, that as the evidence was fresh in their memory it was unnecessary to read the quotations, but that references to them might be given.

Mr. City Solicitor.—I refer to the evidence of Mr. Acland, page 18, Nos. 146 and 147; page 22, No. 168; page 23, Nos. 187, 191, and 192. Mr. Travers's evidence, page 25, Nos. 211, 212, 216, and 217; page 26, Nos. 220, 221, 222, and 226; page 27, No. 232. Mr. Acland's evidence, page 39, No. 388; page 49, No. 480. Mr. Powles's evidence—page 111, Nos. 1037 and 1039; page 114, No. 1072. Mr. Bennoch's evidence, page 127, No. 1181. Mr. Hankey's evidence, page 168, Nos. 1692 and 1695. Mr. Cotton's evidence, page 197, No. 1797.

The following is, in a condensed form, the substance of the statements I have referred to. The witnesses say our corporate system is obsolete, old, worn out; that it is "a "humbug," and ought to be "swept away;" that "corporations are a nuisance, and ought "to be abolished, beginning with the corporation of London, and vesting its functions in "the Home Office." It is said, in effect, that the aldermen and common councilmen are "of the shop-keeping class, conducting their transactions in small coins, which gives them "a contracted view of subjects;" that they are persons of a selfish disposition, who take office for selfish and interested objects; that they are of a very inferior class to what they were anciently, and to even what they were fifty years ago; that "they have never led, "and have been with difficulty dragged at the tail of, popular opinion;" that merchants of a high class and men of high character would not take office with them; that they are depicted "in farces with a big belly, and caring for nothing but eating and drinking;" and that since the end of the last century there has been "a slur upon them;" they have been "spurned as something loathsome." The facts I shall adduce will shew that these charges are not only not true, but that the very reverse of every one of them is capable of proof. I have the original books from the corporation archives in court; and I am prepared, if the Commissioners desire it, to turn from time to time to the entries, and vouch the time, the person, and the place, to which every statement I may make is capable of being referred for proof. The witness No. 6, Mr. Pulling, occupied above half an hour, and consumed ten pages of paper and print in describing the commercial and constitutional history of the City of London from Tacitus to Stowe, from the Romans to the Stuarts. I will limit myself to six pages and twenty minutes in laying before the Commissioners a series of facts calculated, in my judgment, to prove that there is no period in which the aldermen and common councilmen of London have been, in the aggregate, more wealthy, more respectable, or more intelligent than the men of the present day, or when the corporation has manifested more zeal, fidelity, and ability in the discharge of its various important functions. The facts to which I intend to depose to prove my statement, have reference to the early part of the seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries. I will adduce a series of facts, to shew what was the position of the corporators and the corporation at those dates, and what is their position at the present time.

I first take the year 1663, not because it is affected by any peculiarity of circumstances, but because the City's account of receipt and expenditure commences with this year: the series of accounts which recorded the expenditure of former years, was afterwards destroyed in the great fire. In the reign of Charles I., before the breaking out of the civil war, ours was practically a close corporation. The Lord Mayor and aldermen had in their hands the uncontrolled government of the City. The Civic Court was composed of the mercantile aristocracy of the City, mixed up with persons in needy circumstances. As a Court of "Wards and Managers," they had vast funds at their command, out of which they were in the habit of making considerable loans to each other and to their friends, on their own security. They sold or otherwise disposed of, for their own use and benefit, places and appointments of great value, remunerated by fees. Of the metage dues (amounting to many thousands a year), which we have proof were received by the officers, who purchased their offices of the Mayor and aldermen, no part appears in the book of accounts. I have examined the book. I have it here ready to be produced if required. I further state that from the intercepting of this and other important portions of the corporation revenues its finances were in a desperate plight. Notwithstanding that some of the most eminent merchants and goldsmiths or bankers of that day were members of the governing body, they were driven to gratify their courtly extravagance as corporators on the most humiliating terms. Although, at one of the pageants on Lord Mayor's day, the conduits in the streets spurted out wine, and the Court of Aldermen complimented Prince Charles with a present of 500*l.*, gave the Queen a gold basin and ewer worth 750*l.*, and presented the King with a diamond that cost 4,000*l.*; the corporation were obliged to pay for it, 1,000*l.* down, and the remainder by instalments of 1,000*l.* a year. In those days the City Court, like the Court of Whitehall, was of the most motley order. Merchants of the highest grade held office in the corporation, and employed both the influence and the cash of the City to obtain rank and titles for themselves. They had, however, for their associates, placemen, pensioners, and dependents of all sorts, as members of the court They rarely allowed the common council to meet. In the year 1633, not a single Court of Common Council was held; and in the preceding and succeeding years only one, and they were indispensable to levy subsidies on the livery companies. At this time both the wealthy and the needy were borrowers of public money. As appears by their accounts at this time, fifteen living aldermen, and the executors of four who had died, owed the City upwards of 30,000*l.* lent to themselves or their friends, upon their security; and upwards of 10,000*l.* were then due to the trust fund, for arrears of interest, ranging from six months to nine years. I repeat what I have before said, I have no pleasure in speaking either of the living or the dead, to their disadvantage. I therefore mention no names, but I swear to the fact, and am ready to produce the proofs if required. It is to the bad name and the bad conduct of the aldermen in those days, and to the satire of the wits of that time, that their successors of the present day are indebted for much of the censure and sarcasm they now have to bear.

I pass from the beginning of the seventeenth to the early part of the eighteenth century. During the interval, the state of the corporation had been to some extent improved. The middle classes of the citizens, during the period of the Commonwealth, had acquired some power; and at the Restoration they struggled to retain it. Constant feuds arose between the commercial aristocracy and the citizens at large. At length, in 1723, the common council sought to pass an Act of their own body, to regulate all corporate elections; but it was resolutely opposed, and fifteen of the aldermen, by collusion with the government, obtained in 1724, the Election Act (11 Geo. I.); which, under the pretext of "settling controversies and dissensions" amongst the citizens, took away their ancient power to amend the customs, and fastened upon them and their posterity the restrictive policy and complicated machinery of that detested measure. That there were "dissensions and controversies," amongst the citizens, as recited in the Act, there is no doubt; for the Lord Mayor and aldermen had sold all their valuable appointments, as their predecessors in the previous century had done; the only difference being that the common council had, in the interval, acquired the possession of one-third of the alienation price of office, and one-eighth part of the metage fees on coal and corn. The following is a list of the offices at that time sold by the Lord Mayor and aldermen and sheriffs, or by their authority and for their benefit: "The two secondaries of the Compter's judicial "offices, the comptroller of the chamber, the remembrancer, the city solicitor, the sword-"bearer the common hunt, the water-bailliff, the upper marshal, the under marshal, the, "keeper of the Guildhall, two yeomen of the wood wharfs, two meal weighers, "two clerks of the papers at the Compter's, eight clerk sitters at the Compter's, two "prothonotaries of the Sheriff's Court, eight attornies of the same court, the auditor of "the City and Bridge House accounts, the clerk of the City's works, the clerk comp-"troller of the Bridge House, the clerk of the Court of Requests, two beadles of the "same court, four onion and fruit meters, four salt meters, the clerk of the chamber, "the keeper of the green yard, the measurer of woollen cloth, the Bridge House "porter, the keeper of Bethlehem burying-ground, and two keepers of Moorfields."

8474. They did not go into the corporation account?—One-third went then to the city; in the previous century the Lord Mayor and aldermen took the whole.

8475. Do you mean that they took them for their private use?—Yes. It is hardly credible, of such great men as we hear so much about; but it is the fact, and there are very distinguished names among them. Apart from the discreditable practice of selling judicial and administrative offices, it was a most imprudent and improvident course. Some of the appointments were sold for life or for years; with a power to renew the lease, or to put in a new life, upon paying a fine to the mayor or sheriffs for the time being. As these civic dignitaries held office only for a year, they were at the mercy of the appointees; and on the eve of the principals vacating their office they were glad to get any sum, however small, rather than leave the appointments to their successor. Some years were, from sudden deaths or other circumstances, of course, more productive than others. 1726 was a lucky year. The Lord Mayor received altogether 6,800*l.* for his share of these windfalls alone. Among other sums, he had 2,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for the sword-bearer's place; 800*l.* for an attorney's seat at the Sheriff's Court; and 1,780*l.* for one of the solicitorships in the Mayor's Court. This was one of the places sold with the right of alienation in perpetuity; and the corporation, during the past year, in order to enable them to reform and throw open the Mayor's Court, have been obliged to buy it up for several thousand pounds. I think 4,000*l.* is the sum which was given for it. At that time, as in the former century, though perhaps not quite to the same extent, the corporation was composed of the most diverse elements. The corporators had not, it is true, like their predecessors, the command of thousands of pounds of trust funds, to allure either the greedy or the needy; but they had in both courts specimens of both varieties. Placemen, and pensioners, and tradesmen to the corporation had seats in both, according to the morality of the day; they voted themselves contracts, and paid their own bills. One of the aldermen held the humble appointment of City printer, with a salary of 4*l.* a year; and the titled lady of a very eminent merchant, who had been Lord Mayor, enjoyed a lease of the laystalls or dung heaps in the City. The corporation, in the year 1727, owed the executor of their deceased chamberlain 7,000*l.*; but, in imitation of their predecessors, they expended 4,900*l.* in a banquet to the royal family, in the next year; in addition to the ordinary charges of the Lord Mayor's day. This period was undoubtedly one of the most disastrous and discreditable in the history of the corporation. When the Election Act, brought in by the fifteen aldermen, was pending in Parliament, it was opposed by the great majority of the citizens, headed by the common council, who expended 1,800*l.* in the opposition. Sir Robert Walpole's government supported the aldermen; and to prevent the citizens from meeting to petition against the bill, Guildhall-yard was filled with troops. Immediately after the passing of this Act the governing body exceeded, if possible, their predecessors in the arbitrary and improvident exercise of their newly-acquired powers. They took heavy fines for granting long leases at low rents (the enormous sum of 5,000*l.* for one lease); and having, by the Election Act, rendered it indispensable that all voters for corporate office should be freemen, they increased the redemption fine to 25*l.*, to meet, as the order of court expresses it, the debts of the City. They proceeded at the same time to levy fines, in some years to the amount of thousands of pounds, upon Dissenters, whom they nominated for sheriffs, knowing they could not conscientiously qualify for office by taking the sacramental test. They thus rendered themselves odious in the sight of the citizens. I have a list of the aldermen who at that time were directors of the Bank of England. Eleven of them were of that class. I should state that I have been at the Bank of England to check my list with their's. They did not know, till I informed them, which of the directors had been aldermen. They have record of only two aldermen that were ever Bank directors. One was Sir Brooke Watson, and the other Alderman Thompson; but I produced my list and corrected their's by it.

C. Pearson, Esq.

8476. Were there eleven at one time?—At one time; at the time of this Election Act, when these transactions took place. Eleven of them were of that class; notwithstanding which the corporation was out of credit, and descended to the degrading expedients I have named, to get the possession of ready money; a strong contrast with the conduct of the same bodies during the last twenty-five years. During that time when, as Mr. Cotton, a Bank director says, there has been "a slur upon the corporation," and while the conduct of its affairs has been in the middle classes, the corporation has, at various times, for public improvements, borrowed of the Bank, at the lowest rate of interest, a million-and-a-half of money; every payment, both of principal and interest, having been made with perfect punctuality.

It is said, that when matters are at the worst they mend; so it was in this case. In 1724, Mr. John Barnard became the champion of the citizens in opposing the Election Bill. Shortly afterwards he was elected a member of Parliament for the City, and an alderman. He was not a Bank director, or one of the so-called great merchants of the day; but of the middle ranks of the commercial community, a man of independent mind and means. Our present noble Home Secretary is descended from this great corporation reformer. It was he who brought in the celebrated Act of common council, which took from the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs the sale of places, and obtained for the corporation the revenues arising from the metage of coal and corn. During his corporate life, upwards of thirty years, he laid the foundation of many other reforms. Pope, in doing homage to virtue, couples Sir John Barnard with the "Man of Ross." He received a public funeral, and a statue to his memory was erected in the Royal Exchange. Since his day the ranks of corporate reformers have never wanted leaders from amongst the middle classes of the citizens. I can prove this from my own knowledge and recollection, for well nigh fifty years; and numerous pamphlets, newspapers, and addresses I have read supply the evidence for the intervening period. Alderman Waithman, Alderman Wood, Alderman Thorp, Alderman Goodbehere, Alderman Oliver, Alderman Combe, Samuel Thorp, Samuel Favell, John Cowley, Thomas Dornford, Joseph Harcombe, Alexander Galloway, Richard Taylor, and many other common councilmen (omitting living corporators), all of them manufacturers, or wholesale and retail dealers in the City (not great merchants, as in former times), have proved that their order furnishes materials out of which a good municipal body can be formed; and it is to them, and men like them, independent men of the middle class, that the world is indebted for most of the great reforms which have taken place in this country, during the last century; not in the corporation alone, but in the other institutions of the nation.

The witnesses No. 20 and No. 10, appear to me wholly mistaken in supposing that in the latter part of the last, or the commencement of the present century, any marked change took place in the character or circumstances of the aldermen, to distinguish them from the members of the court in previous years. The court was then, as it had long been, composed of the most discordant elements, as regarded both their political opinions and their commercial positions. There were in the court at that time, merchants and bankers, holding the highest rank in the commercial community; and at the same time there were gentlemen, who though they had fallen from their high estate, both in commercial and personal consideration, yet still clung to their gown, possessing or hoping for some of the emolumentary appointments, which the corporation then had in their gift. I desire to handle this subject as delicately as may be consistent with the positive refutation of a specious fallacy; I refer to this period, not because it was invested with any peculiar characteristics, but because it had been selected by these witnesses, to illustrate the statement that from that date the corporation lost caste in the mercantile world, and has been since looked upon, as one witness says, as "something loathsome." I refrain from mentioning corporators by name, connected with this period of our municipal history, as I have done with those who lived in the early portions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; but I have no hesitation in saying, that evils similar in principle, though less in degree, attached to the last, as they did to the former periods to which I have referred; the extremes of wealth and poverty were associated on the same bench, the only difference being that, at the latter date a portion of the middle order of citizens had been forced into the Court of Aldermen; and the Court of Common Council had acquired a degree of weight and influence which it had never before possessed. I wish to avoid mentioning names, but I am prepared if required to do so. I however state that, at this latter period, when, I repeat the very greatest merchants and bankers were aldermen, the court was half filled with persons of fallen fortunes or with placemen under the government or the corporation; the commissary general was an alderman; two government contractors were aldermen; the collector of the orphan dues was an alderman; the collector of the wine duties was an alderman, both of them appointed by their own court, executing their offices by deputy, and having large balances in their hands; the chamberlain and the high bailiff continued to hold their gowns along with their lucrative offices; and the office of salaried justice of Southwark was likewise then, or shortly afterwards, filled by an alderman. I have looked at the list of the men on the bench, in the interval between 1795; and 1805, and I am prepared to state that, although I repeat many of them were merchants and bankers of the highest credit and character, there were mixed up with them, one gentleman whose debts had been compromised by public subscription at 5*s.* in the pound; another was for years in the Rules of the Fleet and as to four of the others, whatever may have been their position at the time, they or their families became dependents on the corporation for bread. "The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong; but time and chance "happen unto all." I mention no names; I desire to cast no censure; I merely narrate facts which it is essential should be known to dispel a fallacy which has been put before the Commission.

I come now to a period when I can speak of facts within my own knowledge; I am a genuine cockney; and as soon as I was of age, I began to interfere with corporate affairs. Another reason for referring to this period, is, that there is no living corporator who was in the court before 1816; no man responsible for any transactions before that time; they answer for themselves since that date, and can do so proudly. I will mention what was the state of the corporation in 1817, when I joined it in that year. On the day I entered the common council there were two reports before it for consideration; the one was a report from a committee bringing up the bills for an entertainment given by the corporation of London to the foreign Emperors and to the Duke of Wellington. The amount of the bills together for the two entertainments was 25,000*l.*, and this book contains the details of it. It was the termination of the war, and if the corporation had had 25,000*l.* to spare, I should have very much commended them for giving such an entertainment; but at the same court came under consideration, a communication from the chamberlain to this effect: "The committee are doubtless well aware of the inadequacy of the present "income of the corporation to meet its general expenditure, which has produced alone, "within the last four years, a debt of 33,000*l.* and 25,000*l.*, three per cent. stock, "independently of upwards of 10,000*l.* now in advance and due to me, which has been "principally occasioned by the increased expenses of the gaol in the last two years;" that is to say, the 10,000*l.* had been principally occasioned by the increased expenses of the gaol. I declare, under the solemn obligation which I have taken in coming here, that the Lord Mayor then communicated to the court, that the baker had refused to trust the corporation with bread for the prisoners in Newgate, unless he, the Lord Mayor, would give his personal security; the chamberlain had refused to give any undertaking, and the Lord Mayor called upon the court to provide the means. The report brought up on that day contained a statement that they were indebted to their officers in large sums of money. In fact they had been for many years in the hands of their officers. They owed to their officers 25,000*l.*, and they had borrowed of a trust estate of which they had the management, the Bridge House Estate, 75,000*l.* The report states, "We beg leave "respectfully to submit to the consideration of this honourable court, whether the excess "of the said charges should be defrayed by a rate to be in future raised upon the "inhabitants of this City, in the nature of a county rate, or by what other means the "same should be provided for." I was sent into the common council a reformer to oppose the rate; I moved to send the report back to the committee for reconsideration. Eight new men were put upon the committee, myself and seven others, and we vowed that we would neither eat nor drink at the public expense till we had rectified this, and got the corporation out of debt. We kept our pledge—we laid the foundation of certain important reforms, and dragged them out of debt, and then had the gratification of dining, like honest men, upon money fairly applicable to such a purpose. Now at that time we had not got rid of all the incumbrances upon the corporation. Then there were very great merchants and bankers, and there were paupers and placemen in the court. From that time the corporation has been pursuing what it had before begun, a system of reform, which has led very rich men to leave the corporation; the very poor men it has excluded; and it has supplied the corporation with the middle class to which, in my judgment, you can alone look for a good municipal body.

8477. Why do you apprehend that these reforms have had the effect of inducing the higher class of merchants connected with the City of London to keep aloof from the corporation, into which they would have before entered?—I will think before I answer your question, because I wish to offend nobody. I am not a leveller. I believe that when there is not, as was formerly the case, great patronage and great power in the corporation, the power of lending large sums of money, and when it is not an avenue to court favour, great merchants find that they can acquire distinction by more easy means, and they will not pursue that course. One of the reforms which we determined upon was, to test every man before he was elected an alderman, by calling upon him to pledge himself, as a man of honour, that if he became unfortunate in business he would resign his gown. I was one of a deputation to a very eminent banker, and we solicited him to stand for an alderman's gown. He was yielding, as it appeared to me, to our solicitation. Just as we were leaving, I said, "Oh, by the way, we shall have to apply a test to you; of "course nothing offensive to you;" rather apologizing for asking him to pledge himself to such an improbable state of circumstances. I do not know whether it had any effect upon his mind when I told him of it, but, cum hoc, I can say he declined, and two years afterwards he failed. Great men did not like to be called upon to make such pledges. Some men did give them who honourably redeemed them. I can name men who took those pledges that were as little likely then to fail as any of the great merchants of former times; but they became unfortunate; and when called upon personally by their pledges to retire, they redeemed them; they did not lurch for the chamberlainship, or for any places that were in the gift of the court, which in the present day no member of the court can hold. Formerly they were retiring places for gentlemen who were unfortunate.

C. Pearson, Esq.

8478. Surely there are a great number of the higher merchants of the City of London with whom the fear of insolvency would not operate as a reason for declining the civic office; but who would be operated upon by the same motives for taking their share in the corporate business of the City of London, which induce merchants of the same standing in Liverpool and Manchester to do so. How do you account for that peculiarity which has undoubtedly existed of late years in the City of London; namely, a keeping aloof from civic business, generally speaking, by the great merchants?—I have disposed of that part of my case.

With your leave I will now proceed to examine the first witness's description of the London aldermen and common council, and will read the question No. 146 and his answer:—"Do you mean that the corporation is too much separated in point of feeling and "interest from the leading merchants of the City of London?"—"My impression is this: "The corporation of London, common councilmen, and aldermen are of the shop-keeping "class; and entertaining the conviction, as I do, that counter transactions in small coins "have no tendency to give a man enlarged views, or habits of viewing, in a large sense, "any interests which he may be delegated to promote; such men, I believe, have not the "power of promoting them, and they are therefore not qualified for the offices they "fill." The following is this gentleman's description of the aldermen:—"There are "twenty-six aldermen; the trades and professions of the twenty-six aldermen "are mentioned in the paper I have before me; there are two auctioneers, two "wharfingers, two stock-brokers, two builders, one ironmaster, one retired saddler, a "china manufacturer, a bookseller, a silk manufacturer, a dry salter, a stationer, a retired "lottery office keeper, a corn factor, a wine merchant, a coal factor, an upholsterer, a tea "dealer, a print seller, a grocer, a solicitor, a clockmaker, and a salesman, and banker. "You have twenty-six aldermen of those trades." By examining this statement in detail we shall find how much is fact and how much fallacy; we shall see what amount of mere literal truth and what amount of apparent misrepresentation it contains. He says there are two auctioneers; this statement refers to Mr. Alderman Farebrother, who is, and Sir John Musgrove, Bart., who was of that profession. Alderman Farebrother may, perhaps, be said to stand at the head of his profession; he is also proprietor of a large manufacturing establishment in London, and is engaged in considerable mercantile transactions in the City. Alderman Musgrove, when he became Lord Mayor, retired from the profession which he had long conducted on an extensive scale in Broad Street ward, where he successively served as common councilman, alderman, and Lord Mayor. He is a director of the Union Joint Stock Bank. In his retirement he is an acting magistrate in Middlesex and Kent, in both of which counties he possesses considerable property. Alderman Farncomb is one of the wharfingers referred to. He has occupied a wharf and warehouses in Southwark for several years. He is a director of the London and Westminster Joint Stock Bank, and also a magistrate of Surrey. Alderman Humphery likewise carries on business as a wharfinger and a merchant in Southwark. He is the owner of extensive docks, wharfs, and bonded warehouses within the borough, where he has carried on business nearly half a century. He also represented the borough in Parliament for twenty years. Mr. Humphery is likewise a magistrate for the county of Surrey. Alderman Sir Robert Walter Carden is, as stated, a stock-broker; but having a partner in business, he is enabled to devote an unusually large portion of his time to the public service as an alderman. Sir Robert is also a magistrate for the county of Middlesex. It is presumed that the other stock-broker referred to is Mr. Salomons, although he is now entirely out of business, and never was a stock-broker in the ordinary acceptation of the term. It has been his lot to be elected an alderman of London for three several wards. Determined practically to aid the developement of the liberal opinions which characterize the age, he sought and obtained at the hands of his fellow citizens, twenty years ago, the office of sheriff of London and Middlesex, and the office of alderman for two of the wards of the City as they became vacant, at a time when gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion were supposed to be ineligible. Mr. Salomons, who is himself a member of the English bar, contended for his legal admissibility to office. But although the point of law was determined against him, the legislature has so far given its sanction to the influence of popular opinion in liberalizing municipal institutions, as to legalize the admission of Jews to all corporate appointments. The firm of which Mr. Salomons was the head was of high standing as capitalists in the City, in which himself, his father, and grandfather were born. Although he has quitted business, he is a very active director of the London and Westminster Joint Stock Bank, and is chairman of the associated committee of those great establishments. Mr. Salomons has served as Sheriff of Kent, and was returned to the Parliament of 1847, as representative for Greenwich, although, from the existing state of the law, he was not permitted to take his seat in that assembly. Mr. Salomons is an acting magistrate for the counties of Middlesex, Sussex, and Kent, in which he possesses considerable freehold estates. Alderman Cubitt and Alderman Lawrence, are the builders referred to; the former has long been known to the public as one of a class of builders and contractors whose extensive works are characteristics of the age. He relinquished the active duties of business when he became an alderman; he is likewise a member of Parliament, and a magistrate for Surrey and Middlesex. Alderman Lawrence was for many years a common councilman for the ward he now represents in the Court of Aldermen. He carries on a very large business as a builder and contractor, in partnership with his sons, who conduct the affairs of the business, leaving the alderman to the uninterrupted discharge of his corporate duties. He is also a magistrate for Middlesex, in which county he resides, and possesses a large freehold property. Alderman Thompson, the iron-master referred to, has been governor; and is, and has been for many years a director of the Bank of England; he is likewise a merchant and a shipowner, as well as an iron-master of high standing. He is also chairman of St. Katherine's Docks, and chairman of the Association of Merchants trading to the Continent, and was formerly chairman of Lloyds. For above thirty years this gentleman has been a member of Parliament, formerly for the City of London. He is, and has been for ten years, one of the representatives of the county of Westmoreland; for which county, as well as for Middlesex, he is a magistrate. Sir Peter Laurie is the retired sadler spoken of; after having acquired a fortune by trade, this gentleman retired from business, upon his being successively elected sheriff and alderman of London, nearly thirty years ago. Sir Peter is likewise an active Middlesex magistrate; and it is a coincidence which provokes observation, in times when it is pretended that the pursuits of trade are disqualifications for the magistracy, that one of the most able and most useful of the police magistrates of the metropolis, Sir Richard Burnie, many years the chief at Bow Street, was in early life engaged in the same pursuits with Sir Peter Laurie. Sir Peter is also the active chairman of one of the most extensive and successful monetary establishments of the City, the Union Joint Stock Bank. Alderman Copeland, truly designated a china manufacturer, is the head of the eminent firm so long known as Spode and Copeland. Besides his extensive manufacturing and wholesale house, the alderman is a large coal-owner in Staffordshire, and has long been engaged in mercantile concerns in the City. He was a member of Parliament for nearly twenty years; for fifteen of which he represented Stoke-upon-Trent. the seat of his extensive manufacturing operations, where he employs about 1,000 hands. Alderman Copeland is in the commission of the peace for three counties. Alderman Kelly conducts, and has for very many years conducted with honour and success, a large business as a bookseller and publisher in Paternoster Row; he graduated to his present office, by serving his fellow citizens many years as a common councilman and deputy of the ward he now represents. Alderman Wilson is supposed to be the person referred to as a silk manufacturer. He was, in early life, the successor to a very large wholesale establishment in the City, being carried on by his family in the silk trade. Having an ample fortune, he relinquished business upwards of thirty years ago, since which he has dedicated himself to the public service. Besides being an alderman of London, he is an acting magistrate for four counties, with which he is connected by property or residence. Alderman Finnis may possibly be the person referred to as a dry salter, having been a common councilman and deputy of the ward of Tower, for many years. In 1848, he took upon himself the office of alderman, at the invitation of the leading merchants and other inhabitants of the ward. Mr. Finnis is the head of a large shipping house and a partner in a considerable mercantile firm. Sir William Magnay, Bart., though not now a stationer, carried on for many years a large wholesale and export trade in that department in the City. He has now retired from business, but he is a director of one of the old insurance companies of the City. Sir George Carroll, many years since retired from business, after the discontinuance of the state lotteries; he is a director of the London Joint Stock Bank, the Alliance Insurance, and other important public companies; he is also an acting magistrate for Middlesex and the county of Essex, in which he principally resides. Alderman Muggeridge; this gentleman was a common councilman and was unanimously elected alderman of his ward. Although a young man, and the founder of his own fortunes, he has become one of the most considerable corn merchants and factors in the Port of London, and has extensive mercantile transactions both at home and abroad. Alderman Hooper, having served his fellow citizens for several years in the common council, was elected an alderman of the ward in which he and his family carried on a wholesale business as wine merchants for many years. He was Lord Mayor in 1848, and gained golden opinions from the Government and his fellow citizens, in making arrangements to preserve order at that memorable period. Sir James Duke, Bart., has retired from the business of a coal factor, which he successfully conducted for many years. Sir James has been in Parliament for upwards of fifteen years, and now represents the City of London; he is one of the directors of the London Joint Stock Bank, and an acting magistrate for Middlesex and Sussex. Alderman Hunter, described by the witness as an upholsterer, rose to his position of alderman through the ranks of the common council. He carried on a wholesale business in the City for several years; and having acquired considerable wealth, retired in favour of his sons, and now devotes the whole of his time to his public duties. The present Lord Mayor is described by the witness as a tea dealer. He is the type of a class unknown in the times when, although the principal merchants of this City were aldermen of London, the amount of their annual transactions were insignificant as compared with the great wholesale and retail houses in the present day. Alderman Sidney is at the head of a large retail establishment in Ludgate Hill. His firm have likewise wholesale and retail houses of business in Leeds, Dublin, Bristol, Norwich, and Hull. In common with other great concerns in this age of active commerce, the Alderman has extensive wholesale transactions, and the aggregate amount of the returns of his firm would cast into the shade many of the men who were regarded as the principal London merchants a century ago. Alderman Sidney is a magistrate for

Middlesex. He sat in the last parliament for Stafford, his native town; and having relinquished his seat, he was at the last election nominated for Leeds; and without being present, or canvassing a single elector, 1,000 voters polled on his behalf. Alderman Moon has been long known as commercially connected with the fine arts, and formerly kept a print-shop in the City and in Pall Mall. The Alderman served his fellow citizens for many years in the common council. He has now retired from business, but is still closely indentified with the local interests of the City, by the possession of a very large amount of freehold property, contiguous to the Royal Exchange. Alderman Moon, like most of his brethren, is a county magistrate. Sir Chapman Marshall; this gentleman, having been connected with the corporation for several years as a common councilman, was, in 1832, elected an alderman. He was for several years the head of a firm of wholesale grocers in the City, from which, however, he has retired; and having passed through the shrievalty and mayoralty with honour, he devotes his time to the discharge of the functions of alderman, seeking no other reward than the good opinion of his fellow citizens. Alderman Wire is a solicitor in extensive practice in the City. He, like so many of his colleagues, long served the City in the common council, until he was invited to take the gown by a requisition signed by all the inhabitants of the ward, which includes the establishments of Baron Rothschild and Mr. John Ingram Travers, both of whom attended, with other inhabitants, to introduce him to the Court of Aldermen. Alderman Carter takes rank as an intelligent and successful tradesman in a country once called in derision a nation of shopkeepers. Mr. Carter succeeded his grandfather and father in business as a watch and chronometer maker; or, as the witness is pleased to call him, a clock maker. Alderman Carter, five-and-twenty years ago, received the chief prize from the Admiralty Board for a chronometer made by his hands, or under the immediate direction of his skill; he afterwards received three other prizes from the Board and was elected a fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society. The employment of skill and science in the production of articles of such vast importance as accurate chronometers to the commercial world, when combined with honourable conduct and independent position affords a strong recommendation to the good opinion of a commercial community. Alderman Challis is at the head of an extensive business as a factor in London; and, in connection with his son, has established a banking-house in Smithfield. He is a Middlesex magistrate, and a member of Parliament for the borough of Finsbury, in which he possesses very extensive property. The foregoing statement will show the tendency of the constituent body to regard with favour all old servants; they prefer old faces to new ones, and desire to advance to higher stations those who have served them in other positions. Thirteen out of the twenty-six of the present race of aldermen have graduated from the ranks of the common council; sixteen of them are county magistrates; eight of them are or have been members of the legislature; and nine have retired from business, and have thus their time at their own disposal, to be used in the public service. The Lord Mayor estimated the property of the existing body of aldermen at between three and four millions sterling. I have no standard by which I can measure their wealth; but after death, Doctors' Commons does afford some information as to their predecessors. I have had a search made for the wills of the last six aldermen who have departed this life; and after making certain deductions, which are required from the full amount, for probate duty, they will be found to have left behind them considerably more than 300,000*l.* in personal property; and from some knowledge I have upon the subject from various sources of information, I believe that the aggregate amount of their freehold property exceeds that sum.

8479. Do you mean that each of them left that amount, or the aggregate?—In the aggregate. Before I close this statement, I should remark that the aldermen concurred in the very Act of Parliament which was obtained for disqualifying men from holding corporate office in the City, if they were either bankrupt or insolvent, or if they did not attend to their duties for six months. Those two classes were cut off; which classes constituted, in my judgment, the chief defect of the corporation in past days; that is, gentlemen who kept their honours and their place, though they never attended, and did no work; but left it to men who, whether they had lost their honour or not, had lost their position, but retained their gown. I have known aldermen, gentlemen of high respectability, who have not been near the council, and, I believe, even for years. That cannot now take place. For the purpose of meeting a question which was put to one of the witnesses, "Whether a merchant of the "first rank would be well received by the corporation," I may state that he would be well received; and I refer to the case of a gentleman of that class who now holds office, I mean Alderman Thompson. Ill health, other avocations, and perhaps some indisposition to the mere routine of office prevent him often coming amongst his brethren; they cheerfully do his duty for him amongst themselves. The nine gentlemen I have referred to, who have retired from business, cheerfully undertake Alderman Thompson's duty, so that the public service does not suffer; and I may say in addition to that fact, that it being in the power of a ward to petition against an alderman who did not attend to his duty for six months, as a ground of disqualification, Alderman Thompson felt it right and delicate of him to communicate to his ward his desire to retire; but, at the request of his ward, he continues in his office; and his brethren of the Court of Aldermen do his duty for him whenever, from any circumstance, he cannot attend. In a printed list containing a return of the number of attendances at the Guildhall Justice Room, for the hearing of police summonses at Guildhall and for the despatch of business, from the 9th November 1852 to the 8th November 1853, pursuant to an order of the Court of Aldermen of the 22d November 1853, I find William Thompson, Esq., M.P., with a nought to his name. I find the other gentlemen to whom I have referred as having retired from business, such as Mr. Wilson, thirty-three times; Sir Peter Laurie, twenty-seven times; Sir Chapman Marshall, twenty-three times; Mr. Moon, thirty-three times; Mr. Finnis, thirty-three times; Mr. Lawrence, sixty-three times; Sir Robert Walter Carden, twenty-nine times; and so on. I am thus able to answer the question; and show that a merchant of high position who would take his share of the duties and entitle himself to the ease of retirement by early service, would be received most courteously and gracefully. But, as I humbly submit to the Commissioners, one Bank director, one such man as Alderman Thompson, coupled with the other aldermen, affords a fair type, a fair representation, a high representation of the commercial body in the City of London.

8480. Do you mean to state as a matter of fact that the higher class of the merchants of London are fully represented in the present corporation?—In point of numbers, I think they are, taking the whole constituent body into account. I think that one person of the class of Alderman Thompson bears a fitting proportion to the whole body of that class.

8481. I suppose you would desire, as far as possible, in any local institution to combine all classes, looking to intelligence and responsibility, in managing the affairs?—All classes who would work. I do not desire to see many Alderman Thompsons, much as I regard him. He has earned his leisure by early service, but I do not desire to see gentlemen brought in for ornament, who might come down to vote upon particular occasions, and not give to the city the benefit of service.

8482. I believe that in some of the provincial corporations of England, it is not unusual for merchants and others whose time is very much occupied, and who cannot devote much time, year after year, to the affairs of the corporation with which they are connected, yet to accept the office of Mayor; so that occasionally a man of that sort is put at the head of the corporation as Mayor. Do you think that desirable?—I do not, for two reasons. The admission, I do not mean a rare single instance, but the admission at all frequently of such a principle would be attended with two evils; in the first place it would bring in persons who had not been qualified by previous municipal education in the inferior offices; and in the next place, it would damp the enterprise and energies of other men who would give to the public a large share of service, in the prospect that they would have their reward in the chief magistracy.

8484. You think that a good constituency would be able to judge of what was fairly due to the claims of service to the corporation; and also to those claims which general commercial eminence might present?—I do not think it would, and I do not know that such a thing would be undesirable; but I am a servant and have masters over me. I do not know what their opinion may be, and I therefore speak with diffidence.

The description of the position of the corporators, which I have before read, the Commissioners will recollect was made by the witness to apply to both the aldermen and the common council. I read it in the place as applied to the aldermen, because it was more inapplicable to them possibly than to the common council; but you will keep it in mind in regard to what I am now about to read respecting the common council. The assertion, it will be observed, equally addresses itself to the members of both courts. The honourable Commissioners, who may be supposed to have been unacquainted with the gentlemen who compose the common council, must have formed a very erroneous opinion of their commercial and social position in the City, as well from hearing this statement as from the same witness's description of their trades in a later period of his examination. Although gentlemen aspiring to a seat in the Court of Aldermen, it is reasonable to conclude, held higher stations in the City than, cæteris paribus, those who remain members of the larger body; yet the witness's reference to "counter transactions in small coins," as regards the common council, is, in the greater number of cases, literally, and I may safely take upon myself, that it is in almost all cases, substantially fallacious. Common councilmen of the present day are respectable citizens; very many, I believe most of them, are wholesale dealers; holding place between the higher order of merchants on the one side and the smaller retailers on the other. Although engaged in business on the confines of both classes, they are frequently blended in their transactions with one or the other. The Commissioners have received from several members of the common council evidence as to the commercial position occupied by themselves and their colleagues in their own and in neighbouring wards. Amongst my own immediate acquaintance in the common council, I can name four of them who are county magistrates. A very large number are, to my knowledge, possessed of independent means and business habits; and have been selected on account of these qualities, to fill the position, not only of corporators, but of directors in important public companies. Some few of the members to whom these observations apply may be still found, it is true, in the very retail shops in which they acquired their independence. For example, one of the deputies of Bishopsgate ward is a baker. A few years since, when chairman of the Navigation committee, it was asked by a witness in a committee of the House of Commons, "What could a baker, who had no "concerns with the river, know about its trading interests;" it turned out, upon inquiry, that he was at the time a shipowner, an importer, and a director of a steam-boat company. A few months since, this gentleman received a public testimonial of respect from his neighbours, after having resided amongst them for half a century. Although of independent means, he takes a pride in "sticking to his shop," as he terms it. He may be seen daily coming from his country residence to his place of business, where he has lived for forty years. From thence, in the middle of the day, three or four times a week he wends his way with a cheerful countenance either to Guildhall, where he takes his seat as chairman of the Commissioners of Sewers or of the Police committee; or perhaps to one of the old London Insurance companies, where he succeeded in the chair the son of an English earl, one of the most honourable, able, and gentlemanly men in Europe. I concluded my observations respecting the Court of Aldermen by a reference to Doctors' Commons. I have had searches made as to the property left by five gentlemen of the common council, who died in the last year; they left in personalty 130,000*l.*; and, to my knowledge, one of them had very large freehold property; and, as I am informed and believe, another of them had distributed among his family a very large sum shortly before his decease. If property is to be considered a test of fitness for the common council, the average property of these gentlemen may be regarded, I submit, as a high qualification of the class to which they belong.

I now turn from what men have been, and what men are, to what men have done; and with that I shall desire to close. From the extracts of the evidence I have read, we see that one of the witnesses has said, that the corporation have never led, and could hardly be driven to follow at the tail of public opinion. The corporation, it is known, possesses the right of addressing the Throne, and petitioning Parliament by their sheriffs at the bar. If they have acted as this witness says, they have abused their privileges, and deserve the censure he has cast upon them. I have examined the records of the common council for the last fifty years; and I declare that they will be found at all times in the van of public opinion, as far as relates to both national and corporate reforms. From the year 1780 up to the passing of the Reform Act, they led the liberal party in the nation, by petitioning for reform, for reduction of places and pensions, and for the enforcement of economy and retrenchment in the public expenditure. They petitioned for the abolition of slavery in our own Colonies, and for the suppression ofthe slave trade throughout the world. They petitioned against state lotteries, as encouraging the spirit of gambling. They abolished the packing of juries in the City, which led to the reform of our jury laws. They relinquished their own profits, and purchased up their joint proprietors' rights at a cost of 1,000*l.*, by which they were enabled to suppress Bartholomew fair. This led to the suppression of similar nuisances in the neighbourhood of the metropolis. They gave a public sanction to the decent observance of the Sabbath, by sacrificing a portion of their rents in closing their markets on Sunday, when other metropolitan markets were left open. They petitioned for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and for the removal of Catholic disabilities, long before those restraints upon religious freedom were removed by Parliament. The corporation, upon several occasions, petitioned Parliament to equalize and consolidate our criminal code and to mitigate its rigours, while Sir Samuel Romilly was struggling with prejudice and power to accomplish these objects; which have been since largely promoted, if not entirely effected by Lord Lansdowne and Sir Robert Peel. The corporation have repeatedly petitioned Parliament to confer upon the Jews the same civil privileges as their fellow subjects enjoy; and they gave practical proofs of their sincerity by admitting Jews to the freedom of the City, and abolishing the thousand pounds' fine for Jew brokers' tickets; which had been imposed when the rich merchants bore the sway in the corporation, to operate at once as an instrument of extortion, and a badge of disgrace. At a charge of 7,000*l.* a year they established a body of day police, armed, accoutred, and clothed, for the protection of the persons and property of the citizens, when no such body existed in any other part of the metropolis. At the approach of the cholera in 1832, the corporation authorized the appropriation of 10,000*l.* to provide temporary hospitals; and a medical staff for the diseased, and a suburban place of interment for the cholera dead, had the mortality spread, as was the case in some other populous places. The Commissioners of Sewers in the City of London have taken the lead, both theoretically and practically, in effecting sanitary improvements in the streets and sewers, and in the dwellings of the poor. There is, I believe, no portion of the metropolis which, under such unfavourable circumstances, is so well paved, lighted, cleaned, and guarded as the City of London. The corporation have greatly diminished, and are proceeding to abolish official fees in every department of their corporate government. They appointed a committee of clerks and officers, by whose labours they have been enabled to diminish the number and consolidate places of profit; and though the duties of their officers have been greatly increased during the last thirty years, their salaries have been in most instances reduced. I put in a book of reports which have been made, as to all the offices of the corporation, in which the reduction of salaries and the regulation of duties have taken place. The common council in 1833 abolished the ballot, which had been previously used in the selection of officers. By abolishing the ballot, the accountability of the representative in the exercise of this important act of delegated authority, was restored to the constituent body. To increase the influence of the constituent over the representative body, and to give them increased knowledge of the manner in which their affairs were conducted, the common council in 1811, provided for the annual printing of the accounts, and the minutes and reports of their proceedings; with the same object they provided seats for the reporters of the public press in the body of the court. In 1836, the common council passed resolutions requiring divisions to be taken in the presence of strangers, and to be published in the minutes, and also the names of the members present at the opening of the court. Standing orders have been made, a copy of which I will lay before the Commissioners, from which it will be seen that effectual precautions have been taken to exclude all possibility of jobbing by the members of the corporation; they have carried this principle to an extent not known in any other elective assembly, for they extend its operation to members after they have left the court, as well as to the sons of the members themselves. They likewise have made standing orders, by which they exclude placemen of the Government and placemen of the corporation from seats in the court or at their committees. The aldermen themselves have opened their doors to the public, and no longer deliberate in a closed court. We have seen that by the extravagance and mismanagement of the corporate funds by their predecessors, so late as 1817, the existing corporation had become involved deeply in debt, not incurred for public improvements, but by the excess of ordinary expenditure over ordinary revenue; by sacrificing justice to generosity and giving costly entertainments to princes when the prisoners were threatened with want of bread; within five years of that time, the corporation, by excluding jobbing in every department both of expenditure and receipt, and by diligent attention to their corporate management, lifted their receipts above their expenditure; discharged all debts to their officers; and replaced the trust funds they had expended. Since that time, with due regard to vested rights, they have bought up, at a cost of more than 40,000*l.*, various places and appointments, judicial, administrative, and fiscal, which places, as the public interests have demanded, they have abolished or placed under control. The corporation during the same time have reduced or remitted fines and fees to an amount exceeding 300,000*l.* Out of their increased revenues in 1835, the corporation erected and endowed a grammar school in the City for 600 youths, at an outlay of 20,000*l.* and an annual cost of 1,000*l.* In 1824, they founded a library, at a cost of 2,000*l.*, with additions to the extent of 200*l.* a-year from that time. The common council, within the last ten years, erected and endowed alms-houses, and a school for the benefit of decayed citizens, their orphans, and widows, and from the year 1817 to the present time the corporation out of their revenues have paid for charitable purposes very nearly 100,000*l.*, and to public improvements upwards of a million of money.

I have now only to express my obligations to the Commissioners for indulging me with this very long and very patient hearing. I am authorized by the committee to say, that I believe I am the last witness. The chairman of the committee is here; he has probably some observation to make to the Commissioners. I can never be sufficiently thankful to you for the kind manner in which you have been good enough to listen to me.

8485. I will read you a passage from the report of the municipal Commissioners on the corporation of London with respect to the markets. The passage is this, "The charter "granted to the City 1 Edward III. s. 12., contains a declaration that no market "shall be granted by the Crown to be holden within seven miles all round about "the City; which grant was renewed nearly in the same terms by the charter of "14 Charles I, s. 14., and under these grants the corporation has always insisted "on the necessity for its consent being obtained to the establishment of any market "within those limits. Even when the corporation has not opposed Bills in Parliament for such markets, it has been usual to require their formal consent under the City "seal, before the Act could be passed." Can you explain to us what steps the City have taken at any time with respect to the assertion of that privilege?—I cannot. I was always opposed to any exercise of it when I was a member of the court. I do not know what has been done.

(Mr. City Remembrancer.) I am not aware of any such circumstances.

8486. Do you mean that you are not aware of any opposition offered by the City to the establishment of a market within seven miles?—That I am not prepared to say. I know of no instance in which the assent of the corporation has been given under seal.

8487. Is there any doubtas to the legal existence of the privilege?—I think none at all.

8488. Is it a privilege which the City now practically enforces?—I think only with respect to the sale of live cattle.

8489. Some clause was inserted in the Islington Market Bill, was there not?—There was; that Bill was very much opposed by the corporation of London. The clauses in that Bill were the usual saving clause, and also clauses, that as far as the Islington Market interfered with Smithfield Market they should compensate the corporation of London.

C. Pearson, Esq.

23d Feb. 1854.

8490. If it were proposed to establish a general market for the sale of vegetables and poultry within seven miles of the boundary of the City, would the City take any step to oppose the establishment of such a market?—They would have the power to do so, but my opinion is that they would not.

8491. What did you do when Hungerford Market was established?—It was not opposed.

8492. Was any compensation stipulated?—No.

(Mr. City Solicitor.) Another Bill passed some years ago to build a market at Paddington, and there was no opposition.

8493. Is it understood that the title of the City to Smithfield depends upon its use as a market? Is there any belief that if Smithfield or some portion of it were not used as a market, the land would revert to the Crown?—I have heard that suggestion made.

8494. Is it the fact?—I am not able to say. I am City solicitor, and I have not been told to look into it. I hope the question will never arise.

8495. It is important that it should be cleared up, because there is no advantage in the City using it as a market merely on technical grounds, as it were, to preserve their title?—No, I do not see that there is, because the Act of Parliament which has removed the cattle market, would be our justification for abandoning such a course.

8496. Something was said by one of the witnesses as to the use in future of Smithfield Market for the purposes of some other market; and I have heard it suggested that that plan was adopted by the City in order to meet some technical objection, with respect to their title to the soil?—I have not heard of any such suggestion. I have always heard it spoken of as being desirable to use it for the best purpose that it could be applied to. I do not suppose that there is any intention to act at variance with the Crown in regard to it. What is best to be done with it will no doubt be done.

John Wood, Esq.

JOHN WOOD, Esq., was further examined, as follows.

8497. Do you wish to add anything to your evidence?—As chairman of the committee to whom it was referred, to afford to this Commission every assistance and information you might consider requisite in the course of the inquiry into the corporation of London; I am requested to state that if any evidence or information, oral or documentary, beyond that with which you have been already furnished, should be desired by you that desire will be immediately met. I may add that the corporation received a communication from the Commissioners, inviting us to make suggestions for improving the constitution of the corporation; that, coupled with our own desire, on the subject, has rendered it a duty on our part to endeavour to agree upon a series of suggestions to you. A committee has been appointed to consider that matter; they have had frequent meetings; they met yesterday, and the Court of Common Council will meet to-morrow; and individually I hope that suggestions will be laid before you; but of course I cannot undertake to speak for the court. The communication from the Commissioners was received in the most respectful manner; and will, I feel assured, be properly responded to by the court.

The witness withdrew.

J. Acland, Esq.

JAMES ACLAND, Esq., was further examined, as follows.

8498. Will you state to us what further information you are desirous of producing before this Commission?—I am anxious that it should appear truthfully how much money passed through my hands from the corporation, acting as their agent, in resisting the Smithfield Market's Removal Bill. Mr. Scott stated very loosely, so loosely that some of the newspapers understood him as I believe, but certainly he stated it so loosely that it appeared that I had received thousands of pounds in that matter, which is nothing like the fact; and the best way of proving that it is not the fact, is to call upon the corporation to produce my account rendered, and my receipts given for the money.

8499. If my memory serves me, that was not the statement of Mr. Scott?—I do not say it was; but it was so much like it that I cannot blame the newspapers for misunderstanding and misrepresenting it.

8500. In point of fact what was the sum you received upon that occasion?—I would rather not state; and for this reason, that I was engaged confidentially. I have endeavoured to avoid anything like a breach of faith in the entire of my evidence. It is not for me to state it; but I think it is for me to call upon them to show that their statements are accurate.

8501. As I understand you, you do not complain of the inaccuracy of the statement of Mr. Scott, but merely that it was mis-apprehended; and that the public therefore is under a false impression as to what Mr. Scott intended to say; is it not so?—It is not exactly so; I should still complain, even if it had not been mis-represented; for Mr. Scott's statement was so loose, as fairly left the inference that thousands of pounds had passed through my hands as their agent.

8502. You have now an opportunity of setting right any false impression which you think was produced by Mr. Scott's statement?—I do not think it would be becoming in me, having been retained by them as an agent; but nothing would be more easy, as Mr. Scott has that statement, than to produce it; for he must have passed it through their committees and must have received the authority to pay the amount.

8503. It is due to you to state that if you think there is any point on which your personal veracity has been impugned, and upon which you are desirous of making any statement we are bound to hear you?—Perhaps I may ask that you would extend your liberty thus far; I have made a statement that the corporation have illegally created a rental of 3,000*l.* a year, by charges upon Billingsgate Market to which they have no right; and I would that you would allow a corporate officer to be called who would prove it to a certain extent; that the parties from whom the corporation claim the privilege of charging this large rental, never enjoyed any such rental at all; and that therefore it is not, as Mr. Solicitor has stated, a prescriptive right. Their retired officer, Mr. Goldham, I think his name is, might be called; their present officer might be called, who has charge of that market; and there can be no difficulty in satisfactorily establishing that this rental of 3,000*l.* a year is quite a recent charge as a rent levied upon the salesmen and factors; the market being a free and open market; and, in the schedule of tolls referred to in their Acts, there being no such item.

8504. If there is anything which requires elucidation, we can communicate by letter and obtain it; but we are desirous of confining our evidence within some reasonable limits?—I am not desirous of extending it unreasonably.

8505. Is there anything which personally affects you?—I think so. If you will have the kindness to allow me by your next meeting to look over the evidence, I shall be able to save your time by condensing as much as possible my observations in reply.

(Mr. Dakin.) As one of the Markets Improvement committee, I may state that, as far as regards the delicacy of the witness as a confidential agent, we will absolve him from that delicacy, if he thinks it essential to his character.

(Mr. Acland.) I have no hesitation in saying that nothing like one-half of the money which Mr. Scott states ever passed through my hands. I have not the account here, and I cannot state the amount without having the precise figures.

8506. This seems to be Mr. Scott's statement, No. 3819, in the City print of the evidence: "I am now authorized to state fully to the Commissioners what the amount was "and how it was expended; 2,750*l.* was the whole amount expended. That was expended "in canvassing, agency, procuring very numerous petitions from all parts of the country, "printer's charges, and law stationers' charges. Mr. Acland, who was at that time the "secretary of what was called the Central Markets Association, an association consisting "of butchers and dealers at Smithfield market, and parties interested, was employed by "the remembrancer upon that occasion; he being fully cognizant of the question, and very "well qualified to assist in getting up petitions of this kind. On behalf of the City?— "Yes. A large portion of the money was paid to him; but 2,650*l.* out of the 2,750*l.* or "thereabouts, was expended entirely in those charges, in promoting petitions to Parliament. "Do you mean that the money paid to Mr. Acland was included in the 2,750*l.*?—It was. "That sum covered the entire expenditure of that description?—Of that description. "£2,650 out of the 2,750*l.* was exclusively applied in promoting petitions and in getting "up a memorial from the electors, in number 7,000, to the members for the City, and in "ascertaining the validity of the signatures. The remaining 100*l.* was expended in "payments to some gentlemen at the bar and other literary services which they "rendered."—Those items in which the 2,650*l.* are said to have been expended, were all items coming legitimately within the scope of my agency, and were all items involved in my account against the corporation; and therefore the assumption is that the 2,650*l.* had passed through my hands, for I employed the printers and I employed the canvassers; in fact those items are strictly within the charges I have made to the corporation; but I say that nothing like 2,650*l.* ever passed through my hands for those charges. I am, therefore, anxious that the account should be produced, and produced by those who have it.

8507. (To Mr. Dakin.) Would there be any difficulty in producing those accounts?—None whatever.

8508. (To Mr. Acland.) You heard the statement made by Mr. Pearson, the City solicitor, to-day. Is there anything in that statement upon which you wish to advert?—I would say that I have never stated to this Commission that there were no respectable gentlemen members of the Court of Aldermen or Court of Common Council. My observations applied to the general body of the corporation; and I do not think it an answer to my observation that a picked sample of twenty of the common council should be produced before you, against whose competency to legislate municipally I, for one, entertain no question whatever, and of whom I should certainly say they are the exceptions to the general body of the Court of Common Council. If I had been permitted, or any other person, to pick a like number of another class from the common council, the corporation would not have presented the aspect which under present circumstances it does before the Commission.

J. Acland, Esq.

8509. If there is any statement of a matter of fact which you would wish to correct, or if there is any point in which your meaning has been misunderstood or misrepresented unintentionally, we are ready to hear any explanation of that kind, but not argumentatively?—I believe it was to a statement of mine that Mr. Pearson adverted with reference to the corporation being rather disposed to lag behind public opinion.

(Mr. City Solicitor.) It was not.

(Mr. Acland.) Then it might have been, for I certainly entertained that opinion. There is a gentleman whom the Commissioners might call as a witness; and who, I think, could establish that point very fully. A gentleman very high in his profession, Mr. Tite, the architect. Mr. Tite would prove to you that the corporation refused the grant of Southwark Bridge, and preferred rather to oppose the Mid Kent Railway coming over the Thames, and now they have to purchase the bridge.

(Mr. City Solicitor.) Mr. Tite expressed yesterday his perfect willingness to come before the Commissioners.

(Mr. Acland.) I would only ask that I should be permitted an opportunity for half an hour, at your convenience, to answer such portions of the evidence as are, antagonistic in fact to the statement with which I opened this inquiry to you. It seems to me but reasonable that I should be afforded that opportunity. I think it will appear so to you; my object not being to waste your time, but simply to endeavour to reconcile, as far as I can, any apparent incongruity; in point of fact to put myself straight with you and the public as to the statements which I have made on a former occasion.

8510. If there is any matter of fact in which you have been contradicted, we are ready to hear anything of that description. We feel that we have the case before us very fully?—Very fully you have; whether sufficiently so it is for you to decide.

8511. It is not the practice in matters of this sort, either in a commission or a committee of the House of Commons, to allow witnesses to argue with one another; but to hear witnesses on both sides of the question, and for the commission or committee to form their judgment upon it. If there is any statement as to a matter of fact, which you wish to explain, we are ready to hear the explanation; beyond that I think we cannot go?—I had understood that when you called on the corporation for their case, you did so upon the fact of there being a primâ facie case against the corporation, and that you would hear them, reserving to yourselves the power of deciding whether you would take further evidence or not.

8512. We reserved to ourselves the most unlimited power. We have heard the statements on your side, and we have heard the statements of the corporation; it appears to me that the case is very fully before us, and that there is no use in hearing further evidence; that it would be a loss of time?—I think the Billingsgate Market question is not before you.

8513. We will look further into it; and if we think it right to re-open the inquiry upon it, we have the power of doing so. My impression is that the case is fully before us; and if not fully before us, by calling for documents we can make it so?—I have no desire to force any evidence upon you.

The witness withdrew.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., M.P.

Sir Robert Alexander Ferguson, Bart., M.P., was further examined as follows.

8514. Is there anything which you wish to add to the evidence which you have already given?—With respect to the statement of the governor of the Irish society, that I had stated that they had no right to expend their money on building farm houses, my statement was not that they had no right, but that they would have no funds to do so, if they looked first to discharge the duties of their trust. I instanced the free or diocesan school, and the support of the corporation of Derry. Then there are the quays. In their early proceedings in 1613, 1616, 1624, and again in 1625, when called upon to build quays, to have a sufficient quay at Derry, they never denied that that was a part of their duty. They first devolved that trust upon their tenant, and subsequently the quays have been built either by government grant or by money levied from the trade; and the Irish society, in fact, were large gainers, as well by the building of quays, which pay them a large rent, as by the erection of a number of houses on land left dry by their extension into the river. There is also the question of a bridge, to which they are called upon to contribute; and a year or two ago they offered to join the Bridge commissioners in petititioning the government to appropriate the lands of Culmore, which are at the present held by the governor of that port, but which, it is believed, are not to go to his successor. With respect to the perpetuity leases, it would be desirable to place on the minutes parts of the answer of Alderman Thorpe, governor, and Mr. Schultes, secretary to the society, at the time of their contest with the Skinners' company, by whom they were called to account for having granted these leases, and they then put upon record the reasons which induced Alderman Alsop and the Irish society of his day to grant those leases. "Extracts "from the answer of Alderman Thorpe, governor, and Henry Schultes, secretary to the " Irish society, in the suit with the Skinners' company." " And these defendants, further " answering, say, that in the year 1767, the said Irish society, upon deliberation, and with " the advice of counsel, first granted leases in perpetuity of the said lands, in consideration " of fines or premiums to be paid to the society; and it appears by the minutes of the " society that a considerable number of the tenants of houses and lands, in and near the " city of Londonderry, sent a memorial, dated the 19th of April 1765, to the society, stating " that the granting of leases in perpetuity would be a strong inducement to them to lay out " larger sums in buildings and repairs than they were then disposed to do, by which the " city of Londonderry would be ornamented and improved, and the trade and manufactures " thereof promoted and increased; and that, having created and repaired the said houses " at their own expense, they, the memorialists, had, including their respective rents, paid at " least twenty-five years' purchase for the same, which they hoped would be thought to give " them an equitable title to the favour of a society constituted, as they conceived, as " trustees for the benefit of the said city, for the twelve companies of the City of London; " and they proposed that the said society should grant them leases for three lives, renewable " for ever, the memorialists agreeing to pay an additional year's rent on the dropping of " every life. And it appears by the said minutes, that such memorial was taken into " consideration by the society on the 16th July 1764; when it was resolved that a case " should be submitted to Sir James Gyne, then recorder of the City of London, for his " opinion, as to the power of the said society to grant such leases; and Sir James Gyne " stated his opinion on a case so submitted to him, that the society had power to grant such " leases if they should think the same beneficial to the estate vested in them; and that, " thereupon, the matter was referred to a committee of the society, who made their report " thereon, dated the 27th August 1766, stating their opinion to be that leases in " perpetuity would be to the mutual advantage of the society and their tenants, for the " following, among other reasons. First, Because they conceived that the planting of " the said City of Londonderry, and the town of Coleraine, with Protestant inhabitants, " being the express intent of the charters of the said society, it was the duty of the said " society to promote such intention to the utmost of their power. Secondly, Because the " encouraging tenants to build in a substantial and elegant manner, appeared to them the " most likely means of fixing the said tenants and their posterity in the said city and " town, and inducing others to come and settle there; which, as population and trade " reciprocally promoted one another, would, in their opinion, raise the state of manufactures " and commerce in these two places; and, by enriching the inhabitants, not only for ever, " secure the society's rents there, but improve their other estates in the neighbourhood, " called the Quarterlands; and, consequently, prove of advantage to the surrounding " estates of the twelve companies. And Thirdly, Because the generality of their leases " having twenty-nine years to run; and most of the buildings being very old and ruinous, " there was little probability that the tenants would put themselves to any considerable " expense in repairs; or that the buildings at the expiration of the term, would be worth " more than the ground. And the said committee recommended that leases should be " granted for three lives, renewable for ever, upon certain conditions, and among others, " that their rent should be raised one fifth; and that a fine, equal to one year's rent, should " be paid for renewal at the end of seven years, or the fall of every life, at the option of the " tenant; and the terms proposed by the committee were sanctioned by the society, and that " the tenants agreed to accept leases at such raised rents, and to pay the proposed fine every seven " years." The affidavit of Mr John Claudius Beresford states, in the same cause, that he was convinced that if the recommendation of Alderman Alsop had not been adopted, the city of Derry would have gone to decay, and a settlement would have been made lower down the river Foyle, or the trade which Derry now enjoys would have been fixed higher up at Strabane; and, further, he states that the common lease for building now granted in the city of Dublin is 999 years, and concludes thus: "If, therefore, individuals who let " the property for private emolument found it necessary to grant such tenures to procure " expenditure of capital on their property; how much more are a public body like the " Irish society called on to do so, whose existence originated in a plan for establishing " a colony, and whose continuation ought to be dependent on their endeavours to do " their duty in promoting and fostering such an establishment." It further appears that these leases were not considered very advantageous by all the tenants from the first condition in the letter from the Irish society of 30th August 1766, which runs thus: " That the present leases be surrendered up on or before Michaelmas 1767; in default " thereof no regard shall be had for the future to what is called tenants' right, or shall " any such leases be renewed thereafter on any terms whatsoever." And it is known in the town of Coleraine that the ancestor of Lord Waterford, the Lord Tyrone of that day, wished not to take out these renewable leases; but having taken them, the society compelled him to continue them. It is hard, after the lapse of a century, to accuse Alderman Alsop, who remained governor for eighteen years after granting these perpetuity leases; and the committee, who gave such enlightened reasons for their decision, that they were actuated by bribery. With regard to the conversion into fee farm grants of these leases, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland has been printed in the Irish Jurist; it is too long to put upon the notes, but I submit the following extracts.

The Witness delivered in the same and withdrew.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart. M.P.

23d Feb. 1854.

EXTRACTS from the Judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Ireland.

Ex parte Knox,—14*th Feb.* 1854.

"In this case a petition has been presented by the petitioner, Samuel Knox, Esquire, under the provisions of the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act (12th & 13th of the Queen, c. 105. s. 22), against the respondents (formerly called the Irish society), praying that a grant in fee-farm may be executed by the respondents to the petitioner, under the provisions of the said Act, of the messuage, lands, and tenements demised by the lease in the petition mentioned (which lease bears date the 29th of September 1830), and further, praying the usual consequential directions.

"The Irish society have not served a notice under the provisions contained in the latter part of the first section of the statute, stating that the right of the petitioner to require a grant in fee-farm is disputed; nor do they, by their counsel, dispute such right.

"The only question which has been raised, or upon which the Court is called upon to decide, is, whether, upon the true construction of the 5th section of the Act, the Irish society are entitled to compensation for the loss, which, according to the affidavits of Mr. Collis (and which affidavit is uncontradicted), will take place in the marketable value of ther interest in the lands demised by the lease of the 29th September 1830, by the conversion of their estate in the reversion into an estate in the fee-farm rent."

The Master of the Rolls, after a minute and lengthened examination of the statute, proceeds thus:—

"I therefore am of opinion, having regard to the language of the 5th clause, and to the affidavit of Mr. Maurice Collis, that the respondents, as the owners in fee of the reversion in the lands demised by the lease of the 29th September 1830, are entitled to compensation for the loss; which, it appears from that uncontradicted affidavit, will arise from the conversion of their estate, in the reversion to an estate in the fee farm-rent; and I must therefore refer it to the Master to ascertain the amount of such compensation. A circumstance occurred during the progress of the argument, to which I think it is proper to advert.

"In the case of the Skinners' Company v. the Irish society, reported in 12 Clarke Finnelly, p. 425, it appears that that society hold their property under a charter from King Charles II.; and although the House of Lords decided that the Irish society were not trustees for the Skinners' company, yet it was considered that they were trustees for public purposes.

"I suggested the propriety of the petitioner or the respondents putting the charter in issue, and consenting (in order to save expense) that the printed copy used before the House of Lords should be read. The petitioner has declined to amend his petition, and put the charter in issue, or consent to its being laid before the Court; and the respondents have also declined to put it in issue, or to consent to its being read. I am therefore obliged to decide the case without regard to the consideration that the respondents are trustees for public charitable purposes.

"The reason why it occurred to me that it would be desirable that the charter should be in issue was this: It is quite clear, as laid down by Lord Cottenham, in the case of the Attorney General v. Pilgrim [a] 'that it is an established rule of this Court, which it is its 'duty to maintain, that leases of this sort (that is, long leases of charity lands) amounting 'to an alienation are, primâ facie at least, not to be supported.'

[a] 2 H. & T. 188.

"If the charter had been put in issue, the petitioner, without any inconsistency, notwithstanding the general rule as laid down by Lord Cottenham, would have been at liberty to contend that the lease under which he derived was valid, according to the authority of the Attorney General v. Hungerford [b], and at the same time to have insisted that, according to the case of the Attorney General v. Kerr [c], and many other cases, the Irish society could not, primâ facie at least, have conveyed their reversion in fee-farm previous to the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act, and could not now convey in fee-farm if that statute had not passed; and that, as there would perhaps be no marketable value attached to an estate in a reversion, incapable primâ facie, of alienation, in consequence of the estate being subject to a public charitable trust, there could be no loss by the conversion of the estate in the reversion into an estate in the fee-farm rent.

[b] 2 Cl. & Fin. 357. S.C.; 8 Bligh, 437.

[c] 2 Beav. 427.

"I am not at liberty to enter upon that question counsel on each side have declined; (notwithstanding the suggestion of the court that the case should be argued on the real facts) to put the charter in issue.

"I wish it, however, to be distinctly understood, that I offer no opinion whatever on the point, as it may be argued on some future occasion.

"It was stated in the course of the argument by counsel on the part of the Irish society, that the compensation which they would claim under the 5th section of the Act from their tenants, in the event of their all seeking for fee-farm grants under the statute, would exceed 100,000*l.*

"It was not, however, stated by counsel, how the Irish society proposed to expend that sum; and if I may judge from the account laid before the House of Lords, in the Skinner's Company v. the Irish Society, [d] no portion of it would be expended in Ireland. What proportion of the property of the society is expended in the performance of the public trusts reposed in them, may properly be the subject of inquiry before the Commission now sitting in London.

[d] 12 Cl. & Fin. 451.

Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart. M.P.

23d Feb. 1854.

"In the case in the House of Lords, to which I have referred, Lord Lyndhurst, in giving judgment, observed that the Irish society 'have to provide for the Protestant religion the 'Protestant establishment in that district. That is not a temporary but a permanent 'object; and, with the establishment of religion in that district, they have also to 'superintend and take care of that which is closely and intimately connected with 'religion, and a part of it (if I may so describe it); namely, the education of the inhabi-'tants of the district; they have also to perform other public duties of great importance 'connected with the district; duties, as it appears to me, from the very nature and 'character of them, of a permanent description; and it appears to me that there is no 'foundation whatever for the argument which has been urged, that their authority as 'public officers has long expired, and that they have no duties to discharge.'

"In the course of the present sittings, I had an injunction motion before me, in which two private Bills were handed up to the court (and which Bills it is proposed to bring in in the present session of Parliament) to authorize the building of quays, and for other important public purposes, at Londonderry. I believe it also necessary to build a bridge there. The inhabitants of Londonderry are to be heavily taxed for these public objects, and they are, in addition, according to the statement of the counsel for the Irish society, to have the sum of 100,000*l.* levied upon them by the society, under the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act; no part of which will probably be applied towards any public object connected with Ulster, unless a different course should be adopted from that which appears, from the accounts laid before the House of Lords, to have been hitherto pursued. The question, however, will no doubt be carefully considered by the Commissioners now sitting in London; and the expenditure of the funds of the Irish society fully inquired into.

"I have decided the question, in the present case, with the Irish society on strict legal principles. Whether they have been each advised to insist on a right which has only been claimed by two Irish landlords, notwithstanding the number of fee-farm grants made under the statute, remains to be ascertained."

Adjourned.

* Note.—The Corporation are possessed of Freehold Estates in the City of London and Counties of Middlesex and Surrey, Quit Rents in Ireland, a Leasehold Estate in the Manor of Finsbury, as well as Markets, Public Buildings, and Rights of Tolls and Duties, from which the foregoing Revenue is derived. There are also outstanding certain Loans raised by the Corporation under various Acts of Parliament, in respect of which (in the event of the failure of the specific sources of Revenue upon which such Loans are primarily charged), the Corporation would become contingently liable. These Loans are not included in the foregoing Account, being debited to the Accounts to which they respectively belong. They are as follow; viz. Loans, "City Improvement Fund," (Account No. 8.) 580,000*l.* Loan, "London Bridge Approaches Fund," (Account No. 5.) 88,000*l.* Loan, "Gresham Trust," (Account No. 29.) 85,000*l.* There are likewise various Accounts herewith returned, the Credit or Debit Balances of which might with propriety be considered as Assets or Liabilities of the City's Estate; but these Accounts having necessarily been kept separate from the City's Cash, they are rendered in a separate form; but in order to the fullest elucidation, their Balances are enumerated in the margin hereof.†

Appendix No. 3.

REPORT:—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE COURT.

With suggestions for the consideration of the Court with the view of submitting them to the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the Corporation of London.

Read as follows:

"To the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled.

"We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, your Committee of the whole Court of Common Council, to whom on the 9th Day of February instant, it was referred to take the necessary steps for carrying into effect the Resolution of this Honourable Court, in preparing and submitting for the consideration of the Commissioners, suggestions for the amendment of the constitution of the Corporation, and to report such suggestions for the approval of this Court, do certify, that we met on several days and from time to time considered, as well the provisions of the Bill laid before Parliament in 1852, as also the Resolutions of the Reform Committee embodied in their Report of June last, and likewise sundry suggestions by Members of this Court, and having fully deliberated upon the same, we report to this Court the following suggestions to be recommended to Her Majesty's Commissioners as consented to by this Court.

1. That the Election Acts 11 Geo. I. cap. 18 (except the 17th and 18th sections) and the 12 and 13 Vict. cap. 94. be repealed.
2. That every Male person of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, who shall have occupied within the City of London or the liberties thereof for a period of a year and a day next previous to the first day of September in any year, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons, any House, Warehouse, Counting-house, Office, Chambers for business, or shop, and shall, in the case of a sole occupation, be rated to the Police Rate in respect of such premises, in his own name, on or to an amount of not less than Ten pounds per annum, or in the case of a joint occupation be rated in the several names of the occupiers on or to an amount which, when divided by the number of occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than Ten pounds per annum for each and every such occupier, shall, whilst continuing to occupy the same, be entitled to vote in any election for Alderman or Common Councilman or Ward Officer of the Ward in which such premises shall be situate—with provisions as to the nature of the premises, the title to them, and the preparation of the Lists of Voters.
3. That every person entitled to vote as aforesaid, and who shall not have declared himself, or have been declared to be bankrupt or insolvent, and shall not have taken or applied to take the benefit of any Act for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, and shall not have made any composition with his Creditors, shall be capable of being elected a Common Councilman for the Ward in which the premises occupied by him are situated, or an Alderman for any Ward, or a Sheriff of the City of London, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. Provided always, that if any person who may have declared himself, or been declared to be bankrupt or insolvent, or may have taken or applied to take the benefit of any Act for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, or may have made any composition with his Creditors, shall afterwards pay all his debts in full, such person shall be capable of being elected an Alderman, or a Sheriff or a Common Councilman, in the same manner as if the previous cause of disqualification had not happened.
4. That the constituency for all elections in Common Hall shall include the Liverymen, and also all those who are above proposed to be entitled to vote at the Wardmote Elections.
5. That the time for holding elections should be shortened, and that there should be one day for nomination and election in the Common Hall, and one other day for the nomition and election in the respective Wardmotes; and that in the event of a poll being demanded, the poll shall be taken and concluded on the day following the nomination.
6. That the Lord Mayor shall be chosen from those Aldermen who have served the office of Sheriff.
7. That the election of the Lord Mayor, by the constituency in Common Hall, shall be absolute.
8. That the election of Aldermen, by the Wards, should be without any veto.
9. That the election of Aldermen should be for life.
10. That the Common Councilmen should be annually elected in the several Wardmotes.
11. That the number of Common Councilmen be continued as at present.
12. That if any person holding the office of Alderman or Common Councilman for the City of London shall declare himself, or shall be declared, bankrupt or insolvent, or shall apply to take or shall take the benefit of any Act for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, or shall make any composition with his Creditors, or shall altogether absent himself from his duty for more than six calendar months consecutively

(unless prevented by illness or other reasonable cause), or shall be convicted of fraud or of any crime, then, and in every such case, such person shall thereupon immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office of Alderman or Common Councilman, as the case may be, and the office shall become vacant. But any person becoming disqualified, and ceasing to hold such office by reason of having made any composition with his Creditors, shall, on payment of his debts in full, be capable (if otherwise qualified) of being re-elected to such office; provided always, that any act done by any such Alderman or Common Councilman so becoming disqualified as aforesaid, previously to his office becoming vacant, shall have the same force and validity as if such Alderman or Common Councilman had not been so disqualified.

13. That the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen shall be continued as a separate Court only for purposes connected with the administration of Justice, Police, Gaols, and maintenance of any Court of Law or Equity now by charter or otherwise under their separate jurisdiction. That the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen shall have no separate power or authority to draw upon or order any payment out of the City's cash; and that for all municipal legislation, and other purposes connected with the City's affairs, the same be henceforth managed and transacted under and by the authority of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons in Common Council assembled.
14. That all acts whatsoever authorized or required to be done by the Common Council, and all questions of adjournment, or others, that may come before such Council, may be done and decided by the majority of the members of the Council who shall be present at any meeting, the whole number present at such meeting not being less than one fifth part of the number of the whole Council; and at all such meetings the Lord Mayor, if present, shall preside; and in the absence of the Lord Mayor such Alderman, or in the absence of all the Aldermen, such Councillor as the Members of the Council then assembled shall choose to be the Chairman of that meeting, shall preside, and the Chairman shall have a second or casting vote in all cases of equality of votes.
15. That the Chamberlain should be elected by the Court of Common Council.
16. That in any alteration of the existing Wards it is desirable to adhere as much as possible to the present limits, to unite the smaller and divide the larger Wards, so as to make them more equal in the number of occupiers of and amount of rateable property.
17. That all extra-parochial places within the limits of the City should be included in the City of London, for all municipal purposes.
18. That the Bye Laws of the 15th April 1606, and the 4th July 1712, restraining persons not free of the City from carrying on trade therein, be repealed.
19. That the Street Tolls should be abolished.
20. That the powers of the several City Courts should be consolidated and amended, and that there should be only two such Courts for the trial and hearing of civil causes within the City, namely, the Mayor's Court, and the Sheriff's Court as regulated by the Small Debts' Act.

"All which we submit to the judgment of this Honourable Court. Dated this 22d day of February 1854.

JNO. WOOD,
Chairman."

[Note.—In the following Index the figures refer to the questions in the Minutes of Evidence where page is not prefixed.]

Accounts, Corporation. See Chamberlain.

Abstract of the accounts of the Parish of St. Marylebone for the year ending 31st December 1852, Hickson, 2724.—Produces an account, and, in part, an approximate estimate of the sums collected for public and charitable objects by different local bodies within the City of London for the year 1852, ib. 2725.—Comparison of accounts of corporation of 1833 and 1852, Williams, 2795.—Statement of amount paid to five committees between 1802 and 1808, Scott, 4502.—Thinks the city accounts are made unintelligible on purpose, Acland, 582.—Difference between comptroller's and chamberlain's accounts, ib. 578.—Statement respecting, Pearson, 8459.—On the completion of any of their undertakings the corporation publish a much larger book than the blue book, with a minute detail of the expenditure, ib. 8470.—Has no doubt the accounts might be kept more clearly, ib. 8471.

Acts of Parliament:—

Prejudicial interference of the corporation in the passage of bills through Parliament, with reference to charities, Acland, 558.—Relating to aldermen, Pulling, 1979.

New Customs Act.—Excludes the city from any claim upon fruits upon which the duty is levied by measurement, Keeling, 1595.—The Reform Act operated to cut down the right of the liverymen, leaving the municipal elections and the burthen of the offices as they were before, Mills, 1025, 1028.

Acland, James, Esquire. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has directed his attention to the affairs of the corporation of the City of London, 1.—Resides in London, 2.—Is an electoral agent, 4.—Has been engaged in parliamentary elections and contests for civil offices, 5–7.—Is an inchoate freeman of the City of London, and secretary of the London Municipal Reform Association, established in consequence of the Chamberlain of the City of London having issued notice to him, in common with thousands of others who had not taken up their freedom, to take it up, 8.—Society was established in the month of July this year, and is composed of persons who feel themselves aggrieved in the manner described; others who, upon general principles, desire an alteration in the present system of the corporation of the City of London; small shopkeepers who are unable to pay the corporate demand of 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for permission to continue their trade in the City; and gentlemen, Manchester warehousemen, and others, who from feeling the necessity of corporate reform have joined the Association, 9, 10.—The Association consists of 1200 members, 11.—The only subscription is a registration fee of one shilling; all other contributions are voluntary, 12.—All the members are 10*l.* occupiers [book in which they are entered produced], 13.—The objects and principles of the society have been published in an authentic form. The objects were, first, to secure to all rated occupiers an equal right to a free and full participation in the privileges which are now monopolised by freemen; and, secondly, to defend the members of this association against any prosecution on the part of the corporate officials, connected with the demand that they should take up their freedom, 14.—At a meeting of the Association it was resolved to give all possible aid to this Commission, 15.—The society have rather desired to expose the abuses that exist in the constitution of the corporation, and have not as yet considered what will be the best remedy, 16.—The society has held several meetings, and has appointed a committee, who have also had several meetings, to conduct its affairs, 17.—The complaints of the society have been only against the system, and not against individual officers, 18.—As an advocate of free trade principles, is opposed to anything in the shape of monopoly, where the effects of that monopoly are, as in this case, prejudicial to the general interests of the community, 19.—Has read and studied the Report which in the year 1837 the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales presented upon the City of London, and does not think with "Relation of the City to the Metropolis" there is much in the argument that, because the City of London is surrounded by more than two millions of inhabitants, therefore the two millions and a quarter, or a half, should be thrown into the municipality, 20–21.—Is of opinion that it would not be desirable to extend the limits of the City of London; is decidedly opposed on conviction to the addition of the metropolis to the City of London, 22–23.—Is speaking commercially of the great export and import trade of London; states opinion, that by way of concession instead of imposition the borough of Southwark, the municipal ward of Bridge Without, should be restored to its rights; states reasons, legal and otherwise, 24.—The limits of the ward of Bridge Without are not coterminous with those of the parliamentary borough of Southwark. The borough of Southwark comprises eight parishes, the ward of Bridge Without comprising but five of those parishes, 24*a.*—The ward of Bridge Without comprises all of what may be called the commercial part of the borough of Southwark, the part which adjoins the river. Gives his opinion of what the municipality of the borough of Southwark is. It comprises three manors and five parishes. The manors are, first, the Guildable Manor, which was the original village of Southwark. The second is the King's Manor, purchased of Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry the Eighth. The third is the Great Liberty Manor, which on the dissolution of the monasteries was surrendered by Abbot Parfew, with the other estates of Bermondsey Abbey. These three manors constitute, as is contended, the ward of Bridge Without, 25.—The inhabitants of Southwark did enjoy all the privileges that then existed, 25*a.*—The corporation of London take charge of the borough in many important particulars; they take charge of the manors, and have always taken especial charge of them. Gives numerous instances in which they have taken charge of other matters, 26.—It does not appear positively that any common councilmen were ever elected for this ward; but that four of the resident citizens of that ward were named as the body from which the Lord Mayor and aldermen were to select the alderman for the ward, although it does not appear that the inhabitants of the borough ever did return those four citizens; but such was the ancient practice, for the Court of Common Council in their ordinance proclaim the disuse of that ancient practice, and therefore order that those four shall henceforward be selected by the Court of Aldermen themselves, and then that one of the four should be, by scrutiny of the lord mayor and aldermen, chosen as the alderman of Bridge Without, 26*a*–28.—Believes that the following passage from the Report of the Commission which sat in 1834: "With respect to the ward of Bridge Without, it has already been mentioned that the charter of Edward VI. granted the borough of Southwark to the City, and shortly after an Act of Common Council was passed by which this was made a new ward by the title of Bridge Without. The mayor and aldermen named the first aldermen for the new ward, but the Act directed that the inhabitants of the ward should for the future elect the aldermen as was then done in the other wards. This Act seems never to have been carried into effect:" is a correct statement, 29–30.—The inhabitants of the Southwark ward have repeatedly applied, and are very desirous to be assimilated in all respects with the City of London. In 1788 they petitioned the Common Council for equal rights with their fellow citizens, 31–32.—In 1814 they petitioned the Common Council again, in consequence of which petition the Court of Common Council consented that aldermen should preside as magistrates in the Town Hall of the borough of Southwark; and in the year 1814, and for some years subsequently, an alderman did preside there. Some day in this year, in February, the gaol was sold by Messrs. Pullen and son, auctioneers, 33.—Thinks the gaol was the property of the corporation of London, 34.—States in answer to question as to whether the proceeds of the sale were carried to their account, that the latest financial accounts of the corporation are for the year 1852. The gaol was sold only at the commencement of the present year. Mr. Pritchard, as the high bailiff for Southwark, has 100 guineas a year; Mr. Payne, as the steward of the borough of Southwark, has 50*l.* a year; the prothonotary has 50*l.*; and there are the messenger and housekeeper at the Town Hall, and various other expenses. Then comes the Borough Compter. Mr. Newman, the keeper, has funds to enable him to pay the wages in the said compter—217*l.*; and Dr. Russell, as chaplain, for twenty-nine weeks, 60*l.* 18*s.* There are also entries for meat and potatoes, which show that in the year 1852 prisoners were in the Borough Compter. Those prisoners have been removed to the new City Gaol at Holloway, where Mr. Newman is also on the establishment. There is a court of record; courts leet are regularly held, 35.—The high bailiff of Southwark is appointed by the Court of Common Council, 36.—His authority does not extend over the whole of the parliamentary borough of Southwark; probably he may be appointed returning officer of the parliamentary borough, but as the high bailiff of Southwark he can have no jurisdiction over the three parishes which have been added as a portion of the parliamentary borough. The form of holding the quarter sessions is regularly gone through in the Town Hall, 37.—Does not think that it would be desirable to assimilate in all respects the ward which is on the other side of the bridge with the rest of the City of London. The inhabitants of the borough of Southwark are in this extraordinary predicament, that the City of London claims them as far as it answers its views, and yet it refuses them their rights as citizens. They are told, if they apply to the Privy Council for a charter of incorporation, that they cannot get it because they are a part of the City of London; and they think it very hard that they can neither be free citizens of London nor free citizens of Southwark, having an independent municipal corporation. Thinks that the course to be pursued in reference to them is, that the Commissioners should hear them, and judge of what is best in the common interest. Sees some difficulties in making them citizens of London. If the borough of Southwark were independent of the City of London it could apply for a separate charter of incorporation; Lambeth could do the same; and there would thus be for the whole of the south of London, from Battersea to Greenwich, but two municipal bodies for consultation and co-operation upon all questions of sanitary progress and local and social advancement. This would certainly be for the general advantage and health of this vast community, especially in respect of the supply of water and the general sewerage of this important district, which is generally supposed to be the source and origin of the malaria which so frequently and fatally afflicts the metropolis. Would contend that either the ratepayers of the borough, if the borough be a ward and part of the City of London, should have equal privileges with those on the north side of the river, or that the borough of Southwark should be dissevered from the civic corporation, 39.—Thinks that Southwark should be separated from the City of London, because part of the borough of Southwark is not a municipal ward, and three of the parishes of the parliamentary borough cannot well ask for municipal incorporation as a mere sectional interest. Does not know what pecuniary interest the corporation of London may have in the manors of Southwark, or in the municipal receipts within the borough of Southwark; but believes that the inhabitants of the borough hold for their part, that if they were severed from the City of London it would be just that the corporation of London should be made to concede to them a fair proportion of the pecuniary advantages which that corporation has heretofore enjoyed, or now derives or may hereafter derive, from property connected with the locality of the Bridge Ward Without, 40.—Thinks that the answer of the Court of Common Council given to one of the petitions presented by the inhabitants of Southwark to the Court of the Mayor and

Aldermen would give its prayer, or the effects of its prayer. There was a petition in 1814, another in 1836, and one within the last two years. Was present in the Court of Common Council when the last-mentioned petition was received and rejected. The Report of the committee of Common Council gives answers to the arguments set forth in the petition, and gives reasons for rejecting those arguments. The first objection they urge is this:—"The long usage of the privilege of the inhabitants, without reference to any corporate qualification, to return from their own choice, distinct from the City of London, two members to represent them in the Commons House of Parliament;" because this municipal ward of Bridge Without did certainly as the parliamentary borough of Southwark return two members independently of the City of London, and anterior to the grant of the manors to the City. One of the objections then to the petition on the part of the corporation is, that there would be an antagonistic interest in parliament to that of the City, or at least a separate interest, 41, 41*a*.—The petition was for a complete assimilation, not for a severance. The second objection to the petition is, "The concurrent jurisdiction of the sheriff and magistrates of the county of Surrey and the police establishment at Union Hall." But that was not regarded as a reason why the alderman should not sit at the Town Hall when they established it as a court of justice. This argument was not made available upon that occasion, when it answered their purpose to vote 800*l.* a year to one of the aldermen in order that he should sit there as a magistrate. That was worse than a concurrent jurisdiction; it was rather the establishment of a conflicting jurisdiction in the instance of an opposition court of justice. The third reason is: "The powers exercised by the high steward and marshal of the king's house, the said town and borough being within the verge;" in other words, the powers exercised by the Palace Court. But the Palace Court no longer exists, therefore that can no longer be an objection. The next objection is: "The contribution to the county rates, of which Southwark forms a very considerable portion." Of course if they paid municipal rates they would no longer pay county rates. It is a peculiarity of the borough of Southwark, that as a ward of the City it pays no municipal rates as other wards do, but it does pay county rates as though it were within the county, and not within the City, 42.—It does not appear that it has ever been made a part of the City of London, which is a county of itself, so as to take it out of the county of Surrey, yet the City of London can walk into this part of the county of Surrey and administer justice there. The next reason is: "The erection of a new gaol, or such an enlargement of the Borough Compter as may render it fit for the purpose of a separate and exclusive jurisdiction." That is a pecuniary jurisdiction simply. Since that they have the Holloway gaol, which is quite large enough; therefore that would be no longer an objection. The next reasons are these: "The being subject to the Militia Laws, and to the billeting of soldiers, the Commission of Sewers of the county, and District Commissioners for the paving, lighting, and watching of the borough, and other local authorities created by acts of parliament; the establishment of the metropolitan police in the districts of the borough; the power of the several courts of the City and its officers in respect to the attachments of property, foreign attachments, &c., although granted by the charter of Edward the Sixth, and the compelling of persons to take up the freedom of the City, never having been exercised in the borough; and the trial of nisi prius cases at the assizes of the county, for which it would be necessary to make some provision or arrangement for their trial within the City, as it is now done in London at the London sittings of the several courts at the Guildhall, &c." These were the answers that were given to the petition, forming the grounds on which the petition was refused. The question is, how the corporation can claim to hold the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark in their civic thrall, without giving them those privileges which it is in their power to give them, by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council, 43, 44.—There are citizens of London, freemen of London, resident in Bridge Without, whose feelings would probably be for perfect union in privileges as in duties with the City of London. But there is a far larger and much more influential portion of the inhabitants of Southwark who are not freemen, whose opinion is that it is not desirable to become a part of the corporation of London

as it is, but that it would be very desirable to become part of a corporation of the City of London such as it might be made, and such as it ought to be, and that the feelings of the inhabitants non-freemen of Southwark is precisely that of the inhabitants of the City of London north of the Thames, non-freemen, 45.—Does not believe that there is on the part of the inhabitants any general desire that the borough of Southwark should be taken out of the county of Surrey and annexed to the City of London, 46.—The City of London exercise jurisdiction in Southwark when the alderman sits to administer justice, the county having at the same time a police court within 150 yards, in Union Street, 47.—Is not prepared to say what is the feeling of that portion of the public of the City of London whose opinions he particularly represents with regard to this question of assimilation or of the severance of Southwark from the City of London, 48. —Thinks that it is rather a discredit to the corporation of the City of London, that though they have the control of the south bank of the river Thames, extending for miles, and they take all the waifs and strays, and all the water bailage, and so on, along that mileage of the river side, yet they neglect what appears to be their municipal duties with reference to the rights of the citizens and inhabitants of that locality, 49.—By an ordinance of the Court of Common Council representatives could be given to the ward of Bridge Without, and the privileges of a wardmote might be given to the resident freemen of that ward, so that they should elect their aldermen and common councilmen, as they are elected in the other wards; but whether Southwark could be separated from the county of Surrey without an act of parliament cannot say, as the question involves some legal technicalities which witness is unable to deal with, 50.—Would give a municipal constitution wherever it was desired, but would force it nowhere, 51.—It would be desirable that there should be a municipal borough in the City of Westminster; and thinks the same with respect to every parliamentary borough; and that there should be a municipal organization for each of those parliamentary boroughs, 52–54.—The municipal organization is to be obtained upon the consent of the majority of the ratepayers in each borough—the majority in number, and thinks the majority in rated amount. The Privy Council has not yet been petitioned, 55, 56.—Each municipal borough should have a separate jurisdiction, but not a separate police, 57, 58.—Does not think that the sewerage of the metropolis can be sufficient or effectual under different administrations, 59.—If there were a municipal borough of Marylebone, the police and sewerage being withdrawn, the functions of the town council would be purely local and independent, 60.—Does not know when the borough of Southwark first returned members to parliament, but it is of very ancient date; and this seems to show that they were not considered at that time as being an integral part of the City of London, 61–63.—Would rather place the management of the paving and lighting the streets with the sewerage than under those municipalities, 64. —Would not give to each separate municipality the supply of water, but would form a common council, which should have the power of supplying water under but one jurisdiction, 65, 66.—Wardmote functions convey the idea which witness entertains supposing there were a town council, 67.—The administration of justice is all that remains of a municipal nature; the office of justice of the peace, or paid magistracy, 68, 69. —If there was a properly elected municipality the appointment of the paid magistracy might be intrusted to that municipal body, 70.—Does not think that the administration of justice by the aldermen is more satisfactory than that by the magistrates appointed by the Crown in the metropolis; states reasons, 71.—The same objection would always apply directly or indirectly to magistrates appointed by popular election; but to a much less extent if the electors were the whole of the ratepayers, than where the electors, as in the City of London, are but a small portion of them, 72.—In that respect would assimilate the practice in the City of London very much to the practice which prevails in the large cities throughout the country, 73.—At Manchester and Salford, where there is a double municipality, and the town is divided into two boroughs, the system works harmoniously, 74.—Is not advocating, one way or the other, with reference to Southwark, but wishes to show the very peculiar and awkward position of that ward of Bridge Without at the present moment, inasmuch as they cannot have the rights of citizens of London, and yet they cannot apply to the Queen for a charter of incorporation for Southwark, 75.—There would be a conflict of authority if the ward of Bridge Without were united to the City of London without comprising in the union the whole parliamentary borough of Southwark at the same time. Thinks it would be necessary if the one were done to do the other, 76, 77.—To enlarge the boundaries of the City, so as to include the whole of the metropolis, the effect would be to overlay the commercial relations of the City of London; it would lose its commercial character; and it is desirable that the port and city of London should have a corporation of its own; and be able, by the agency of its municipality, to pursue commercial objects, 78.—London is too large for a single municipal government, 79.—With reference to the present constitution of the corporate body of the City of London. Thinks the corporate body conveys to the mind the aggregate governing body, taking the corporate body as a whole. The corporation is in bad odour among the inhabitants of the City of London. The freemen of the City of London, until the year 1835, were necessarily all members of a company of one of the many guilds, which by some are said to be part of the corporation, by others to be only connected with the corporation. It was in the year 1835, subsequently to the inquiry in 1834, that the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council decided by an ordinance that a person might acquire his freedom from their officers under the authority of that court without being primarily a member of any one of the guilds or liveries. The being a freeman of a municipal corporation should be a privilege, and if it were a privilege it would be desired; but it appears in the City of London this is not the case. With the redemption fine, ranging from 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* to 8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*, for that period of thirteen years, from 1835 to 1847, both inclusive, the number of freemen admitted was but 877 annually, as against 1,000 annually who had been admitted for thirty-five years, when the redemption fine was thrice and nearly four times the amount, 80.—There was no other way open of obtaining the freedom of the City at the same time, 81.—The numbers stated include the whole of the admissions. A person becoming free of the livery of any company takes the certificate of freedom to the chamberlain of the City of London, and on payment of the redemption fine is enrolled a freeman of the City, 82.—Before the year 1835, no person could become a freeman of the City unless he was a member of a company, 83.—One becomes a member of a company by applying to the company, or by the application of the company to him to compel him to take up his freedom, 84.—A person could become a freeman by birth or by apprenticeship; for instance, was an inchoate member of a company, as being the son of a member of a company, 85, 86.—Any son of a member of a company could become a complete member on the payment of a certain fee, his father being free previously to the birth of the applicant, 87.—In order to become a freeman of the City it was necessary to pay a second fee, 88.—Residence is not necessary in addition to the payment of the fee; but is necessary for other purposes, as will be seen presently. There were 1,000 people admitted per annum from 1800 to 1834, when the redemption fine may be taken at an average of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* Then there was a third series in the last five years, terminating with the close of 1852, during which term the redemption fee to the corporation was only 3*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* (there being a stamp of 3*l.* in addition), and with that enormous reduction from 30*l.* in the first series to 10*l.* in the second, and to 3*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* in the third, there was nevertheless a decrease from 1,000 annually in the first period, to 877 in the second, and to 650 in the third, 89.—The cause of that decrease is to be attributed to the bad odour in which the corporation stands in the City of London, to the non-desirableness of being a freeman of the City of London, and to the natural English feeling of resistance to anything that looks like compulsion against one's interest or one's wishes. The corporation seem to have been extremely anxious to increase the number of their freemen, and since the freemen will not come to them voluntarily to enrol themselves and pay for the privilege, the corporation will go to the freemen and compel them to take up their freedom. In the course of the last year the corporation went to parliament for a bill, taking the most liberal view of this question, being desirous of terminating and putting an end to the question as to whether the occupiers should be prosecuted, in order to compel them to become freemen (quotes from bill), 90.—The bill was brought in, in the session of 1852. It was introduced at the instance of the corporation of the City of London, 91, 92.—Thinks it was brought into the House of Commons by Sir James Duke, 93. —Did not pass. The preamble proceeds: "And whereas the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London are seised of or entitled to tolls on carts and other carriages belonging to non-freemen, conveying goods into or out of the said City of London." The second section enacts a very large concession. That is a declaration by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, that an occupier, who is not a freeman, ought to be admitted to a free participation in the equal rights enjoyed by those who are freemen. A meeting of the livery in Common Hall was convened, and the liverymen thought fit to reject the bill. The preamble was not proved, and the bill was lost, 94, 95.—This bill was successfully opposed on the part of the liverymen before the committee of the House of Commons. In that very year the Court of Common Council resolved that their officers shall forthwith prosecute occupiers, and compel them to purchase their freedom, 96.—Believes that the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council accepted that bill, 97.—In that year, when by that bill the corporation proposed no longer to ask the redemption fine from shopkeepers who were non-freemen, they actually proceeded to prosecute occupiers, by a vote of the Common Council, because they were carrying on trade, not being freemen; and at the end of 1852 the City officers prosecuted thirty-four tradesmen. The Court of Common Council seem to have been generally for prosecution, and the Court of Aldermen to have resisted their will, 99.—Prosecutions had taken place for some time previously to those specified by witness, 100.—As the law now stands, no person can exercise any retail business who is not free of the City, 101.—If he belongs to a trade of which there is a company, he must belong to the company; at least, the company can prosecute to compel him to do so, 102.—Thinks it is the general practice of poorer companies, especially if a person exercises a retail trade of which there is a company, to prosecute if he does not belong to it, 103.—With respect to the corporation, the general practice is for ward inquests to return lists of occupiers, not being freemen, carrying on business in the wards, and then the ordinary routine course would be that the City officers should be directed by the chamberlain to summon those parties, in order to compel them to take up their freedom, 104. —It is certain that the corporation claims the right to compel every retail trader to become free of the City, but it is certain, also, that it does not always compel, 105.—Believes that those prosecutions were in most instances successful; the parties took up their freedom, 106.—Thinks there is no doubt of the law on this point. If the facts are proved, they are sure of a conviction; they go before their own court, the Lord Mayor's Court, 105*a*, 106*a*, 107.—Reads letter from the City solicitor, explaining the report of the freedom committee of the Court of Common Council, which they made to the court after the rejection of the bill in 1852, 108.—The livery interfered, and procured the rejection of the bill by the House of Commons, 109.—The bill does not affect the constitution of the Court of Aldermen one way or another, 110.—Does not think that any one can bring one of those actions against a non-freeman. Does not think a freeman has any right to compel a non-freeman to pay a redemption fine. A freeman may not, according to the City law, employ a non-freeman so long as another freeman is willing to be employed. If a butcher who is a freeman employs a butcher who is not free, another butcher who is not free can inform against him, and procure the infliction of 5*l.* upon him, 111, 112.—Means if he employs a man as journeyman. Statement as to the 4,032 occupiers, against whom actions have been brought, 113–116.—This is not the act of a single corporate officer, but of several single ones, 117, 118.—The example of Alderman Finnis is partially followed by the Lord Mayor elect, Mr. Alderman Sidney. It is the common practice for the beadle so to make up their lists, 119.—The steps which the officials ought to have taken to obtain a more correct list would have been to have registered a man who had become free, and then to have transferred him to the list of the beadle of the ward in which he resided; in short, the method adopted was an unbusiness like way of proceeding,

121, 122.—The beadles generally possess sufficient intelligence for their duties, 123, 124.—Does not think that any of the numerous statutes and charters affecting the City make any provision on this subject, 125. —Does not know that any steps have been taken to remedy these defects, except the beadle sending round the notices already alluded to, 126.—Before 1835 no person could be admitted to the freedom of the City without the intervention of one of the companies; but in that month the Court of Common Council passed a resolution to the effect that persons might become freemen without being members of a company on paying 5*l.* instead of 25*l.* as a redemption fine, 127. —This resolution was passed in consequence of the municipal inquiry, but possibly it was before the report of the Commissioners, 128–129.—Thinks it was competent to the City by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council to make that alteration in their constitution, 130.—Agrees with the remark of the Municipal Commissioners on this subject, with one exception, and gives reasons for his objection, 131. —The livery companies include about 10,000 members, of whom some 7,000 are on the parliamentary register as liverymen. Of those 7,000 about 2,000 are also on the parliamentary register as occupiers; so that the inference is 5,000 of those 7,000 live in the suburbs of London, and are not occupiers in the City, 132. —Does not apprehend that many liverymen occupy houses of less than 10*l.* value in the City. There is scarcely a room in the City of less than 10*l.* value. Those 5,000 liverymen are not occupiers in the City of London, and yet under the Parliamentary Reform Act they are electors as liverymen, 133.—Thinks there should be no occasion for a man to pass through the sieve of a company in order to become a freeman of the City of London, 134.—Does not think it desirable that the municipal franchise should be in any way dependent upon a connexion with a trading company, inasmuch as trading companies have lost their use, 135.—The franchise for the election of members of parliament should not be more extensive than the franchise for elections for municipal purposes, but it would be better to put up with that apparent inconsistency for a few years than do an injustice to some thousands of individuals, 136.—The freedom of the City is altogether independent of the companies, 137.—All members of companies are freemen, 138.—There are seven kinds of freemen; some of whom are members of companies, some are not, 139, 140.—Proposes that in future the franchise should exist altogether without reference to whether a person is a member of a company or not. Recalls attention to the position of the Tower ward. There are 604 municipal voters in the municipal list issued by the alderman, and the number of persons rated at 10*l.* in the ward is only 587; so that not only has Mr. Alderman Finnis put parliamentary electors who are not freemen on his municipal list, but he has also put those who are not 10*l.* occupiers, 141.—The freemen of companies who are liverymen, but who reside beyond seven miles, are municipal electors in Common Hall alone; they are not on the municipal list. The inequality of the wards is a matter of notoriety, as the wards without, increase their population, by drawing the inhabitants from the central wards. In the ward of Queenhithe every twelve occupiers send a member to the Court of Common Council; in the Vintry ward every thirteenth is a member, and Bread Street ward every thirteenth; while in Farringdon Without every member represents fifty-one individuals, and Bishopgate thirty-four. In the ward of Bread Street there was once a contest for the office of alderman. In that contest 6,000*l.* was spent upon a scrutiny, 142.—Thinks that that contest took place about twelve years ago. It was between Mr. Hughes Hughes and Alderman Laurence. Believes it was settled more by chance than on the merits, as they reduced the number of voters till one had eleven votes and the other ten, 143.—It would be very desirable greatly to diminish the number of the representative body, 144.—Is not quite sure that there should be a Common Council at all in the present acceptation of the term. Looks upon the corporation as a body opposed to every liberal extension of commerce. The London Docks were opposed by the corporation at enormous expense, because they held that the establishment of docks would interfere with their receipt of money from ships in the Pool, 145.—The corporators of London, common councilmen and aldermen, are all of the shopkeeping class; and, entertaining the conviction that counter transactions in small coins have no tendency to give a man habits of viewing in a large sense any interests which he may be delegated to promote, does not believe such men have the power of promoting them, and therefore they are not qualified for the offices they fill, 146.—The corporation is an anti-commercial body. They refuse to assist in the formation of docks when they are necessary for extending the commerce of the City of London. They opposed the extension of the Blackwall Railway to the City. After they were beaten upon that in 1835, in the year 1845 or 1846, when the Direct Manchester Railway was formed, and application was made to the Court of Common Council for permission to bring that railway into the City, the corporation resisted it. The North-western became fearful lest the Direct Manchester should gain access to the City, and they should be excluded. They retained Mr. Lambert Jones, then a member of the Court of Common Council. The solicitor for the Direct Manchester, Mr. Ashurst, a member of the Court of Common Council, specially retained another solicitor, the present Mr. Alderman Wire, then also a member of the Court of Common Council. Those gentlemen united their influence, extended their forces, and eventually established a majority. It was money influence which was brought to bear upon the Court of Common Council, 147.—There is a great disadvantage in giving the command of large funds to a body which represents only a small portion of the metropolis, for the purpose of opposing bills before Parliament which affect the whole of the metropolis, 150.—In some instances the corporation have represented the feelings of its own local constituency, and at the same time opposed measures which might have been beneficial to the entire metropolis. Does not mean to say that Mr. Wire, Mr. Ashurst, and Mr. Jones could have turned the corporation round from exclusiveness to liberality if the public feeling had not been at their back. When the Direct Manchester wound up, and the North-western had nothing to fear from its exclusive access to the City, the North-western cooled upon the question of the expediency of bringing a railway from Euston Square into Farringdon Street, and the matter dropped. In reference to the Great Central Railway Company, the corporation have over and over again declared that it ought not to come into the City. Public opinion, however, at last triuuphed, and then the Common Council declared it to be very desirable it should, and there was a sum of between 200,000*l.* and 300,000*l.* voted to assist the railway company to realize its purpose, 151.—The corporators represent but a small portion of the area, and a small portion of the population of the metropolis, 152.—Does not think that because the corporation is the only municipal body in the metropolis it is a good one. It is one of the complaints of the City of London that the Government did it great injustice at the time of the Municipal Reform Bill. Draws attention to the anti-commercial dues which are imposed upon British commerce by the corporation. The corn metage last year amounted to 9,596*l.* The corporation claim a right to measure your corn whether you would or not; that is a grievance, 153.—Corn is measured whether there is a sale or not, merely upon its entering the City of London. The case of Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company, between whom and the corporation of London there have been legal processes pending for the last fourteen years, is as follows: they malt their barley out of London, and transmit it from their malthouses to the brewery in their own barges. The corporation interferes, and insists upon measuring it. They say, we don't want it measured. The corporation, however, claim the right to compel Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company to submit to the metage of their malt or barley whenever they bring it into the port of London. Upon the river Lee there is a charge in the finance report for the last year for so much per barge upon 870 barges going up that river subject to metage by the corporation of the City of London, 155.—In the case of Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company the metage was performed in the following manner: the men sat in a public house close by, and when the malt was measured by other persons they charged for porterage, 156.—Does not think that Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company have petitioned or complained to the common council, although they dispute the legality of the charges. The corporation pays year by year hundreds and hundreds of pounds to the City solicitor for the expenses of carrying on these legal proceedings. There are two proceedings against Messrs. Delafield and Company; one by the corporation for metage, and the other by the company of fellowship porters for porterage; neither of which questions have been decided yet, 157, 158.—With reference to the City tolls, believes the charge is 2*d.* on the carts of non-freemen entering the City. The sum received by the corporation in 1852 for these tolls was 5,810*l.* This, however, is not the amount exacted from the public, but is the amount received by the corporation as rent for the tolls, which are on the same system as exists with regard to turnpikes, 159, 160.—Does not know whether those tolls are put up to auction, but supposes they are let by tender, 161.—The tolls are taken wherever there is an entry into the City, 162.—Thinks the expense of collecting amounts to as much as the amount given for the tolls, 163.—There was an attempt on the part of Mr. Alderman Sidney to modify the practice of taking 2*d.* upon carts entering the City, but is not aware that it has been at all improved, 164.—Carts belonging to persons well known pay at the time of passing. In the year 1835, the Government purchased of the corporation all the duties on package, carriage, bailiage, and porterage. Thinks the corporation received 162,000*l.* Can hardly imagine that these were port dues, as the following item appears in last year's receipts: "By groundage and water bailiage on corn, 1,713*l.*," 165, 166.—The average constituency of each common councilman is twenty-nine; and the average rateable property that each common councilman represents is 1,943*l.* There are three governing bodies; the Court of Aldermen, the Court of Common Councilmen, and the Court of Common Hall, 167.—The Court of Aldermen are tradesmen. They are twenty-six in number. They are magistrates by virtue of their office, and are elected for life. They decide the validity of corporate elections, and even of the elections of their own body. The aldermen are elected from the municipal lists. Money is frequently paid by or for a candidate who desires to be elected an alderman, 168, 169.—Seven of the present body have been elected by a direct money influence, 170.—Believes that there is what may fairly be called a corrupt expenditure of money coming direct from the private funds of the aldermen themselves, 171, 172.—It has been the practice for many years; but there have been fewer cases of corruption recently than there were formerly, 174, 175.—The wards differ materially with regard to the comparative purity, but money influence is more exercised where the constituency is small, 176–179.—Has no doubt but that he will be able to produce witnesses to name the aldermen who are supposed to have exercised this influence, and who can establish the statement, 180–182.—Publicans are very prominently the agents in a contested election for the office of alderman. The municipal electors of the City of London are to a far greater extent frequenters of public houses than are the occupiers who are not municipal electors; and hence the publican seems to present himself naturally as an agent for bribery on those occasions, 183.—Does not think that political considerations enter much into the choice of the alderman, 184, 185.—Suggestions for the improvement of the election of aldermen, in order to remove or diminish the existing sources of bribery, 186.—Believes that there would be a disposition on the part of the higher class of commercial men to accept municipal offices if the municipal government of the City of London were so completely altered as that none of the ill odour which now attaches in their minds to the corporation of London should attach to them, 187–189.—Would do away with the office of aldermen, 190–192.—Does not see any advantage in the existing division between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council, as distinguished from the ordinary constitution of municipal boroughs, which have a single town council, 193.—Would certainly get rid of the aldermen as a separate legislative body, 194, 195.—Thinks that one great inducement to become an alderman is, that if poverty should overtake them there is always the situation of chamberlain to fall into. Saw in the accounts of money voted by the Court of Aldermen last year various amounts for the relief and support of persons relicts of late aldermen, 196, 197.—These sums are voted by the Court of Aldermen without any confirmation by the Court of Common Council, 198.—The Court of Common Council and the Court of Aldermen are quite independent of each other with respect to money grants, 199–201.—There is as much corruption in the Court of Common Council as can possibly be suspected of the Court of Aldermen, 204.—Whatever municipal body may have the government of the City of London, as they will be responsible to their constituents, the funds cannot be intrusted to better hands than those who are so responsible, 205.—The management of the details of those funds must always be referred to a small body in the shape of a committee, or to officers duly qualified, and giving sufficient guarantees for the faithful discharge of their duties, 206.

Acland, James, Esq. (Examination resumed.)—States, in addition to his evidence of yesterday, with reference to the Court of Aldermen, that all aldermen are governors of the hospitals of Christchurch, St. Bartholomew, Bridewell, Bethlehem, and St. Thomas's. They also license the publicans of the City of London, in both of which offices they exercise considerable influence, 261.—It has been said and is believed that some aldermen who are wine merchants exercised an advantageous influence for personal purposes. Is not aware of any alderman being a brewer, 262.—Uses the words "an advantageous influence" rather with reference to their being the governors of the royal hospitals, 263.—Means that their positions as governors of hospitals give them a certain patronage and power of recommendation, 264.—They have Church patronage, 265.—They appoint to some of the livings in the City. Many charges of nepotism have been brought against the common council of the City of London. Enumerates some, 266.—A portion of the patronage resides in the Court of Aldermen, 267.—Some of them are appointed by this Court, some by the Court of Common Council, and some by the votes of committees of the Common Council, 268.—The only officers out of the list who are appointed by the freemen of the liverymen are the chamberlain and the two bridge-masters. The list might be considerably extended. Admits that there are in both Courts gentlemen who endeavour as far as they can to resist the perpetration of such evils. States that the common councilmen are 206; not 240, as they were at the time of the last Commission. Since that Report was published there have been two material changes; the one a reduction of the Court of Common Council from 240 commoners to 206, leaving always the 26 aldermen in addition, 269.—The reduction was effected by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council, under pretence of making a fair distribution, and they certainly have a less unequal distribution of the representatives of the wards than formerly, 270.—It diminished the inequality of the representation of the wards in a very slight degree, 271.—Can state how it was done, by referring to the numbers of the wards given in this Report. The wards were not altered, but the numbers returned by some of the wards were, 272.—The numbers returned by the smaller wards were generally diminished. Aldgate has been increased from 6 to 8. Aldersgate had 8, and has still 8; it has 173 municipal voters. Aldgate ward had but six members and 227 voters. The ward of Billingsgate was reduced from 10 to 8. The ward of Bread Street, with only 106 municipal voters, has been reduced from 12 to 8 members. The ward of Bridge had 15; it has now but 8. Does not see why Bridge ward should have so many as that, unless there be a portion of them for Bridge Without. The number of electors is only 153, dividing which by the members of the common council for the ward of Bridge Within gives but 19 for each, 273.—Does not see that it has increased any but Aldgate and Coleman Street. In some cases they have been reduced. Farringdon Without, which as regards rateable property and the municipal constituency is most inadequately represented in the Court of Common Council, has not been increased. The municipal constituency of Farringdon Without are 815; it has but 16 members, which gives 51 constituents to each member, while several of the wards have but 12 or 13 to each member. The entire municipal constituency of the City is not one third of the occupiers of the City rated at 10*l.* and upwards, 274.—The Court of Common Council is composed of 206 members, who are elected annually, and 26 aldermen, who are elected for life. The municipal ward list serves for the election of both. The elections of common councilmen are generally preconcerted. In several of the wards there are precincts, which constitute a sort of sub-committee. At the precinct meetings, which are rarely attended by more than from 6 to 12, and very often not by more than 2 or 3, the list of common councillors is agreed upon to be recommended to the court of wardmote. At the court of wardmote the list is represented as the list of candidates recommended, and it generally consists of old candidates. At those precinct meetings it very often happens that cake and wine and other refreshments are provided for the few who are assembled to prepare this nomination list. Then, if any person be proposed as a candidate, he is proposed against this nomination list, and is put at the bottom of that list at the wardmote, in order to the taking of the votes for the election of the common councillors. He is considered an intruder. The preliminary committee of the wardmote, the precinct meeting, or, where there are no precincts, a clique of publicans (for they exercise very considerable influence in the election of common councilmen), prearrange who shall be the preferable candidates, and those candidates are returned directly in the case of precincts, indirectly in the other case, to the wardmotes, as the parties who should be elected. Is not aware of any case of direct bribery in the election of common councilmen. There is at all events the semblance of purity and popularity in the election of common councilmen, as compared with the case of aldermen, where there has been a contest, and where money power has been exercised. But considerable influence is exercised by the common councilmen in the distribution of the enormous patronage which belongs to them. That influence is exercised very generally in committees. It is an object with many individuals to become members of particular committees. Thinks allowances are made to the extent of 2,825*l.* a year by the Court of Common Council to those committees, to some committees 200*l.*, to others 300*l.*, and so on. Thinks there are about twenty committees, many of them exercising powers over very great properties, 275.—The committee men are paid in meal or in malt; in money for attendances, or in dinners, junkettings, swan hoppings, trips on the Thames, and a variety of ways in which this money is applied, 276.—In some committees the whole of the money is applied in the payment of those members who attend the meetings, 277.—The committees decide as to the manner in which the money shall be distributed; the total allowed is 2,825*l.*; the system is a great hindrance to business, 278, 279.—The committees appoint such officers as they deem necessary. Some of them have clerks, 280.—Those which have clerks are paid besides. The officers of the corporation are for the use of the committees. Gives instances, 281.—Most committees are standing committees; some for special purposes. Gives instances, 282.—Does not think the members were paid for attending the Wellington committee. Does not think that the common council voted a sum of money for that particular committee. They vote so much per annum to a standing committee for expenses, 283.—In the case of the Wellington committee the published accounts of the corporation shew whether they did vote money for that special purpose or no. There is great difficulty in getting a quorum to attend when there is no allowance. A committee, which has 400*l.* allowed it, may please to have an excursion, and when the money is nearly exhausted there is great difficulty in getting a quorum. There was a deputation sent to Ireland, and they had 400*l.* voted for their expenses. They went to Ireland; but they made a tour of the lakes to finish the money, 284.—Supposes they went to Ireland on business of the Irish Society. Sometimes, when there is a pile to be driven in the river, they vote 400*l.* for expenses, and the committee takes two or three days on the business. They go to Windsor or Reading, and take their wives, 285.—It is eating, drinking, and pleasuring money, 286.—In some cases it is used for business; in many for pleasure, 287.—Considers the allowances very small if used as a remuneration for their services, 288.—Jurymen are paid. They are compelled to be jurymen. They seek to be common councilmen, 289.—Many common councilmen are members of several committees. The great fight is to become members of those committees which have most money and most influence, 290.—Members of committees are chosen by vote of the common council. In 1849 the consolidated committee of the Court of Common Council made a report to the Court, the purport of which was that the newspapers had of late said a great deal about the corporation in no very flattering terms, which led Her Majesty's Government to misunderstand the motives of the corporation, and that a sum of money ought to be voted to the consolidated committee to enable them to put themselves right with the public through the press. The

Court received the report, and voted 1,000*l.* annually for this purpose. Is sure the effect of that is to induce a paper, by the purchase of a number of copies, to suppress what is unfavourable, and to give as favourable an account of their proceedings as it can, 291.—The details of the expenditure of this sum of 1,000*l.*, together with many others, are not laid before the public, 292.—The members of the consolidated committee have the management of the details of this expenditure. They determine what newspaper and how many copies shall be taken, 293.—Does not think a question is brought before the committee. The committee business is in the hands of two or three active individuals. Believes that application is made to them by people connected with the paper to take so many copies when they have an article in favour of the corporation, 294.—Does not know who the individuals may be who manage this business. The consolidated committee includes 14 aldermen and the Lord Mayor, 295.—It is a standing committee, 296.—A common councilman is only elected for one year, 297.—The same person is very often re-elected, 298.—It generally is so, 299.—A common councilman generally serves till he is promoted to some office in the corporation, or dies. Besides the 2,825*l.* allowed to the committee, there is 500*l.* for the procession on the Thames. Very much of the 2,825*l.* is spent in dinners at the hotels, 300.—Does not think that incompetent persons are generally placed in offices of importance, 301.—The higher offices are filled by competent persons, 302.—To some extent there has been an improved feeling of late years in regard to the selection of men to fill important offices, as, since the period when Lord John Russell announced his intention to bring a bill into Parliament to reform the City public censures have been so general that the corporation cannot but have seen the absolute necessity of being more careful and more vigilant, 303.—A clerk may be appointed to a situation of 150*l.* a year, who, probably, is not worth 80*l.*; still his incompetency is covered by the sufficiency of his superior, who takes the responsibility, 304.—Leaves the Commission to form a judgment upon the motives from the list of appointments he has read to them of sons and nephews of common councillors, and sons and nephews of aldermen and late aldermen, who are appointed to the offices, 305.—The common hall is a very ancient court of the corporation, and consists of the liverymen of the various guilds There may be 10,000 of these liverymen, and at whatever distance they may reside they are good electors at the common hall, provided they are on the livery of a guild. Of those 10,000, 7,000 and some hundreds are on the Parliamentary register, and residing within seven miles of London; the rest are either non-occupiers in the City of London, many of them supported by charities of the guilds, and a considerable number in most of the towns of the United Kingdom. There are not above 400 liverymen who take any general interest in the proceedings of the common hall, and something less than half that number may usually attend; but should say that the functions of that court are exercised commonly by from 50 to 100 of th-10,000 liverymen, 306.—Those functions are: the election of the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, the chambere lain, the bridge masters, the auditors, and officers called aleconners, 307.—The attendance is larger when it is anticipated there is a real fight to come off than if the arrangement is preconcerted, and all settled beforehand, 308.—The elections are almost all arranged beforehand, the above-mentioned 400 liverymen being at the beck and call of two, three, or four individuals, who may be called the managers of the common hall elections, which are generally conducted under a system of undisguised bribery and corruption, 309.—This remark applies sometimes, though not generally, to the election of Lord Mayor; almost invariably to the elec tion of sheriffs; and with very few exceptions to tha- of chamberlain and aleconners, 310, 311.—The corruption upon the present system commenced in 1831, when there was an election for the office of mayor between Sir John Key and Sir Peter Laurie. Thinks it was for the second mayoralty of Sir John Key. Alderman Lucas took a prominent part in the election, and, being an extensive lighterman, he was well known along the shores of the Thames by the people connected with the navigation and business of the Thames, who, under the corporation, must of necessity be freemen, in order to hold certain offices, or members of livery companies, because the occupations of those people are corporate, and they must of necessity be liverymen to be members of the waterman's company, or fellowship porters, or any of those trades connected with the commerce of the Thames in the hands of the corporation of London. The election cost for the two candidates from 12,000*l.* to 15,000*l.*, a very large proportion of which went to those men who are now called 'long shore men, large bodies of whom were brought by Alderman Lucas to vote for his friend Alderman Key, 312.—By 'long shore men now is meant all those liverymen who are to be bought for tickets of 1*s.* or 1*s.* 6*d.*, who recognize their leaders in the self-constituted managers of those elections, and who, by preconcert, go to the hall on every occasion of an election to hold up their hands. When it comes to a contest, it is taken out of the hands of the 'long shore men, and of course the great body of the livery are appealed to, and in most cases respond to the appeal, 313.—Generally the holding up the hands settles the business; for, the constituency being large, and distributed over the kingdom, a poll is a very costly affair, 314.—The 'long shore men are not divided specifically into bodies, but each of those three or four managers considers that he has an influence over this or that man, and calculates that he can bring up a certain number of voters, 315.—In electoral matters party politics have nothing to do with this organization. The question is how much can the voter make by the transaction, 316.—In all contested elections by the liverymen, similar to the contest between Sir John Key and Sir Peter Laurie in 1831, a considerable portion of the money is spent in defraying expenses, 317.—Had no personal means of becoming acquainted with the fact, but there has been no secret of it made in the City, and the agents connected with the election have themselves avowed it, 318.—In the City of London it is held by lawyers, among others, that there is no law against bribery at common hall elections, and possibly at municipal elections, 319.—It is believed in the City that at municipal elections no personal consequences will ensue disadvantageous to the party taking or giving a bribe, 320.—No one could bring in question before a court of justice the validity of an election, all being parties to the transaction. There was an election in 1846, between Sir George Carroll and Mr. Thomas Wood, which cost 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*, 321.—At an election for members of Parliament, you must get the man into a room by himself, and then bribe him. In the City of London no such concealment is necessary. You go to the committee room of a candidate, where you can ascertain the market price of your vote, whether 2*s.* 6*d.* or 10*l.*, and you can get it and take it, 322.—It is a matter of notoriety that open bribery is practised at municipal elections in the City of London, and no less a matter of fact that the elections at common hall are almost invariably venal, 323.—Bribery is practised in two ways at common hall. Men are bribed to prevent the election of a man to an office he does not wish to fill, or they are bribed to secure the election of a candidate to an office which he desires to fill, 324.—The most recent instance of bribery was in the election of the Lord Mayor elect, Mr. Alderman Sidney. It was only to the extent of 200*l.* or 300*l.*, 325.—Mr. Alderman Sidney is generally supposed to be a corporate reformer. It was not thought desirable in the City that he should be Lord Mayor, and it was declared by an agent that two other names should be returned to the Court of Aldermen from which to select the chief magistrate; but the party who made this threat, who was a manager of those 'long shore men, received a bonus, under the inducement of which he did not carry his threat into execution, 326.—In the last election to the office of chamberlain, which took place this year, the committees of the rival candidates openly tendered payments of money to those who voted for their respective candidates, 327.—The candidates were Sir John Key, the present chamberlain, and Mr. Scott, the chief clerk,—the deputy chamberlain,—the man who does the business in the office, 328.—It was a very closely contested election, 329.—There were committee rooms open for the two candidates, at which bribes were undisguisedly tendered to the voters. Was a retained agent for one of the candidates, but not on the committee, 329–331.—Money was given to parties to vote in favour of Mr. Benjamin Scott, the candidate for whom witness was agent, 332, 333.—Within his personal knowledge, money was certainly given to persons to vote for Mr. Scott, but would state, in addition, that Mr. Scott was certainly the popular candidate, and being an advocate of purity of election, it was only in consequence of the wholesale bribery of the other party, which jeopardized the election of the man who really had the majority of legitimate votes, that Mr. Scott paid to a very limited number of persons money for their votes, 334.—Has no doubt these payments were made with Mr. Scott's knowledge. There was no necessity to bribe, if the legitimate liverymen polled in sufficient strength for Mr. Scott as they did for a considerable portion of the time of the poll; but when the numbers were turned, and it was known, as will be proved, that Alderman Key was bribing largely, a small and insufficient effort was made to counteract it, and Mr. Scott was urged to spend another thousand pounds, by which means he might win his election, but declined to do so, 335.—In particular cases, parties were solicited to vote for Mr. Scott, but had been offered higher terms from Sir John Key, which they afterwards accepted. This was confirmed from information received from the agents in the payment of money from Sir John Key, 336.—Mr. Scott's committee believing that extensive bribery was practised on the other side, wrote circulars to liverymen living at Bristol, Manchester, and other considerable distances, informing them their expenses would be paid, which by liverymen in the City of London is always understood to mean something more than expenses, 337, 338.—The disfranchising all liverymen who do not reside within seven miles of St. Paul's would not materially affect the question. Thinks the majority of those who come up from the country come from feelings of desire for corporate reform. It is somewhat singular, that this was an election in which the aldermen took one side, and the general feeling of the reputable livery and even the bribed portion of the livery was on the other, 339.—The aldermen voted on the side of their brother alderman, Sir John Key. They imagine the chamberlaincy is an heirloom to their court for decayed aldermen, and felt that it would break through that rule, and prejudice the anticipations of some of them, if Alderman Key were not elected to the office, and nineteen of them agreed to find 100*l.* apiece towards turning the scale. 340.—The office of chamberlain of the City is a very high office, with a good salary, and large advantages, but very little to do. The duties, however, are so complicated, that it requires a man of great clearness of intellect, great assiduity and experience in the office, to discharge them; therefore worn-out aldermen are not the best qualified persons to fill the office; and those duties are almost all of them discharged by Mr. Scott, who for that reason, as having been acting and efficient chamberlain for many years, sought the office of chamberlain, 341.—The principal had better not give much attendance or perform many duties, inasmuch as he is not so competent to discharge them as his deputy, 342.—Does not believe 2,500*l.* a year to be, by a considerable sum, the full amount of the emoluments for the office of chamberlain. Mr. Scott might probably be able to give the most correct information on that point. The chamberlain himself might be the most competent person to inform the Commission, but is not sure of that. He has a privilege in reference to the balance in hand which is not clearly understood. There was a certain fund applied by Act of Parliament to buying up and exhausting certain offices. They have all been bought up and exhausted, and believes there is a balance of 70,000*l.* left, which cannot be disposed of without special Act of Parliament, 343.—The chamberlain has the use of it, to this extent, that if there be an expenditure of corporate estate funds beyond the assets in hand he has always the power of taking temporary accommodation from it, 344.—As no account is rendered of any interest on such sum, believes the chamberlain must have the advantage of that accruing interest, 345.—Is not aware that it has ever been investigated by any of the public bodies of the City, 346.—The annual profit accruing to the chamberlain upon the balance in hand is put considerably too low, as fluctuating between 1,000*l.* and 2,000*l.*, 347, 348.—No alteration has taken place in the mode of remunerating this officer, "by making his emolument dependent upon "his dealing with the balance intrusted to his care." If it were not an heirloom of the Court of Aldermen no such system would be allowed to exist, 349.—Objects both to the amount of remuneration and the mode in which it is given. On the part of the chamberlain himself, it is an office nearly approaching to a sinecure, but it is one of great labour and responsibility to the deputy or chief clerk, by whom the duties are performed, against whose salary the duty should be set, and not against that of the chamberlain, 350, 351.—He is not called the deputy chamberlain, but is certainly a servant of the chamberlain. An overture was made to Mr. Scott during the contest, that his situation should be improved pecuniarily if he would resign, but if he persisted in the poll he would lose his appointment. He did not resign, nor has he been removed. There is no other person of experience who could take the office, the duties of which are very laborious and responsible, as referring to such large accounts for a corporation like that of the City of London, 352–355.—The unsuccessful candidate, with a small salary, discharges the responsible duties of the office for the successful candidate, who receives a large salary, 356.—Cannot say why Mr. Scott remains, as he did not succeed in obtaining the office of chamberlain, 357.—The chamberlain appoints the principal clerk, Mr. Scott, but thinks the latter has a voice in the appointment of the subordinate clerks, of which there are several, his brother holding one office, 358.—Mr. Scott would have been fully competent to the duties of chamberlain, but thinks the salary now paid to the chamberlain would have been an excessive addition to Mr. Scott's present salary. Has no doubt he would discharge the duties for 2,000*l.*, and just as ably as they are now performed at 1,000*l.* for himself and 3,000*l.* for the chamberlain, which for the sake of argument we will suppose to be the amount of salary now received, 359–361.—The chamberlain and clerk or deputy have each to give securities, the latter to the chamberlain, 362–364.—Mr. Scott is paid by the City, 365.—Cannot imagine any advantage in keeping up a distinction between the constituency of the common hall and that of freemen. Sees no reason why the freemen should not have the power of electing the lord mayor and other officers now elected by liverymen, 366, 367.—The open system of bribery applies to common hall elections only, 368.—In the election of lord mayor, the liverymen elect two men from whom the aldermen select one, who is, with few exceptions, the next alderman in rotation, though occasionally an unpopular alderman will be passed over, 369.—It is desirable that the lord mayor should be elected directly without reference to the Court of Aldermen, and that he should be eligible from the general body of citizens, 370, 371.—The prospect of one day becoming lord mayor may probably induce some persons, among the present class of aldermen, to obtain the office of alderman, as the lord mayor can frequently save 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.*, out of the funds provided for him, 372–375.—It is desirable there should be a municipal body exercising such functions as the corporation of London now exercise, they being trustees for an immense amount of municipal property. They are bound properly to administer to the City estates, held by them as municipal trustees, 376–378.—Does not believe the citizens of London would be satisfied to be without municipal institutions, while there are such institutions in other great country towns, 379.—It would be preferable that the lord mayor should hold office for more than a year, 380.—The mode of election and time for which aldermen should hold their offices are regulated by the Municipal Reform Act. It would not be advantageous to put the corporation of London within the operation of the Municipal Corporation Reform Act. That would recognize the continuance of the Court of Aldermen, a certain number of whom would go out of office triennially, 381–384.—Under the Municipal Act there is no distinct Court of Aldermen; they are a portion of the town council. There is an annual election, when those who have served three years retire, and others come in, 385–387.—Nothing but the thorough reformation of the municipality of the City of London will induce the merchants, bankers, and higher classes of the commercial population to assist in the proper government of the City, 388.—With this reform, the inhabitants of the City would possess this advantage over the inhabitants of the rest of the metropolis having no municipal institutions, that the municipal funds held in trust by the corporation, meaning those which have descended to the present corporate trustees from times past, would be administered under the responsibility of popular election, by which is intended such an extension of the franchise that every person contributing towards the municipal rates should possess the municipal franchise, 389–391.—The aim in reforming the corporation is chiefly to provide a good machinery for administering the City property; excising the magisterial duties from the mere municipal functions, 392.—There are several other important functions; for instance, a power is vested in the corporation to impose tolls, restraints and annoyances, upon the trade and commerce of the port of London. This is certainly not a beneficial function, and one which ought to cease, 393, 394.—No doubt there are feelings connected with old historical recollections which would render the citizens of London unwilling to see themselves deprived of their municipal institutions, 395.—The City public entertainments have frequently a political purpose. It is convenient for the minister of the day, dining at the Mansion House, to put affairs straight with popular feeling, in the interest of his party, 396, 397.—Believes the annual allowance to the lord mayor for public entertainments is about 10,000*l.*, which witness thinks in the next mayoralty may not be sufficient to cover expenses. In the present it may have been, and in some has left an overplus, 398–400.—It is quite right that these expenses should not be defrayed out of the chief magistrate's own purse, as many of them could not afford it; but believes, if the merchants and bankers were members of our municipality, they would prefer paying them out of their own means, to receiving them from the funds of the corporation, 401.—The lord mayor's office is in the abstract an expensive one, but not as regards that officer himself, if more money be allowed than will pay the expenses. It must of course depend upon his liberality, whether he exceeds the allowance; but thinks that generally speaking he does not find himself a loser at the end of his year of office, though it is not thought creditable in a lord mayor, by his brother aldermen, to have saved money, 402–405.—In the Report of the Commission it is stated that the emoluments "rarely meet the expenditure," and that the excess of the outgoings above the income averages 3,000*l.*, though it is believed that frequently the lord mayor saves money out of the amount allowed him, 409.—The lord mayors differ very much in their expenditure, 411.—The office should be put in such a situation that a man of moderate fortune might accept it, and that the legitimate expense of it should be defrayed by the public, 413, 414.—Sheriffs are elected at the common hall, 415.—The expenses of the shrievalty always exceed the allowance made by the corporation. More money is paid for voting against than for the election, 416.—In the Report of the Municipal Commissioners it is stated that on an average each sheriff exceeds his receipts by 2,000*l.* This is outset by his having the power of appointing to the lucrative office of under-sheriff, hence the immorality of the common hall elections for the office of sheriff. There are more lawyers than men of any other description in the Court of Common Council, namely 21 out of 206. Many who are included in this number of 21 have been active in procuring such persons to be elected sheriffs as would appoint them to the office of under-sheriff. Lawyers are the originators of the system. It can be proved that in many instances one professional member of the Court has procured the appointment of many sheriffs for the above reason. They also procure a rejection of the sheriffs who have been named. The business is done in all cases by the two or three managers of the common hall elections, who with bribes varying from 1*s.* to 10*l.* can buy over the 400 liverymen, 417.—To do what the Court of Aldermen expect of him a sheriff must spend 3,000*l.* above what he receives, 418.—Each sheriff is expected the next 9th November to pay 700*l.* towards the expense of the dinners at Guildhall, 419.—The expense is divided between the sheriffs and lord mayor, 420.—The office of sheriff involves considerable expense; regular dinners are expected, also a dinner to the judges at the Sessions House, 421.—The duties of the shrievalty may be discharged with reasonable hospitality at half the amount which is now lavished upon the office, but in doing so the person holding the office must place himself in direct antagonism to the Court of Aldermen, 422.—Does not think the office either of alderman or lord mayor an expensive one, 423, 424.—The office of alderman has been extended for life on account of its patronage, 424.—The lord mayor is a magistrate, and has considerable patronage; has from 8,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* a year paid him to fulfil the duties of that office; must go through the office when elected, which is a reasonfor its being annual. Not so with aldermen, 425.—The mayoralty is considered too great a prize to be held for more than a year, 426.—Mr. Sheriff Wallis is a sheriff of economy. Difference between the invitations to his table and Mr. Sheriff Wire's. The corporation do not like the intervention of economical principles, 426.—There are two bridge masters, whose salaries vary from

200*l.* to 400*l.* a year. The office is procured by bribery, 427.—Auditors, the only other officers in connexion with common hall whose salaries are trifling, are mere formal officers elected yearly by the 400 liverymen, 427, 428.—Does not think the auditors qualified either by station or mental qualifications to investigate effectually the accounts, 432.—They are not generally professional accountants, but clerks, 433.—They audit the chamberlain's accounts, 434.—Argues that the audit is inefficient from the fact of the return of the accounts of the corporation for the last year being so very imperfect, 436.—In the Report of the Municipal Commissioners, the auditors, a few years back, applied unsuccessfully to the chamberlain for the means of investigating the ultimate application of all the sums which had passed through his hands. He being in many instances unable to furnish the full bills of particulars. The common council interfered to protect him; does not know whether any attempt has since been made to support the auditors in their demand, 437.—A person elected sheriff who refuses to serve has to pay a fine of 400*l.*, but can generally by bribery to the amount of 100*l.* or 150*l.* prevent himself being elected, 439.

ACLAND, JAMES, Esq. (Second Examination.)—States, with reference to a document which he handed to the Commissioners when last before them, that he has received a letter from Mr. Borlase Childs, requesting him to correct the statement, that he, the surgeon of the police force of the City of London, is the brother to a partner of an alderman, and wishes to withdraw his name from the list of persons holding under the corporation who are related to members of the governing body of the corporation. Wishes to correct his former statement, that the corporation had allocated a certain sum for the purpose of inducing a better representation by the press of their proceedings. Believes the fact to be this, that in 1849 a report was made by the consolidated committee to the Court of Common Council, to this effect, that whereas it appeared to the committee that the motives and objects of the corporation had frequently been misunderstood, owing greatly to the imperfect publication of the reports, the committee proposed a more systematic and periodical publication of them, and suggested that it should be left to them to make temporary arrangements for these purposes, and to report to the court the provisions, if any, which they might think fit to suggest for permanent adoption. The court resolved in the affirmative, and referred it back to the committee to carry the same into execution. Believes he before stated that the court sanctioned the allocation of 1,000*l.* to the above purpose, and that it has done so each year to this time; but wishes to correct that statement, as no such vote was come to as a formal vote, but is prepared to prove that it was well understood by the committee that the court sanctioned them to expend not more than 1,000*l.* a year for that purpose, 440.—The proceedings of the corporation are tricksy; there is much of that understanding as regards the appropriation of funds for purposes not to be recognized in public courts, where the press are, 441.—Assumes that the committee have spent the money, but cannot prove it, 442.—There is no trace of any actual vote, putting any given sum at the disposal of the committee. There is a sub-committee of three members of the consolidated committee, who have dealt all along with this vote as though it were a vote of 1,000*l.* a year, and have so treated it in figures, consultations, &c., 444.—They have purchased newspapers 300 at a time continually, according to their own admission; they have in their financial report an entry of 1,000*l.* under this heading: "To Mr. Hallkeeper," (who is avowedly the person who has dealt with the transaction of the newspapers,) on account of disbursements of his office, consisting of expenses of assistants, watchmen, newspapers, &c., in the year 1852; and several smaller sums to the same individual, including 100*l.* under the head of advertising. In the year 1851 is the same entry of 1,000*l*; 1850 the same entry; in the year 1849 the same entry. Believes in the year 1850 it is 1,200*l.* It is admitted that papers were purchased, but there is no account excepting the entry of 1,000*l.* to the hallkeeper, 445.—Does not doubt the accuracy of the report in the public papers, of a statement of Mr. Wood, in which he says that the money spent in buying newspapers has not exceeded 150*l.* a year; but remarks that it is not denied that any other sum was paid with reference to dealings with the press,

446.—Cannot prove that payments have been made out of this 1,000*l.* beyond the 150*l.*; but states that the sub-committee had it under consideration to publish a newspaper of their own, with the balance which they had not spent of the 1,000*l.*, and the 1,000*l.* accruing for the year ensuing, and the 900*l.* which they pay for the shorthand writer's report of the Old Bailey proceedings. It was proposed to throw those reports into their own newspaper, 447.—As the sub-committee have never had the manliness to publish a report of the 150*l.* which they acknowledge to have spent, and as they have the power to spend the whole 1,000*l.*, witness argues that they are open to the assumption that they may have spent it all, 448–451.—The committee spent money at that period in in deavouring to establish a newspaper called the Citizen, 453.—The Old Bailey reports are on sale at Cheapside, but believes they are entirely given away, 454, 455.—Believes the Court of Hustings to be an obsolete one. There are many complaints is the Lord Mayor's Court, with reference to foreign attachments; is not able to enter into details, 456.—The Sheriffs' Court is still so called, though it is in point of fact a County Court. The City of London opposed the extension of the County Courts Act within its jurisdiction, till compelled by public opinion to apply to Parliament for a specific Act for extending to it the operations of that court. The operation of that Act proved very beneficial; business increased enormously; profits are considerable; fees are in consequence much reduced. The court presided over by a judge appointed by the Court of Common Council, many members of which are traders, and often plaintiffs in the court, and many are lawyers, and often appear before the judge as representing parties to suits before him; and it has been said that when legal gentlemen who are members of the court ask for costs, they get them more readily and more frequently than others; has never heard improper motives urged against the judge of the court, but thinks his position with reference to those who appoint him open to objection, 457.—The judge should be appointed by the Crown, 458.—The jury are not able to interfere with the awarding of costs, 462.—Aldermen are generally quite unfit for the office of magistrates, 463.—Recommends barristers for that office; to be appointed by the Crown, and to receive salaries, like the magistrates of Liverpool, to be paid out of the funds of the corporation, 464–467.—The recorder of London is appointed by the Court of Aldermen. The present appointment is highly to their credit, 469–472.—Would propose that there should be an end of the Court of Aldermen, and that in future the recorder should be appointed by the Crown, 473, 474.—The recorder is so appointed in all other corporations by the late Act; and is strongly opposed to the City of London being made an exception. It seems unjust to use its old charters as a guard, to exempt it from being dealt with as other portions of the empire. It is objectionable, because, if it thereby got better terms other parties would be dissatisfied, and if worse terms then it might complain it had not equal justice, 475.—Has a very strong opinion that the more commercial portion of the City of London will not participate in any municipal arrangement which continues anything like the existing system. The municipal institutions of other towns, under the Municipal Reform Act, secure aldermen as well as common councilmen; but the aldermen of the City of London have rendered themselves so unpopular with the superior classes of the civic community that he doubts whether that class would become a portion of the reformed corporation, if it resembles the present as nearly as that in the provinces, 476.—The name of aldermen would always involve ridicule in the City of London, 477.—Does not think it desirable to abolish the mayor and sheriffs, 478.—Does not object to an alderman in Manchester, but only to what the term alderman implies in London, 479.—However the functions and situation of alderman might be altered there would still be an objection to retaining the name in London, as it is most desirable that the higher class of the community should be induced to co-operate in the municipal government of the City of London, 480.—Statement respecting the Old Bailey, 481.—The same objections apply to the system of the county magistracy in England, at the sessions, as to the Old Bailey, 482.—The committing magistrates sit on the bench at quarter sessions in counties; but takes objection, first, in principle, to the system as applied to the City, 483.—Practically the trials in the City of London are always at the Old Bailey; there are no quarter sessions, 484.—Knows of no other criminal court than the Old Bailey, 485.—When the recorder, the common sergeant, or judge of the Sheriffs' Court, sits as judge, the aldermen take part in the proceedings on trials at the Old Bailey. Does not know if they do when the judges of the land preside; but the three courts sit at the same time, and the aldermen are necessary to the constitution of the other courts. Was present at one of the three Old Bailey courts within the last fortnight, when the seat of honour was occupied by an alderman, and a judge of the court was in an inferior position; it was not the principal court, 486, 487.—In the principal court the lord mayor sits in the middle of the court, because he is considered the head of the commission, but he takes no part in the proceedings. In the other case the alderman takes the seat of honour, 488.—The Old Bailey absorbs all the attention, 489.—There is less sessional business in the shape of trials in the City of London than elsewhere, partly because the alderman is generally prayed to deal summarily with the case, when he has the power, which is much more extensive than it was, 490, 491.—The principal alteration he would suggest in the superior criminal courts of the City is, that the magistrate should take no part in them, whether he be an alderman or not. Would next mention a practice at the Old Bailey which is most objectionable, but which is sanctioned by the corporate authorities, that of setting apart the best places in the court, in the shape of a gallery, and charging money for admission into it, 492.—Cannot tell the precise proportions which the different officers of the corporation get of this money, but knows that money is actually taken by the doorkeeper, who is the tenant, contracting with the under-sheriffs, believes per annum. Understands that a part of the money received by the under-sheriff from the doorkeeper goes to the lord mayor, another part to the mace bearer, and another part to enhance the profits of the sub-shrievalty, 494, 495.—The doorkeeper, who is usually one of the footmen or servants of the sheriff, pays a sum of money under contract to the sheriff, chancing whether he makes a profit or loss, 495–497.—The payments made by the doorkeeper to the under-sheriff are notorious, and it is also notorious that the doorkeeper pays the under-sheriff for his place, 498–500.—The fee exacted by the doorkeeper varies in proportion to the interest the public take in the trial. Whilst on the subject of civil and criminal courts, wishes to mention that the corporation, by its officers, makes out the jury panels; that the moment a person is elected a common councillor his name is removed from the common jury panel, and put upon the special jury. There are members of the Court of Common Council who are constantly in attendance on those courts, in order to get their guineas as special jurors. The same thing used to occur at the Nisi Prius Court at Guildhall, and has no doubt that some of them made very good special jurymen, 501, 502.—The Courts of Conservancy of the Thames are generally considered mere excuses for parties of pleasure for the lord mayor, aldermen, and friends. The aldermen receive 13*s.* 4*d.*, for attending each court in the out counties; thinks, Kent and Essex; and 10*s.* for each court in the home counties; Middlesex and Surrey, 503. By the municipal law a freeman may not employ a non-freeman to the prejudice of a freeman, which law tends to give the freeman a higher rate of wages than the other can command, and without regard to the value of the labour. Gives a case, and thinks it a most objectional monopoly in favour of a small section of the operatives, not only against the employers but to the prejudice of the great mass of the labouring class, who must not undertake work unless they pay the corporation 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for the privilege of doing so, 504.—Does not think the magistrate fined illegally, but thinks the law must be wrong which caused him to regret being obliged to fine, 505.—Is quite sure that the rate of wages received by labourers thus incorporated is much higher than labourers of the same description who are not. Gives a case, 506.—Besides the payment of an entrance fee, some companies have bye laws limiting the number of their members, the higher class companies especially, and those which are trustees of very large estates, 507, 508.—In all companies which admit operatives they are admitted as a right upon paying the admission fee, but all those companies which demand the highest price in the shape of fines necessarily exclude operatives. Suppose the fine to be 15*l.*, how few could find that sum. Since the year 1835 an operative may become free of the City on paying 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, 509, 510.—Being free of the City does not entitle a man to be free of any company, nor enable him to become a fellowship porter, 511.—There is one fixed price of admission to fellowship porters, fixed by their rulers, 512, 513.—A poor company is never full, as the admission of freemen is a great source of income. In rich companies they are exclusive, 514.—If a man becomes a freeman of the City, the ordinance of 1835 holds him harmless to work as a journeyman butcher, 515.—Wards do not comprise any certain number of parishes. Parishes are broken in the arrangement of wards, which is very objectionable. Charities are sometimes left to wards, sometimes to parishes, sometimes between the two, and as wards do not comprise entire parishes there is great difficulty in the arrangement, 516.—As the present division of wards cannot be maintained, it is scarcely desirable to keep up the division, except for the charitable purposes of the trust, 517, 518.—If there be a division in the City of London, it need not be in the form of wards; objects to that form as it encourages party feeling and local prejudices, 519, 520.—If there be anything in the objection it would apply to other towns in England as well as London, 521.—Has no plan prepared for the better government of the City of London, but is preparing one, 522.—Admits that the City of London police is well managed, but thinks that the metropolitan police should be homogeneous, and under one authority, 523.—The City district is not only surrounded but intersected by the metropolitan police; there are parts of the City which a City policeman has no right to enter. Alludes especially to the parishes of St. Bartholomew and Glass House Yard, 524.—Does not know that the expenditure is extravagant, but on general principles thinks the consolidation of the two would tend to greater economy in the management, 525.—The extension of the metropolitan police with the City of London police would require a greater increase of the staff than would be necessary in any other portion of the metropolis. Lives in Milk Street, Cheapside, and knows that the warehouses and counting-houses of the City of London are left in the sole custody of the police, 526.—Port of London is an intricate subject because of the defects of the present municipal system. The corporation assume to be conservators of the Thames; but it is of the highest importance to the commercial interests of the City of London that they should not remain so. Their power under their old charters enables them to impose so many vexatious restrictions upon trade that it is highly desirable those charters should be abrogated, and the port of London be set free. Statements as to metage duties, 527.—The City of London's account of its revenue is incomprehensible. Ventures to say they have nothing like the amount of cash in hand they profess to have, 528.—They do not produce any account of their gross receipts, 529.—The account of expenditure is complete, if you take for granted, for instance, that 1,000*l.* covers newspapers and candles; but particular items are not specified; therefore, without a more searching audit, cannot say they are correct, 530, 531.—An effectual audit never takes place. That financial account appears under various heads. The corporation have mortgaged the present Smithfield Market for 100,000*l.* within the last few weeks, 532.—Believes that the City have an unlimited power of executing charges upon their property, 533.—This disadvantage results from the mode in which brokers are appointed in the City of London: a broker acting for the corporation puts a poor man out of court; he is backed by his employer, a wealthy corporation, to stand against which would be madness on the part of a poor man. The effect of the corporation licensing a man to act as a broker gives a fictitious position to that broker. He gives security for a most inefficient amount, but he pays a fine for his admission to the freedom of the corporation, which is the great object of the brokerage system, as far as the corporation is concerned. If it is desirable that a broker should be licensed, the licence should be efficient as a guarantee to the public against any malpractices, 534.—Within the Stock Exchange they have their own rules with regard to the admission of brokers, 535.—Believes that it is necessary for a broker to have the sanction of the corporation and the Stock Exchange, in order to act, 537.—The markets, which are the private property of the corporation, yield a legitimate revenue; but with respect to Billingsgate, which is not their property, but which they lay claim to, they have acted illegally and oppressively. Produces the 9th and

When the Dock Act was passed a clause was introduced compelling the dock company to make compensation to those whose interests they interfered with. With respect to the free porters, it is contended that they should have, and it is believed that some one has had, for them, a similar compensation to that which the ticket porters received, 544, 545.—Thinks that the merchants of the City of London would buy up the privileges of coal, corn, and fruit meters at a fair estimate, 546.—Does not know of any trade privilege which it is desirable to maintain, 547.—The trade privileges are very numerous and various, 548.—Knows of none of public utility, 549.—Statement respecting the property of the companies, 550.—There was a good deal of bribery in the contest for the mayoralty of 1846. Gives list of persons who were bribed. Has receipts of 11 or 12 who were bribed on that occasion, 551.—The receipts were given under the shape of attendance at 10*s.* per day, 552.

ACLAND, JAMES, Esq. (Third Examination.)—Statement with regard to the Irish Society. It is in the interest of the 12 principal guilds of the City of London; and the salters company, having very few salters, were often obliged to substitute an alderman, which was so inconvenient that the corporation undertook its management by a Board, 553.—Cannot say how the change was legalized, 554.—It is still the property of the companies. The change had the effect of giving the corporation considerable patronage. Gives instances, 555.—There is a strong feeling that the Irish estates are not in good hands, 556.—Has no personal knowledge, except such as a perusal of the Irish papers has given him, 557.—Addresses a few observations to the Commissioners on the practice of the corporation, through their agent, the remembrancer, interfering mischievously with the passage of Bills through Parliament. Gives instances. Hands in statements with reference to charities within the City of London, 558.—Statement respecting the coal tax which was granted to repay money lent to the Sovereign in former times, 559.—Part of the proceeds of these coal dues is applied to the improvement of other parts of the metropolis besides the City. The citizens of Westminster have to pay 13*d.* per ton, and have only expended on the metropolis 8*d.* The City of London take 4*d.* from the inhabitants of Westminster. The fourpence tax received by the City in 1853 amounted to 62,440*l.*, 560.—It has been complained with justice that the corporation obtained an undue advantage in extending the 20 miles by the road to 20 miles as the crow flies, 561.—Thinks that it is unreasonable that coals brought by land should pay the same as seaborne coals, 562.—Reads statements of the produce and expenditure of the City estates for the year 1852, 563.—Duplicates of the account are extremely difficult to get. Is unable to understand it. Gives various items of the account, 564.—The chamberlain makes payments, the comptroller renders an account of what he thinks the corporation should debit the chamberlain, and in such account there appears 9,000*l.* more than the chamberlain debits himself, 565.—The comptroller does not execute the same duties as auditor. Gives case, 566.—Dues are to be accounted for to the comptroller before they are paid into the corporation, 567.—The comptroller's part is rather a preliminary check, 568.—The auditor bears no relation to the comptroller, 569.—The comptroller receives nothing; he is only the check, 570.—He renders an account. Has that account. It is a practice with the corporation to merge a great many items under one head. Hands in statement of the difference in the accounts between the comptroller and chamberlain. Hands in the charges connected with the office of lord mayor. The benevolences of the Bridge House Committee in 1852 stand thus: "The Right Honorable William Hunter, lord mayor, the usual benevolence out of the Bridge House estates, for feasts during his mayoralty, 50*l.*; T. Cotterell and R. Swift, Esquires, Sheriffs. The same during the shrievalty, 50*l.*,

571.—Thinks they are feasts in which the members of the Bridge House Committee participated beyond their allowance from the corporation, 573.—Does not think it is for the purpose of charity. These items come afterwards: St. Thomas's Hospital, 5l., Parishes of St. Olave and St. John Southwark, 2l. 13*s.* 4*d.*, 574.—Thinks that there is no head in those accounts under which such an item could fairly range, 575.—Does not know amount of secret service fund, 576.—Believes it is applied to any purpose the corporate functionaries think they have an interest in, 577.—Will let the Commissioners have evidence that some of the funds are misapplied for secret service, and are not accounted for. Hands in extracts from accounts referred to. Submits a list of returns to be demanded from corporation. The interest of the monies does not go to the chamberlain, but to the account from which he and that portion of the corporate establishment are paid, 578. —Means that there are paid salaries out of the profits of balances. Continues list of returns which ought to be called for, 279.—Thinks the accounts are drawn up in a form which shall be least intelligible, 580, 581.—Thinks they are made unintelligible on purpose, 582.—Has never heard of any complaints of the form in which they are drawn up, 583.—Has prepared a scheme to substitute for the present municipal government of the City of London, 584.—Gives outline of such scheme, 585.—Would have the coal dues abandoned at once, 586.—The book does not show to what extent they are mortgaged, 587.—Proposes that all mortgages and debts shall be paid off; that the Incumbered Estates Act for Ireland be applied to the corporation of London, 588.—Would sell the property of the corporation to pay all debts, Would pay off the debts of the corporation, 589, 590.—Cannot see how a corporation in debt can make a difference with reference to the specialty suggested as affecting its payment of the money it owes, 591.—Has made many calculations, and is of opinion that the economy which would be effected in getting rid of all useless machinery would go very far towards defraying the large expenses of that scheme, 592.—Thinks it is not insolvent, but that it does not know how far it is from insolvency. Simplification is the first thing necessary, 593.—Proposes that the whole of the landed property of the corporation should be sold, and the proceeds vested in the manner described, 594.—The Irish property belongs to the guilds, which are not part of the corporation. Let the guilds pay the value of any part which belongs to the corporation, 595.—The proceeds of those estates go to the guilds who found the money, 596.—The corporation does not receive an income for managing the estates, 597.—Has nothing more to say to the Commission at present, 598.

Adams, Mr. Serjeant. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As assistant judge cannot agree with the recorder that the effect of the restoration of the jurisdiction to the Middlesex Sessions has been injurious; on the contrary, though it has greatly increased his duties, believes that the public have been much benefited by the change, and is borne out in that opinion by the chief magistrate of police. The recorder states that if the criminal jurisdiction were concentrated, cases might be taken on particular days, witnesses need not be detained for a whole week, and the expenses would be much reduced; now all these advantages have been attained by the restoration of the jurisdiction of the sessions. In 1853 the sessions sat 132 days, tried 2,650 cases; there were but 40, which for special causes were not tried on the days on which the bills were found, so that the average detention of the parties in each case did not amount to half a day; and the cost of a trial at the sessions does not exceed 30*s.*, while at the Central Criminal Court it averages about 5l.; the saving to the country has exceeded 8,000*l.* With respect to the evil of "counsel handing over briefs to one another just to suit their own convenience," it is a complaint of very old standing, but doubts if it is caused, though it may be increased, by the increase of the jurisdiction of the sessions. There are other lucrative courts to which the bar go, and believes that the court over which he presides is not the only cause whereby briefs are so handed over. No counsel can take a brief for a case in the Quarter Sessions Court, without knowing at the time he takes it the day it will come on; the arrangements are so complete. The sessions are never overcrowded. Male prisoners are tried on Wednesdays, female on Tuesdays, all bailed cases on Wednesdays. This arrangement was made to avoid interfering with the

Central Criminal Court, which tries very few cases on Mondays, and the judges do not attend there till Wednesday, 7227.—Some of the same counsel attend the Old Bailey Court, but not all, and the question is whether the minor inconvenience to certain counsel of not being able to practise in both courts must not yield to the great public advantages resulting from the present arrangement, 7228.—The recorder in his evidence refers to a particular instance, in which the counsel was supposed to be at the sessions, but that could not be, as on that particular morning there was but one prisoner to try, who pleaded guilty, and the court did not sit 10 minutes. The Court of Quarter Sessions sits from 36 to 46 weeks in every year, and if the sittings of the Central Criminal Court were monthly the two courts need never clash. But the sittings of the Central Criminal Court, no doubt for a sufficient reason, are extremely irregular; sometimes the adjournment is for a fortnight only, sometimes six, five, three or four weeks, 7229.—Though at such uncertain intervals, they are all fixed days, but it is impossible for a court which has to sit from 36 to 40 weeks in a year not occasionally to interfere with the other. The sittings of the Central Criminal Court are fixed to meet the convenience of the judges, the arrangement of terms, &c. Every endeavour is made to prevent the sittings of the two courts from clashing. The recorder is of opinion that it would be better to consolidate the criminal jurisdiction, and have but one court. Such a consummation would equalize the duties of the metropolitan criminal judges, which are now most unequally divided, for while in 1853 the assistant judge sat 132 days, and tried 2,560 cases, the number of cases tried by all the judges of the other courts united, including the judges of the land, was only 1,135, and the number of days on which that court sat 56,—the recorder, common serjeant, and commissioners, sitting on an average 40 days each. If such a jurisdiction were formed it would obviate the inconvenience of the counsel having to attend different courts, and the prison officers would have a better means of identifying old offenders. Presumes that the recorder, in virtute officii, would be at the head of it, and a more efficient man could not be found to fill the office. Such a jurisdiction would only require about 36 sittings in the year, and the judges to attend, say 8 or 10 times. In cases at the sessions, believes grand juries to be perfectly useless, and, if dispensed with, and all ordinary cases of committals of police magistrates, much time and cost of trial would be saved, 7230.

Aldermen:—

The mode of election and time for which aldermen should hold their offices are regulated by the Municipal Reform Act, Acland, 381.—Under the Municipal Act there is no distinct Court of Aldermen; they are a portion of the town council. There is an annual election, when those who have served three years retire, and others come in, ib. 385.—The name would always involve ridicule in the City, ib. 477.—The court acts for the whole City in its collective capacity, Dillon, 697.—The court claim a very extensive power over elections, Pulling, 892.—Mr. Scales was three times returned and three times objected to by the Court, who then claimed their right to exercise the franchise themselves; witness objects to their possessing that power, ib. 892, 893.—Thinks the court sits about once in a fortnight or three weeks; they have the power to order prosecutions independently of their right to be apprized of questions which come before the Court of Common Council; thinks it an objectionable power, ib. 909, 910.—Within the limits fixed by the Court of Common Council the Court of Aldermen can exercise discretion as to votes of money for prosecutions, ib. 913.—The inducement the court have to interfere in respect to prosecutions is, that the aldermen individually are magistrates of the City of London, and are therefore sometimes exposed to a number of actions, ib. 916.—Has no doubt that they discharge the functions of a public prosecutor out of the city funds. The principle is bad, ib. 917.—Supposingt he power of the court to direct prosecutions were abolished, the cost would fall first upon the rates, and then upon the Home Office, ib. 920.—Are unpopular at the present time; thinks many of the powers which they exercise might be taken away, ib. 904.—It has become the common practice that no question can be brought before the Court of Common Council without the assent of the aldermen; the aldermen sit with open doors, ib. 905–908.—The elections of aldermen are generally free from bribery. Bennoch, 1239.—Has known the expenses of a candidate for an alderman's gown to be 1,500*l*., Wallis, 1378.—The court should be swept away, ib. 1417.—Would make them as responsible as possible, and would elect them every three years, Hyde, 1510, 1511.—Would maintain a separate court and keep up their magisterial powers; in Liverpool they are not a separate court, ib. 1512–1514.—One great evil is that they are elected for life, Alcock, 1767.—The first person who threw up his gown was Mr. Robert Williams, a banker in Birchin Lane, from which time there was a sort of slur cast upon the position, A. Cotton, 1797.—Power of aldermen over hospitals, Pulling, 1969.—Thinks they ought not to continue as magistrates though they have discharged their duties to the utmost of their abilities, Bennoch, 2024.—Perfectly independent of the Court of Common Council, ib. 2027.—The aldermen must pass through the office of sheriff before they can be lord mayor, and generally when there is any difficulty about a sheriff, when there is an alderman who has not served, they fall back upon him, ib. 2117.—Objects to their being elected for life; would unite that court with the Court of Common Council in one body, Morley, 2152.—The alderman having the conduct of the various wards show an admirable example as to charity, Rogers, 2668—There are two courts in which the aldermen sit as magistrates; at the Mansion House, when called upon by the Lord Mayor to assist him, and at Guildhall, Merewether, 4896.—Statement respecting the court, ib. 4909–4935.—The division of duties between them and the common council has worked satisfactorily, ib. 4979–4980.—Has never known the aldermen sitting at the Central Criminal Court interfere with the judges in the question of what the sentence to be passed should be, Stuart Wortley, 5497.—When any great crime has been committed, and the parties are too poor to prosecute, the Court of Aldermen are the most efficient body to direct proceedings to be taken, Pearson, 5668–5673.—Believes that they perform their duties more to the satisfaction of the citizens than any paid magistracy would do, Key, 5908.—The court always acts promptly with regard to condemning ruinous buildings, Woodethorpe, 6828–6829.—Does not think 26 gentlemen could be found in any assemblage of public representatives who could vie with them, either in their private or public characters; as a body they are possessed of between three and four millions sterling, Lord Mayor, 7146.—Would have the Court of Aldermen retained for the dispatch of the business which now comes before it, and that the aldermen should, as at present, be continued for life; they should have the power of appointing two paid magistrates for the police courts of the City. The aldermen should not have the power to draw cash, except for magisterial duties, and the scale of payment should be settled by the corporation at large, ib. 7161.—Would give to the aldermen the same power of appointing a magistrate in the police courts which they now have in the election of their recorder. In reducing the number of aldermen to 18 the public interests will require one or two paid magistrates, and would give to the aldermen optional power to appoint if necessary. Would certainly retain to the aldermen the functions of magistracy which they have at present, ib. 7200.—Would not deprive the aldermen of any power which they now possess, but in arranging a new system would leave the magistrates free from anything like the imputation that they have the power of drawing money out of the chamber for any improper purpose, ib. 7204–7205.—In right of their office are connected with the royal hospitals; they have the exclusive management of Emanuel Hospital. ib. 7206.—The statement made by the recorder contains the opinion of the whole Court of Aldermen, Farebrother, 7222.—Thinks the aldermen, from their business habits and information, are better able to discharge the functions of magistrates in the City than paid magistrates, Jones, 7795.—If magistrates, they ought not to be periodically elected, ib. 7797.—List of lucrative situations held by aldermen under the corporation in the eighteenth century, Pearson, 8476.—Statement disproving that they are small shopkeepers, as stated in No. 146, ib. 8478–8479. See also Courts.

ALIENS:

A great many are shopkeepers in the City; supposes it is winked at, Pulling, 777.—The son of an alien (British born) can become a freeman of the City, with assent of the common council, Merewether, 5185.

ALLCOCK, MR. GEORGE FREDERICK, (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a citizen of London, 1749.—Resides in the City, 1750.—Has been a wholesale and retail gold refiner and bullion dealer for the last thirty years, 1751, 1752.—Has never been connected with the corporation, but has taken an active part in the elections as a liveryman, 1753.—Wishes to call attention to the fact that this constituency does not fairly represent the citizens of London. The franchise now lies with the freemen householders for all wardmote officers. The freemen do not comprise more than one fifth of the inhabitant householders; the objection is that the freemen disqualify every other inhabitant, who unless they occupy houses and are free of the City have no vote, 1754.—Proposes the extension of the franchise to every inhabitant householder paying scot and bearing lot with six months occupation, 1755.—There is a combination of the old members of the corporation to keep out new ones. If any gentleman tries to get in for the purpose of making some useful reform, he is met with the statement, "We are very comfortable as we are, we do not want any reform," 1756.—The liveries ought to have no influence in the election of corporate officers. Some of the poorer companies had rights conferred on them in early ages which they exercise at the present day to the detriment of beginners in trade. Gives various instances, 1757, 1758.—Does not think it desirable that the liverymen should be electors in common hall, 1759.—Would deprive those liverymen who do not reside in the City of their franchise, 1760, 1761.—His house of business is in the Ward of Aldersgate, 1762.—There are about 900 inhabitant householders who would be entitled to the franchise if the word "freemen" were not attached to it, 1763.—There are less than 200 freemen householders; at the last contested election for ward officers only 110 polled, and they were brought up by the 8 common councilmen who represent the ward, 1764.—The alteration he recommends would increase the constituency of his ward from 200 to 900, 1765.—Such an alteration would secure a good representative body. It would make an entire alteration in the body who are now elected; they would be of a better class; the franchise now rests among the smaller class of shopkeepers and traders who prefer men of their class; the proposed alteration would enable every gentleman to support a friend if he felt inclined. The election of aldermen stands upon a wrong basis, they very often receive no vote at all; Sir Peter Laurie never recorded a vote in his life; when Alderman Cox died no one stood forward, so he was elected as a matter of course. The constituency is so small that in a great many wards if there was a contest it would not amount to above 30 or 40 votes in each, 1766.—The extension of the franchise would not remedy it so long as the inequality of the wards continues; the next point is the equalization of the wards; if carried out properly, you would not want half the present number of aldermen. Another evil with respect to aldermen is that they are elected for life, 1767.—Would have paid magistrates to the two police offices in the City who understand the profession and are not dependent on a solicitor, 1768.—Would allow the aldermen to remain part of the corporation, but not a detached part as now; they have means at command uncontrolled by the common council, they can grant pensions to their own relatives, 1769.—Would abolish their right of presiding as magistrates, because they are not men competent to perform the duty, 1770.—Would deprive them of their magisterial duties, abolish their separate court; incorporate them with the common council, and cause them to be periodically elected, 1771.—The extension of the constituency would remedy the various evils arising from the elections in common hall. If all citizens took an interest in those elections you would not find men come forward for a situation of 3,000*l*. or 4,000*l*. a year, and literally buy it. In the late election for chamberlain a person (not a liveryman) was paid for coming from the workhouse to vote, 1772.—If the common councilmen were elected by the extended constituency they might be trusted to elect the chamberlain and bridge-masters, 1773.—The lord mayor as the principal officer of the corporation should be elected by the whole constituency, which would prevent partisanship in the common council, 1774.—There would be no occasion to go to a great expense, unless there were corrupt means. In any reform of the the corporation, the bribery clause as applied to members of Parliament ought to be inserted. It would send back a great many who are brought to the poll if the bribery oath were put to them, 1775.—It is the general belief in City elections that bribery is not illegal, in fact they make a boast of it, 1776.—At the last election for chamberlain two guineas were given to some of the butchers in Newgate Market for a vote, 1777.—The bullion business has nothing to do with the corporation, 1778.—The only thing to complain of in the corporation with respect to the bullion trade is the founders visit, which produced no advantage; they withdrew all their charges, they gave notice at the Bank of England that they should seize their weights, which are the best in the kingdom, because they were not stamped at Founders Hall, 1779.—With respect to the election of aldermen, there was a contested election for the ward of Bassishaw; one of the candidates thought he could make half a dozen friends liverymen and present them with their freedom, and so carry the election; the opposite party heard of it and made twelve instead of six, and gained the day, 1780.—He paid the fees on admission of those persons to freedom, 1781.—Persons are entitled to vote immediately on their taking out their freedom. 1782,

ALMSHOUSES:—

The London almshouses were originally built for a particular purpose; that purpose ceased, and the subscribers withdrew their money to the extent of 843*l.* 15*s.*; but there are outstanding accounts for building, repairing, &c., amounting to 4,367*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, Merewether, 6773.

APPRENTICES:—

When committed to Bridewell are not allowed to mix with the criminal part of the prisoners. The bindings have been about 470 a year for the last 7 years. States nature of the bond, Sewell, 6270.—The Chamberlain's jurisdiction with respect to apprentices works beneficially, Merewether, 6758.

ANDERTON, JAMES, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the under-sheriffs of the county of Middlesex. This is the second time he has held the office. They are annually appointed by the sheriffs, upon their election, as under-sheriffs of London and Middlesex, but only derive benefit from their appointment as under-sheriffs of Middlesex. The secondary of London is, in fact, the under-sheriff of London, appointed by the Court of Common Council, 7589–7594.—The sheriffs usually appoint their own solicitors. There is also a deputy, who retains his office; he takes a certain portion of the fees, and a certain portion is given to the under-sheriff, 7595, 7596.—Witness's share of the emoluments last quarter was 175*l.* which is about the usual amount. It is not so much as it used to be, 7597, 7598.—The under-sheriffs have to keep a carriage and an additional servant, and are expected to contribute to various charities, 7599.—Has been appointed by two sheriffs, Sir John Musgrove and Mr. Alderman Wire, quite unexpectedly, 7600.—The under-sheriffs do not go on from one sheriff to another. Each sheriff appoints one, 7601.—The under-sheriffs attend constantly at the Old Bailey, and attend the sheriffs upon all public occasions. They used to attend the Courts at Westminster, but Messrs. Burchell now perform those duties, 7602.—The under-sheriffs do not attend at Nisi Prius at Westminster, nor when the Grand Jury are sworn at Westminster. Mr. Burchell attends, 7603, 7604.—The necessity for the office of under-sheriff is to indemnify the sheriff from any loss, and for that indemnity he has the fees of office, 7605.—It is a mere private contract, in consequence of the acts of the subordinate bailiffs. Had to pay in his former under-shrievalty from 200*l.* to 300*l.*, in consequence of a wrong execution on the part of the officer. Takes security from the officers, but in this case the sheriff's officer and his sureties failed. The under-sheriffs are liable to the amount of thousands of pounds, 7606–7610.—The secondary attends at Nisi Prius in London, 7611.—If the corporation would take the same responsibility in the case of Middlesex which they do for London, thinks the separate under-sheriff would not be necessary. The secondary gives security to the amount of 10,000*l.* to the corporation, besides having purchased his office; therefore in the event of his failure the corporation would be liable, and not the sheriffs; whereas, in Middlesex the under-sheriffs are liable to the sheriffs, and the sheriffs personally liable, 7612.—The system is precisely the same in other counties in England, 7613, 7614.—The secondary takes the security for the bound bailiffs; he is in fact under-sheriff of London, 7615.—In London the under-sheriff is not answerable for the conduct of the bailiffs; only in Middlesex, 7616.—Much has been said about the common council. Has been one of the representatives of the ward of Farringdon Without for seventeen years. Has had thirteen contests, but never solicited a vote nor spent a sixpence. The electors under the Parliamentary franchise consist of about 1,500, but is sorry that the number of municipal electors is only half that amount, and they are annually decreasing; last year the decrease was 58. That arises from persons not taking up their freedom, 7617, 7618.—This shows that it is important the municipal franchise should be put upon a more extended basis. With regard to the Irish Society, has held the office of deputy-governor. Went to Ireland in 1846, and examined the whole of the estates under the immediate management of the Irish Society, 7619.—The corporation of London appoint the members, but from that moment their authority ceases except as visitors in the event of any complaint being made, 7621.—The year after witness was in Ireland, a petition was presented to the Court of Common Council, complaining of the manner in which affairs were conducted; upon which the corporation, exercising their visitorial powers, appointed a committee to go into the question, 7622.—The object of the management of this property by the Irish Society is simply for the benefit of the inhabitants of Coleraine and Londonderry, where the property is situated, 7623, 7624.—A letter was received, with a copy of the resolutions passed by the Synod of Ulster, commending the Irish Society for what they had done in regard to Presbyterian churches. They also received an address from the Dean of Derry and others, trustees of Foyle College, thanking them for an additional grant to the college, and calling attention to the fact, "that in consequence of the London companies having withdrawn their annual contributions, the support of the school is chiefly dependent upon your liberality." Upon this the Irish Society established for ever an annual exhibition of 30*l.* for five years, therefore hopes they will always have five scholars at the Dublin institution, to each of whom there is 30*l.* a year allowed, 7625.—They have considerable property in Derry and Coleraine, 7626.—Much of it is let on perpetuity leases, and the houses are in a bad and dilapidated state, 7627.—In these cases a notice was served upon the tenant to repair, or the conditions of their leases would be enforced. Where parties had long leases and sub-let to others, it was determined to get rid of the middlemen, and as the leases fell in, to let only to occupiers, 7628.—The local manager of the estates is Mr. Green, at a salary of from 400*l.* to 500*l.* a year, with a house adjoining to Londonderry, 7629, 7630.—Is quite sure the society, by its agents, does not interfere in any manner as landlords in local or general politics in Ireland, and would remove any agent exercising undue influence over their tenants, 7631–7633.—The estates are managed chiefly by the agent; he is not agent for any other properties, 7634, 7635.—Is not now on the committee of the Irish Society. Thinks the great fault in the present system is, that no person except the governor can be on the society more than two successive years, and just as you are used to the management you go off, 7636.—It is a popular committee, as it is the only one of the corporation having line money attached, 7637–7639.—The governor, deputy-governor, and twenty-four members, were allowed 590*l.* 15*s.* for attending at fifty-four meetings held during the year, and their entertainments. Witness's share was 15*l.*, 7640.—The governor is seldom removed. Mr. Alderman Humphrey has held the office some years. It has generally or always been an alderman, 7641, 7642.—With regard to certain items under the head of tavern expenses and allowances to members from 1828 to 1831, referred to by the Commissioners, from the report of a case in the House of Lords, the Skinners Company versus the Irish Society, supposes the money was spent in line money and dinners, but the amount is not so large now by any means. While a member of the society, there were sixteen lawsuits, all of which were then settled. In the case of one action went with Mr. Wood to Ireland, and settled it without going to trial, receiving only travelling expenses, though both were professional men, 7643, 7644.—Gave in aid of public improvements and the employment of the people, 1,484*l.* Is not aware that the sum of 3,460*l.* was expended in the contested election of the late Mr. Alderman Thorp for Coleraine; there has been nothing of the kind during the last few years, 7645.—Is not surprised at anything they did formerly. The society was then composed of members belonging to the twelve livery companies. It is now chosen from the common council, irrespective of the companies, 7646.—The Irish Municipal Act provides that the corporations of Londonderry and Coleraine are to submit their byelaws to the Irish Society previously to their being presented to the lord lieutenant, 7647.—Has never known them to interfere with the action of the municipal bodies of Coleraine and Derry, but believes they cannot act upon any byelaw till it has been submitted to the Irish Society. Cannot tell whether there is any object in maintaining that power. Their powers are entirely confined to that part of Ulster, 7648–7650.—Believes some few years ago the power was exercised, 7651.—At present, thinks the byelaws would be agreed to as a matter of course. The corporation have nothing to do with the funds of the Irish Society, but it would be their duty, as visitors, to interfere if those funds were misapplied. It is so stated by Lord Langdale, Lord Lyndhust, and Lord Campbell, 7652–7654.—The London Committee go over occasionally to inspect their Irish estates. Believes the last three or four years they have been yearly, 7655–7659.—When witness went, spent 400*l.* There were seven in party. Entertained the gentlemen resident in the neighbourhood, the principal tenants, and clergymen of various denominations, Catholics and Presbyterians, 7660.—Doubts whether so much is usually spent. Was absent about a month, 7661, 7662.—Visited every estate, and almost every house. There was at that time great famine and distress; gave instruction to the agent that every labourer and poor man on the estate should have employment at good wages, and that he should buy up all the quick he could get for the purpose of planting the property, 7663.—The sum paid last year for the attendance of members was 560*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and for their visiting the society's estates 300*l.*, 7664.—The gross receipt for the year for which witness has handed in the accounts was about 8,500*l.*, and the expenses about 2,000*l.*, including 400*l.* to the secretary, who devotes the whole of his time to it. Does not see how the expenses could be much reduced. Believes the vice-admiral and some of the other officers have not been reappointed. There are many expenses a private gentleman would not incur; he would reside upon his estate, and look after it himself, 7665–7667.—With regard to the law expenses in the same year, which amounted to nearly 3,600*l.*, the society had got into debt considerably, having, in addition to the suit with the Skinners Company, sixteen advowson suits with the Bishop of Derry, all of which were then settled, 7668.—The society had foolishly given some vacant livings to Englishmen instead of Irishmen, and the bishop claimed the right of presentation. The law was in favour of the society, as the judges declared, but the jury decided in favour of the bishop, and he has got the advowsons. Thinks they are better with him than the society, 7669–7671.—Large sums were spent that year in the promotion of education, and other public and benevolent objects, 7672.—Does not believe the suit in which Lord Langdale's decision was given has made a material difference in the management of the society. There is every desire on the part of the gentlemen connected with it to manage the funds for the benefit of the people of the district, 7673.—In the year above mentioned the society spent 3,481*l.* for schools and churches, and for public improvements, and for the employment of the poor, 1,484*l.* Since that time they have allowed 700*l.* a year for the recorder of Londonderry, and expenses connected with the corporation and the office of mayor, 7674.—Believes there is a clause in the charter that some allowance shall be made, 7675.—The twelve companies claimed for many years any surplus which might remain in the society's hands, but the result of the law suit with the Skinners Company was to put an end to those allowances, 7676.—They now feel bound to spend all the surplus for the benefit of that part of Ireland in which their estates are situated, 7677.—In 1847 the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Londonderry presented a petition to the Court of Common Council, making complaints with regard to the management of the society. A day was appointed for hearing the petitions, and persons were to come from Ireland, but instead of coming, their solicitor wrote, stating that they understood, by the advice of counsel, that the corporation had no power to rectify the errors complained of, therefore they declined to attend them; and after considerable expenses had been incurred on both sides, the petition was not proceeded in, 7678.—The corporation of Derry applied for the allowance of 700*l.* for the recorder while witness was on the society, but were refused, as not having any legal claim; however, the society afterwards thought it better to make the allowance instead of their laying a borough rate upon the inhabitants. It is not a fixed annual charge, only so long as the society choose to give it, 7679–7681.—Should say Londonderry is a flourishing town, 7682.—With regard to the 4,000*l.*, entered last year as repaid to the Union Bank of London, they had to borrow money to carry on the suits. They were several years paying it off, but believes they are now free, 7684–7686.—Can give no account of the balance in favour of the society of 1,400*l.* upon the receipts of last year, not being now on the society, 7687.—They have a house in London built by the society; they are in daily communication with the agent in Ireland, and with other parties. There are also continual applications for charities of all descriptions, which are always closely investigated, 7688–7690.—Never expects public property to be managed like private property. They have done a great deal of good, more than a private individual could do, 7691, 7692.—Thinks they look after it, and manage it as closely as can be expected, and as honestly, 7693.—Whether it might be managed more economically, must refer the Commissioners to the observations made by Lord Langdale and Lord Lyndhurst in the suit by the Skinners Company, in which various charges of wasteful expenditure were made against the Irish Society. When witness was in Ireland, the deputation visited twenty-one schools, and gave them donations; sixteen churches and chapels. Laid the first stone of a Presbyterian church in Londonderry, to which the society gave a liberal donation. Also visited various hospitals and public institutions, and gave annuities and donations to several aged persons, 7694.—Refers to Mr. Hankey's evidence condemning the lord mayor's dinner at Guildhall as a heavy and useless expense. Produces copies of letters on two occasions requesting tickets for Mrs. Hankey. Mr. Travers says, "Nothing would induce the higher class in the City to undertake the office of lord mayor." At a dinner given to Sir John Pirie, heard some of the principal merchants say they would feel proud to fill that office, but could not afford time to reach the office by the duties they would have to perform as aldermen. Believes there are not twenty-six more honourable men than the Court of Aldermen. Mr. Travers alludes to "the smaller shopkeepers who belong to the common council." There is not a shopkeeper among the six common councilmen of this ward, which he ought to know. He says, "Every educated man thinks the office a humbug." Believes there are among the councilmen gentlemen of as high respectability and education as Mr. Travers. Hopes the lord mayor's show will never be done away with. Thinks it the strongest demonstration of the advantages of self and popular government. The tens of thousands drawn out upon the last lord mayor's day, without the necessity of a single soldier, and almost without the necessity for a single policeman, astonished every foreigner who saw it. Besides, it is the only working man's holiday in the year. With regard to the accounts of the corporation, was given a committee "To investigate the accounts of the City and Bridge House Estates, and report whether any reasonable retrenchments could be effected; also to inquire and report by what authority (if any) the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen grant pensions, and draw upon the chamber of the City for payment of the same, or for any sum of money, without the previous sanction or authority of this court." After which was chairman for several years of a committee, "To inquire into the duties, salaries, fees, profits, and emoluments of the several offices of the corporation; also into the amount of the City's revenue, the sources from which it arises, how expended, specifying each item in detail in this year and 1797, and report what reductions can be made; to consider the charges of admission of persons to the freedom; to inquire into the nature and extent of the duties of the prothonotary of the Borough Court, and the expediency of continuing the same, or whether any alteration should be made in the said office." Various alterations and improvements in the mode of keeping the accounts were suggested, and it was ordered, "That all officers and tradesmen of the corporation do in future send in separate bills and accounts for all business done in its several departments, and warrants be respectively drawn for the same accordingly; and that the comptroller, remembrancer, and solicitor do also deliver in separate bills and accounts for all business done or expenses incurred in relation to the City dues upon coals, corn, and all other duties belonging to the City, and also in respect of the general property and estates of the City." Also, "That the hall-keeper so keep his accounts as shall enable the committee for letting the City's land, or other committees, to draw warrants for the same under each head of expenditure." The accounts have since been kept in the way so recommended. Although that committee frequently worked four and five hours of the day, they never spent a farthing of the corporation money. With regard to the members of the common council, issued an address in 1841, and is still of the same opinion, "That it is but an act of justice to the Court of Common Council to declare that I have at all times witnessed, both in the court and the various committees in which I have been present, the most anxious desire to promote the interests of their fellow citizens, and am surprised that so many individuals engaged in large mercantile and trading establishments should be willing to devote their valuable time to the affairs of the corporation, without any other advantage to themselves than what arises from the satisfaction of having faithfully and honestly discharged a public duty." Some few years ago, being then a reformer, as now, thought the allowances to committees too much for the duties performed, therefore in 1841 got an order of the court made, that all the committees should make a return of their duties and the amount of property under their control. The Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee stated their duties to be, "To examine the accounts of the coal dues monthly at the coal market, and to see that all the amounts are paid into the chamber of the City; they were, in 1839, 139,818*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*; in 1840, 144,471*l.* 3*s.* 10½*d.*; in 1841, 157,847*l.* 12*s.* 2¾*d.* To give directions for the necessary repairs of the coal market in Thames Street, and the offices connected therewith; to let such offices to proper persons, and audit the collector's accounts of the rents for the same half-yearly; the produce, in 1839, was 582*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*; 1840, 573*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; and in 1841, 597*l.* 14*s.*" For these and other duties which they have to perform, they are allowed 200*l.* a year. Formerly they used to spend 1,200 a year. The City Lands Committee, which is the chief committee of the corporation, in 1808 spent 1,417*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* a year; they are now allowed 400*l.* a year, and have "To manage and let the estates belonging to the corporation; to grant building and repairing leases, and see that the covenants are duly performed; to ascertain if any encroachments have been made upon the said estates, and on applications for leases, to view the premises, attended by the City architect, to enable the committee to form an opinion of the value thereof; to see that the rents reserved by such leases are paid into the chamber of the City, which for the last three years have exceeded 44,000*l.* a year; to grant leases of premises within the manor of Finsbury, holden by the corporation on lease from the prebendary of Hilliwell and Finsbury (one sixth part of the net yearly rents being payable to the prebendary), and to see the rents are paid into the chamber of the City, which for the last three years (after the above deduction) have exceeded 11,000*l.* a year; to let the tolls collected at the gates and bars of the City, which were then let for three years from Midsummer 1841, at a gross rental amounting to 4,795*l.* per annum; to audit artificers' bills, and the various officers' accounts." They also report, "The amount of income under our management for the last three years has been: in 1839, 71,939*l.* 15*s.* 2¾*d.*; in 1840, 70,038*l.* 6*s.* 7¾*d.*; in 1841, 69,999*l.* 14*s.* 8¾*d.*" Has been on that committee from twelve o'clock till five, going out in all weathers to view the estates before they were let; and the committee, consisting of the lord mayor, eleven aldermen, and twenty-nine commoners, are allowed 400*l.* a year, which upon an average is about 6*s.* 6*d.* for a dinner and pint of wine afterwards. The Bridge House Committee have an allowance of 300*l* a year. In 1807 they spent 1,900*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*, of which the tavern expenses amounted to 1,162*l.* 10*s.* The property under their management exceeds 30,000*l.* a year, and, like the City Lands' Committee, they have a great deal to do. There are returns from other committees to the same effect. With regard to any reform in the corporation, hopes the abominable Act of 11th of George the First will be repealed, and repealed upon the grounds stated by the lords in their protests at the time that bill passed. There was a petition against its passing, signed by many thousand inhabitants of the City, and all they state in opposition to it has been realized, and so continues at the present moment, 7695.—Should say there is no necessity for so large a number as seven members of the Irish Society to visit the estates in Ireland; but there is an advantage in the tenants personally knowing their landlords to be present; they can make known their grievances, if they have any. Many of the poorer tenants expressed their surprise and pleasure when called upon, 7696.—Wishes to draw the attention of the Commissioners to the lieutenancy of the City of London. There is a large sum of money collected in the way of rates as a "trophy tax" for the militia. The lord mayor is at the head of that commission, and claims the right of opening it whenever he pleases. Persons are put on totally unconnected with the City, which is not right, as they have to collect and distribute the funds of the citizens, 7697, 7698.—They are appointed by the Crown by a commission; so that when the lord mayor wishes to put any members of his family into the commission, and to wear a red coat, he opens the commission, and they are put in, 7699.—The commissioners stand in the position of lord lieutenant; the whole office of the lord lieutenant is put into commission, 7700.—The trophy tax is imposed by Act of Parliament, by the commissioners in the first place, and afterwards by the common councilmen of the respective wards. The order goes from the commissioners of lieutenancy. It is a sort of county rate, 7701, 7702.

ARCHITECT:—

The City architect makes an annual report of the improvements, and the Improvements Committee give a detailed report of the cost, not only generally, but of each individual property, Dakin, 7363–7364.—Mr. Bunning is both architect and clerk of the works. Thinks no man could be found equal to him in the discharge of the multifarious duties connected with his office, Taylor, 7848–7854.

ASHLEY, Mr. GEORGE CROWLEY, (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides at Isleworth, 4110.—Is a Roman cement manufacturer, 4111.—Is very seriously affected by the regulations with regard to watermen upon the river Thames, 4112.—Has heard Mr. Beck's evidence, 4113.—Takes fully the same view of the case, 4114.—Has been subject to penalties for infringement of the laws of the Watermen's Company, 4115.—Was summoned to the Mansion House in August 1851, and fined 2*l.* 2*s.* for expenses. Had a barge in London; the captain came on shore for orders, leaving three competent persons on board. The barge was moved from Lambeth about a mile down the river. An informer saw it, rowed on board, and took the command of her; almost immediately after the captain came on board. Was fined because neither of the parties on board were free watermen, 4116.—The captain's absence for a short time was sufficient to render witness liable to the penalty. If he had been on board, although in his cabin asleep, he could not have been fined. The waterman who laid the information was a man from Kingston, who got his living principally by this means, 4117.—A considerable portion of his business has been on the line of the Grand Junction Canal. Witness's factory is about a mile higher up the river than the entrance of the Grand Junction Canal. Employs those boats which travel on the canal. They dare not move a yard on the river without a free waterman. These boats travel in pairs, but the law requires that they should have a free waterman for each. Paid these useless watermen 124*l.* on two contracts only on that line of canal. Has paid these watermen 1,000*l.* within the last 15 years; most of the watermen who look out for these jobs are lazy characters. While the boat is being loaded they have nothing to do, and frequently get intoxicated. In one case a drunken man ran a boat on shore, at a loss of 60*l.* to witness, and at 40*l.* to the owner of the barge, 4118.—They have nothing to do; the tide takes the barge down and brings her up, the master of the boat himself steering. With regard to the efficiency of these watermen, one of them in broad daylight ran a barge into Kew Bridge, one of the easiest bridges to pass on the river; the barge was sunk, and witness lost 120*l.*, 4119.—Is not aware of any benefit arising from the system of free watermen, 4120.—Would throw the trade completely open, 4121.—Does not think it would be necessary to substitute any system in the nature of police to protect the public against the negligence of the watermen, 4122.—There should be some stringent regulations with respect to those who ply in pleasure boats; but would have the trade carried on in barges entirely open. Witness has annually about 15,000 tons of stone brought to his factory from Harwich; but from their being loaded beyond the limits of the City, no free watermen are required to navigate them, 4123–4126.

Assessment:—

The assessment in the City is as high in relation to the annual value as the assessment in the rest of the metropolis. It is continually changing from year to year, and generally on the increase, Payne, 6669.

Attorneys:—

Particulars about, Wortley, 6482.

Auditors:—

Auditors are mere formal officers elected yearly by the 400 liverymen. Does not think the Auditors qualified either by station or mental qualifications to investigate effectually the accounts. They are not generally professional accountants, but clerks. They audit the chamberlain's accounts, Acland 427-434.—The Common Hall of the Livery elected the Auditors, but gentlemen were selected by the corporation to fill that office, Williams, 2777.—The power of electing is in the hands of persons who are not always interested to send the best men, Scott, 4464.—Would increase their powers of pulling the separate accounts to pieces, and putting each item under its proper head, ib. 4673–4678.

Babington, Anthony, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is stamp distributor for Londonderry, and land agent for several properties in the counties adjoining, 8082.—Lives three miles from Londonderry, on the lands of the Irish Society, 8083.—Complains that the tenants have found inconvenience from the management of the society; the members of the deputation labour under great difficulties; half of them retire every year, 8084.—Believes the London companies are not fluctuating bodies, but hold their estates for life, 8085.—Witness thinks, from his own experience, that the deputations often take great pains, but sometimes they spend but one day in Londonderry, although they are away from London nearly a month, 8086.—The deputations wait till they return to London to decide points. They report to the court, and generally make that the ground for any change in what they had proposed doing, 8087.—Believes the London secretary has the principal management of the estate, though he seldom accompanies the deputation; he is a life officer, 8088–8090.—Thinks the whole system of management very expensive for trust property, 8091.—The society receive full value for their landed property, and in 30 years have not spent any money to improve it except giving a sum of money for a school, 8093.—The money spent in charitable objects by the society is not judiciously expended; they have given money which should have been laid out for Derry and the plantation to charities of the London companies, when they were able and willing to support their own, 8094,—Witness does not think that, under all circumstances, Londonderry would have an exclusive right to the proceeds of this property, but that, as the rest of the plantation is provided for by other means, this ought to be given to Derry, 8095–8097.—The extent of the rural property of the society is 1,500 Irish acres, about 3,000 English, 8099.—The rental is between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* a year. Does not recollect any money belonging to the society being laid out on that part of the property, 8100.—There are 40 or 50 tenants on it, 8101.—The farm buildings have been erected by the tenants as long as witness recollects, 8102, 8103.—There are no repairs done by the society, 8104.—Nor draining or improvements of any kinds. There was a bog field reclaimed by the society in the year of the famine, upon which they employed some persons; in the course of a few years the tenant was obliged to throw it up, he could not keep it at the rent, 8105.—Supposing the land were let on liberal leases, and left to the enterprise of the tenant, the principal part of them would not be able to undertake any outlay upon it, 8106.—Complains that leases are not granted in a way encouraging to the tenant to improve. States two or three cases, 8107.—The landlords generally in the north of Ireland do not erect buildings on their property, though some of the companies do assist their tenants, 8108.—The Irish Society manage their estates differently from most others in the north of Ireland, 8109.—States difference. Is afraid, from the society's standing order, that there is no chance of improvement on their property at present, 8110.—Thinks, if the tenants could get a sufficient tenure, that they would improve the property, 8111.—The society appear to wish to turn everything to money. There was an application made for land for waterworks; the society fancied they had a right to the same price as any one else. The tenants were paid for their holdings, and the society were paid to the full extent of their reversionary interest. It was just the same in the case of the cemetery and railroad, 8112.—Thinks it would be a great advantage to Derry that this property be sold, the money invested, and the proceeds administered to those public purposes to which the income of the property is applicable. Were the gentlemen of the deputation permanent, things would be better done, 8113.—Draws a distinction between the property of the Irish Society and that of the City companies, 8114.—The resident agents of the City companies have lived in great harmony with the most respectable part of the inhabitants. Gives an instance of the society's charging a tenant for a house built by him for three years; it was afterwards remitted, but the money already paid was not returned, 8115.

Ballast:

With respect to ballast, there is a sort of jurisdiction claimed by the Admiralty. That more particularly refers to the Trinity House, Merewether, 5277.—To take ballast from the river, private parties must apply for licences to the Lord Mayor, and can only work according to the conditions set out upon it, Leach, 7531–7532.

Bateman, Henry, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is connected with the City of London as a merchant. Is a freeman and has been for the last 30 years, and a liveryman of the Goldsmiths Company, 2338.—Is not a common councilman, 2339.—Carries on his business in the City, 2340.—Is a timber merchant, 2341.—There are many points connected with the corporation to which witness wishes to call attention. Feels qualified to do so from having lived there for the last 30 years, and having taken considerable interest in the elections of the ward in which he lives, for the last twenty years. Is a resident in the ward of Bishopsgate, one of the most influential wards returning 14 members to the common council. No one has interfered more in the elections of common councilmen than himself, 2342.—Has never been a candidate, has often been asked to be so, has no interest in the corporation in any way, being perfectly independent of it. Has often tried in his own ward to induce persons to come forward as common councilmen, but the office is so unpopular and so generally low in public opinion, that when he has asked any one to be a member of the council the remark has been thrown back upon him, Why are you not a common councilman yourself? 2343.—Attributes this indisposition to accept offices connected with the corporation to the opinion of modern active men, that it is a tiresome worn-out trouble, some thing in the way of improvement, and persons are hopeless of mending it. It then comes to this that persons of another class have come to be common councilmen. Has been instrumental in getting gentlemen to become common councilmen for whom witness has great respect as the best gentlemen of the class to be got. Has been obliged to ask them to come for lack of others, and has generally succeeded in getting them the situation but the misfortune is that when this class is grouped together the men who are desirable will not join them, 2344.—Does not think it desirable to abolish all the municipal institutions of the City. Would certainly abolish the present corporation, 2345.—Gives outlines of the change to be effected in the civic institutions of London, 2346.—Does not think it desirable that liverymen should retain their votes for the City officers. Knows how liverymen are made; in olden times the institution was good and right for its then purposes, skilled men of the trades banded together, and the men who were then skilful in their hands were considered fitting men to be taken care of and put in some position. Is a timber merchant, but belongs to the Goldsmiths Company. The liverymen of the Goldsmiths Company are very few of them goldsmiths; it is a great high Tory political organization, they will not elect a man who is not a high Tory, 2347.

Baths and Washhouses:

The City has not expended anything in baths or washhouses further than by giving 50*l.* or 100*l.*, now and then, to such institutions already established in the neighbourhood, Bennoch, 2052.

Baylis, Mr. Samuel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is collector of tonnage dues, 7090.—Has been so since August 1849, 7091.—Was appointed by the Thames Navigation Committee, under sanction of the Court of Common Council, 7092.—At a salary of 200*l.* a year, out of which has to pay a clerk, and partly a messenger, which reduces it to about 80*l.* Is also collector of wine duties, 7093.—It is a City duty, 7094.—Is not aware of the origin of the tonnage dues; they were under the management of the Government up to the time witness took them, 7095.—The tonnage is from one halfpenny to three farthings per ton, 7096.—Gives list of vessels exempt from tonnage, 7097.—There is no difference between the dues on British and foreign ships, 7098.—The rates apply to every class of vessel, 7099.—Of whatever national character, 7100.—The dues become payable on the ship's entry being made either inwards or outwards, 7101.—The ship's entry is a Custom House operation, 7102.—When Government collected the duties they were collected by an officer in the customs, 7103.—They are collected in the long room, and a seat is appropriated to the corporation officers, 7104.—Sits in the office where the reports are received, 7105.—Is practically a Custom House officer, 7106.—Gets the information from which the dues are collected from customs' document, 7107. —A ship cannot depart in cargo without clearing at the Custom House, 7109.—It is a similar process with ships clearing out, 7110.—The process of the collection of wine duties is much the same, 7111.—The duty is 4*s.* 9½*d.* per ton of 252 imperial gallons, 7112. —That is a uniform duty on all varieties of wine, 7113, 7114.—Does not collect any other duties, 7115. —The tonnage duties are paid daily into the chamberlain's office, 7116.—The wine duties are paid weekly into the chamber, 7117, 7118.

Beck, Mr. Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Will substitute present evidence for that given on a former occasion. The existing rules and regulations for the Watermen's Company are felt to be very oppressive; first, as to the laws for regulating the watermen and lightermen on the river, an Act was passed in the 4th and 5th years of Queen Anne, called "An Act for the Encouragement and Increase of Seamen and for the better and speedier manning of Her Majesty's Fleet." It appears that watermen were at all times liable to serve, and in cases of refusal they would be deprived of the benefits as free watermen. The before-mentioned Act, with others, was by an Act passed in the 7th and 8th George IV., chapter 75, called, "An Act for the better Regulation of the Watermen on the River Thames between Yantlett Creek and Windsor," repealed or consolidated into this Act of George IV.; and by section 57, the court of mayor and aldermen were empowered to make byelaws for the government of the freemen of the Company of Watermen, and therefore the Watermen's Company are not independent of the lord mayor and aldermen. To become a free waterman, a person must serve seven years apprenticeship to a free-waterman, or the widow of one; and by section 11 of the byelaws, it is expressly stated that an apprentice shall not be employed at any other business than a waterman or lighterman during his apprenticeship; and by section 15, it is ordered that no apprentice shall depart from his master's or mistress's service unless pressed into His Majesty's service; but such apprentice may serve on board a merchantman with the consent of his master or mistress, if he has been in such employ for two years, and during the time of his serving on board of any merchantman or in His Majesty's service, his wages shall belong and be paid to his master or mistress. It is supposed that these acts and byelaws were made to ensure a sufficient number of skilful watermen; but it will be seen by section 101 of the Watermen's Act it does not extend to any western barges, and that all flat-bottomed boats and boats navigated from the town of Kingston in Surrey, and places beyond the said town, should be deemed western barges; and these laws do not apply to barges or vessels trading without the limits of the corporation, nor do they interfere with the Trinity House of Deptford Strand, save as to the prices of fares, which are to be the same. These all show that an apprenticeship is not necessary to ensure skill and ability in watermen and lightermen. The same regulations apply to barge owners; none but freemen are allowed to carry goods for hire or reward for other persons. Will exemplify the working of the monopoly by his own position, premising that he does not do it on private grounds alone, but on the same principle as the abolition of the East India Company's charter and the corn laws have been advocated, and feeling satisfied that it will benefit those who think themselves benefited by the present restrictions. After being at sea many years and trading to all parts of the globe, witness settled at Isleworth, where he has a large wharf, but to which there was no established business; but found that not having been apprenticed to a free waterman, he could not employ his capital in working barges to carry goods on the river for any one who thought proper to employ him, without employing another person who was in that position. Did not find the plan answer, and gave it up when the other branches of the business enabled him to do so. Continued to employ free watermen for some time, but from the trouble the men employed by him gave, took the earliest opportunity, when business allowed, of building a craft of his own, and obtained a licence for it from the Waterman's Hall, which only enables him to do his own lighterage, and does not permit him to carry for others. Considers this restriction a great hardship, as he could often get a freight down for his barges instead of sending them down empty, which is generally the case, except when by mutual accommodation he carries small quantities for a friend. The before-mentioned laws regulating the apprenticeship, as well as those affecting large barge owners, are constantly evaded; the former by binding a boy to a free waterman for the sake of obtaining the privileges, who rarely shows himself on board a barge, and never can be capable of managing one; and the latter, by purchasing the use of the number and name of the widow of a free waterman. The byelaws also expressly forbid the employment of men or boys in barges who are not free watermen, yet this is continually done. Unintentionally committed an error in stating that he was not permitted to carry lime from the Medway upon hire. Was under a misapprehension as to the limits of the jurisdiction of the Watermen's Company. Will endeavour to show the absurdity of the restrictions alluded to. Not far from witness's place of business resides a gentleman who is a coal owner in the north; if he hires witness's vessel to bring him a freight of coals from the north, any crew may bring them up the river opposite his house without the aid of a free waterman, but if it is necessary in order to get them close to his premises to unload part, then he must employ the barge of a free waterman. If witness brings a cargo of coals direct from the collieries his men must not unload them in the usual manner called whipping, but they must be carried on the men's backs in sacks or baskets. With regard to the conservancy of the river there are numerous shoals. Isleworth is a place of great trade, but from the want of money being expended in clearing away those shoals, by soil accumulating, there is not a free passage. As to the amount of trade done at witness's wharf and at the wharf adjoining, as much as 25,000 tons come up to the wharfs during the year; but sometimes, on account of the shallowness of the river, they are obliged to go to considerable expense in rigging out a kind of landing way over which the goods are brought on shore. Has always found Mr. Leach, the gentleman who acts for the City in witness's neighbourhood, very accommodating, but supposes he cannot do what is necessary for want of funds. The City, as conservators of the river, ought to clear away the obstruction offered by Battersea and Putney bridges. Pays City toll, 2½d. per ton, to Isleworth. Does not think it suitable that the City should have the conservancy of the river, because those who sit on the committee can hardly be acquainted with the subject. Would suggest that the carrying trade on the river should be thrown entirely open. That the system of free watermen should be abolished. That bargemen should be registered in a similar manner to watermen. Would place the conservancy of the Thames under no existing branch of the Government machinery. Would recommend a permanent establishment with district boards working under its orders. Such a board should compel owners of property to maintain it, and not allow it to waste into the river for want of embankment. The wash of the steam boats is carrying away, year by year, portions of islands into the Thames, which should be prevented. The tolls alluded to are applied partly in maintaining the towing-paths, 4104.—Proposes that the board to superintend the conservancy of the river should be appointed by the Government from men well acquainted with the subject, 4105.—Would not let the corporation or the citizens have anything to do with it. Considers the present regulations are oppressive on many deserving and able men, who have lost the advantage of a free waterman through not having been able to be bound apprentice when young, 4106, 4107.—No vessel above 90 tons can come up to Kingston bridge; but if all impediments to the navigation were cleared away, and a sufficient sum raised for deepening the river and for the maintenance of good locks, there would be no reason why vessels of 200 tons should not come up to Kingston, 4108.—Sea-going vessels which can get under all the bridges but Battersea and Putney at certain times of the tide. Believes the great floods in the Thames are owing to the admirable way in which the land is drained, 4109.

BEQUESTS TO DEBTORS:

Thinks some higher authorities than the keeper of a prison should deal with the bequests, Merewether, 2429.

BELLAS, HUGH, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an inhabitant and general merchant of Coleraine, 8233–4.—Has been connected with the municipal commissioners of Coleraine for twenty years, and was their chairman for three years, 8235.—Whilst chairman applied to the deputation of the society for aid in supplying the town with water, but did not get any grant, 8236, 8237.—Statement as to the rates of Coleraine, 8238, 8239.—The society do not contribute to the municipal purposes of the town, as they ought to do as trustees. They have given several donations for religious and educational purposes, 8240–8244.—Founds their claim to assistance from the society, on the belief that the land was given for civil, religious, and municipal purposes. The leases which are granted on lives renewable for ever have had a most beneficial effect on the town, 8245.—The greater part of the property of the society is held under these long leases, particularly the business part of the town (8246), which is the main streets, 8248.—Strictly speaking, the water-side property belongs to the Clothworkers Company, 8249.—Thinks the best course to pursue would be to sell the property, and devote the receipts to the good of the town, 8250.—The citizens mostly think that the influence of the society is not beneficial (8252), and that their management of the property is not conducive to the general interests of the town, 8254.

BELTON, Mr. S. T. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was appointed by a public meeting of the ratepayers and inhabitants of St. Marylebone to make certain statements to the Commission, 1992.—The meeting was not very numerously attended, but the most influential persons were there, and has no doubt the parish was fairly represented, 1993, 1994.—Was instructed to state the injurious effects of the coal and cart duties. The coal dues levied upon the parish amount to 22,000*l.* a year, including the gas, which alone is equal to 5,000*l.* a year, 1995.—There are 17,000 houses in Marylebone parish, averaging ten rooms each. Allowing a ton and a half to each room, according to the quantity supplied to the Marylebone almshouses, believes the estimate, as a general one, will come to the amount stated, 1996.—The tax averages about 1*l.* a house. It has been collected for some years from the inhabitants of the various parishes round London, who have received no benefit whatever from it, for the purpose of paying 1,000,000*l.*, which was borrowed for building London Bridge and its approaches. That amount has been paid off some time, therefore it is now applied to making new streets in the City, and a small portion in Westminster and Middlesex, 1997.—Believes about 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* of it was paid for the improvements in Oxford Street, 1998.—The entire expense of New Oxford Street was not defrayed from that fund, only that part which fell upon the public. The ground rents were raised, being only 10*l.* or 20*l.* a year upon the old houses, 1999, 2000.—Does not consider Marylebone so much benefited as St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury, a great many poor and dilapidated houses in those parishes being pulled down, and the poor population dispersed over Marylebone. The houses which formerly let for 30*l.* or 40*l.* a year now pay a ground rent alone of 70*l.*, therefore those improved ground rents ought to go to liquidate the money borrowed, and the coal dues need not be levied, 2001.—Supposes those ground rents are part of the revenue of the Crown, but though paying so much from Marylebone parish, there are no means of ascertaining the receipts from this property, nor how the money is expended, 2002.—The expenses of a large improvement like that of New Oxford Street might possibly be defrayed from a parochial rate. The injustice of the coal dues is this, that to pay for those fine streets in other parts of London the poor man is deprived of a fire one day in every week, the duty being equal to 7 lbs. of coal per week. Does not say the City has this to answer for, the laws having been made when the population was much smaller than it is at present, 2003.—Objects both to the principle and application of the tax. For this reason: the citizens of London collect it, and there is perhaps much of it spent for useful purposes in the City and other parishes, but the majority of them receive no benefit from it. It is injurious to trade, as driving manufacturers from the neighbourhood of London, which would be beneficial to the working population. At Reading coals are 2*s.* 6*d.* a ton cheaper than ten miles nearer London, though those coals pass through London. Steamers take in coals below Gravesend, to save the tax, which injures the London trade, 2005.—Has no doubt a rate for the improvement of the metropolis would be more willingly paid than the present coal tax, 2006.—Agrees that the whole of the metropolis benefits from an improvement in particular parts. In the case of St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury, the parties in possession receive large improved ground rents at the expense of Marylebone, 2007.—A general metropolitan tax would be equally injurious, unless under control. The vestry of Marylebone is a municipality without a head. They are elected under Sir John Hobhouse's Act, every ratepayer having a vote. The vestrymen superintend the paving, lighting, and all other acts which a municipal body have to do, 2008.—It is no doubt advisable that each district of the metropolis should not merely look within its own precincts for the purposes of improvement. Marylebone has expended within the last year 25,000*l.* for paving Oxford Street, which benefits the whole of the parishes around, as well as the City, from being the principal thoroughfare to it. Believes 500*l.* a year is received from the neighbouring parishes to make good the expense, 2009.—If there was a general tax levied, it might be a benefit. Some portion of it ought to go to the improvement of the localities, and there should be some mode devised for that purpose, 2010.—Has had several conversations with the leading parties in the parish as to being incorporated under the Municipal Corporations Act, but cannot find they wish for any alteration in the present system, 2011.—No doubt being incorporated under the above Act would supersede the vestry, and interfere with their functions. The vestry, is now elected, by all the ratepayers, whether male or female householders, voting by ballot, 2012.—Does not think that a town council elected under the Municipal Corporations Act would be any improvement to the parish of Marylebone. It would be an improvement to the parish of St. Pancras, and perhaps also to Paddington, 2013.—If the Parliamentary borough of Marylebone were incorporated, those three parishes would be thrown together, 2014.—Therefore the town council would be a differently constituted body from any one of the present parochial vestries, and there would be only one governing body for the three parishes instead of three, 2015.—Does not think it would be an improvement to the parish of Marylebone, but taking the three parishes together, it might be an improvement, 2016.—There is generally a very strong parochial feeling in those large parishes. Witness wishes also to refer to the cart duties levied by the City of London. At the present time they are let to contractors for 5,000*l.* per annum, and is informed that they collect something near 10,000*l.*, giving 5,000*l.* clear profit to the contractors. If a man, not a freeman, takes a load of goods into the City three or four times in a day, he must pay 2*d.* each time, 2017.—A toll is paid every time a cart passes the toll collector with a different load, 2018.—Believes those who go constantly into the City make some contract with the toll collector; they give 1*s.* a week, 2019.—The power of compounding only rests with the collector, 2020.—He may demand a toll each time if he pleases, 2021.

Bennett, Mr. Benjamin. See Gibbs.

Bennett, James Charles Graham, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a solicitor in the City of London, and also an election agent. The complaints which exist against the present system are, 1st, the seven days' poll, and the mode of taking it; 2d, the want of a complete register of the liverymen who are entitled to vote, for the guidance of the clerks on taking the poll, and for the guidance of the secondary or sheriff's deputy, on objections being taken to any vote tendered; 3d, the absence of arrangement of the polling booths according to the alphabetical order of the companies; 4th, the absolute impossibility of identifying who are and who are not liverymen, and the consequent absence of all check against the personation of voters, whether living or dead, against voting more than once, and against false and fictitious voters; 5th, the want of a specific enactment against bribery, which the Act of 11th George I. chapter 18 does not contain; and, lastly, the total absence of all means of putting an end to or preventing bribery, corruption, the manufacture of false voters, perjury, suborning of perjury and conspiracy. These are heavy words to utter, but witness is in a situation to prove that all these practices exist at elections in common hall, 4179.—An opinion unhappily prevails among the liverymen, that inasmuch as the Act is silent on the subject of bribery and treating, it is no wrong, not even a moral wrong, to be paid for their votes, 4180.—The election for members of Parliament for the City and for the county are all tainted with 'longshore influence, to the disgrace of the voters, 4181.—The expenses attendant upon the contest for the office of chamberlain at the last election were very large indeed. A poll was demanded. Gives particulars of each day's poll. It lasted seven days. The result shows that there were 362 false votes polled during the contest, against which, under the present system, it was and is quite impossible to guard, 4182, 4183.—Believes the ultimate result of the poll was obtained by bribery and corruption, aldermanic influence, and various other modes resorted to on the occasion, which were exceedingly disgraceful. Stood upon the hustings during the whole of the contest, and during that time five persons were given into custody for pretending to be voters, they having no qualification, 4184.—There were check clerks, and they ought to prevent any vote being improperly recorded. But they have no means of detecting improper votes, for the reason that no alphabetical order of the companies nor of the livery existed. Witness next offers a few suggestions, by way of remedy for the existing evils: 1st, to limit the poll to one clear day, as in the Parliamentary election contests; 2d, to limit the constituency to those of the livery who reside within the Parliamentary range of seven miles; 3d, to disfranchise all almsmen, whether resident in the almshouses, or receiving pecuniary or other charitable assistance, among the liverymen, as well as all those who have received back all or any part of their livery fines; 4th, to compel the master and clerk of each company to revise the lists of their liverymen once a year, excluding those resident beyond the seven miles limit, and all classes of almsmen, and to make printed annual returns to the sheriffs of those only who are found eligible to vote; 5th, to divide the Guildhall into polling booths, arranged in alphabetical order of the companies, or to compel those liverymen whose companies have halls to vote at their halls, the Guildhall being appropriated only to those who have no hall; 6th, whether the poll be taken at Guildhall or in the halls of the companies, to make it compulsory upon the masters, clerks, and beadles (excepting in case of sickness, or from other unavoidable cause) to be present during the entire poll. Witness adds, he has no objection to the corporation of London as a corporation. Admires it and its institutions, though he is neither a freeman nor a liveryman, 4185, 4186.—Does not think it would be advisable to admit freemen as well as liverymen to vote, or to alter the franchise in any respect beyond what has been stated, 4187.—There are a large number of persons connected with the City of London by way of business who live more than seven miles from it, 4188.—If the power of giving votes on paper were adopted under proper management, it would have a good effect, 4189.—The effect of limiting the franchise to those resident within seven miles would be to retain the votes of many persons of an inferior class who might reside in the City, but to disfranchise the masters who might come to their business during the day, 4190.

Bennoch, Francis, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Has been a member of the common council since 1845, 1148.—Is a wholesale warehouseman in Wood Street, Cheapside, 1149, 1150.—Resides at Blackheath now, but lived in the City for 4 or 5 years, twenty years ago, 1151, 1152.—Has taken a very active part in the business of the corporation as a common councilman, 1153.—Appears before the Commission in an independent and impartial capacity, not for the purpose of accusing the corporation but to speak of facts which have come within his own knowledge, 1154.—Was sent into the common council to endeavour to effect certain reforms. It happened soon after some prosecutions had been engaged in against some wholesale warehousemen. They defended themselves by raising a fund sufficient to pay their expenses, and the corporation was defeated, 1155.—The point at issue was whether they conducted their business by retail or wholesale. The corporation attempted to prove that a wholesale dealer who divided a dozen pair of stockings into three sales was really carrying on a retail transaction. They employed spies for the purpose of ascertaining the fact, 1156.—The question was raised for the purpose of trying to convict them of trading by retail and thereby obliging them to become free of the City, the object being to get the money, 1157.—Within the last two years as many as 4,000 summonses have been issued for the purpose of obliging traders who were not retail dealers, but exercising the profession of merchants or bankers, to take up their freedom, which some three or four hundreds have been frightened into doing, 1158.—The summonses included merchants of all descriptions, wholesale and retail. Produces a statement of the number of freemen made from 1800 to the present time. At certain periods the people became very much offended with the proceedings of the corporation and declined to take up their freedom. They then reduced the money to be paid for the purpose of becoming free. In 1836 the numbers rapidly rose in consequence of the reduction of the price, 1159.—The document was made by the clerk of the chamber to the court of aldermen, 1160.—It has been circulated to the whole of the members of the corporation, 1161.—The return was made in the year 1849, 1162. Draws attention to one point indicated by the return, 1163.—Believes that above 300 of those who have taken up their freedom during the present year were induced to do so by fear of the law, 1164.—In some cases the people were sold up in consequence of the summonses. The resistance of the higher class prevented the corporation going to the extent they would otherwise have done, 1165.—No legal proceedings were taken against any of the higher class of merchants during the late proceedings; on a previous occasion it was agreed that they should proceed against one firm, Ward and Co., of Wood Street; others agreed to defend that action by a joint purse. The City agreed to be governed by the result of that action, 1166.—The result was that they were entirely defeated and were obliged to pay all the expenses, 1167, 1168.—Quite recently they have renewed the attempt against the wholesale merchants, and by a resolution of the court of common council, even gentlemen who had been in the habit of considering this an essential element of corporation reform joined with a great number of others to compel those men to take up their freedom under the persuasion that such a proceeding would draw the attention of the Government, and bring about a reformation which they are unable to effect themselves. Hands in a series of resolutions which were agreed to, 1169.—A committee was appointed six months ago for the purpose referred to in the last question. So soon however as the Royal Commission was announced the committee suspended its meetings, 1170.—The report was brought up to be presented, but is not quite sure if it was presented. Could furnish a copy, 1171–1173.—It was proposed that a certain number of aldermen should be elected every seven years, 1174, 1175.—Believes that the committee consisted of about 30 or 40 members, 26 or 28 common councilmen and the aldermen, 1176.—Thinks that persons should be allowed to trade in London without being freemen, 1177.—The bill was opposed by the companies because it provided that all persons residing and paying rates should have all the privileges of freemen and liverymen. That there should be only one body of electors. The principal thing was that it provided that the officers of every kind should be elected by a common constituency, whereas the livery had the privilege of electing the lord mayor, the chamberlain, the bridgemasters and the auditors, 1179.—To apply the general Municipal Act to the City of London would be absurd on account of its enormous magnitude and he great variety of interests involved, 1180.—Sees no objection to the Municipal Reform Bill being applied to the City with certain alterations arising out of its peculiar condition in connexion with the great number of charities left to it for specific purposes, but does not think this applies to many of our other municipalities. The City of London, through the municipality, have always been advocates for every thing calculated to promote the liberties of the people. But it singularly happens that in all matters connected with their self-government, with the institution with which they are immediately connected in all matters of popular liberty and of popular privileges within their own jurisdiction, they have never led, it has been with great difficulty that they have been dragged at the tail of popular opinion. Would refer for example to the New River Company and other cases, 1181.—Does not know of any work of public utility which has been voluntarily promoted by the corporation. Believes that through some of their members they endeavoured to remove and ultimately did remove Farrington Market from the place where it stood, and established one of the finest schools in the kingdom, the City Schools. The greatest improvement was that of London Bridge, but this they were goaded into by several members of their own body before they gave their consent, 1182.—Is not a member of the market committee, 1183.—The corporation has bought land and are having it drained and walled in, and have contracted to construct slaughterhouses, 1184.—Is of opinion that the arrangements are unnecessarily expensive, 1185.—They have bought land for 58,000*l.* and there must be an enormous expense to make that sum up to 400,000*l.*, 1186.—They have bought 78 acres, 1187.—They were prudent to buy a large quantity of land, 1188.—Part of it will be resold on building leases to get the land in the proper shape for a market, 1189.—The whole of the sum will not be lost to the City. The committees thus are formed; each member is appointed for 4 years, and serves 2 years before qualified to be chairman. As one member retires another is appointed; incompetent persons are frequently appointed; only those whose time is of little value will consent to be on committees, 1190.—The chairman of a committee is always expected to take the chair at convivial meetings, 1191.—The dinners are paid for out of the corporation funds, 1192.—Payment managed by vote of the common council. A certain sum is placed at the disposal of each committee, and only the signature of the chairman is required that so much money has been expended. That document is given to the hall keeper, and he gets the money from the chamberlain, 1193.—The tavern bill is generally sent to the hall keeper, 1194.—Thinks there is no audit of those tavern bills, 1195.—At one time the committee received a certain fee, which was liable to great abuse; men had their names entered above the line, and then absented themselves. That is, the names were read over, and then a line drawn; those who come under the line did not receive any fee, 1196.—The committee could not divide it among themselves instead of spending it on dinners, but if there was any surplus and the chairman had behaved well, he would very likely have a piece of plate presented to him, 1197.—It is to the interest of the committee to see that the charges are moderate, 1198.—The money is allotted to them to spend as they please, 1199.—There is no law to prevent their dividing it among themselves if they thought proper, 1200.—The dinners almost invariably take place on the days on which they meet for business, which is the inducement for the gentlemen to attend, 1201.—The committee receive no other payment for services rendered. Has been frequently connected with committees where no allowance is made. Thinks they are generally most numerously attended, and by the most competent persons, 1202, 1203.—There are about 16 or 18 committees of common council in a year, 1204.—There are 16 paid committees, 1205.—Total of money paid in this way 2,900*l.*, 1206.—Is not aware of money being spent in any way but for entertainment, 1207.—Each committee decides how the money shall be spent, 1208.—The practice has prevailed for a number of years; gentlemen are placed on the navigation committee who have hardly anything else to do. They have a barge at their command, and another boat or two, and go in procession down the Thames and inspect a pier or rock, and return to dinner at Greenwich or Blackwall. The whole thing is a farce. They are men who are utterly incompetent to perform their offices, 1209.—The duties of the conservancy of the Thames are efficiently performed by the harbour master, 1210.—Does not think it advisable to unite members of the Trinity House with members of the Corporation. When any one shows himself particularly "au fait" at any thing upon a committee, the chances are he will be excluded from that committee, 1211.—Might do very well if done independently of the corporation; all the resolutions of that committee have to be brought before the court of common council, who might reject them, 1212.—The river Thames, the banks, and the navigation are of such importance that they ought to be referred to a competent committee. The regulation of the port of London and the navigation of the Thames concern the metropolis generally, 1213, 1214.—It is most injudicious to confide the interest of the whole of the metropolis to a small part of it, 1215.—Does not think it possible to give the corporation of the City a power to conduct its affairs to the advantage of the whole metropolis, 1216.—The objection to a mixed committee of the common council, with representatives of the great mercantile bodies of the metropolis, would be that their decision, though right, would be liable to be overruled by the court of common council, which is exclusively a City body, 1217.—The court of common council does not adequately represent the interests of the metropolis at large, 1218.—Does not think it would be possible to form a committee partly of the members of common council and partly of the great mercantile bodies, 1219.—There would be this advantage in keeping up a connexion between the conservancy of the Thames and the corporation, that it would be a very proper application of part of the funds of the City of London, 1220.—The state of the river is not only a metropolitan but a national concern. It would be better to have the bridges and every thing connected with the river under the superintendence of a central committee. Should advise this Commission to call upon each committee for an account of every item that has been spent in the last 10 years, and upon Mr. Scott, the clerk to the chamberlain, for the amount of money put into the hands of the hall keeper for purposes in connexion with each committee, and on the hall keeper for an account of every item for which he has paid money during the last ten years. When the return is made the Commission will discover that in 1849 there was a very large sum of money expended, some in dinners to Members of Parliament to manifest their gratitude for the assistance received in the House of Commons, 1221.—Is not aware of any grant to the committee for conducting the Smithfield bill, 1223.—Thinks no specific sum has been assigned to any committee for the general purposes of opposition. Thinks more than 1,000*l.* was expended in the opposition in various ways. Articles were written and sent to the newspapers with a sum of money, 1224.—It was done through committees or one of the officers of the corporation, 1225.—The money was sent that, instead of an advertisement, the newspaper might be induced to allow it to appear as a paragraph, 1226, 1227.—No doubt he will be able to prove it, 1228.—Believes that 150*l.* a year has been the whole of the money spent in that manner, 1229.—The statement with regard to the money sent to the newspapers is distinct from the one to which he has adverted; that was 3 or 4 years ago. Does not think there has been a penny expended in any other way than was described in the court of common council within the last three years. The members of the court of common council have no right to inquire into the proceedings of a committee to which they do not belong, 1230.—As a member of common council might move to get an account of the proceedings of a committee, but if it was a popular one would never get it, 1231.—In most cases, a return asked for properly would be granted, 1232.—The desire of the common council is to give every information to their fellow members, 1233.—Some money must have been expended in getting up petitions against the removal of Smithfield market. Believes Mr. Acland was engaged professionally to conduct the opposition to the Government bill. Mr. Acland was in the shed at top of Cheapside as the expounder of the model, showing the advantages it would give to the public at large, 1234. —Has no personal knowledge on the subject, 1235.—Believes the election of common councilmen and aldermen is generally conducted honestly. There is no ground on the part of common councilmen to expend money, as they are elected annually, but there is ground for an alderman who is elected for life. Gives an instance. A large sum of money is sometimes expended in the case of an election of lord mayor. Gives an instance, 1236.—Does not think bribery is much practised at the elections of aldermen, further than by means of what has become now a City peculiarity. The lower class of the livery of London are of the very lowest description; the pretence of a certain amount of payment is, that poor men cannot afford to give up their day's work, 1237.—Is speaking of the elections in common hall, 1238.—The elections of aldermen are generally free from bribery, 1239. —The largeness or smallness of the ward makes very little difference. The elections in common hall are very anomalous: the livery elect the lord mayor, the freemen elect the aldermen, but the liverymen elect the lord mayor from among the aldermen; the livery can elect the sheriff, to which office there is a fine for non servitude, but the common council can excuse the payment of the fine; the livery elect the chamberlain, who is accountable to a committee of the corporation, the livery also elect the bridge masters, who have no more to do with them from the moment of their election, 1240.—The livery have nothing to do but elect in common hall for certain offices, 1241.—Thinks that election is under the Statute of the 11th George I.; it occupies several days, 1242.—Sees no advantage in keeping up the plan of election in common hall, 1243.—Would have only one constituent body which should elect members to represent them, and all officers under the corporation in common council assembled should be elected by the common council, 1245. —Would destroy the common hall altogether. It has been a nuisance for a number of years. You will find more corruption in the companies than the corporation. The livery companies are no longer what they used to be, the protectors of the trades whose names they bear, they have become private charitable companies with large funds, which are expended in making themselves comfortable, 1245.—Proposes to cut off the connexion between the companies and the municipal body of the corporation. Advises examination of gentlemen employed by various candidates for office in the corporation, 1246.—Wishes to call the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that freemen can elect members of common council not being liverymen. Persons who are freemen and not on the parliamentary register cannot vote for members of common council according to an Act passed 6 years ago. The constituencies are so small, and gentlemen refuse to take up their freedom because they do not like to do any thing on compulsion. The way to get a proper constituency is to establish a law by which all men paying certain rates and occupying certain premises should have the right of exercising the franchise, 1247.—Sees no objection to the qualification under the Municipal Reform Act. Would not make it necessary that in order to vote people should appear in the Parliamentary Register, 1248.—The qualification which prevails in boroughs under the Municipal Reform Act would be a proper one for the City of London, 1249.—Would abolish all special privileges, such as the privileges claimed by the livery, and all metages which have been purchased by individuals who do no service but receive the pay, hiring persons to conduct the duty, and keeping the balance. Gives an instance, 1250.—Would have to compensate for all offices which have been purchased. All offices by purchase have been abolished by the corporation for many years, 1251.—In the case of the oyster meters as the appointments fall in, the corporation appoint some one to do the work, and he receives the pay. Alderman Muggeridge took great interest in the question of the corn dues. His evidence would be very valuable. The result has been shown to be that ships are driven from the Thames to the Severn because in the one they can clear their cargo for 14*l.* or 15*l.*, and the other 50*l.* or 60*l.*, 1252.—The Corporation claim the right of measuring all goods which come into the port of London, 1253.—Believes this applies to all corn brought for home consumption, 1254.—

Thinks the grant of metage was originally intended as a protection to the public, and as an accommodation to those who wished their corn properly measured, 1255, 1256.—Does not think it was intended that the City should force their measurement on those who did not wish it, 1257.—They require all persons to have their goods measured, and they receive the dues thereon, 1258. —The tolls of the City ought to be abolished, 1259, 1260. —The toll is not more than twopence, but when people are continually going through it becomes a very important matter, 1261.—There is a man watching at each entrance into the City to demand the toll, 1262.—The toll is disliked chiefly on account of the manner in which it is demanded, 1263.—Is not sure whether the tolls are leased out by the City, 1264.—There is no toll upon carriages; persons who live beyond the City, as tradesmen drive as near as they can, and leave their carts and come into the City to buy their goods. In consequence of that inconvenience a great many persons have established themselves in certain trades just beyond the City bars. The exaction therefore operates to the disadvantage of the City itself, and the inhabitants are injured because persons are prevented going into the City to buy their goods, in consequence of the toll, 1265.

BENNOCH, FRANCIS, Esq. (Second Examination.)—When last examined was about to go into considerations with reference to the financial accounts of the corporation, 2023.—With reference to the Court of Aldermen, so far as their conduct has come under his observation as magistrates, they have discharged their duties to the utmost of their abilities; but thinks they ought not to continue as magistrates. The great objection witness has to the Court of Aldermen, as at present constituted, is that they have the control of the City purse, as much as the general corporation in Common Council assembled, 2024.—They are perfectly independent of the Court of Common Council. Gives instance, when the present lord mayor performed a certain work, which was esteemed by his brother aldermen of value to the City, they, of their own accord, caused his portrait to be painted, and a vote of thanks to be emblazoned at an expense of some 300*l.* or 400*l.* They have the right of pensioning the widows and orphans of relations of deceased aldermen, 2026.—Thinks the Common Council has the same power, but that they would have more discretion, 2027.—Instead of giving pensions they should elect some of the friends of deceased common councilmen to occupy some of those offices which are in their gift, 2028, 2029.—Their property consists, to a considerable extent, in possessions within the City, 2030.—Has no doubt that the corporation, as landlords in the City, in the management of their outlying estates, conduct them with consideration equal to that which is shown to tenants in the City, 2031.—Belongs to the City Lands' Committee. Before a lease lapses notice is given that the lease will lapse within a certain time, and if then the occupier desires to continue, he must give notice to the committee within a certain time, 2032.—The estates of the City are liberally and kindly administered as relates to the tenants, and they are sufficiently prudentially administered as far as relates to the property itself; there is a very fair return obtained from them, 2033, 2034.—Believes the staff of agency to be preposterously large as refers to the management of the property, and that in that manner the net receipts of the estates are rendered less than they ought to be. Thinks as far as the estate is concerned the agency is not extravagant, 2035, 2036.—The agents are very few indeed. The comptroller of the City lands, who has a staff of clerks, invites all parties to come and apply to him. The property lies in the City, or contiguous to it, 2037.—Nearly all the City property is either near or in the City. There is some property of the City in Marylebone, some in connexion with Conduit Fields' Estate, on the left-hand side of Holborn; again in Finsbury, and two or three other parts of the metropolis, 2038.—It is generally well-conditioned property; easily managed, 2039.—The committee has nothing to do with the management of the property of the Irish Society, 2040.—It is a doubtful matter whether the property of the Irish Society belongs to the City as a corporation. It is under their management, 2041.—There is a regular account kept between the comptroller and the chamberlain, which is published annually. He pays it in as he receives it. The Irish Society employ an agency. The amount never appears in the general account of the corporation 2042.—Considering the small area of the City, it would be better to have all the sewers of the metropolis under one management. Is a member of the Commission of Sewers in the City, 2043, 2044.—There is a sub-committee appointed as a delegated body, who, together with the surveyor, attend the General Commission of Sewers when anything in connexion with the City is under their consideration, 2045.—Thinks the joint action is practically and properly carried out, 2046.—That the City should give up all separate jurisdiction over its own sewerage, 2047.—And that it should be merged in one General Commission of Sewers, or such other body as might be deemed best, under a complete system of municipal government. With respect to the accounts is unable to see anything that would justify any charge of peculation or malversation, in connexion with the members of the corporation; but thinks that the total expenditure is much too large, 2048.—Witness here makes statement as to the expenditure from the blue book published by the City, 2050, 2051.—The City has not expended anything in baths or washhouses, further than by giving 50*l.* or 100*l.* now and then to such institutions already established in the neighbourhood, 2052.—They have paid no attention to the building of an improved class of dwellings for the labouring poor; that is one of the arguments against the past conduct of the corporation; therefore, in the neighbourhood of Clerkenwell and Moorfields, where improvements have not been made, the population has sunk to the lowest points of degradation, the labouring classes being obliged to live near their work. There being no other accommodation provided for them, families, to the number of three, four or five crowd together, to the injury of their health and morals, 2053.—Thinks it is the same in other parts of the metropolis, 2054.—There seems to be a great misapprehension in the minds of some witnesses as regards the manner in which the coal tax is expended. The coal tax is 1*s.* 1*d.* per ton, of which the City receive for the expenses of collection and other matters 1*d.* They receive and appropriate to public improvements, under Act of Parliament, 4*d.*, and 8*d.* is handed over to the Government for the purpose of making general metropolitan improvements, 2054.—The evil of the coal tax lies in its being levied at all; that the proceeds of the coal tax have been distributed with sufficient equality over the whole of the metropolis, 2055, 2056.—4*d.* per ton belongs to the City itself, and is applicable to purely City purposes at the discretion of the Corporation. It was originally granted for the purpose of completing the approaches to London Bridge; then the period was extended to complete other improvements contiguous to London Bridge, 2057, 2058.—Thinks the authority under which that 4*d.* was levied expires in 1864. Till that period it is altogether pledged to public bodies, who advanced the money by which the corporation have been able to effect certain public improvements, 2059, 2060.—Cannot say whether there is any money derived from the coal tax which is now at the discretion of the City, but thinks not, 2061.—Thinks there is not any amount of the tax upon coal which is now levied, granted in perpetuity, 2062.—It will wholly expire in the lapse of time, unless renewed by Act of Parliament, 2063.—It would be advisable to anticipate the period at which the coal tax will expire, and substitute a general rate, 2064.—Has no fear of the unpopularity which generally attaches to a direct tax of this description. The coal tax bears particularly hard upon certain trades, 2065.—Objects to any special tax which bears upon one commodity, and perhaps presses heavily upon one particular trade, and gradually, especially in the case of the tax on coal, presses at least heavier on the poor man, who can very ill afford to pay it, 2066.—Witness next refers to certain discrepancies between the Chamberlain's account and the amount of salaries returned by the officers. Thinks the discrepancy arises in this manner: All the gentlemen have attached to their own offices certain fees, which vary to a certain extent year by year, as in the case of the mace-bearer. Those fees are received by themselves, and they receive the salary out of the chamber; but the fees swell up the salaries, as certified by their own return, far beyond the amount appearing in the chamberlain's accounts, and make the whole discrepancy amount to above 10,000*l.* Enters into particulars, 2067, 2068.—Mr. Scott, the chief clerk of the chamberlain's office, has been in the service of the corporation twenty or twenty-four years, and, of course, with a gradual promotion or advance of salary; but as he, within the last few days, has resigned his office, thinks it very likely that a re-arrangement might be made of the offices, so as to save 500*l.* or 600*l.* a year. Witness here enters into more particulars, 2069.—How reductions in legal salaries alone might be effected, without impairing the efficiency of any office, 2070.—The remembrancer during the recess arranges all the ostentation, and settles questions of precedency in connexion with the lord mayor's dinner. Believes he is a solicitor; but has not any private practice, 2071–2073.—The remembrancer's brother, who is solicitor to the City sewers, is permitted to have private practice. Would throw the three offices of town clerk, secretary, and remembrancer into one office, 2074.—For some time the duties of the bridge-house comptroller and solicitor were combined in the same office, and no inconvenience was experienced. Believes the double salary was not continued. Would abolish the high bailiff of Southwark and the common pleaders altogether, because they are no use to the corporation. Would unite the offices of clerk of the peace and coroner together, 2075.—The coroner is appointed by the common council. After mentioning many more offices which might be united, and reductions made, comes to the conclusion that in the general expenditure, without impairing in the slightest degree the efficiency of any office of the corporation, from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* per annum might be saved. Thus, therefore, you have for use, at four per cent. a capital for the improvement of the City of a million and a quarter, and that in perpetuity, 2076.—As they are nearly all annually elected, Parliament would call upon those gentlemen, at the end of their year of office, to resign their offices without compensation; but thinks, although they have no legal claim, they have decidedly an equitable claim to compensation, 2077, 2078.—Reads a curious document collected from the leading men in Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dublin, which applies to such matters, 2079–2081. In some of these boroughs the income is much more than in London. States the aggregate of the particular salaries of those analogous officers in those several towns. The aggregate expenditure of above 100,000*l.* by the corporation of London, in connexion with its offices, is much larger than the whole expense of the civil government of the United States, 2082.—The federal government, and what is perhaps still more startling, the expenditure of the corporation on itself, in administering the funds it possesses, is larger than the whole amount of its revenue from rents, tolls, and fees from brokers, three great items of its income. The accounts kept by the Manchester corporation might be taken as a model of accounts for every corporation in the kingdom, 2083.—Manchester has not the same kind of property which the corporation of London has. Liverpool resembles London more nearly in that particular, 2084, 2085.—Witness has taken the expense of certain offices in London, and the aggregate expense of analogous offices in connexion with Liverpool. Enters into particulars, 2086.—Cannot say whether much is done by contract at Manchester. That information might be obtained from some officer from that place, 2087.—The subject of salaries has not been sufficiently brought forward, but when it has it has generally been decided that the office should not be disturbed, 2088.—An opportunity of reduction occurred at the recent vacancy of the chamberlain's office, 2089.—The question was referred to a committee, who published a report, which has been placed before the Commissioners, recommending that the office should continue as it had been. The report was received by the common council, and may be considered as their opinion, 2090, 2091.—Believes there was a long discussion when the office of chamberlain fell in, and a strong opinion on the part of a large number to reduce the salary by at least 1,000*l.* a year; but it was remembered that one of the candidates had served the corporation, and that an office of that kind having fallen in, he was a fit person to elect, 2093.—It is in the power of the common council to reduce salaries, 2094.—Except in cases where the officers are appointed, and their salaries fixed by the aldermen, but those are very few. There is a general rule now that no money of a general nature shall be paid by the chamberlain on the order of the Court of Aldermen. A late lord mayor expended a large sum in exhibiting himself at Oxford, &c., and there was a general feeling on the part of the common councilmen that it ought not to be repaid, so the chamberlain received an order to that effect, 2095.—Does not know the legal right with respect to the public purse, 2097.—Some legal officers of the corporation think the common council have the power of controlling the expenditure by the aldermen, and some that they cannot; but the custom is that the aldermen can do as they like. They have, to a large extent, done as they liked, 2098.—Witness only recollects one instance in eight years of the common councilmen exercising any authority over the aldermen, 2099.—The first report of the Commission on Municipal Corporations in 1835 contains the character of the common council of the City of London, and speaks of them as a body which has watched vigilantly over the interests of its constituents, and has studied to improve the corporate institutions with zeal and justice. If that be true they must have become sadly degenerate since. Holds that in doing justice to its constituents you ought to watch carefully the expenditure of the money, which in point of fact belongs to them. Believes no charter has ever been granted without expressing that the benefits arising from it are to be to the Court of Aldermen, the common council and the commonality. Apprehends that by the commonality is meant the constituency, as well as those who represent them. It frequently happens in cases of emergency in any department where an extra officer is wanted that he is appointed, and there always seems great reluctance to destroy the office, in consequence of which many offices have become almost sinecures, and so they go on till we find a staff of 150 officers, where one-tenth would be quite sufficient. There is a certain amount of patronage in connection with the election of those officers; the offices have been retained, and on a vacancy another officer has been appointed. This arises from the changeable nature of the corporation. A man enters the corporation determined to do all the good he can; he finds it impossible to make any impressions, and retires, 2100.—The multiplication of offices has been greatly owing to a want of system in the corporate administration, 2101.—The present state of things has been the growth of some hundreds of years; some of the old customs which are still retained are a disgrace to the corporation, for instance, the election of sheriffs, 2102.—With regard to the hospitality of the corporation being popular in the City, the avidity with which people receive the invitations arises probably from their being anxious to see what has been so much talked about, and then to laugh at it, 2103.—Believes the feeling in the City with regard to lord mayor's show is that of universal contempt; the transactions of the City may be counted by millions in the course of the day, and to have the thoroughfares blocked up for this parade is absurd, 2104.—Does not think there is a feeling in favour of it on the part of any class, 2105.—The lord mayor pays half the expense of the show, and the sheriffs each pay one quarter; then, after all are invited who have a right to go, the lord mayor has about 100 or 150 cards, and the sheriffs each 50 or 60 for private friends, each of which, in fact, costs from 10*l.* to 12*l.*, 2106.—Thinks it a gross injustice on the merchants who are elected sheriffs, that they must pay a fine if they do not serve, and if they do serve to be obliged to spend 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.*, and go through scenes from which they would naturally shrink, 2107.—On the last occasion a gentleman was elected to serve as sheriff, who refused to join in all the usual extravagances, so the lord mayor in the present year, has had to add three-eighths to his expenditure, and the other sheriff about two-thirds. Several members of the common council have tried to make an impression on the court as to the importance of their standing between the merchants of the City and the unprincipled men who, as soon as the name of a likely man to serve as sheriff is whispered, present themselves at the counting-house of the gentleman so named, and offer to prevent the election for a certain sum. They would then assemble the liverymen, and crowd the hall with them, and as they always vote as it is signalled to them, the common hall elections are a complete farce. Should the gentleman named refuse to bribe, he has, if he does not wish to serve, to pay the larger amount of the usual fine, 2108, 2109.—The general body of the common council, by a vote, have the power to exact or remit the fine, 2111.—It is levied as a matter of course, unless a person applies to have it remitted, 2112, 2113.—Gentlemen have applied to the Court of Aldermen to have the fine remitted, and been refused. Believes the Court of Aldermen also have the power, 2114.—The common council have power to excuse the fine, whether the man gives a good reason for it or not; but as those fines go to support a school for orphan children, they perhaps think it rather a good thing to enforce it, 2115.—There are two aldermen who have not served the office of sheriff, 2116.—The aldermen must pass through the office of sheriff before they can be lord mayor, and generally when there is any difficulty about a sheriff, when there is an alderman who has not served, they fall back upon him, 2117.—Witness having finished his observations reads the outlines of a scheme which he proposes to substitute for the present system, 2120.—Proposes that a change should be made at once, and not wait till to vacancies occur, 2121.—Has no fear of the political consequences arising from such a body as has been described sitting in the metropolis, and representing the population, 2122.—Thinks that were his plan adopted, the chief power would not be vested in the central municipality, as he proposes that each municipality be re-divided into twelve wards, each ward to have a representative in the central council. The present division of the City is most absurd; produces a plan which he thinks would be a great improvement, which involves two new streets. In connection with the boundaries begs to put in a paper showing certain alterations proposed by the reform committee of 1852, which, even if not adopted, serve to show that some members of the committee have devoted their attention to that matter, and to a general reform of the corporation, 2123.

BENNOCH, FRANCIS, Esq. (Third Examination.)—States a case to prove that the aldermen within the jurisdiction of the City can do with the City purse whatever they think fit. There is a byelaw to prevent the chamberlain from paying money for any expenses beyond that boundary, without the consent of the common council, 2124, 2125.—Thinks that the common council could not legally restrain the aldermen in any expenditure of money, but as they are part of the common council, and agreed to the byelaw, they could not infringe it, 2126.—The aldermen who are members of the common council have only votes like the others, 2127.—States case to show the advantage of the byelaw, 2128.—Except in certain things the Court of Aldermen has co-ordinate power with the Court of Common Council for all financial purposes, 2129.—States a case with regard to the expenditure of 133*l.* for cloth for the ministers of State, in evidence of the fact that a custom once established is seldom repealed voluntarily, 2130.—There are certain officers appointed by the committee of City lands, among them the keeper of the Monument. He was either a common councilman, or a connexion of one, and had received for many years an average income of 240*l.* or 250*l.* a year out of the money received from those who go to see the Monument. He performs no part of the duties himself, but employs two men, to whom he pays 80*l.* or 90*l.* a year. In 1851 the price of admission was reduced from 6*d.* to 3*d.*, and the profit of that year was 1,337*l.* The corporation receive no benefit, 2131, 2132.—The expenses of repairing and lighting are not paid out of this money. They are not considerable, 2133.—The Irish Society is an independent society, and keep their own accounts. They must be called on to give their own evidence if required. If the remodelling of the corporation on the plan suggested be adopted, it would effect a saving of 80,000*l.* or 90,000*l.* a year, and allow 20,000*l.* a year for all the expenses of the municipality of the City of London, 2134, 2135.

BENNOCH, FRANCIS, Esquire. (Fourth Examination).—Wishes to make some statement with regard to the Gresham Committee. Appears as chairman of a committee appointed to endeavour to establish in London a mercantile and maritime college. Is accompanied by Dr. Waddilove, Messrs. T. P. Lowell, Cook, Leoni Levi, and Anderson, as a deputation from that committee. In that position was brought into connection with the Gresham Committee in endeavouring to induce them to assist it, regarding the Gresham College foundation as the nucleus of an institution on which might be built the superstructure which is desired to be raised. A public meeting was held in May last at the London Tavern, presided over by Lord Harrowby, at which were present 100 or 150 of the leading merchants, shipowners, and traders of London, who recommended that communication should be opened with the Gresham Committee, the Corporation, and Her Majesty's Government, on the subject. In consequence a communication was made to the Gresham professors, and an answer received requesting a statement of the committee's views in connection with the Gresham College. Accordingly a statement was drawn up of the whole history of the Gresham College from its commencement. Reads the statement. Accompanying this historical sketch was sent a scheme to be engrafted on it. It was not wished to interfere in the least with what seemed to be the will of Sir Thomas Gresham, but to establish something in harmony with the present time, and be a great aid to the mercantile classes. Reads the scheme of the "Mercantile and Maritime College." There is no place in London where boys can be thoroughly educated for the pursuits of commerce and the marine. Reads the letter sent to the Gresham professors with the above scheme, and their answer, showing that instead of being opposed to it they were desirous of doing all they could to carry out the views of the merchants of London. Wishes to draw the attention of the Commissioners to this point, that though any opposition to an established system may seem clamour, the only clamour now raised is to show that the Gresham College has seven lecturers and a sum of 1,200*l.* or 1,300*l.* per annum to deliver lectures, and, with the exception of the lecture on music, can scarcely ever obtain an audience. A similar letter was written to the Gresham Committee. Reads their answer, declining to agree to the proposition submitted to them. Letters were also sent to the different companies to assist in the matter, also to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a courteous but not satisfactory reply was received in regard to the amount of money realized by the sale of the Excise office. As a proof that the merchants are seeking such an institution, several of them have enrolled themselves as students in a similar institution established by Mr. Leoni Levi, at Liverpool. There are three sessions in the year, and they pay 2 guineas for each session. Several of the large mercantile houses have enrolled some of their principal clerks, and attend many of the lectures themselves. Whilst the question has been discussed in London, colleges of this kind have been established in Sweden, in Austria, and Belgium. About two years ago a committee was formed to effect certain reforms in the Customs; when their labours ceased it was proposed to present their chairman Mr. Ingram Travers, a merchant, with a testimonial, and his letter to the testimonial committee bears so strongly on this subject, cannot forbear quoting it. Reads the letter. The Government, we observe, in regard to their civil officers, have also discovered the importance of some sort of examination as a guarantee of the fitness of individuals to perform the duties which shall come before them. Mr. Cook is present, who can show the greatest importance of a nautical education being applied to youths who enter our mercantile marine. It has been thought right to bring this matter before the Commission, in order that, if they think it of sufficient importance, they may speak of it in their report, and lead to the conversion of what is now a comparatively useless theatre for lectures which few attend, and fewer understand, into a noble institution, by which the merchants of the metropolis, and youths entering on commercial life, might be greatly benefitted. Dr. Waddilove has gone into the question with regard to the legal position of Gresham College, and some matters tend to show that the trustees have not been so faithful to their trust as they ought to have been. Whenever the question is thoroughly investigated, fears it will be found that the professors and trustees, instead of working together for the public good, have more frequently acted in a spirit of antagonism, and have cared less for their duties than their self interest, 7269.

Billett, Mr. William Bartholomew. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is the senior churchwarden of the parish of St. Pancras, and appears before the Commission in consequence of a resolution passed by the representative vestry, desiring to have a corporation for the parish of St. Pancras, 4127.—Reads the resolution and the report which was presented to the vestry, 4129.—States the grounds on which the parish desire an incorporation, 4130.—Refers to that part of the parish running from the work house up to Battle Bridge, Agar Town, Holmes' estate, and another portion nearly opposite Battle Bridge. An application was made to the commissioners of the Calthorpe estate to take in that portion on the northern side; they took in two streets, Swinton Street and Acton Street, but refused the rest of the property, because it would not pay them. In 1840 the commissioners of the Kentish Town estate refused to take in Agar Town because it would not pay them; and in the New Road there is about half a mile which has no less than five paving commissions on it under five different managements, 4131.—Complains of the effect produced on the parish by the managements of those departments being distributed over various properties, 4132.

Bills in Parliament:

Money was spent confidentially with respect to Bills in Parliament by the corporation, Scott, 4660–4673.—The City oppose Bills only when they propose to take their property from them, not if they made an alteration in any custom, unless the repeal would be injurious to the City, Tyrrell, 5463–5466.

Blake, Henry, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been connected with the corporation of the City of London above 8 years. Is a common councilman, and has been chairman of the Freedoms' Committee about 12 months, 7480–7483.—In 1851 made a motion in the Court of Common Council to refer to the Freedoms' Committee to consider what amendment could be made in the Act of Parliament for the reform of the corporation passed in 1849, and the efficacy of which had been impaired in its progress through the House of Lords. In consequence of witness's zeal on that occasion he was placed on the Freedoms' Committee. Mentions this to disprove what has been said in certain parts of the evidence, that if a man shows zeal on any particular question he is thereby debarred from being on the committees. Wishes to contradict the impression conveyed in the evidence that the committee have exercised undue severity in forcing non-freemen to take up their freedom within the City of London. Can truly say that they have done their duty in as merciful a spirit as was possible. Wishes to allude to Mr. Acland's evidence in question 80 and 90. He gives a table of fines for admission to freedom, showing that to 1834, when the fines were about 30*l.*, there were 1,000 persons annually admitted, and that after the reduction was made the admissions gradually decreased, and imputes the cause to a reluctance to associate with the class of persons who constituted the corporation; but the Reform Act of 1834, which gave parliamentary franchise to householders of the City of London, removed a great temptation from persons to take up their freedom. There are a large number of persons indisposed to serve the responsible office of sheriff, and also who desire to avoid the duties of the corporation altogether, which operates as a reason why they should not take up their freedom, unless coerced into doing so, and also accounts for the decline in the number. Mr. Acland also alludes to disputes which he says existed between the aldermen and common council in respect to the enforcement of freedom; but no such dispute did exist. The letter referred to by Mr. Acland was written to the Freedoms' Committee, who addressed the Court of Common Council for further instructions on the subject, and were referred back to the order of the 10th of June preceding, to compel non-freemen to take up their freedom. From that moment there was no conflict between the two courts. Refers to a paragraph in the report of the Commissioners of 1836, which coincides with his own opinion as to the feeling which influences the higher classes of merchants to avoid corporation offices, 7483.—There are greater inducements to keep men aloof from the corporation offices in London than in Liverpool besides that of the duties being more onerous, 7484, 7485.—The unfair evidence of Mr. Travers has already been animadverted upon, 7486.—Has been a member of the Irish Society. Heard the preceding evidence, and differs from the witness to this extent, that after all the obligations of the trust are performed, the companies who originally contributed the money would be entitled to any residue, and not the corporation, which was only the medium by which the money was conveyed, 7487–7490.—Concurs with him that the affairs of the Irish Society are well managed. The surveyor is a very intelligent man; he only receives 100*l.* a year, 7491.—There have been applications to the society for contributions towards public institutions, and recently a large portion of land was given for the purpose of erecting a college, 7492, 7493.—Except the small share mentioned the corporation have no interest, and are performing a public duty gratuitously, 7494, 7495.

BOUNDARIES:
The boundaries of the City have never been changed, but cannot look with certainty to any period before Edward III., Merewether, 4789–4792.

BOWER, BENJAMIN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is deputy-governor of the fellowship of porters, 6967.—The alderman of the ward of Billingsgate is always the governor, and his deputy exercises the office of deputy-governor, 6968.—Does not think the present lord mayor, who is alderman of Billingsgate, ever interferes, 6969.—Has not been deputy above a year, 6970.—Is not conversant with the affairs of the fellowship, 6971.—Has never taken part in the management of them before, 6972.—The business of the twelve rulers of the fellowship is to keep the men at work, 6973.—They meet to deliberate once a month, 6974, 6975.—Is not present at the meetings unless wanted, but can be if he likes, 6976.—At the meetings the finances are managed, and disputes decided between the porters and the meters, 6977.—The deputy appoints the fellowship porters; he has the power of fining for misconduct and dismissing, 6978.—It is a very ancient body; being found necessary in former times, was created by the corporation, 6979, 6980.—The corporation have the right of porterage and metage, and they appoint those men to do the duty, 6981.—The porters have to work with the meters, 6982.—Does not know of an Act of Parliament under which the porters act; there is an Act of Common Council, 6983, 6984.—There are 2,000 men on the books; from 900 to 1,000 are constantly at work, 6985.—Must be a freeman to become a porter, 6986, 6987.—He must have paid 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and a few trifling fees, 6988.—When he becomes a member of the fellowship he lodges 5*l.* in the hands of a ruler, 6990.—If the fellowship is done away with the five pounds will be returned, 6991, 6992.—It would be competent to the common council to dissolve the fellowship, 6993.—There is no Act of Parliament recognising the body, 6994.—Is a fruit merchant, landing large quantities of fruit on men's heads, 6995.—The fellowship porters are trusted to a large amount. They might very easily dispose of their goods, 6996.—They are a more respectable body of men than the ordinary porters, 6997.—Does not think they are too well paid; they get 2*d.* for bringing a package from the ship to the warehouse, 6998.—Does not think there is much complaint made of the porterage rates, 6999.—There is a fund belonging to the fellowship, 7000.—They have a sum in the three per cent. consols, amounting to 3,500*l.*, 7001.—There is 5,760*l.* in the hands of the shifter to pay the men, 7002.—Has seen Mr. Brown's evidence, 7003.—All payments go to the fellowship, 7005.—The fellowship call themselves a corporation, 7007.—They cannot sue or be sued in their own name, 7008.—Reads extract from Mr. Brown's evidence and explains it, 7009.—The corn shifter is an officer of the fellowship, 7010.—He collects the money for the work done from the persons who employ the porters, 7011, 7012.—He has to collect it frequently from long distances in the country, 7013.—The men are paid at Mr. Ruston's office, 7014.—He pays the men, and the real employer pays him, for which he deducts 1*d.* in a 1*s.*, 7015.—Believes the 87,000*l.* spoken of to be made up by this profit, 7017.—Can't say whether the corn shifter often has bad debts. According to the Act of Common Council there is a certain sum to be paid to the rulers and a certain sum to the deputy; has declined to receive it, 7018, 7019.—His office has been wholly gratuitous, 7020.—Is of a different opinion to Mr. Bennoch with regard to the chairman of committees being elected for their convivial qualities. The rule is to take a man for the chair who is in his fourth year, and is of opinion that they generally take the most efficient men. Thinks, if Mr. Bennoch had attended the committees more regularly, and made himself master of the business, he would have been elected, 7021.—The chairman is expected to dine with the committee when they have their business afterwards, 7022.—Once elected he is chairman for that year, and they have no power to vote him out of the chair, 7023.—The chairman is generally chosen from those who are in their fourth or last year upon a committee, 7024.—Does not find gentlemen object to take the chair at dinners; and it often happens that the man who is the most fit to take the chair at a committee is most competent to take it at the dinner table, 7025.—Does not think the dinners necessary to secure an adequate attendance. Thinks it fair that, when men give up a large amount of time in the middle of the day, and break up their social habits, they should have a dinner provided for them. Mr. Bennoch says that the corporation is generally composed of retail dealers. In witness's own ward there are eight representatives, and not a retail dealer among them, 7027.—It is not true that the common council generally is composed of retail dealers, 7028.

BOWER, BENJAMIN, Esq. (Second Examination.) —Should wish to correct his statement, that Mr. Bennoch accused the corporation of being men of no mark, and generally retail dealers. Finds it was Mr. Acland, in 146, and Mr. Travers, in No. 216, who made that statement, 7390.

BOROUGH COMPTER. See PRISONS.

BRAND, FERDINAND, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is clerk at the Bridge House, and comptroller of the works and revenues of London Bridge, 5765.—Is appointed by the Court of Common Council, 5766.—Has held the office nearly fifteen years. Has been connected with the corporation upwards of twenty-nine years, 5767.—The salary is 300*l.* a year, with other emoluments. The total of gross emoluments for the year 1852 was 1,013*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, from which sum is to be deducted the expenses of the office, 312*l.* 14*s.*, leaving the net emoluments of the office 701*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* Holds another appointment connected with the Sheriffs' Court, 5768.—Discharges the duties of comptroller and solicitor for the Bridge House trust. The duties of the chamberlain, as connected with the Bridge House trust, are discharged by the bridge masters; they are two ancient officers, 5769, 5770.—The fund of the Bridge House estates is created by ancient grants from the Crown, gifts from different individuals, and purchases of property arising from the saving of the revenues at different periods. On the first building of London Bridge, a sort of crusade was preached by Peter of Colechurch; he went about the country with a brief, and was enabled to collect funds towards the erection of the bridge. Sometimes money was given, and at other times land, for the purpose of building London Bridge; at other times grants have been made from the Crown, and purchases have been made out of the surplus rents and profits of the Bridge House estates. Property also has been given by will, 5771.—The result is a fund held in trust for the maintenance and support of London Bridge, 5772.—The whole of that fund is derived from rents of land and houses, with the exception of some dividends which arise from the produce of lands which have been sold at different times under the authority of Acts of Parliament; the money in such cases is paid into the Bank of England, and invested by the direction of the Court of Chancery, according to the provisions of those Acts, either in the purchase of other property, or in the funds, 5773.—Does not make any payment towards the Orphans Fund, 5774.—At the present moment, the money that was raised for the rebuilding of London Bridge is secured upon the Bridge House estates; the sum of 431,000*l.* was advanced by Government out of the consolidated fund, and is charged upon the Bridge House estates; the repayment whereof is secured by various annuities, amounting in the whole to 21,550*l.* per annum, the whole of which annuities will be paid off in the year 1871, 5775.—The charge will be permanent up to that year, 5776.—The diminution will commence in 1867; up to that year there will be no alteration. In 1867 some of the annuities will begin to fall off, and they will all cease in 1871, 5777.—When the present Blackfriars Bridge required to be substantially repaired, a difficulty arose as to the means of obtaining funds for that purpose. The Government of that day considered that it would not be an improper application of the Bridge House funds to appropriate a portion of them in securing the repayment of the monies advanced for the repair of Blackfriars Bridge, and those estates were accordingly charged with the payment of 77,400*l.*, raised for the repair of Blackfriars Bridge; in respect of which, the sum of 73,100*l.* still remains unpaid, 5778.—That charge of course applies only to the surplus rents and profits, after the payment of the 21,550*l.* a year to the Government, from the actual produce of the Bridge House estates. That surplus is about 5,000*l.* a year. That is charged, in the first place, with the payment of the annual expenses of the lighting, cleansing, watching, and repairing Blackfriars Bridge, 5779.—For the present the fund is entirely exhausted by the expenses in respect of London Bridge and Blackfriars Bridge, and the cost of collection, 5780.—The corporation have the legal estate in the Bridge House property, but the estates are no part of the property of the corporation; they have no right to appropriate any portion of the Bridge House estates to their own corporate uses, 5781.—They are trustees of a fund devoted to a particular purpose, 5782.—They cannot alter the application of the fund without the authority of Parliament, 5783.—The entire management of the trust is vested in the corporation, 5784.—If the management of this fund were incorporated with the management of the estates of the City, the saving of expense would simply be the salary paid to witness of 300*l.* a year, and also of the salaries paid to the two bridge-masters, 5785.—The senior bridge-master receives about 380*l.* a year; the junior has 50*l.* a year less, 5786.—The rents are paid at the office of the bridge-masters, 5787.—There is no collector who goes round, 5788.—Believes the practice of the comptroller of the chamber and the department which he (witness) fills is precisely the same, 5789.—The bridge-masters attend personally to receive the rents, 5790.—The office of the Bridge House estates is now at Guildhall. There was an ancient establishment connected with the Bridge House close to London Bridge, where all the officers in ancient times used to reside. Materials were kept there for the repair of old London Bridge, and the superintendent for watching the bridge and keeping it in repair was to be found there. About ten or twelve years since the bridge house in Tooley Street was pulled down, and the site thereof let for the benefit of the trust, and it now forms part of what is called Cotton's wharf, 5791.—The present alderman of Bridge Ward has nothing to do with the Bridge House estates; but there was a justice of the bridge yard in ancient times, who had a residence at the bridge yard, and was paid a small stipend out of the Bridge House estates, 5792.—Apprehends that if the City purchased Southwark Bridge, it would be entirely independent of the Bridge House estates. Does not think that the corporation intend to purchase it, 5793.—If they did, they must provide the money out of their own estate, 5794.—It has been stated that the income of the Bridge House estates for the year 1852 was upwards of 47,000*l.*; by the printed accounts for that year that will be seen to be an error. In that amount of 47,000*l.* are included sums of money for the sale of property, which of course formed no part of the income or revenue of the estates, 5795.—The produce of the property sold was invested; it does not come into the hands of the bridge-masters or the corporation at all. Under the provisions of the Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act, any money paid for the purchase of property situated as the Bridge House estates are, is paid into the Bank of England, and can only be dealt with by the direction of the Court of Chancery. Some of the witnesses have included 12,740*l.* as revenue, which forms no part of it, 5796.—The Court of Chancery would probably direct the produce arising from the sale of that land to be carried to the account of the fund. The money is invested in the funds, and the interest or dividends forms part of the income. Ultimately, the principal must be laid out in the purchase of other freehold property, 5797.—The practice of the corporation in letting their property is precisely the same with respect to the Bridge House estates as with respect to their own estates. They give a preference in all cases to the tenant in possession. It is ascertained first that he has such an interest as will enable him to retain possession of the property up to the time his landlord's lease will expire, and then he may make an application to the Court of Common Council for a lease. That application is referred to the Bridge House Committee; the committee then view the property. The surveyor then makes a general survey, and reports his opinion as to the best mode of letting the property. The committee then consider that report, and agree as to the mode of letting the property. The tenant then comes to the committee, and treats with them for a lease. The tenant offers a rent; if his offer be what the committee consider a fair offer, they either accept it or tell the tenant that his offer is not what they consider the property worth; and if it approaches to their opinion of the value, they tell him the amount, and he either accepts or rejects it. If the committee agree with the tenant, they then report the fact to the Court of Common Council; the Court of Common Council usually agree with the committee as to letting the property, and then a lease is granted. If the tenant in possession does not treat, the property is advertised to be let by tender, no preference being given to any one. Then the party offering the highest rent, if he is a respectable man, has the property, in which case it is not necessary to report to the court, 5798.—It does not often happen that the property of the City is let by tender; the occupying tenants usually treat, 5799.—The tenants are not to assign or underlet without a licence, 5800.—A licence is not unfrequently given. The object of the corporation is to remove the middlemen altogether, and give the occupying tenant the preference, 5801.—It often happens that the immediate lessee of the corporation obtains leave of the corporation to underlet, 5802.—The result would be to divide the property, to let it out in parcels to a number of people, 5803.—They have frequently let a property where the ground rent was 20*l.* or 30*l.* a year; by dividing it out it has produced between 300*l.* and 400*l.* a year, 5804.—The whole of the premises which were contained in the original lease are scarcely ever comprised in any new lease; the principle being to give the occupier, who is settled and established and carrying on a trade, the benefit of any advantage which is to be derived from holding directly under the City, instead of having another person over him who could screw out a larger rent by way of goodwill. Produces the last audited account of the estate, 5805.—Reference has been made by one witness to a payment under the name of a benevolence to the lord mayor and the sheriffs. There is 50*l.* put down as paid to the lord mayor towards the charge of feasts during the mayoralty; and it has been intimated that it is a feast to the Bridge House Committee. Begs to state that it is no such thing. The Bridge House Committee have no feasts during the mayoralty at all. They have a certain allowance from the corporation of London for their tavern expenses. This payment to the lord mayor is a very ancient payment. With reference to the allowance to the committee, taking the average at the commencement of the year 1802, for eight years, it was something above 300*l.* for the attendance of members, and for their tavern expenses 900*l.* In 1832 the allowance for attendances was 200*l.*, and the allowance for tavern expenses 300*l.* Since 1836 the allowance for tavern expenses has been 300*l.* only, the attendance money having been entirely abolished, 5806.—The Bridge House Committee is a committee of the common council, 5807.—Thinks their duties are onerous. In a large estate like that of the Bridge House there are questions constantly arising as to letting and otherwise; also as to London and Blackfriars bridges, 5808.—All the details of the estate in regard to granting new leases are decided by the committee, 5809, 5810.—They are the managers. The comptroller of the Bridge House estates has the general superintendence, subject to the supervision of the committee, 5811.—Has to see that the directions of the committee are carried into effect, and to take care that all facts connected with lettings and other matters are duly brought before the committee, 5812.—Has to prepare and arrange all the business for their consideration. Their meetings during the year 1852 were thirty-two, and the average attendance of members from sixteen to eighteen; they sometimes sit till four or five o'clock. The property in Southwark to which allusion has been made belongs to the Bridge House estates. The purchase money was paid out of the Bridge House funds; and the rents and profits of these estates have always been received and appropriated as part of the Bridge House estates. Of course they are not applicable to improvements in Southwark in general terms, but submits that the borough of Southwark has derived greater advantages from those estates being in the hands of a great corporation like that of London, than it would have done if the property had been in the hands of private individuals. On the estate in St. George's Fields, for example, when the lease fell in there many years ago, the City expended large sums. They expended upwards of 12,000*l.* in sewerage, and upwards of 2,000*l.* in the formation of roads and ways, all of which have been beneficial to the public, 5813.—The tenants and occupiers of the City houses pay parish and other rates like other tenants, 5814.—Besides paying rates and taxes, the City has acted the part of a liberal landlord with respect to the property. This is an actual outlay of 14,000*l.*, for which the tenants pay nothing, 5815.—The borough of Southwark would not have derived this outlay from any private individual. The rate would have been made upon the inhabitants after the sewers were made; but had not it been for that 14,000*l.*, the sewers never would have been made at that time. In answer to a statement made by one of the witnesses in page 132, No. 1221, as to the conflicting duties of the different committees of the corporation, states, that two years ago, instead of five, as is there stated, a report was made that symptoms of sinking had taken place at one of the piers of Blackfriars Bridge. Under the advice of Messrs. Walker and Burgess, the Bridge House Committee acted in directing that rubble should be thrown in to support the defective pier. That work was executed under the direction of Messrs. Walker and Burgess; and believes it is not correct that any of that rubble caused shoals or accidents on the river. A statement was made a short time ago that the steamboat called the "Ant" had met with an accident at Blackfriars Bridge, occasioned by this rubble being thrown in. An investigation took place, and it was ascertained very satisfactorily that the supposed accident to the "Ant," whatever it was, had arisen before it reached Blackfriars Bridge, and not in consequence of any shoals whatever connected with or adjacent to the bridge. The Navigation Committee and the Bridge House Committee act in perfect harmony, Mr. Leach, the engineer of the Navigation Committee, taking care that nothing shall be done to the prejudice of the navigation, 5816.—By direction of the Court of Common Council, the Bridge House Committee have been in communication with the Southwark Bridge Company with respect to the purchase of Southwark Bridge, 5817.—The negotiation was first opened in 1849, at a conference with the directors of the Southwark Bridge Company. Upon that occasion the Southwark Bridge Company required the sum of 300,000*l.* for the purchase of that bridge, 5818.—Believes the Southwark Bridge Company are incorporated under Act of Parliament, 5819.—They were asked by the Bridge House Committee to state the basis upon which they formed that calculation; the directors gave for answer that the only basis they would give was, that they had been offered 300,000*l.* by the North Kent Railway Company for the purchase of the bridge, and that sum they should require. The North Kent Railway Company had a plan for bringing their railway into the City, but the bill did not pass the House of Commons, 5820.—It appeared that this projected company had contracted to give that sum for the purchase of the bridge, subject to their bill passing. Finding that the dividends realised by the Southwark Bridge Company were confined entirely to the preference shareholders, and that the other shareholders did not receive one shilling, the dividend upon the preference shares being only 1¾ per cent., the committee of the Bridge House thought that 300,000*l.* was a large sum to ask, and they requested to know the basis upon which the calculation was formed; but the directors of the Southwark Bridge Company declined to give any other basis than that mentioned, 5821.—There were 6,700 preference shares, 5822.—£2,600 was the annual income. Since that time it has diminished; it has gradually been getting less and less, and they receive now about 1¼ per cent., 5823.—The expense of maintaining the bridge is said to be very small; they say that they have nothing but the collectors, and it requires very little repair. The negociation has been renewed recently. During the latter part of last year attended again with the Bridge House Committee at a conference with the directors of Southwark Bridge; they still maintained their price of 300,000*l.*, and do not appear to be disposed to make the slightest abatement. In fact, it was intimated, that unless that sum was speedily given, the price would be raised. They seem to have an impression that the bridge must be purchased for the public, and they think, as one of them said, that they will be able to get any price they like, 5824.—The tolls levied on Southwark Bridge are 2*d.* for a one-horse carriage, and 1*d.* for foot passengers, 5825.—The traffic is very inconsiderable, 5826.—The approaches are very bad, 5827.—No estimate has been made, but it has been pretty well calculated that, irrespective of the sum of money which may be paid for the purchase of the bridge, it would require an outlay of 150,000*l.* to make the approaches available, in order to render the bridge beneficial to the public. Has no idea that the Bridge House estates could be applied to the purchase of Southwark Bridge, nor that the corporation of London should be expected to provide the whole of the money for its purchase, seeing that it is made in the nature of a national concern more than a City one. Believes that the corporation desire to bring the matter into such a train that, with some assistance from the Government, and by means also of their own funds, this bridge should be thrown open to the public, 5828.—The northern end of Southwark Bridge abuts upon the City, 5829.—Holds the appointment of prothonotary and clerk of the papers and clerk's sitter of the Sheriffs' Court, 5830.—Has a salary of 100*l.* a year. Receives an allowance for livery of 2*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and derives emoluments from fees amounting in the year 1852 to 21*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*, 5831.—The duties are not very onerous now. The old Sheriffs' Court has little or nothing now to do since the passing of the City Small Debts Act, and especially since the extension of the powers of that Act to debts not exceeding 50*l.* Held the first of those appointments from the year 1832. When elected to the office of comptroller of the Bridge House estates tendered his resignation. The corporation were then contemplating improvements in the Sheriffs' Courts, and requested witness to continue the duties of that office, in order that they might not be encumbered with the appointment of new officers, or any claim founded upon vested rights. As other offices have fallen in of the same kind, the whole of the offices have been accumulated upon witness, with the exception of two of the clerk sitters. The business of the office was for many years conducted at Whitecross Street prison, under the provisions of the Act of Parliament for removing the compter in Wood Street and the Poultry compter. The resort to a prison being considered very objectionable, the corporation were desirous of removing it from there; and in passing the Act for the Small Debts Court, a clause was inserted which enabled them to do so. Looking at the operation of the Small Debts Act, although the corporation did not feel that they could supersede the old Sheriffs' Courts altogether, they were not desirous of incurring unnecessary expense in the establishment of a new office, therefore they requested witness to take the duties of the office, performing them at his own office, thus avoiding the necessity of having another office for the discharge of those duties, 5832.—The business of that court is now virtually annihilated, with the exception of replevins and writs of trial from the superior courts, 5833.—Does not think there would be any objection to the abolition of the court by Act of Parliament if the position of the officers was properly regarded, 5834.—The Sheriffs' Court business is conducted in the same way as business at nisi prius, 5835.—The subject of jurisdiction would be debts of any amount. The counsel in the old Sheriffs' Courts were the same as in the Mayor's Court, the City pleaders. The corporation bought up all the rights of the City pleaders, and they have thrown open the Sheriffs' Courts to all attorneys, with a view of increasing the practice of that court, 5836.

Bribery:

Is not aware of any cases of direct bribery in the election of Common Councilmen, Acland, 275.—Is practised in two ways at common hall. Men are bribed to prevent the election of a man to an office he does not wish to fill, or they are bribed to secure the election of a candidate to an office he wishes to fill, ib. 324.—The most recent instance was in the election of Mr. Alderman Smith. It was only to the amount of 200*l.* or 300*l.*, ib. 325.—The open system applies to common hall elections only, ib. 368.—With bribes varying from 1*s.* to 10*l.* can buy over the four hundred liverymen at common hall elections, ib. 417.—Office of bridge-master obtained by bribery, ib. 427.—There was a good deal of bribery in the contest for the mayoralty of 1846. Likewise in 1844 at the election of Alderman Brown as chamberlain, ib. 551.—It has been said upon elections for sheriffs the liverymen get a sum of money for voting, Pulling, 952.—Indirect bribery was exercised at Alderman Harmer's election, Hyde, 1532, 1533.—Does not believe there is any in elections in common-hall, Jones, 1559, 1560.—Used in the election of Mr. Sherriff Croll, ib. 1560–1564.—Oath; would have the bribery oath put to men who are brought to the poll, Alcock, 1775.—Case of, at the last election for chamberlain, ib. 1777.—Has never paid voters for the sake of inducing them to give their votes. Has heard 10*s.* or 15*s.* have been paid, Macnamara, 2890, 2891.—Never resorted to in the election of sheriffs, Rose, 2937–2939.—Prevalent opinion upon bribery amongst the liverymen, Bennett, 4180.—Corrupt practices have prevailed to a considerable extent at some of the City elections, owing to a prevalent opinion that the same laws do not apply to them as to the Parliamentary elections, Merewether, 5040.—Bribery and personation are very rare at the wardmote elections. Thinks that would be the case if the qualification were the same for voting at common hall. The greatest difficulty at common hall is, the liverymen are not known to the corporate officers, ib. 5051.—Desires to rebut some evidence given by Mr. Acland in question 325 and 326, stating that money to the amount of 200*l.* or 300*l.* was spent in bribery at witness's election, the whole amount spent being 21*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* Produces the bills and receipts. Contradicts another statement made by Mr. Acland, 340, that 19 aldermen agreed to find 100*l.* a piece towards turning the scale. Answers for himself, and has no hesitation in answering for the great majority of his brethren, that they neither engaged to subscribe, nor paid anything, Lord Mayor, 7123. Flatly contradicts a statement to the effect that the corporation funds were used at an election for the purposes of corruption, as stated by Mr. Sheriff Wallis in question 1462, ib. 7124.—In elections in common hall, the way in which parties have to pay for getting a hall, as it is called. The voters ought to pass through the respective wickets, and witness was called on to pay 5*l.* a hundred to some person for having allowed what appeared to be non-voters to pass through a particular wicket. The corporation have twice tried to alter this, but the opponents were too strong on both occasions, Harrison, 7293.—There is much bribery in common hall elections, the candidates can buy votes by the hundred, ib. 7293.—Some witness implied that Mr. Sheriff Croll had been corruptly engaged in getting himself elected; contradicts that statement so far as Mr. Croll is concerned, Pearson, 8470.

The office is procured by bribery, Acland, 427.—Mr. Gibbs has held that office for about seven years, Lord Mayor, 7155.—The salary is about 400*l.* a year, ib. 7156.—It is generally supposed that the salary is not enough for the expenses of election, ib. 7157.—Can see no reason why the common hall should elect officers of this character in public hall assembled, ib. 7158.—Is elected by common hall, ib. 7165.

BRIDGES:

Blackfriars. Built by the city, Merewether, 5283.—The foundations are in a very bad state, Leach, 6417.

London. The erection of this bridge was contracted for by Messrs. Jolliffe and Banks, at the sum of 426,000*l.* The Act for building it received the Royal Assent July 7th, 1823. It appears by a report to the Court of Common Council, that the corporation had spent, up to the 3d of December 1831, upon the bridge and its approaches, 1,426,145*l.*, one million sterling more than the original contract, Hickson, 2760.—11,500*l.* mortgaged to make the approaches, Williams, 2828.—London Bridge was built out of the revenues of the Bridge House estates, and some other properties, in one way or other, by money raised by the City, as well for the purpose of building the bridge as making the approaches to it, Merewether, 5284.—In individual cases very considerable damage may have been done to the property on the bank of the Thames since the removal of London Bridge, just in this way, that higher tides flow up the river now than used to do before the removal of old London Bridge, therefore they may flood the country and do mischief, Leach, 6397.—London Bridge Approaches Fund has been one of the largest, but is not so at present, Scott, 4557.—It is in the chamberlain's office. The 8*d.* coal duty, the 1*d.* duty, and other sources of revenues, form that fund, ib. 4558.—It is not a corporation fund; it is a trust created by Act of Parliament, the proceeds to be applied exclusively to public works, under the Board of Works, ib. 4559.—Consists of the coal duties, the wine duties, and a contribution from the City of 11,500*l.*, also fees on the admission of freemen, and binding apprentices, and the rentals of waterworks. The revenue is about 140,000*l.* per annum, ib. 4618, 4619.

Southwark. One abutment of Southwark Bridge is in the City Proper, the other is in Southwark. That bridge was built by a private company, Merewether, 5285.—Negotiation for the purchase of the bridge by the corporation in conjunction with the Government, Dakin, 7385.—Mr. Tite could prove that the corporation refused the grant of Southwark Bridge, and preferred to oppose the Mid Kent Railway coming over the Thames, and now they have to purchase the bridge, Acland, 8509.

Waterloo. Does not consider the foundation secure, Leach, 6416.—The company themselves are not very sanguine as to the security of the bridge. Thinks that a settlement may be apprehended from the alterations going forward from day to day in the bed of the river, Leach, 7520.—The company have no objection to the Thames Navigation Committee cutting off the sheeting of the piles of the piers, or to the removal of any other piles that may be considered necessary, Powell, 7524.—The company called upon the parties who had made an excavation of the channel on the south side of the river to stop it up, which they did, Leach, 7536.

Westminster. The City have nothing to do with it, Merewether, 5283.

BROKERS:—

Pay a fine for admission to the freedom of the corporation, Acland, 534.—Necessary to have the sanction of the corporation and the Stock Exchange in order to act, ib. 537.—The corporation regulates brokers. The regulation of brokers is by virtue of an immemorial custom which is recognized in some of the earliest charters and laws relating to the city of London, Pulling, 729.—The jurisdiction of the City over sworn brokers has been another of the immemorial enjoyments of the City, Merewether, 5196–5213.—The jurisdiction which the Court of Aldermen exercise over brokers is very beneficial, and it is of great importance that there should be in the Court of Aldermen gentlemen connected with the business of brokers in London. Has seen practical benefits result from it, ib. 5203–5213.

BROWN, Mr. CHARLES. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the rulers of the body of fellowship porters, 3054.—The governing power is lodged in the governor, who is at present Lord Mayor, Alderman Sidney; his deputy, twelve rulers, the law clerk, beadle, two corn shifters, salt shifter, and fruit shifters, 3055.—The number of members is limited to 3,000, but at the present time it does not exceed 2000, 3056.—The number is limited by an act of the common council. There have been as many as 2,800, but the restrictions which have been laid upon them by the corporation have caused the reduction, 3057–3059.—There is not as much work for them as there used to be, 3060.—The body of free porters of the fellowship of London is not a corporation itself, but they claim their rights of labour under prescriptive right from the corporation. They have existed since the time of Edward the First, and were originally established and now exist for the purpose of landing and delivering coal, corn, salt, apples, pears, plums, onions, and other things in their nature measurable, waterborne, brought into limits of the port of London, that is, from Yantlet Creek eastward to Staines Bridge westward. The fellowship porters claim this species of labour, and their wages have been regulated and fixed from time to time by the court of common council, 3061.—They claim their privileged rights under prescription of the corporation, 3062.—All the members of the fellowship must be citizens of London, and they make application to the company of the fellowship to be admitted as members of that body, 3063.—A citizen of London, if he wishes to be admitted into the company of the fellowship porters, must go through the ordeal of presenting a petition to be admitted, and wait his turn, 3064.—The number has been settled by an act of council, 3065.—Previously to 1619 the body was governed by ordinances issued from the court of aldermen; but in December 1619 the court of common council passed an act for the better regulation of the company; altered the number from 120 to 200, and from that time has made various alterations to meet the increasing demands of trade; and the number of porters which was last fixed on in 1822 was 3,000, 3066.—The number of porters varies with the amount of business to be done by them, 3067, 3068.—In consequence of the large portion of the corn labour being taken away by the various dock companies, the men have left the employment, and when there are spurts of work it is difficult to find persons to do the labour. The principal merchants signed a memorial to the lord mayor, requesting him to supply them with more porters, as they had employed men not under the control of the rulers of the fellowship, and that they had in the course of a week five or ten sacks of potatoes stolen, 3069.—Each fellowship porter, upon his admission, has to find two sureties, who give a bond in 40*l.* each for his honesty and general good conduct; and on complaint being made in case of dishonesty, and being proved to the satisfaction of the rulers at Fellowship Hall, he would be immediately dismissed from the company; and in case of other misconduct he would be fined, perhaps suspended too, 3070.—The rate of wages is fixed by tariffs made by the corporation. With respect to the corn labour, the fellowship porters receive for working oats 2*d.* a quarter; this 2*d.* is to be divided among as many fellowship porters as may be employed in the job, either seven or eight. That is the only sum they receive, and out of that they have to pay the shift; that is a sum of money deducted from them for the purpose of paying the counting-house department of the fellowship, and a portion of that goes towards the governing expenses. When they are doing peas, tares, wheat and barley, they receive 2½*d.* per quarter, and whatever other charges may be added, and sent in to those who employ the porters. These are the only amounts of money received by the porters for their work, 3071.—Considers the charge made by the porters considerably below the market price of labour, 3072,—Thinks that if the privilege were removed the porters would get more money than they receive now; they are obliged now to go to jobs which they are out of pocket in consequence of taking, 3073.—There are generally many applications to join the fellowship, but believes that they apply in error, supposing the parties are in the receipt of the prices for labour as fixed by the corporation, and that the whole of the claimed corn labour is done by the porters, which is not the case in either instance; as a proof that other men will not work for their price, a strike took place yesterday with the men not fellowship porters, employed in landing oranges, 3074, 3075.—When there is an occasional press of business, and not men enough for the work, they then select freemen, and give them a ticket appointing them to the packing department, but never to the loose corn department when to be measured during the press of business, 3076.—They were not freemen who struck, 3077.—Many men who are neither fellowship porters nor freemen are employed in landing oranges, on occasions, does not think it is exactly illegal, 3078, 3079.—They say there is a distinction in the orange trade and other trades, but it is merely in practice, 3080, 3081.—There is always a provision in respect to perishable articles. The corporate charges for delivering potatoes and turnips out of one vessel into another, if not carried on the porter's back, 1*d.* per sack. Those sacks weigh a hundred weight and a half. If carried on shore from the first, second, third, fourth, or fifth vessel on the tier to any distance not exceeding ninety yards, whether delivered into carts, waggons, warehouses, or others, 1½*d.* per sack, 3082.—One of the privileges which the fellowship porters claim is that of attending the City bushel, in all its engagements, and that is one complaint which the fellowship porters make against the corporation, that they do not enforce the fellowship porters' right with the meters in those various docks, 3083.—Considers that there is not that responsibility attached to the labourers working within the dock that there is to the fellowship porters. When the porters are working with the meters, the porters are equally bound to see justice done between the parties as the meters, 3084.

Brown, Mr. Charles—continued.
—The fellowship porters are not employed within the docks; have not been for some years; the meters are employed, 3085, 3086.—Witness complains that the City do not enforce the privilege of the porters to be employed within the docks, 3087.—There have of late years been innovations made upon their privileges by various mill-owners on the banks of the river, 3088.—The steam mills for grinding corn have taken upon themselves the prerogative of employing labourers to perform the privileged work of the porters, in assisting the City meters in filling and striking the City bushel. Refers to the evidence on this subject as given by corn merchants, and before the general purpose committee, inquiring into the privileges of meters, 3089.—The owners of the mills have themselves excluded the porters, 3090.—They have assumed that power to themselves; the dock companies have done the same and make a profit on the labour, 3091.—The fellowship porters petitioned the common council in the year 1847, calling their attention to the poverty brought upon the members generally in consequence of that portion of the employment being taken away from them, but from that time to the present they have not had any assistance from the corporation, 3092.—Does not say that the fellowship porters are not satisfied with their corporate tariff of wages, if they received them, which they do not on corn labour. In the case of potatoes they are so, but the impression has gone abroad that the fellowship porters' earnings are excessive. It is not so, 3093.—The fellowship porters are worse off than labouring men in the same class; gives an instance: a meter applied to witness for a man to go to Blackwall, saying he had 50 quarters of grain to measure and deliver into a craft. Those men had to pay 6*d.* each for the railway, 3*d.* each for waterage, and when they got on board the vessel they measured but two quarters, which amounted to 5*d.* out of that they had to pay a halfpenny shift, and then 4½*d.* was to be divided among those six men, 3094.—This is a case of hourly occurrence, 3095.—It is not corporate tariff of corn wages they complain of, but the extreme smallness of the majority of the jobs, being debarred going into the docks where the large ones are done. The small jobs in the river, compared with the large ones, are as one to forty, 3096.—They do not pay at all, 3097.—The advantage of a system is, in obtaining at all times prompt and careful men to perform the merchant work. A as a large number of men would necessarily be required, a regulating power would be absolutely necessary. Witness paid 50*l.* to purchase citizenship, and then paid 5*l.* on admission into the company. Instead of performing their obligations, the corporation suffer the dock companies to take away this labour without any compensation for the loss thereof, 3098.—Should say there were a hundred who paid as much as 50*l.*, but still the whole of them were compelled to belong to one of the trading companies, and must have paid very large sums of money to the corporation for their citizenship, whether they obtained it by patrimony or servitude. They have had to pay fees, and also a large sum of money has been paid to the Government in the way of stamp duties on their obtaining their freedom; and on each admission to the fellowship 2*l.* is paid to the Government as the duty on the bonds, 4000.—What witness complains of is, that the City have taken their money in the shape of redemptions and freedoms, and do not give them efficient protection by the assertion of their exclusive privileges, 4001.—They are not a corporation, or they might sue in their own name for a restitution of privilege labour, 4003.—The limit which the lord mayor claims is from Yantlet Creek to Staines Bridge, 4005.—The Watermen's Company have nothing to do with the conservancy of the river between those points; they claim their privilege as a trade privilege under the corporation, 4006, 4007.—The City claims jurisdiction over the whole distance that has been mentioned, 4008.—The fellowship porters' privilege extends over the whole port of London from Staines to Yantlet Creek, 4009.—Cannot undertake to say that these men ever go up as far as Staines; has known them go down as far as Gravesend, 4010, 4011. Complains that this right is not enforced to what they consider its extreme limits. Witness claims a right of corn labour in the several docks, which has not been enforced by the corporation. Mr. Gibbs, in his evidence before the Commissioners, infers that the fellowship porters increase the trade expenses of the oyster owners. Now the fact is, that neither the oyster owner, nor the salesmen, nor the meter, pays the porter at all. The purchaser pays him, and also pays the holdsman who measures the oysters; so that whatever difference there may exist on the subject of expense to the owner, must be attributed to the meters of the corporation; it is not with the men who actually do the work, 4012.—The porters are only paid for the work actually done by them, but whatever profit there is accrues to the meter. When a fellowship porter is employed, the salesman is perfectly satisfied that as soon as the goods are in the porter's possession they will be delivered safe to the purchaser; and if any mistake is made they have only to apply at the Fellowship Porters' Hall, and the money is paid for the loss, 4013.—The privilege of the fellowship porters only extends to a limited class of articles; if a ship contains some articles to which the privilege applies, and others to which it does not apply, an arrangement is made by which the porters assist in landing those articles over which, properly speaking, they have no right, 4014–4016.—No inconvenience arises from this sort of compromise. Some evidence has been given that they are excluded from the docks by clauses in the Dock Acts, but it is no such thing. The rights and privileges of the corporation of London are all reserved in each of the Acts. They are expressly mentioned as fellowship porters in the Commercial Dock Act, and likewise in the Victoria Docks, and in all the Acts the rights are reserved to them as the rights of the lord mayor and commonalty of the City, 4017.—Thinks the corporation might more effectually protect their privileges if they were inclined, 4018.—The shareholders and parties who have the management of those various docks are in connexion with the corporation, and mixed up with them; and, on the other hand, thinks the dock companies, being very rich, the corporation does not like to commence a contention with them, 4019.—Was informed that in one year the West India Dock Company realized a profit of 18,000*l.* on corn labour alone, 4020.—They got the work done more cheaply than if they had employed the fellowship porters, but they charged their clients at the same rate, 4021.—Such men as the companies employ are induced to work cheaper than responsible practical men, particularly as the dock labourer is not subject to the drawbacks and expenses entailed on the fellowship porter; besides, the dock companies afford them facilities for doing the work with less men, 4022.—The way they get it done cheaper is by introducing machinery, so as to enable the men to work shorter handed, 4025.—Does not think persons on the quays of the river have the same advantages for economizing labour that the dock companies have; at all events, not with respect to corn labour, 4026.—Another complaint against the corporation is this, that they have passed acts of council regulating the body of fellowship porters, in which they have coerced them to make payments to officers of their appointing. The principal corn shifter borrowed of the company 7,000*l.*, which the corporation compelled the company to lend him to carry on his business as a corn shifter. He was appointed in 1827, and he has received the sum of 87,000*l.* out of the earnings of the porters from that branch of his employment of corn labour. Although a portion of this sum has been paid over to the rulers of the company at different times no effective provision is made for old members of the body, 4028.—The corporation compelled the company to lend this officer 7,000*l.* without interest, 4029.—The porters themselves do not receive the money immediately from their employers, but when they have done the job they make out an account, and go to this man, who is called the corn-shifter; he shifts the bill, and they have to deduct a penny from each shilling coming to them, and this has been the amount he has received from those pence taken out of the shillings, 4030.—The corporation made an act of council, in which they inserted a clause that the company should advance the shifter any sum he might require, 4032.—He no doubt in the first instance used some of it, providing an officer and paying clerks; but witness thinks it very inconsistent that a man should be found that amount of capital, without interest, to enable him to realise a large income for his own advantage, 4033.—He is indebted to the company for it, and whenever settlement day comes they will expect him to repay it, 4034.—Believes he has given security for the money, and has repaid a part of it. Another complaint against the corporation is that in the case of the potato shifter, their principal meter, who purchased his situation some years ago, was appointed fruit shifter, and upon his returns made to this same enquiry, in eleven years the amount averages 791*l.*, within a very small fraction, per annum. Out of that he pays 130*l.* to the Court of Rulers, making a profit of the rest. Witness concludes that the corporation had no right to impose this officer upon the company, but that this money ought to have been appropriated as a provision for the members of the company when old and worn out, 4035.—The shifter is, in fact, a sort of cashier, who receives the payments from the importers, 4036.—They do not give long credits. In the case of the potato shifter it is very likely they do not give more than a week's credit. Mr. Ruston has given long credits to some of the members of the corn trade; but that is a matter of arrangement between himself and them, 4037.—He gives in his account monthly to the Court of Rulers, 4038.—Cannot say upon what ground the clause named was inserted, unless it was that previously to 1822 those shifts were farmed or leased; in 1822 they were to be leased no longer; they were to pay a certain portion of what they received over, retaining a certain amount to themselves, 4040.—The shifter now collects everything upon the porters' account, whereas before that time the collections were farmed out, so that they (the porters) never knew what the amount levied upon the public was, 4041–4043.—The body of fellowship porters is not in that flourishing condition which the public is generally led to believe, nor do they receive those large sums for their labour which is supposed. The majority of them are in a state of comparative destitution. Those men who follow the corn trade do now not average a pound a week, and some men who have been 22 years members of the body do not average more than 14*s.* or 15*s.* a week, 4044.—The pay awarded to them by the corporation would be remunerative if they had the whole of their legitimate work, 4045.—There is a fund belonging to the entire fellowship, but the expenditure far exceeds the income. This is another subject which the company petitioned the corporation about in 1845, but to the present time have not been able to get them to interfere in the matter. Witness has in his possession an official return of the references to the several corporate committees on various subjects, but cannot find in this return any mention of the two petitions of which he has been speaking. The body of fellowship porters feel particularly dissatisfied in this respect. They also complain that the wages have been reduced, when that reduction was not asked for by one single member of the corn trade, 4046, 4047.—They have to make the deficiency good out of the stock. Will be forced into insolvency if they go on in that way much longer, 4048.—The corporation do not interfere to give any assistance in the difficulty, 4049.—In 1807, the London Dock Company paid to Sir William Curtis, as governor of the ticket porters, the sum of 11,339*l.*, as a compensation for loss of privilege employment by a branch of that society.

BULLOCK, Captain FREDERICK. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been employed by the Admiralty in the survey of the port of London, both of the Thames and the Medway, 2604.—Has been employed since 1830, but not entirely in these rivers, having surveyed all the coast to Great Yarmouth on the one side, to Portsmouth on the other; partially surveyed the Medway fourteen years after its completion, 2605, 2606.—The Medway was re-surveyed on the report of Mr. Gooden, who represented the Medway to have fallen into such a state of decay as to threaten its destruction, 2608.—Has no means of making a comparative estimate of the present condition of the Thames, as there has been no authenticated survey prior to his, which is now the standard. Has always advocated periodical examinations, as the only means of attaining a practical knowledge of the changes which take place in this important river, 2609.—There are certainly in the Thames many shoals that at times impede the navigation of the river, which ought to have been removed long ago. Gave evidence once before a former committee upon the subject, when it was proved that the City had not the right to remove shoals, as they were claimed by the corporation of the Trinity Board; but, in justice to the City of London, remarks that he believes this generation has done more towards the improvement of the Thames than any other, for that in 1841 it was proposed in Parliament to embank the river between London and

Westminster, and in 1842 a commission was appointed, in which witness was associated, and desired to report upon the condition of the Thames, as well as upon the best means of improving it, 2611.—Produces copy of report, date 1842, 2612, 2613.—The bill proposing to carry out those recommendations was presented to Parliament in the session of 1845 and 1846, but was rejected by the Legislature, 2614.—Does not think that there were any of the recommendations contained in the report which could have been carried into effect without the aid of Parliament, 2615.—The lord high admiral has power to remove shoals, but witness questions whether that high power would not find opposition in the chartered rights of the two corporations, the City and Trinity, 2616.—It has been alleged that the City corporation has not the right, or they would not have applied to Parliament for authority to exercise it. The Trinity Board could remove shoals when their product serves for ballast; but otherwise they have no funds to apply for that purpose. It seems, therefore, to be in reality vested in the Government to improve the river, by removing every obstruction to the navigation of it, without reference to corporate bodies. Alludes to the report of 1842, in which it is endeavoured to illustrate the advantage of an uniform embankment of the Thames, 2617.—Has surveyed rivers in America and England, but does not think there is one, except the Thames and Medway, likely to afford instruction or useful data, 2618, 2619.—The Medway is in a very bad condition with respect to the embankment; no one takes account of its decay. Begs to impress upon Commissioners the difference between the two sister rivers: the Thames has been embanked with substantial sea-walls from the time of the Romans, and is well guarded by Parliamentary enactments; while the Medway, on the contrary, is allowed to pursue its natural way towards the sea, through unprotected marsh lands, which overflowed, and exposed to the devastating effects of strong winds and high tides, are daily falling into the river, and must in the end be inevitably submerged. Vide Report on the Medway, 2620, 2621.—The Thames was walled in by the Roman soldiers. Witness thinks that our convicts might be employed by the State in embanking the Medway in the same way; of course not without an enormous outlay, 2622.—The Bishop's Marsh was once entirely enclosed by sea-walls, but is now in a dilapidated state, 2623.—The river is perfectly navigable; no material alteration has taken place since the survey of 1837; but the marshes are falling into the river, and have a tendency to contract it. The depths are maintained throughout its course. The injury is to the marshes, not to the river, 2624, 2625.—The marshes are all private property, 2626.—Believes there is some inconvenience from the conflicting nature of the signals which are carried by steam vessels; stated to the Admiralty some time ago this defect, and recommended uniformity in night signals, not only national, but international, 2627.

Bullock, Edward, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the office of common sergeant nearly four years, 5698, 5699.—The majority of the common council, in whose gift it is, decide the appointment, 5700.—The salary is 1,500*l.* per annum, and some additional fees for extra business, 5701, 5702.—Is a barrister, 5703.—The office is always held by a barrister, 5704.—The main duty of the office is attending at the sessions of the Central Criminal Court, where he sits as one of the City judges, 5705.—The recorder sits in one court, witness in another, and the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, Mr. Gurney, as a commissioner, sits in the early part of the day to try any short cases there may be before the judges come, and to prepare the court for them, 5706.—The Sessions of the Central Criminal Court are held on an average about once a month, 5707.—They always place the most serious cases before the judges when they come on the Wednesday, and as long as they continue to sit. Does not think there is much distinction between the cases which come before the other courts, 5708, 5709.—Usually sits about four or five days in each session, 5710.—His duties at the Central Criminal Court are the ordinary duties of a judge in a Crown Court, 5711.—Tries prisoners with a jury, and acts as a judge, ordinarily does under such circumstances, 5712.—If any difficulty arises in any case, never misses the opportunity of consulting the other judges when they are there, or if the judges are not there, always confers with the recorder or with the commissioners, 5713.—

Besides these duties there is that of attending the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council, in case his opinion is required, 5714.—Is not in the habit of attending very regularly, generally does so, especially if he sees in the notice anything which is likely to give rise to a question to him, 5715.—His attendance would be for the same purpose as the attendance of the recorder, except that the recorder acts as the assessor of the lord mayor, 5716.—His attendance would be principally in order to be consulted upon questions of law, 5717.—Is not in the habit of taking part in the debates, 5718.—There is also the duty of acting as assessor to the sheriff at common hall on the day of the election of the City officers, 5719.—Takes there an active part in proposing the candidates. Proclaims the names and advises the sheriffs as to any point which may arise at the time, 5720.—The recorder does not hold the court; he intimates to the livery for what purpose they are assembled; he then retires with the lord mayor during the time of the election, and then the sheriffs assume the court, 5721.—The common sergeant is the officer of the sheriffs, and he proclaims the names of those who are to be mentioned as candidates, 5722.—He is more especially the officer of the common council, 5723.—Confirms the recorder in one observation which he made about the attendance of the lord mayor and aldermen at the sessions of the Central Criminal Court. Never knew any occasion of their interference except a casual observation, but nothing as far as the trial of the case goes. Holds that their attendance is frequently of good service in the opportunity it gives of consulting them as to the degree of punishment to inflict, 5724.—Practically the lord mayor and the aldermen do not interfere more in the trials than any magistrate sitting on the bench at assizes in the country would do, 5725.—The duty as common sergeant in effect precludes witness from practising in Westminster Hall, 5726.—It was the custom for the common sergeant to practice in ordinary business at Westminster at one time; but the number of the sessions at the Central Criminal Court has very much increased since that. There used to be only eight sessions, and now there are twelve, 5727.—Is not debarred by the terms of his appointment from attending in any court, except inferior courts of criminal jurisdiction, 5728.—Has appeared for the corporation two or three times in the courts at Westminster, but that does not often happen; it used necessarily to happen, but of late, in the appointment of the common sergeant, they have stipulated that should not necessarily happen, 5729.

Bunning, James B., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is architect and surveyor to the corporation, 5991.—Was elected about Michaelmas, 1843, 5992.—Is solely employed for all business done by the City of that description, 5993.—The salary in 1843 was 1,600*l.* a year, which included office expenses; in 1847 it was raised to 2,500*l.* a year, including office expenses, in consequence of the increase of business brought to the office, 5994, 5995.—The office expenses have been greatly increased in the meantime, 5996.—They are now about 1,000*l.* a year, but witness's salary in the year 1852 was fixed at 2,500*l.* a year, and an allowance of 1,000*l.* a year for office expenses, 5997.—This covers all the expenses, 5998.—The salary is made up in this way: from the City's cash, 1,300*l.* a year; for attending to the Bridge House estates, 600*l.* a year; the Finsbury Estate, 500*l.* a year; from the coal fund, 50*l.* a year; and there is an estimate amount of 50*l.* for preparing plans and putting them upon leases of any property which may be let, one on the lease and the other on the counterpart. In consequence of the leases of the Conduit Mead estate being renewed last year, a renewal which occurs every 14 years, there was an accumulation of 413*l.*, which increased the salary, with 5 guineas for subpœnas, in 1852, for attending upon trials, to the total amount of 2,888*l.* 18*s.* When the Conduit Mead leases are completed, judges the receipts from that source will fall back to something like 50*l.* a year, 5999.—The salary was arranged by a committee. When any office falls vacant the duties of the officers are referred to that committee, and it is then decided what salary the future officer shall receive, 6000.—Witness's predecessor received about 2,000*l.* a year. Then he held a district surveyorship, and did private business, not int the City. Witness is not allowed to practise in any way whatever; he was deprived likewise of any district surveyorship which he held at the time of his appointment, 6001, 6002.—The whole arrangement was made by this one committee, with the sanction of the Court of Common Council, 6003.—Thinks the amount of salary would be 2,500*l.* a year in future, 6005, 6006.—Has no other sources of income connected with the City, 6007.—The duties are, to attend the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council when required; for the Court of Aldermen, has to attend ruinous buildings, that is, any building which may be in danger of falling down, 6008, 6009.—To keep the City buildings in a state of repair, and to provide against any in a dangerous position and likely to injure the passers by; not the buildings belonging to the corporation, but those represented to be dangerous by the official referees, 6010, 6012.—The corporation take better care of their buildings than to allow them often to get into such a state, 6013.—Another of witness's duties, is to attend the committee of aldermen with respect to the prisons, 6015.—Has read Captain Williams's evidence with regard to the City prison; he expressed himself satisfied with the accommodation given in the gaols, 6016, 6017.—The prison at Newgate is not fit for the present arrangement of prisoners, or the discipline which is wished to be carried out, 1618, 1619.—In the prison at Holloway there are 436 cells and 14 workrooms, which are equal to 96 additional cells. There is every accommodation there for carrying out whatever kind of discipline may be wished, 6020.—If anything is wanted at any of those prisons in the nature of repair or alteration witness surveys it; and with regard to any work which the governors wish done, before they can do it witness represents it to the aldermen, and is desired to see it carried out. Very frequently gives an estimate before the work is done, and nothing is allowed to be paid till he has certified that the amount is correct, 6021, 6022.—Anything beyond 50*l.* is generally put out to public tender. If it is under 50*l.* the tradesmen of the corporation generally do the work, and it is performed upon fixed prices, which are year by year sent in by the various tradesmen to a committee called the City Lands Committee, 6023.—In the erection of a considerable building, such as the Holloway prison, 12 or 14 of the respectable builders are written to, and the lowest tender is accepted, 6024.—Witness always gives the plans, 6025.—Produces a plan of the Holloway prison. 6026.—Since witness has held the office of architect and surveyor to the corporation there has been no competition, he always giving the plan—the Coal Exchange and the Billingsgate Market,—and he is now forming a new market for the corporation at Copenhagen Fields; there has been no other architect, 6028, 6029.—About 12 years before his election witness had been, by competition, the successful candidate as architect of the City school, which he built for the corporation, 6030.—There was a gentleman who was called the clerk of the works at that time, 6031.—In the case of the rebuilding of the Royal Exchange there were advertisements for designs, 6033.—There is no clerk of the works now; the office is merged in that of architect, 6036.—The average expenditure in the construction and reparation of buildings is about 36,300*l.*, 6037.—In the case of the Royal Exchange having to be rebuilt, it is not entirely under the jurisdiction of the corporation, because the corporation are united with the Gresham Trust. One part might wish to employ their architect, and the City might like to employ their own, therefore under such circumstances they might be glad to advertise, 6038.—Witness is looking out under the direction of the Court of Aldermen for a plot of ground to erect a lunatic asylum. Is in treaty for one conjointly with Mr. Alderman Lawrence and Mr. Alderman Cubitt, 6040.—The site is adjoining the prison at Holloway. A large amount of area is required for the lunatic, therefore is compelled to go to some distance from the City, 6041.—Thinks it an excellent site, in a sanitary point of view, and it has this advantage, that when the aldermen pay a visit to the gaol they will have an opportunity, without going any greater distance, of inspecting the lunatic asylum, 6043.—The Holloway prison was built out of the cash of the City; a loan was effected; the whole arrangements were made by Mr. Scott, 6044, 6045.—The City architect is appointed by the common council. The usual course is to continue the same architect, unless there are reasons for his removal, 6047–6049.—Was the first permanent City architect, 6050.—When first elected was called the clerk of the works, and is, in point of fact, in the same situation which the clerk of the works of the City formerly occupied, only performing all the architectural business of the corporation,—whereas other persons were called in, now no one is called in, 6051, 6052.—Emanuel Hospital comes under witness's care, and the almshouses. Has built new schools and dormitories to that establishment, 6054.—Has likewise to attend to the laying out of the streets, 6055.—On lord mayor's day has to attend to the fitting up of the hall, and whatever may be required to prepare the building for that banquet. For the management of the City lands there is a committee called the City Lands Committee. They have under their control the public buildings and the public stairs. Witness has nothing to do with the river Thames, but with those stairs only which lead to it, 6056.—Has laid before the Bridge House Committee a proposition for throwing projecting footpaths over each side of London bridge. Has no doubt steps will be taken to carry out that improvement, 6057.—Sir John Rennie, engineer, was employed in the construction of the present Bridge, 6059, 6060.—If a new bridge were to be erected witness would not be employed in the construction of it; in fact his duties are so multifarious that he could not do it, 6061.—Sir John Rennie and Mr. Page will be consulted with respect to the present state of London Bridge; when a report will be made to the Bridge House Committee, 6063.—The committee were desirous to ascertain if the system suggested of throwing these projecting ways over the bridge would be approved by Sir John Rennie. It would not improve the appearance of the bridge; but whether the advantage to the public is to override that or not is a point to be determined by the committee, 6065.—If any accident should occur, or any stone be misplaced, or the paving should require renewing, it would be witness's duty to attend to it; but should the arches be defective some eminent engineer would be consulted, 6066.—In the case of making any temporary construction of an ornamental nature, witness submits any idea for the purpose to the committee. If it receives their sanction they generally know before it is placed there the sum of money it is to cost, 6068.—Witness surveys City estates, which consist of about 6,084 houses and buildings. The dilapidations are surveyed; the rentals are assessed, and reports made to the committee, 6069. Witness is surveyor and valuer as well as architect, 6071.—The salary paid to the clerk of the works, when he was so called, was about 2,000*l.* a year, 6073.—Does not think that the 500*l.* a year which is now added to his salary was in consideration of his being architect as well as clerk of the works, but that the corporation raised the salary, seeing the enormous amount of work to be done. The Bridge House estates fall under witness's care. Has to attend the committees and survey the properties, which consist of about 6,000 houses and buildings, 6077.—Before being appointed architect had built schools; but before building the City schools did not know an individual connected with the corporation, 6078.—Witness has to attend the coal, corn, and finance committee, under which committee he built the Coal Exchange. The boundary marks have also been affixed twenty miles round London under witness's superintendence, on each road, canal, and railway. Attends the General Purposes Committee; they have under their care the Mansion House; reports upon the repairs and the general state of the building and the furniture, 6080.—The mansion house is in very fair condition. Witness has to attend to the Leadenhall butchers and poultry markets, 6081.—Leadenhall Market is in a very confined site. It would be very desirable to enlarge it, 6082, 6083.—It is a convenient situation so long as the present system exists of allowing slaughtering at the Whitechapel, 6084.—There is a large hide market separate from the butchers and poultry market. A very large traffic is carried on in hides, 6085, 6086.—Farringdon Market is very spacious but very dark; at present about half of it is used, in point of area; certainly not one fourth of the arcades is used. It is in a very good situation, 6088–6091.—It is very difficult to induce a trade to move or drive a market from one side to another. 6092.—Is now designing a dead meat market to be placed on the site of Smithfield, in place of Newgate Market, which is quite insufficient for the trade, 6093–6095.—The trade in dead meat in the City is increasing. The number of houses used by butchers for the sale of tollable articles far exceeds the area of the market itself, 6096–6097.—Farringdon Market might be used for the purposes of Newgate Market. The whole subject is now before the Markets Committee, 6098.—Till Newgate Market is annihilated it will be very difficult to get the dealers to move, 6100.—With respect to Blackfriars Bridge, refers the Commissioners to Mr. Walker for information, 6101.—Billingsgate Market is in a satisfactory state. No alterations can be made without obtaining the permission of the Markets Committee, and before a bill can be paid it must be certified by witness. Has to do what is necessary in the City of London school. Has altered some extensive premises for the purpose of carrying on the Small Debts Court. Has in hand at the present moment the continuation of Cannon Street, from the statue to St. Paul's Churchyard. Has an improvement going on in Threadneedle Street, in Mark Lane, in Dowgate Hill, and the formation of a street from Farringdon Street to Clerkenwell; on that site also it is proposed to erect lodging houses for the poor. The Improvements Committee have under their care all the improvements. They have now before them the proposed street from Cannon Street to Blackfriars Bridge, and a plan for the raising of Holborn Hill. Has been called on recently to make another estimate for that purpose, and instead of the amount of 316,000*l.* in consequence of the great rise in materials, the work which they would have to perform to raise the road would amount to something like 333,000*l.*, 6102.—In making an improvement through valuable property it will be seen at once there must be a very large amount of loss, because every shilling paid for goodwills is gone. There is something also for compulsory sale; the rents are forced up to their utmost. For example, in the case of Cannon Street the claims sent in for that line amounted to 1,177,153*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, 6103.—Those claims were settled at 796,566*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* being about one third less than the claims; but that is a very large sum, 6104.—About 300,000*l.* will be obtained back for rents; the loss is something less than 500,000*l.* the rest is made up by the sale of the frontages, 6105, 6106.—The frontage value is increased by the construction of the new street. The ground is staked out by witness and plotted upon the plan; it is then advertised, and in almost every instance the parties wishing for the ground bid more than the property is valued at. The frontages are sold and made a deduction from the outlay, 6107, 6108.—The area of the City estate is not increased by the population, 6109.—The Committee scarcely ever meet without considering the insufficiency of the great thoroughfares of the City for the increased traffic of the present time; the difficulty is to know where to begin and where to get the money to carry out any improvements. As the population increases the traffic increases too; therefore the great thoroughfares become year by year worse, 6110–6114—Cheapside will be much relieved when Cannon Street is opened. There are frequent obstructions between Saint Paul's and Temple Bar. The removal of Temple Bar will obviate that in some manner. There would be room for one more carriage if that were removed. Ludgate Hill is a very narrow passage, 6115, 6119.—The funds of the City are inadequate to put the great thoroughfare of the City in a satisfactory state, 6120.—Thinks the public would prefer the continuation of the present coal tax to any direct taxation for improvements, 6122.—It is desirable to perpetuate the coal tax for that purpose. It is a tax paid by persons who hardly know that they pay a tax, it is so very indirect, 6123.—The expense of the new cattle market would be about 300,000*l.* including the cost of the ground. If a larger amount of lairage is put upon the ground, or if a hide market is placed there, of course the expenses will be increased, 6129, 6130.—The contract was entered into for the draining; some 6 or 8 respectable builders were written to, and the lowest tender taken. The contract for the sheep penning, the bullock lairs, and the iron work, was by public tender, 6132.—When parties are writtten to the lowest tender must be accepted, because it is considered you would not write to a man unless you considered him equal to the work. When it is by public tender, the committee have the option of accepting it or not, 6134.

Cash, City:
Agrees with Mr. Norris in the propriety of putting the control of the cash under the united jurisdiction of the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, instead of the Court of Aldermen alone, Williams, 7798.

Cattley, John, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a merchant of the City of London, formerly chiefly in the Russian trade, latterly more in the East India trade, 1266, 1267.—Has a house in the City, but has not resided there for nearly thirty years, 1268.—Has been chairman of the London Dock Company for nearly twenty years, 1269, 1270.—Has never been connected with the corporation. Was twice elected a member of the court of common council, but declined to serve. Has been twice pressed to accept an alderman's gown, but declined, being so much engaged; had no spare time, otherwise would have had no objection, 1271, 1272.—As an old inhabitant taking a considerable interest in what is going on, has rather a favourable impression of the corporation as it is constituted, particularly as respects the magistracy. Thinks the merchants who are not freemen are fortunate in having such a body who take upon themselves the charge of the protection of the very large class who benefit by that protection, without being subjected to many of the duties which might be imposed upon them, 1273, 1274.—From long observation thinks the way in which the aldermen discharge their duties as magistrates is exceedingly favourable, and will bear comparison with any other set of magistrates. They are assisted by a very able assessor at both courts of the City, and a very fair test would be, that convictions are greater in proportion to the commitments, than from any other jurisdiction. Does not mean that aldermen have any particular talent for the office, but they have the benefit of good assessors, and as they principally act upon their advice, substantial justice is done, 1275–1277.—Thinks this system better than that which prevails in the rest of the metropolis, of paid magistrates, because these are unpaid and their decisions quite as good, 1278.—The assessors are paid, 1279.—The system of the unpaid magistracy in the City is more economical than the paid magistrates in the rest of the metropolis, at all events to nine tenths of the inhabitants who get the full benefit, but do not contribute to it. All the expenses are paid from the corporation funds, 1280.—It would undoubtedly be better that the corporation should be more closely connected with the higher class of merchants who ought to share the burdens of the City, but they cannot spare time. There have been however a few exceptions. Alderman Thompson is one, having been for many years a City magistrate, 1281, 1282.—Has never had much reason to complain of vexations from the corporation. The fellowship porters and some of those institutions are complained of by other parties, but they are not allowed to enter the docks, the question having been tried some time ago. The City meters and gaugers are used there. The charge is small, and the employing them optional. Oil is weighed at almost every port in England except London, where the old fashion of gauging prevails, a very absurd fashion, but that is not the fault of the corporation, 1283–1285.—A chamber of commerce in the corporation, with skilled officers appointed, might be beneficial, as a medium of communication with the Government on grievances, 1286.—If the corporation would find the funds, the necessary knowledge of trade might be provided for, by appointing members from the great mercantile bodies connected with the metropolis. They would represent grievances properly to the Government, so that justice might ultimately be done, 1287, 1288.—Thinks the corporation have in general shown a disposition to promote measures useful either to trade or to the public, contrasting London as it is with what it was. Instancing their paving and sewerage. The City has natural advantages in point of soil and elevation over the river, 1289, 1290.—Considers they manage the conservancy of the river pretty well. Occasionally may think the charge too high for putting down a buoy at the entrance of a dock, but the remonstrance is generally met pretty fairly, 1291.—The body which superintends the navigation of the river would be improved, if in connexion with the harbour-masters, who are intelligent painstaking men, such men as the dockmasters were appointed. They are sailors to begin with, and are interested in getting ships up the river, in the best way, to their different establishments, 1292, 1293.—Negotiated with the navigation committee of the common council upon the enlargement of the docks, when they gave every reasonable facility, 1294.—The best committee would be one composed of a certain number of harbour masters, and some of the common council, including others connected with the shipping interests. Regards Captain Maugham as the highest authority in London on points connected with the river. Sees no reason why a committee so formed might not act harmoniously together, 1295, 1296.—The committee on navigation having no knowledge on the subject themselves, rely at present mainly on the advice of the harbour masters, who are efficient officers and well selected, 1297–1299.—The fellowship porters are excluded from the London Docks for various reasons. In case of pilferage the owners of the docks would be answerable, and having done so much for the public they likewise think themselves entitled to what little profit there is on the labour, 1300.—Has never had any trouble with the corporation on the subject. Thinks that there is a clause of exemption in the Act of Parliament, 1301, 1302.—In connexion with the London Docks the City meters are almost nominal. They take the quantities with the custom-house officers who receive the amount. The gauger must gauge every cask, and they are glad to have his check in addition to the other two, the custom-house officer and dock officer being apt to copy each other's numbers, 1303.—The City metage applies equally to fruit, onions, roots, and corn. A licence is applied for at the Mansion House, which cost 4*s.* or 5*s.*, and the City meter actually measures the corn in, and the gaugers actually gauge, 1304–1307.—They are an accommodation and advantage to the public, on account of their skill and probity, particularly the gaugers. The fellowship porters are rather in the way of improvements out of the docks, 1308.—The City claim their privilege as meters, sometimes where an importer does not wish his goods measured, 1309.—It is not desirable they should retain the right of forcing themselves upon an unwilling importer. Those who import cargoes for sale want them measured, 1310.—Is not sure whether the original London Docks Act, which is forty-five years old, provides compensation for the fellowship porters, but thinks they gave almost every one compensation. Has had no dispute with the porters on the subject for the last twenty years, since witness was chairman, 1311, 1312.—The City having such enormous property to protect, requires a greater number of police than is necessary in other parts, particularly at night, and fears that if put all under the metropolitan police there would only be the same number of men allowed for each square yard as in other directions; at present they have double the number, 1313, 1314.—Thinks it would be better all under one head, but there are difficulties, one of which is the much greater proportion required in the City than elsewhere. Cannot say too much in favour of the metropolitan police, having had thirty of their men in the docks for fourteen years, 1315, 1316.—The London Docks are not within the City, but there being a public road through it, they were taken in, though a private establishment and not in their jurisdiction, 1317.—There would be economy produced by consolidation. The chief commissioner might be dispensed with, and perhaps a clerk or two. Doubts whether any saving could be effected by reducing the number of inspectors, 1318, 1319.—Thinks they are indebted to the City for laying out their funds in improvements to which they do not contribute, 1320.—Is not a freeman, 1321.—Has received many summons within the last seven years to take up his freedom, but declined, not wishing to be liable to the office of sheriff or alderman. They did not enforce the summons, but should have stood a trial had they done so, 1322–1326.

CHAMBERLAIN:

The office of, is next thing to a sinecure. The salary and emoluments are considerable, Travers, 243, 244.—Thinks that the Chamberlain should be elected by a large constituency at Common Hall, Dillon, 683.—The office of chamberlain in point of form is an annual office, but not in practice, Wallis, 1396.—Every case of election for the office of chamberlain in witness's time has been influenced by money, ib. 1399.—Every election for that office is expensive, by law annual, by practice generally for life, ib. 1445–1447.—10,000*l.* the greatest sum expended in a contest for the office in the last twenty years, ib. 1452, 1453.—1,900*l.* was once subscribed by aldermen to secure a brother alderman's election as chamberlain, ib. 1462.—Having charge of the City cash, the chamberlain should be appointed by the same franchise as the chief magistrate, ib. 1478.—The emoluments about 3,200*l.* a year. Contests for office expensive, but being for life, worth while to spend 5,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* in the election, Hyde, 1528–1530.—Discrepancies between his accounts and the amount of salaries returned by the officers. Thinks the discrepancy arises in this manner:—All the gentleman have attached to their own offices certain fees, which vary to a certain extent year by year, as in the case of the mace-bearer. Those fees are received by themselves, and they receive the salary out of the chamber; but the fees swell up the salaries, as certified by their own return, far beyond the amount appearing in the Chamberlain's accounts, and make the whole discrepancy amount to above 10,000*l.* Enters into particulars, Bennoch, 2067, 2068.—There is a byelaw to prevent the chamberlain from paying money for any expenses beyond the jurisdiction of the City, without the consent of the Common Council, ib. 2124, 2125.—States case to show the advantage of the byelaw, ib. 2128.—The chamberlains are always men of high character, Williams, 2786.—Statement as to office of chamberlain, ib. 2809.—At the last election, on Sir John Key's side, some money was expended in paying canvassers, flag-bearers, &c., Macnamara, 2885–2888.—In the contested election between Mr. Scott and Sir John Key, Mr. Scott spent 3,500*l.* merely in travelling expenses and canvassing. Sir John Key, 7,000*l.*, some part in corrupting voters, Rose, 2923–2933.—Salary and duties of the chief clerk to the Chamberlain, Scott, 4440.—Emolument of the Chamberlain is 2,500*l.* a year, the clerks cost over 2,000*l.* a year, ib. 4536.—A fixed salary would be more satisfactory to the Chamberlain, who is now doubtful whether he will make his emoluments, ib. 4545.—The whole of the Chamberlain's fund is not derived from the profits of the balances; there are contributions paid by the City, and likewise some out of certain trust funds, for the management of their accounts, which accounts, as a simple banker, he would not be required to keep, ib. 4546.—The profit upon balances has fluctuated in twelve years between 3,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* a year, ib. 4547.—When the profit upon balances has been 6,000*l.* a year, it would more than defray the whole expenses of the establishment, ib. 4548.—The balance is invested for the relief of the trust funds, and the committee have now come to the resolution that the amount is sufficient to authorize the chamberlain to take the whole charges off the trust funds, ib. 4549.—These are invested in the names of the Chamberlain, the chief clerk, and is cashier, who draw upon the account and hold the keys, ib. 4550.—The coal and corn committee can direct the Chamberlain to relieve the trust funds in his office, ib. 4552.—Trust fund is invested, and can only be applied to relieving the public funds in the chamber, ib. 4553, 4554.—The corporation account forms one out of many which are kept in the chamber, ib. 4555.—The Chamberlain is a public banker, ib. 4555.—The balance of the City cash is generally very inconsiderable, ib. 4556.—When there is any balance available for a temporary investment, the Chamberlain purchases exchequer bills, or any perfectly safe security, and sells them when the monies are wanted; he does not deal in bills, ib. 4564.—Any loss upon the transactions would fall upon the Chamberlain and his sureties, ib. 4565, 4566.—Thinks the money could be invested in a more permanent manner if the balance were recognized as City funds, and put under the control of a committee authorized to make use of the money, ib. 4568.—The Chamberlain and chief clerk occasionally consult a broker, but it is not often necessary. Confine themselves to transactions in which there is not much risk. Do not touch public funds at all, ib. 4575.—A sum of money is left in the hands of the cashier at the close of the day, which is not to exceed 1,000*l.* at any time, to enable him to commence paying business in the morning, ib. 4577.—It would be a great loss to the corporation to employ the Bank of England, ib. 4578.—A private bank could not keep the accounts, ib. 4581.—The present system might be amended if there were power to do so, ib. 4580.—By placing money in the hands of private bankers more is lost than gained in point of security, ib. 4588.—The office of Chamberlain peculiar and anomalous; it has been an office of that kind for about seven centuries. Was the office into which the king's taxes were formerly paid, ib. 4589, 4590.—The contested election between witness and Sir J. Key was in May, 1853, ib. 4634.—There was no other candidate but Mr. Haines, and he retired after a short time, ib. 4637.—States particulars of the contested election for the office, ib. 4638–4648.—Should be elected by Common Council, ib. 4656.—The livery do not interfere with the office or with the funds of the corporation beyond receiving the report annually, ib. 4659.—Witness's election cost about 5,000*l.*, Key, 5840.—The chamberlain is responsible for the whole of the City funds, ib. 5849.—The amount of security which he gives is 30,000*l.*, in responsible parties, who must be approved of by the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee and by the Court of Aldermen Every month he is obliged to present his accounts before the committee, and if there be any sum appropriated or deposited in a manner which they do not approve of, or if there is a larger balance than they think proper, at their recommendation an alteration is made, ib. 5851.—If any loss occurs from his mismanagement, he is the person responsible for it, ib. 5853.—The Chamberlain has the power when he thinks necessary to commit an apprentice to Bridewell, ib. 5859.—All the freemen are admitted through the Chamberlain, ib. 5890.—Attends all Common Council, and Courts of Aldermen, ib. 5893.—Has to receive all rents, tolls, profits of markets, and other revenues, with which he is annually charged by the comptroller to make all payments on account of the corporation, and to ascertain that such payments are by warrant or order of competent authority, and conformable to the various resolutions and orders of the Court of Aldermen or Common Council; and to keep accounts thereof, and to arrange the same for the purpose of affording any necessary information thereon, ib. 5893. The entire emoluments of the office can never exceed 2,500*l.*, ib. 5895.—Is quite convinced that the whole election did not cost 1,500*l.*, ib. 5902.—Does not think his own came nearly to 1,000*l.*, ib. 5903.—Would transfer the election of Chamberlain to the Common Council, Lord Mayor, 7158.—Expense of the office of Chamberlain fixed at 2,372*l.* 10*s.*, De Jersey, 7558.

CHIEF CLERK:

It has been one branch of witness's duties to co-operate with the Chamberlain in the banking business, having been bank manager, as well as City actuary, and accountant, so far as the accounts are kept in the chamber. The responsibility of those three departments has rested upon witness, Scott, 4571.—The chief clerk and cashier must be approved of by the Court of Aldermen and the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee of the Common Council, Key, 5898.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE:

Would have a chamber of commerce, and do away with the corporation and local government altogether, Travers, 213.—Recommends a chamber of commerce, Powles, 1064–1072.—A chamber of commerce, with skilled officers, might be useful as a medium of communication with the Government on grievances, Cattley, 1286.—Would be very desirable; but it should not be established out of the funds of the City, Morley, 2163.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS;

Would leave the charitable trusts in the hands of the corporation, reformed under the new Municipal Act, Elliot, 1095.

CHARITABLE PURPOSES:

From the year 1781 to 1852 there has been 127,384*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* voted from the City funds for charitable purposes, Lott, 8003, 8004.—It has been given mostly to City charities, ib. 8005.

CHARITIES:

There are a variety of charities, the administration of which is left by will to the Court of Aldermen for the time being; they are responsible for any neglect of their duty, and may be dismissed from the trust, if they have committed any abuse, Farebrother, 7223.

CHARITY TRUSTS ACT:

The bill now includes in its operations every one of the charities of the City of London, Tyrrell, 5443–5449.

CHARTERS:

Of the City of London, are not accessible to the public, Pulling, 846.—Number of charters relating to the City, Cotton, 1938.—Public not allowed to inspect them, and gives reason, ib. 1943.—Has the charge of the City charters. Mr. Hardy, of the Tower, has translated all up to the reign of Edward III. The Charter of Inspeximus of the reign of Charles II., includes almost all the former ones. They have never been published officially by the City, but by Lufman and by Norton, and, believes most correctly, Merewether, 4712–4722.—Certainly shoul dnot show the original charters to any person in litigation with the City, ib. 4723. — There is no governing charter of the City of London, ib. 4784.—Statements with regard to the charters, ib. 4735–4787.—Extract from charter which gives to the corporation the power of altering the customs, ib. 4985.—According to the general words of the charter in Mr. Norton's book, page 470, the corporation have the entire power of making all alterations within themselves they think necessary, except that they cannot interfere with any Act of Parliament, ib. 4990. — Charters respecting Southwark, ib. 4996.—Should say that all the 120 charters are now in force; they have been seized by the Crown at various times; they were seized by the celebrated quo warranto in the reign of Charles II., but were restored by Act of Parliament in the beginning of the reign of William III., ib. 4998–5000.—Further reference to charters, ib. 5008–5024.—List of charters, with the sums paid for each, ib. 5223, 5224. —Would not admit the public to the charters and title deeds of the corporation upon a subject which is in actual litigation at the time in the courts, Wortley, 5505–5508.

CHERRY, JAMES, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is mayor of Yarmouth, 1983.—Is desirous of representing the prejudicial effects of certain dues and customs, called metage, fillage, &c. &c., which are levied upon all grain brought by vessels into the port of London, but the railway companies being free from these dues, amounting to 3*s.* 6*d.* per last, has the effect of diverting the traffic from the shipowners, as rendering them unable to compete with the railways. The return in 1847 was 266,000 quarters of malt and barley shipped from Yarmouth to London, the last return in December 1852 being only 86,748 quarters, 1984.—Presumes that the great falling off between these two periods arises from the corresponding increase in the land carriage, and not from a general diminution in the trade, but it could only be proved by a return from the railway companies. No doubt large quantities of corn are carried by them, 1985–1988. —Undoubtedly if the shipping interest and the railways were upon a perfectly equal footing they could compete equally for the transport of corn. The dues amount to 4½*d.* a quarter, It would pay the shipping to bring up the corn at 1*s.* the quarter, 1989.—Considers the effect of those dues sufficient to account for the change in the trade. Should say from personal knowledge there is rather more than less corn sent out of Norfolk than formerly, 1990.

CHILDS, GEORGE BORLASE, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been surgeon of the City police since 1844, 6948.—Begs to observe that he was not aware till six last night that he was to appear before the Commission to day. There were twenty-five candidates for the office; was elected on purely professional grounds, 6949.—Was elected by the Police Committee of the Court of Common Council, 6950.—Has a salary of 500*l.* a year, 6951.—Reads a statement of duties, from which it will be seen that the whole of the surgeon's time is the property of the corporation. There are no emoluments attached to the office, 6952.—The police are generally a fine body of men; none are taken under five feet eight, 6953.—The metropolitan force take five feet seven, 6954.—Every additional inch excludes a great number of candidates, 6956.—Thinks you must have men of some appearance in street disturbances, and five feet eight is a fair standard, 6957.—Has no reason for having a different standard in the City to the rest of the metropolis, 6958, 6959.—States that in 1852 a Mr. Bessel brought an action for false imprisonment against Mr. Alderman Wilson, and stated that in consequence of the dampness of the cell he became severely indisposed. The lord chief justice at the time made some very stringent observations in reference to the matter. Received instructions to visit the station house and make a report to the Police Committee on the sanitary condition of the cell alluded to. Reads report, 6960.—The date of the report is 28th July 1852, 6961.—This was after the observations of the lord chief justice, 6962.—Has had opportunities of forming an opinion of the efficiency of the City police, 6963.—The City and metropolitan police act most harmoniously together, and are always ready to assist one another. The Act of Parliament states that the metropolitan police have power to act in the City districts, and the City police in the metropolitan districts, 6964.—Thinks it would be inconvenient to refer from the City to the head office in Scotland Yard, if the two bodies were consolidated. Gives instances

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL:

Is governed by a court of almoners, Mortimer, 6808–6811. (See also Schools.)

CHRISTY, WILLIAM MILLER, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.—Is a liveryman of the City of London. Is not in trade at present in the City. Resides there occasionally, but generally at Kingston. Has accommodation for lodging in the City, 2546–2548.—Has never taken part in the business of the corporation, 2549.—Wishes to speak generally of the defects of the City management. Thinks that, with the large income of the corporation, they should have a house of refuge for the destitute of all ages, from which when rendered decent and cleanly, they might be drafted off to places where employment could be had, 2550.—Does not know that the City Bridewell is used for that purpose, 2551.—The corporation might do a great deal, apart from the poor-law unions, for the relief of the poor, 2552–2555.—The courts and alleys are in a neglected and filthy state, and a large portion of the City funds ought to be used for the improvement of the abodes of the poorer population of the City. The street orderlies, who have lately been displaced, were a very useful body of persons, but the system was not sufficiently extended over the City, 2556–2558.—The police have difficult duties to perform, and do their best under the circumstances. Mentions a number of street nuisances, which might be got rid of without any difficulty, 2559.—Believes the City to be worse off than the rest of the metropolis in these respects, and that from its narrow streets and crowded state it has lost much of its retail trade. Suggests several improvements, 2560.—Would call attention to the state of the foot pavements, and would propose that the scavengers should be required to scrape them before eight o'clock in the morning. The vagrant laws require revision, and the ready mode of licensing public-houses and gin-shops claim especial attention, 2561.

CHURCH RATES:

Are very serious; as long as the present system is maintained there can be no reduction, Hickson, 2959.

"CITIZEN" NEWSPAPER:

The committee spent money in endeavouring to establish the "Citizen" newspaper, Acland, 453.—A newspaper was started by a man of the name of Peel, called "The Citizen," undertaking to give a full report of the proceedings of the corporation, Scott, 4472.—Evidence concerning "Citizen" Newspaper, Richardson, 7703–7706.—Mr. Acland had a vast deal to do with the "Citizen" paper; thinks he purchased that valuable property for 1*s.*, Pearson, 8465. (See also Newspaper.)

CITY ESTATES:

Produce and expenditure for 1852, Acland, 563–565.—Are managed by the Common Council and City Lands Committee. The separate jurisdiction of the Bridge Trusts and Irish Estates ought to be abolished, and the whole centred in the corporation at large, Lord Mayor, 7207–7210.

CITY LANDS COMMITTEE. (See Committees.)

CITY OF LONDON:

Peculiar jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, Cotton, 1849.

CITY PURSE:

The Aldermen within the jurisdiction of the City can do with the City purse whatever they think fit, Bennoch, 2124.

CITY SOLICITOR:

The Common Law Chancery and other legal matters are conducted by the solicitor, the conveying by the comptroller, Tyrrell, 5385.

CLARK, JOHN. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is clerk of the peace for London and Southwark; also holds the office of clerk of the Central Criminal Court. The City of London, being a county, appoints a clerk of the peace, 6331, 6332.—Witness here describes all the duties of his office, 6333.—Has no salary; is paid entirely by fees. The average amount of receipts by fees, commencing with 1848 and ending with 1852, was about 350*l.*, 6334, 6335.—But of that amount about 300*l.* in round numbers was received for fees as clerk to the licensing magistrates, and 40*l.* as clerk of the peace, 6336.—Believes there is a system at the Old Bailey of taking fees for the admission of the public to the gallery, varying according to the interest of the trial; but it is a practice with which the court, as a court, has nothing to do. Knows nothing at all about it. Believes the sheriffs receive part of the money, 6337, 6338.—Witness's duties at the Central Criminal Court are paid for separately. Receives from the corporation of London a sum of 30*l.* per annum to find a clerk to pay orders of costs which are made by the Central Criminal Court, 6339, 6340.—Understands the magistrates are said to license free vintners, many of whom keep brothels and houses of that kind. Believes such not to be the fact. There are not above two or three free vintners who are actually licensed as publicans, and as free vintners they have only authority to sell wine in their own houses, and not spirits, 6341.—A free vintner in his own house may retail wine without a licence. Is not aware that this has led to any abuse, 6342, 6343.—Attends the licensing magistrates. Before the general licensing meeting in each year the common council of the respective wards have meetings, at which all complaints, if there be any, are discussed, and if the complaints are sufficiently strong to induce the magistrates to withhold the licence, they do so, 6344, 6345.—There are not many applications for old licences which are refused, but for new houses the licences are seldom granted, unless a strong reason is shown for granting a licence for an additional house, 6346, 6347.—There are a considerable number of applications each year for licences for new houses. Understands some remarks have been made as to the committals by the aldermen. Has made a return to the Court of Aldermen showing the average number of convictions and acquittals, and the convictions in London, as compared with the committals, bear a very fair proportion to those which come from the police courts, 6348, 6349.—When a bill is not found, a person is not discharged at the Old Bailey till the grand jury is discharged. Believes the practice is the same upon the circuits, 6350–6352.—Thinks the reason for the prisoner not being immediately discharged to be, that the rejection of the bill was not a discharge from the offence itself, but that another bill might be presented. Believes of late a rule has been laid down that a second bill for the same offence should not be presented, 6353, 6354.—It is quite impossible the corporation of London could have originated the practice, 6355.

CLAUSES:

Very few cases have occurred in witness's time of their having procured the insertion of clauses excepting them from the operation of general Acts, Tyrrell, 5467–5475.

CLERKENWELL:—

Commissioners having failed in making improvements, the corporation undertook to finish them if they might raise 88,000*l.* upon the 8*d.* coal duty, Scott, 4617.—With respect to Clerkenwell, the old improvements Commissioners, having expended the funds entrusted to them, besought the corporation to take it up, and as 50,000*l.* had been expended on a street which was of no use till the other was completed, the corporation took great trouble to carry out a work which was not within the City, and agreed to receive 88,000*l.* and to charge their own estate for three years longer with 11,500*l.* per annum, Hall, 7325.

CLERK OF THE PEACE:

Description of the duties of clerk of the peace for London and Southwark, Clark, 6333.

COAL DUTY:

The 4*d.* is corporation property, Tyrrell, 5425–5427.

COAL EXCHANGE:

The 1*d.* duty is the fund out of which the Coal Exchange was built, Hickson, 2758.

COAL TAX:

Statements respecting the coal tax, Acland, 559–562.—Is 1*s.* 1*d.* in the ton. The corporation retain as much as is yielded by 4*d.* out of the 1*s.* 1*d.*; the rest is under the control of the Woods and Forests, Elliot, 1111–1112.—Thinks it advisable that the coal tax should be continued, ib. 1119.—For the year 1852 the corporation give the products of the coal and corn tax, the sum of 73,000*l.*, ib. 1120.

Colquhoun, Isaac, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides in Londonderry, 8117.—From his position as solicitor and land agent to some of the properties, has turned his attention to the doings of the Irish society, 8118.—Thinks the constitution of the society most objectionable; it throws the entire government of this plantation into the hands of the London secretary, 8119.—Brings forward a case to prove the injurious effects of the standing order with regard to the renewal of leases upon the City of Derry, and two or three cases to show the grasping propensity of the Irish Society, 8120.—Communications to the society by persons connected with the property are generally made by a memorial to the society in London, sent through the agent in Derry (8121), who receives the rents, and accounts for them, but witness believes he has no power, not even that of recommendation, 8122, 8123.—The byelaws of Derry must be submitted to the society, 8124.—Witness thinks it highly objectionable in point of principle, 8126.

Colquhoun, Isaac, Esq. (Second Examination.)—States the houses he spoke of yesterday as having been taken by the society from Mr. McCrae are still standing. The society have made use of them. Mr. Munns and his son have taken an active part in bringing the complaints of Derry before the Commission. Believes the society have taken steps to intimidate them; states particulars. Believes the corporation have been influenced to remain at home in consequence of the 1,200*l.* a year, which it is in the society's power to take from them when they please, or else a large portion of them would have been here as a deputation. With regard to the alteration which Mr. Knox mentioned in the lease with regard to the secretary's fees, witness states that he was fortunate enough to refuse to take a renewal according to the new form, and so the society granted it to him according to the old form, 8336.—This was about 22 years ago. M. McCrae holds a lease of lands in perpetuity, and another which is determinable. Upon the first there are good houses, and a Presbyterian meeting-house; but upon the latter the houses are very small and poor, 8337.

Combe and Delafield:

Statement respecting the claim of the City against them, Delafield and Fisher, 601-638.—Porterage and metage suits, Pearson, 5544-5570.—Combe's case is now for argument before the House of Lords, 8459.

Committees:

Thinks they generally elect the most efficient men as chairmen of committees, Bower, 7021.—Nothing can work better than the present system of corporate committees; objects to the consolidated committee, Lord Mayor, 7217-7221. — Has advised that a certain amount should be continued to each committee to secure the attendance of the members. Thinks it quite right that some allowance should be made to committees, as most of the common councilmen live out of town; and where are they to get their dinners? Hall, 7343-7344. — Not desirable to reduce the number of, De Jersey, 7547-7548.—States number of meetings yearly and monthly, ib. 7555.—According to the 38th standing order, no member can be on more than one of the following committees: the City Lands, the Bridge House Estates, the Navigation, the Coal and Corn, and the General Purposes, except in the case of one or two wards, which only return four members, Williams, 7798.—No member can be chairman of a committee who is not in his third or fourth year, that he may be perfectly acquainted with the duties before he is called upon to act as chairman. Statement of his duties, ib. 7798.—Agrees with the suggestion that a smaller number of committees would be desirable, and if the members were retained more permanently, they would become more masters of their business than under the present system, Taylor, 7813-7842.—Of the corporation; describes the attendances and the business done at the different committees, Merewether, 6764.

Anderton, 7695.—Particulars of the formation of the consolidated committee, Woodthorpe, 6198.—Objects to it; gives reasons, Lord Mayor, 7217-7219-7221.—Reads the terms of the appointment of the consolidated committee, which consists of about 60 members, Wood, 7254.—The Lord Mayor has represented that this committee, by a deputation of its members, has taken upon itself not only to confer with the Government upon various matters, but to agree in respect to them; this is not correct, ib. 7256.—Knows of no money spent secretly by the committee; they sanctioned the repayment of a sum of money spent for the establishment of a projected paper, but had nothing to do with the getting up of the paper, ib. 7258, 7259.—They have no allowance. The business is very laborious, ib. 7266.—There has always been a fair attendance of the members, ib. 7267.

Conservancy. The committee have considerable knowledge of their business. They are elected for four years, one-fourth only going out every year. They do not sit simply as a committee, but act as a jury, and argue the point, James, 6882.

Corn, Coal, and Finance Committee. Duty to examine the accounts of corn dues monthly, and see them paid into the chamber of the City. Amount paid in several different years. Other duties, and allowance for the performance of, Anderton, 7695.—Report of the Finance Committee upon the corporation difficulties in 1818, Dakin, 7386.

General Purposes. Principal duties of, are, to look after the Mansion House; but during the last two years they have had a very important matter under their consideration, an inquiry into the charges made, and the privileges maintained by the porters and meters of London, Woodthorpe, 6112.

Law Bills. Is composed of professional men, Pearson, 5529.—Gives particulars of this committee; thinks the corporation has every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which this committee has acted, Wood, 7265.

Navigation. The Navigation Committee is wholly unqualified for their charge, though the business is well done by the harbour masters, Powles, 1034.—Has heard no complaints of inefficient discharge of duty on the part of the committee, ib. 1048.—Were the amendment proposed to be made in the Act of Parliament carried, it would meet the wants of the case, with the further amendment of reducing the committee to 18, ib. 1052–1053. — Witness's experience, is that they either want authority or are incompetent to the proper discharge of their duty, Matthews, 2500.

Navigation and Port of London. Business of the, Woodthorpe, 6154. — Statement of its funds, Leach, 6426-6429. — If some body must be added to the Navigation Committee, possibly the Trinity House would be the least exceptional, because they are most independent, ib. 6458.—It is necessary, under the proceedings in chancery, for the Navigation Committee to give information to the Woods and Forests of all proposed grants, that they may, if they see fit, object, Saunders, 6854.—The mercantile shipping is exclusively under the control of the Navigation Committee, James, 6893, 6894.—Makes a statement to show that the committee are free from the blame thrown on them by Mr. Matthews in his evidence in the case of Mr. Simmons, Southgate, 7231-7234.—Set a powerful dredging steam-engine to excavate; and upon this being pointed out by witness to the City authorities and contractors, it was found by Mr. English that there were excavations from twelve to eighteen feet deep, close to the piers. They filled up those excavations, and restored the bed of the river to its present state at their own or the City's expense, Powell, 7526.—Had permission given to them by the Bridge Company to cut a channel of about four feet in an invert manner, but instead of that, there was no superintendence over the operation, and they continued working away as long as they could obtain ballast that was valuable for concrete and building purposes, ib. 7527.—Employed Messrs. Jolliffe and Banks to remove the piles complained of, without any expense to the Waterloo Bridge Company, ib. 7524.—The conservancy of the river is managed in an efficient manner as far as the committee have the power, De Jersey, 7562.—The chairman is not always connected with the trade upon the river. A greater infusion of practical knowledge into the committee desirable, but the officers are all competent men, Turnley, 7713–7721.

Police. Have no power over the actual executive force; they superintend the supply of clothing and the store, and they have the supervision of the station-houses, Woodthorpe, 6227.

COMMON COUNCIL:

The common councilmen are 206; not 240, as they were at the time of the last Commission. Since that Report was published there have been two material changes; the one a reduction of the Court of Common Council from 240 commoners to 206, leaving always the 26 aldermen in addition, Acland, 269.—The reduction was effected by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council, under pretence of making a fair distribution, ib. 270.—The court is composed of 206 members who are elected annually, and 26 aldermen who are elected for life, ib. 275.—In the court there are more lawyers than men of any other description, 21 out of 206. Many out of this number have been active in procuring the election of sheriffs, who would appoint them under-sheriff, ib. 417.—The court have very extensive powers; they made a change in the office of alderman before the City Elections Act was passed, by regulating the right to vote at certain elections, Pulling, 886.—An act of Common Council may be repealed, ib. 901.—There is a resolution of the Court of Common Council which declares that no sum exceeding a certain amount shall be voted without their consent, ib. 912.—A vote of money taken for promoting or opposing a private bill in Parliament would be made by the Court of Common Council, ib. 914, 915.—States the legislative powers of the Court of Common Council; the Lord Mayor has the power of dissolving the court, ib. 926.—States the forms necessary for the meeting of the court, ib. 928.—It would not be in the power of the Lord Mayor to prevent the Court of Common Council meeting at all, ib. 930.—They have the management of all the funds of the corporation of London, the hereditary revenues, the tolls, and the City lands, ib. 930.—The Lord Mayor takes the chair at all meetings of the Common Council, ib. 931.—He acts as speaker of the assembly, puts questions to the vote, and decides points of order, ib. 932, 933.—Is not aware of any control over the corporation which the Court of Common Council may not exercise, ib. 934.—They have more extensive power over their funds than other corporations enjoy, ib. 935, 936.—They have an unlimited power of charging their property. They can alienate their property, ib. 937–939.—There are about 16 or 18 committees of Common Council in a year, Bennoch, 1204.—The Court of Common Council does not adequately represent the interests of the metropolis at large, ib. 1215.—Substance of correspondence between corn-dealers and General Purpose Committee of Common Council, Hales, 1641, 1642.—The practice of the Common Council is as nearly as possible that of the House of Commons, Rogers, 2636.—Permission to spend not more than 1,000*l.* a year in the promotion of more extensive reports of their proceeding, Norris, 4202.—Has power to make byelaws, ib. 4216.—The present mode of election works exceedingly well, Merewether, 4937.—Is the creation of the corporation, and is regulated by its provisions, standing orders, or resolutions, ib. 4988.—Thinks the present numbers too large, Lord Mayor, 7161.—Is satisfied that, however necessary some alteration in the constitution of the court may be, the general management of the business cannot be better than at present, Wood, 7256.—In thirteen contests never solicited a vote nor spent a sixpence, Anderton, 7617.—Does not think the duties and responsibilities of the Court of Common Council, the committees, and the City officers acting under those committees, are properly defined. The institution is a very ancient one; much has been regulated by practice and custom, Taylor, 7844–7847.

COMMON COUNCILMEN:

There are no improprieties in the election of Common Councilmen, Wallis, 1390.—If all power is taken from them, it will be difficult to find men to go into court, ib. 1469.—The office is unpopular, and low in public opinion, Bateman, 2343.—Of the 200, not above twenty-five live in the City, Dakin, 7380.

COMMON HALL:

The Court of Common Hall is now very numerously attended, being composed of persons who have been members of livery companies. They are not easily identified. It has been said, upon elections for sheriffs they get a sum of money for voting, Pulling, 952.—Sees no advantage in keeping up the plan of election in Common Hall. Would destroy it altogether, Bennoch, 1245.—In order to vote in Common Hall it is necessary for a man to be a member of a livery company and freeman of the City, Merewether, 5028.—Would open the Common Hall to the residents of London, but would not disfranchise the liverymen, Lord Mayor, 7181.

COMMON HALL ELECTIONS. (See Elections.)

COMMON SERJEANT:

The appointment decided by majority of Common Council; salary 1,500*l.* per annum. States his duties, Bullock, 5699–5729.

COMPANIES:

Besides the payment of an entrance fee, some companies limit the number of their members, Acland, 507, 508.—All those companies which demand the highest price in the shape of fines necessarily exclude operatives. Since the year 1835 an operative may become free of the City on paying 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, ib. 509, 510.—Being free of the City does not entitle a man to be free of any company, ib. 511.—Statement respecting the property of the companies, ib. 550.—The livery companies include about 10,000 members, ib. 132.—Observations with regard to the connexion of the livery companies with the Irish Society, Finlay, 42–74.—Companies legally form an integral part of the corporation, Pulling, 881.—The masters and wardens, with a small body called the court, are the governing body of the companies, ib. 948–950.—They are not connected with the trades they represent, Jones, 1569.—The poorer companies had rights conferred on them in former days, which they exercise to the detriment of beginners in trade, Alcock, 1757–8.—Connexion with the trades whose names they bear ought to be restored, Cotton, 1960.—The chartered companies form a part of the existing municipal constitution. If the connexion between these companies and the City was severed the fines would cease, but the property they have produced would continue to exist. The last Commission sought an explanation from the chartered companies of the nature of their property, and what they did with it, but they declined to give any information, and can only be compelled to do so by Act of Parliament, Hickson, 2968, 2969.—Has never been able to satisfy himself whether the companies may be said to be a part or an adjunct of the corporation. With very few exceptions, they act almost wholly independently of the corporation, Merewether, 5344–5356.

Skinner's Company. States the circumstances which gave rise to the suit between the Skinners Company and the Irish Society, Humphreys, 8411.

Waterman's Company. To be a member, does not give the freedom of the City of London, Pillow, 3042.—Rules and regulations of the, Beck, 4104.—Particulars of the penalties for the infringement of the laws of, Ashley, 4116.—The master and warden are sworn before the Court of Aldermen, and the court have the approval of the byelaws under which they act, Merewether, 5222.—Statement drawn up by the Waterman's Company, to explain several things which have been said averse to the company, Lucey, 7276.—The number of persons on the roll of the company is near 8,000, also 1,680 apprentices, but probably not more than 5,000 or 6,000 working on the river; the remainder consisting of master lighterman, persons not following the business, others in the sea service, pensioners, &c., ib. 7277.—No person taking his freedom of the Company of Watermen has a right to vote at elections in Common Hall, nor is he thereby enabled to obtain the freedom of the City of London. It does not stand on the footing of the trading companies, ib. 7278, 7279.

COMPENSATION:

Does not know of any fund except the consolidated fund available for the purpose of compensation, Tyrrell, 5430.

COMPTROLLER:

Receives nothing; he is only the check, Acland, 570.—Accounts for the discrepancies to the extent of 9,000*l.*

between the comptroller's charge and the chamberlain's discharge mentioned by Mr. Acland, Scott, 4451.—He is an attorney; gives account of his duties, Pearson, 5686-5697.—The salary of the comptroller is 1,500*l.* a year, partly received from fees, the balance being paid by the Court of Common Council, as arranged by the court in 1845, Richardson, 6676.—Mr. Bennoch and the Lord Mayor speak of a combination of the office of comptroller with those of Bridge House comptroller and the solicitor. The two comptrollerships might possibly be amalgamated, but thinks it impossible that one man should also perform all the duties of solicitor, De Jersey, 7558.

Confiscation:

The corporation would consider any measure which took away the tolls of a market without compensation in the light of a confiscation, Tyrrell, 5416-5420.

Conservators of the Thames. (See Thames.)

Consolidated Fund:

Does not know of any fund except the consolidated fund available for the purpose of compensation, Tyrrell, 5430.

Consolidated Rate:

Complains of this rate; it is excessive, and very often in that rate the expense of sewers is included, notwithstanding the heavy sewer rate, Whistler, 2631.

Constables:

It is very undesirable that there should be those independent constables all over the City. It is not the case in any other part of the metropolis, Harvey, 6598.

Constituency:

Too narrow, Hyde, 1503.

Contested Elections. (See Elections.)

Cooper, William Durant, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Appears before the Commission at the request of the vestry of St. Pancras, from a committee appointed by them for the purpose of waiting upon the Commissioners, and giving evidence generally as to their connection with the City of London, and also the evils they think they have to complain of, in reference to the corporation as it now exists, 2849.—The first point which they complain of is that they are taxed considerably for the improvement of the City proper, by the tax upon coals. They are grievous sufferers by it, inasmuch as, in consequence of the improvements which have taken place in St. Giles's and elsewhere, the poor people have been driven out of the small tenements they held in those parishes into St. Pancras, and have become chargeable to the parish of St. Pancras, to the amount of between five and six hundred every year during the last seven years. Also complains in reference to this matter, that the duties chargeable upon coals are larger in proportion to the improvements effected than would be the case if there were an improvement rate. Also complains of the cartage dues. The parochial authorities of St. Pancras conceive that they are a body who ought themselves to have a share in the representation of the entire metropolis. Enters into particulars, how peculiarly St. Pancras is situated, and why it is absolutely necessary that some measure of corporation reform, extended to the whole of the metropolis should reach it, 2850, 2851.—The general law makes no provision for the lighting or paving of the parish, 2852.—There is no Act of Parliament applicable to the whole of the parish with respect to lighting and paving, and there is no municipal corporation in the parish which has powers applicable to those objects. They applied to Parliament for the purpose, at an expense of 3,800*l.*, in 1851. The Bill passed the House of Commons, and was rejected in the committee of the House of Lords. The only remedy for all these defects is to have a municipal corporation, 2853.—The existing power, under the Municipal Corporation Act given to the great London boroughs, of applying for a charter of incorporation, is practically inoperative. It was absolutely necessary to have a separate Act in order to do anything effectual; but, to make the matter still worse, under the Metropolitan Roads Act, under which the New Road was formed, the turnpikes were taken off, and the maintenance of 4,439 yards of road and public highway is now flung upon the vestry, to be provided for out of the poor's rate. There are 7,000 or 8,000 yards of road not included in any paving trust whatever, 2854.—Till recently, in consequence of the state of the parish, there have been no good buildings erected, except on the large estates, 2855.—Where there is no good local Act the value of building land is depreciated. In many cases districts under estate Acts are as bad as others. In consequence of having the New Road and the public thoroughfares thrown upon them the entire weight of the whole of the coals brought by the Great Northern and the North-Western Railway Companies is carried over their roads, causing them great additional expense. 9,000*l.* has already been paid to pave the New Road, and probably 9,000*l.* more will have to be paid before it is completed. The amount spent in the parish in one year is about 110,000*l.*, including the cost of paving and lighting; of this only 71,797*l.* is the amount levied in the shape of rates in the year, and spent by the vestry, and included the police and the county rates, 2856.—Does not object to the system by which the metropolitan police is under one general management; but objects to the system by which it is paid for at present. Would prefer that the whole of the metropolitan boroughs should be formed into different municipal bodies, and then one general body should be elected out of them to control the main features of expenditure, dividing the amount rateably between the whole of the boroughs, 2857.—They pay for police rate 6*d.* in the pound, while upon other parishes not rated up to the full value perhaps only two-thirds is levied, owing to the defect of the present law of assessment. They have also to pay to parties not appointed by them 4,359*l.* for lunatics. Thinks if they had a corporation of their own a large portion of that might be saved, 2858.—The deputation emanates from the vestry, 2859.—The vestry were unanimous in preferring municipal institutions to the present parochial government, 2860.—The accounts are audited by five auditors annually elected by the ratepayers themselves. These auditors have ample powers of going into the accounts; they can reject items, 2861, 2862.—They are not so much professional accountants, as men well conversant with accounts, 2863.—The auditors are in an independent position, and do object to do what they think is objectionable. They not only audit the whole details, but they also state to the public our assets and liabilities at the end of every half year, 2864.—The vestry of St. Pancras feel that they have not at present sufficient powers for the proper management of the affairs of the parish, otherwise they would not have tried, at such an expense as they have incurred, to get additional power, 2865.—They are prevented obtaining proper local legislation, the House of Lords having thrown out their bill, 2866.—At present their parochial affairs may be said to have been brought to a complete stand-still, as far as paving and lighting are concerned, and also on the other points over which they have no control, amounting to so large a proportion as one third of the entire expenditure. Witness also has been requested upon one other point to speak to the Commissioners; refers to a part of the practic of the Mayor's Court in the City of London, by which foreign attachments may issue upon the monies or goods of traders in the City of London. Witness here states particulars, 2867.

Corn Dues. (See Dues.)

Corn:

Weight and measure of, Hales, 1661, 1662.—Taking the average of five years from 1847 to 1852, the quantity generally measured has been 4,409,032 quarters, varying slightly, including coastwise and foreign, Harris, 7988-7992.

Corn Shifter:

Paymaster and collector of metage, lastage, fillage, and porterage, all one office, called Corn-shifter, Rushton, 7870-7873.—Its duties are to collect the metage dues, and pay the porters, ib. 7875.—Has had nine clerks employed; but for the last five years has had but five, ib. 7885.—The office was formerly held on lease, paying an annual rent to the Court of Rulers, ib. 7889.—In 1827 an Act of Common Council was passed that the Corn-shifter should be elected by the Common Council, and the Court of Rulers should find the money, ib. 7889-7898.

Corner, George Richard, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has practised as a solicitor in the borough of Southwark since 1824. Is vestry clerk of the parish of St. Olave, clerk to the board of guardians of St. Olave's union, and prothonotary of the Borough Court, 2174.—Is well acquainted with the nature of the connexion which now exists between the City of London and part of the borough of Southwark, 2175.—A large portion of the inhabitants of Southwark have, during the last 60 or 70 years, been using great exertions to be incorporated with the City of London, founding their claim upon the charter of Edward VI., 2176.—The application from Southwark to the corporation has always been for full incorporation with the City. In 1660 they applied to Parliament for a separate incorporation, but failed, and the borough of Southwark has remained under the imperfect jurisdiction of the City, 2177.—Would defer answering the question as to the expediency of the incorporation of Southwark with the City, till after the meeting which is called to consider that point, 2178.—The Commissioners cannot come to a proper consideration of the relation between Southwark and London, without going into a history of their connexion, 2179.—Lays before the Commissioners a plan showing what the borough consists of. If Southwark be incorporated with the City it should include the new parts which have been added to the Parliamentary borough, 2180.—It would cause great inconvenience to place different parts of Southwark under different jurisdictions, 2181.—If the borough of Southwark be made a ward of the City, it must necessarily be taken out of the county. It has never been separated from the county, which is one of the evils complained of, that it is subject to two jurisdictions, the courts of Surrey and the City courts, and from which the charter originally granted did not relieve it, 2182–2185.—The City does not interfere enough with the borough of Southwark. The City holds three Courts Leet for the manor. It is not the case that at these courts fees are payable by parties called upon to serve offices, 2186.—The Courts Leet are ancient courts of the manor; the steward of Southwark presides in them, and is appointed by the Court of Aldermen, on the nomination of the lord mayor, 2187–2189.—Besides these Courts Leet the corporation hold quarter-sessions, at which nothing is done, because they have no alderman to hear cases, therefore there are no commitments for trial at the quarter-sessions. The grand jury are summoned, and the lord mayor, the recorder, and the aldermen who have passed the chair, who are justices of the peace in Southwark, under the charter of Edward VI., attend merely to discharge them. These sessions are merely formal, 2190–2194.—The Court of Quarter Sessions, the assizes, and the Central Criminal Court, have jurisdiction in those cases, 2195.—The Court of Common Council appoint the coroner, 2196, 2197.—The City have the metage of corn and fruit, not only over Southwark, but for the whole City of London, 2198, 2199.—There is the Borough Court, which is a court of record held by prescription for trial of all actions of debt and trespass to any amount. The steward of Southwark is the judge, and the causes are tried by jury. The judge is appointed by the City. It is a very useful court, and one from which the public derive benefit, 2,200–2205.—Does not think the City interferes in any other respect with the borough of Southwark. Should mention they have a nominal alderman of Bridge Without, and the senior alderman who has passed the chair is always appointed to the ward, as a sort of honourable sinecure, 2206, 2207.—The City appoints the coroner, and he has jurisdiction only over that part of the borough of Southwark which was granted to the City by charter. The rest of the borough is under the coroner for the county, 2208-2210.—The general feeling is in favour of a complete incorporation with the City. Quotes an account of the proceedings at the town-hall of the borough of Southwark, and ward of Bridge Without, held 27th June, 1814, decidedly in favour of such incorporation, 2211–2213.—The high bailiff is appointed by the common council, 2214.—The returning officer of the borough of Southwark is appointed by the common council. Under the Act for establishing a Court of Requests in the borough he was the bailiff of the Court of Requests, and was entitled to certain fees, 2215.—The only prison over which the City exercises any jurisdiction is the Borough compter, but it is now quite unused, and partly pulled down. The town-hall is also the property of the City, 2216.—If the whole of the borough of Southwark were incorporated with the City, the addition would be larger than the original body, 2217.—That part of

Southwark which borders upon the Thames resembles in a great degree, in point of trade and mercantile occupation, the City of London as it now exists, 2218.—The borough of Southwark, like every other place, contains a mixture, 2219.—Does not think that adding the whole of the borough of Southwark to the City of London would destroy the special character which now belongs to the City. Southwark is essentially a commercial borough, and all its commercial interests centre in the City of London, 2220.—Taking the borough of Southwark as a whole, it closely resembles the City of London, 2221.

Coroner and Clerk of the Peace:

Coroner:

The appointment is for life though it is called annual, Payne, 6814-6818.—The fees and expenses of the office are paid from the corporation funds, ib. 6822.—The emoluments of the office amount to about 500*l.*, ib. 6824.

Corporation:

The aim in reforming the corporation is chiefly to provide a good machinery for administering the City property, Acland, 392.—A power is vested in the corporation to impose tolls, restraints, and annoyances, upon the trade and commerce of the Port of London, ib. 393.—Statement as to the order and government of the corporation, Pulling, 894.—The officers have been multiplied without necessity, ib. 955.—The corporation has almost for every purpose and every department of municipal government four or five classes of officers, ib. 956.—Statement as to the duties of the judicial officers and the town clerk, ib. 965–969.—Statement as to other officers, ib. 979.—Has seen great efficiency among the officers of the corporation, ib, 980.—The wants of the metropolis have outgrown the corporation. Self-government in London is almost impossible, Elliot, 1077.—Thinks the power that the corporation have of interfering with Parliamentary business to the extent they do a great evil, ib. 1106.—The corporation have great Parliamentary influence, ib. 1110.—Objects to the constitution of it rather than to the conduct of individuals, Cotton, 1848.—Statement as to the cost of the management of the affairs of the corporation, Williams, 2812.—Suggestions for the improvement of, Wilson, 4383.—Is the only municipal body within the metropolis, Merewether, 4826.—Has never been able to satisfy himself whether the companies may be said to be a part or an adjunct of the corporation; with very few exceptions they act almost wholly independently of the corporation, ib. 5344–5356.—The corporation derive no benefit from the profits of the river. The £1,100 a year is a mere trifle compared with what is really required, and which in truth is paid out of the corporation funds, Wortley, 6475.—Gives a summary of sums given to public improvements or charitable purposes, Merewether, 6764, 6765.—Denies that the corporation is composed generally of retail dealers, Bower, 7027, 7028.—With reference to the commercial standing of the corporation, reads two paragraphs from a "Gazeteer" of the year 1769, Lord Mayor, 7146.—Witness gives his views upon the present position of the corporation, ib. 7154.—Is not composed, as has been stated by Mr. Travers, of retail dealers or small shopkeepers, Dakin, 7374–7380.

Opinions with regard to, Hankey, 1721, 1722.

Cotton, Wm., Esquire. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is a director of the Bank of England, 1783.—Has never been engaged as a merchant, principal occupation has been that of shipowner and manufacturer carrying on business at Limehouse, 1784.—Has been connected with that business for about forty-five years, 1785.—Has directed his attention to the general constitution of the corporation, not to any minute detail of their proceedings, 1786, 1787.—Thinks a division, but not constituted as at present, might be advantageous in every corporation. There should be one body superior to another, 1788.—The court of Aldermen are magistrates of the City of London, can only judge of their duties from what he has seen recorded in newspapers, 1789.—The aldermen sit together as a court, and separate aldermen sit as magistrates, 1790.—There is an inconvenience attached to aldermen sitting as magistrates; from the number of cases, people are indisposed to become aldermen on account of the tax on their time. There is an advantage in not having the administration of justice in the hands of paid magistrates, 1791.—Not desirable that aldermen should continue to exercise the duties of magistrates. There should be responsible magistrates appointed like the ordinary police magistrates who should not be dependent on their assessors for information necessary for due administration of the laws, 1792.—The lord mayor and aldermen are greatly dependent on the advice of their paid assessors, in the choice of whom they have been very fortunate, 1793.—The system is one of stipendiary magistracy without the proper responsibility which ought to devolve on their legal advisers, 1794. —The aldermen of London acting as magistrates are more dependent on their legal advisers than the county magistrates on their clerks, 1795.—The paid assessor is practically the magistrate without a proper responsibility, 1796.—The whole constitution of the City ought to be altered. Should be sorry to see the corporation done away with. Some of the leading bankers and merchants used to be aldermen. The first person who threw up his gown was Mr. Robert Williams, a banker in Birchin Lane, from which time there was a sort of slur cast upon theposition. Formerly many of the merchants resided in the City, now scarcely one; the population has diminished, especially those who ought to undertake the duties of aldermen, 1797.—In early days the corporation represented the bankers and merchants, 1798.—Merchants have ceased to reside in the City, 1799.—Not many of the present aldermen reside in the City, does not know where they have their places of business there. The temptation to be an alderman is much greater to a person keeping a shop than to a merchant, 1800.—Believes the corporation represents the retail trade rather than the superior branches of commerce, and the retail trade is considerably altered, the great retail shops are now more at the West end than in the City, 1801.—There are several large retail shops in the City, but the proprietors are unwilling to undertake the ordinary duties of magistrates, 1802.—The state of things referred to dates from within witness's recollection. There were violent attacks made by a party in the House of Commons which brought them into ridicule, 1803.—Is aware that the election of the common council is in the freemen of the different wards who pay a certain rent. Formerly the merchants being free there was a different class of persons to elect the common council, 1804.— Of late years a material change for the worse has taken place in the common council, 1805, 1806. —Does not know in what way the committees are appointed, but thinks there are too many members in each, 1807.—The members of the common council are suited to be a legislative rather than an executive body, 1808, 1809.—Has never transacted any business with the navigation committee, 1810.—Is not a freeman, but considers the elections in common hall very unsatisfactory, 1811.—The plan laid down by the Municipal Act is preferable to the one pursued by the City. Thinks that they have not considered the advantages of electing the parties who are afterwards to elect the proper officers to perform important duties, 1812. —If a system were established by which the common council would have the confidence of the metropolis, from being elected by a great number of persons interested in the prosperity of the City, it would be better to vest the election of the officers with them than with the liverymen, 1813.—Is acquainted with the relation of the trade companies to the corporation. The companies were established for the sake of encouraging their craft, but now the larger companies have very few of their own craft among them. The parties made free by those companies ought not to elect the lord mayor, for the least select are most disposed to add to their number, and the important companies are more particular about the admission of liverymen, 1814.—A better sort of party than the liverymen might be arranged to have authority in the corporation, 1815.—The same franchise dependent on the occupation of a house for a certain time, and the payment of rates as under the general Act might be taken without reference to the companies, 1816.— Most of the companies have lost all special reference to the trade whose name they bear, 1817.—Has no knowledge of the privilege of the City with respect to porterage and metage than what he has seen in the papers, 1818.—Has never had occasion to employ them, 1819. The constituency of London for the election of municipal officers should be in householders of a certain class, 1820.—Unnecessary that they should be free; it used to be considered necessary for any one carrying on business in the City to be free of it, 1821.—Sees no object in admitting to freedom without reference to the parties belonging to any company; received a notice to take up his freedom, but does not think it in the power of the City to compel him. They have never tried to enforce notice, 1822, 1823.—The corporation possesses a large income independently of the taxes levied upon the public, 1824.— They have used it honestly but not in the best way. Should like to have seen them employ a large sum in the social improvement of the inhabitants, but does not think they have done so, 1825.—Does not think the corporation has stood sufficiently forward as the promoters of purposes of public utility. They should have put a stop to many things which interfere with the commerce, as porterage, which is only advantageous to individuals, 1826.—A great exertion has lately been made in the improvement of the thoroughfares. Might have proceeded more rapidly with that than they have done, 1827, 1828.—They appear to have attended more to their own portion of the town than to the general interests of the metropolis, 1829.—The City has a prior claim to the property which was left for the improvement of the City, but there are other incomes which they ought to devote to the general improvement of the metropolis, 1830.—At one time the City was the greater part of the metropolis, nearly all the business was carried on there, now it is only a small part of the metropolis, 1831.—The character of the City has changed since the time that many of their endowments were acquired, 1832.—So that endowments intended for the entire City have now been appropriated to a small portion of the metropolis which has outgrown the City, 1833.—Thinks it possible to devise a plan for the municipal government of the whole metropolis. A certain number should be elected by a large portion of the metropolis and they might elect a small number for the executive council, 1834.—Thinks it would be possible to provide a fund from which a supply might be obtained for defraying the expense of any public work, 1835.—At present there is no mode of imposing a tax limited to the metropolis but co-extensive with the metropolis, 1836.—If you ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a grant, he will say, "If you build bridges in London, I must build them in other parts of the kingdom," 1837.—Regrets that the wealthy who occupy the metropolis cannot be called on to do that which would be of essential benefit to the mass of the population, 1838.—Thinks such an object might be accomplished, 1839.—Agrees with most of the merchants that no good would result from a Chamber of Commerce, 1840.—There are a great many branches of trade which have their head quarters in London, 1841.—But does not think that a small body representing all the branches of trade could be satisfactorily found in London, 1843.—Separate branches of trade now have associations of their own, 1844.—There was an association among the shipping interest of which Mr. G. F. Young was chairman, 1845.—But doubts whether it exists now, 1846.—Thinks it better to form an association when there is anything particular to see into than to have a permanent one, 1847.—Has no other subject to mention. His objections have been to the constitution of the corporation rather than the conduct of individuals; having observed the aldermen and common councilmen, he thinks they have acted very honestly, 1848.

Courts:

Names and descriptions of the civil courts in the City, Cotton, 1867.

Of Aldermen. Generally a court of conciliation. The securities they have the power of taking from brokers too small in amount, Lott, 8008.

Borough. Is a court of record held by prescription for trial of all actions of debt and trespass to any amount. The steward of Southwark is the judge, and the causes are tried by jury. The judge is appointed by the City. It is a very useful court, and one from which the public derive benefit, Corner, 2205.

COURTS—continued.

Central Criminal. The Court of Common Council appoint the judge of this court, Lord Mayor, 7200.—The cost of a trial averages about 5*l.*, Adams, 7227.—The sittings are very irregular, ib. 7229.—Agrees with the recorder that it would be better to consolidate the criminal jurisdiction, and have but one court, ib. 7230.

City Courts. Facts connected with, Wortley, 6479.—Are too many and conflicting; the Court of Hustings, the Mayor's Court, the Sheriffs' Court, and the Secondary's Court, might with great advantage be consolidated into one court, Lord Mayor, 7169.—The Courts Leet are ancient courts of the manor; the steward of Southwark presides in them, and is appointed by the Court of Aldermen, on the nomination of the Lord Mayor, Corner, 2187.

Of Hustings. An absolute one, Acland, 436.

The Lord Mayor's. The Lord Mayor's statement in explanation of charges made against the gross amount of expenditure is 1,738*l.*, Goodman, 6293.—Thinks if they were assisted by the authority of Parliament in making a few alterations that court is capable of being made of great value to the inhabitants of the metropolis; it has all the power of the superior courts, with some exceptions, Wortley, 6481.—The principal peculiar custom of the court is that of foreign attachment, ib. 6486.

Old Bailey Court. The attendance of a certain number of aldermen is necessary there, so the Court of Aldermen is never appointed to sit at the same time, Merewether, 4906–4098.

Palace Court. No longer exists, Acland, 42.

Police Courts. Thinks it would be impossible to improve them, Kearns, 2338.

Quarter Sessions. A very extraordinary power is given to the City of London under the 4 George IV. chapter 64, by which the Court of Aldermen are constituted a court of quarter sessions at all times for prison purposes, Williams, 2368.

Sheriffs'. Still so called, though in fact a county court; is presided over by a judge appointed by the Court of Common Council, Acland, 457.—There were two courts having exclusive privileges called sheriffs' courts, having a judge for each court; but they are now absorbed to a certain degree in the county court of the City of London, Merewether, 4700.—The judge of Sheriffs' Court is appointed by Common Council; salary, and duties, Gurney, 5731–5741.—The Court of Common Council appoint the judge, Lord Mayor, 7200.

Small Debts'. Reason of the use of the word "employments;" jurisdiction of the court, Russell, 5742–5748.—Salary of the clerk and his duties, Wilkinson, 6898–6900.—Gives full particulars of this court, ib. 6903–6931.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION:

Thinks, if it could be managed, it would be very desirable to concentrate the whole of the criminal jurisdiction of this metropolis in one court, that court sitting almost permanently, Wortley, 6479.

CUSTOMS:

States that there is great difference of opinion as to whether legal and valid customs of the City can be repealed by the general words of an Act of Parliament. That has been and is still a point of dispute, Merewether, 5338–5343.

DAKIN, THOMAS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a member of the corporation between ten and eleven years. Is a chemist and druggist in the City, but does not reside there, 7347–7350.—Is a common councilman; has taken an active part in the corporation business, but has not paid attention to any particular points, 7351.—Has served upon the Gresham Committee; was chairman of the City side. Mr. Bennoch and Dr. Waddilove yesterday desired to know the amount of the property of the Gresham trust, and how it was expended. Witness went to Guildhall to obtain that information. Gives a statement of the receipts and expenditure of the City's moiety of Sir Thomas Gresham's estate for the year ending October 10, 1852. The City, acting as joint trustees, have from time to time advanced large sums of money above the amount received as trustees. After the fire of London, there was a debt of 20,000*l.*, which, with the interest from the year 1706, would make 120,000*l.* which the corporation have advanced out of their own funds. That amount has been entirely written off. Besides that, the City have made a loan of 25,000*l.* to the trust above the 85,000*l.* which they borrowed on the security of their corporate seal, and for which they are responsible, 7353.—The present debt of the Gresham trust is 85,000*l.* in bonds, and the loan of 25,000*l.* Is speaking of the moiety belonging to the City. The other moiety, which is administered by the Mercers Company, is similarly indebted to the private funds of that company, and but for these private advances, the trust of Sir Thomas Gresham's will would not have been carried out, 7354, 7355.—After paying the interest of its debt, the Gresham trust has not sufficient to pay for necessary expenses, without drawing on the funds of the City and the Mercers Company, 7356–7360.—The amount of charities under the Gresham trust, is 284*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.* for almsmen, 55*l.* a payment to poor prisoners. Any help which the Commissioners may be able to give towards altering the state of things in regard to Sir Thomas Gresham's will, will be considered a boon. Thinks that several questions with regard to the City improvements were not quite understood. Suggestions for improvements come from the inhabitants of the City. In 1834 the Improvements Committee caused one of Wylde's maps of London to be marked with all the improvements called for by the wishes of the inhabitants; the committee then refer the question to the City architect; he gives his judgment as to the priority in which those improvements might be taken, and the expenditure which would be incurred in their being executed. It is then brought back to the common council; then, if either of the plans is entertained, it is referred to the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee; or the Improvements Committee might be empowered to consider how the necessary funds could be obtained. If that plan became so far matured, the remembrancer would have instructions to draw out a bill, and submit it to the Legislature. This is the usual course, 7361, 7362.—The City architect makes an annual report of the improvements, and the Improvements Committee give a detailed report of the cost, not only generally, but of each individual property; how assessed; whether by arbitration, agreement, or jury, 7363, 7364.—These reports are always published in a blue book, and the greatest publicity given to them. With regard to trusts, the conduct of the corporation is the same as witness has detailed with respect to the Gresham trust, 7365.—Does not think that the corporation are bound, in the erection of any great public building, to take the advice of the City architect. In the case of the Royal Exchange, the erection of that building was submitted to public competition, the cost to be incurred being set down in the specifications, and the amount of rental necessary to enable the Gresham trustees to carry out their trust. Out of the large number of plans sent in, there was scarcely one which did not either exceed the amount at the disposal of the trustees, or fail in producing the rental necessary to sustain the trusts of the Gresham will. Afterwards, three celebrated architects were asked to compete, but declined; ultimately the plan of Mr. Tite was adopted, 7366, 7367.—Has stated that the trusts of the corporation are a source of heavy expense to them, and not a source of aid. Finds that the Navigation Committee have advanced from time to time 40,000*l.*, and that the debt under bonds is 135,000*l.*, which the City is security for, 7368.—If the conservancy of the Thames were altogether separated from the jurisdiction of the City, it would be a pecuniary benefit to the City, and would relieve it of charges from which its funds are now liable; not that they are unwilling to discharge the duties assigned to them. It has been said that the officers of the corporation are greatly overpaid. Knowing both what they receive and the services rendered, thinks the sums they receive are not at all large for the duties they are called on to perform. Take, for example, the City solicitor; his salary and emoluments have been stated at 1,750*l.* a year. Within the last four or five years an addition of 600*l.* or 700*l.* has been made to his salary, before which it was not above 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* a year. There is always in the common council men who are on the side of economy, and before any addition to a salary is made, they look minutely into the question of the amount received and the duties performed. In the case of the City architect, before his emolument was increased, he said that the best part of his life was devoted to the service of the City, for a very incompetent emolument, not such as would enable him to have such a retiring property as every man in the highest walks of his profession has a right to expect, 7369, 7370.—It has been said that there are some situations which individuals have thought it worth while to expend large sums of money to obtain. Thinks this must apply to the office of chamberlain, 7371.—Does not think the officers of the City are overpaid, 7372.—Thinks that some of the older offices might be abolished. The office of the bridge-master is almost obsolete, and some others of that class; but of those officers who conduct the active business of the corporation, does not believe they are overpaid, nor are there too many of them. The City architect was a stranger to the corporation till the competition for the erection of the City of London School. This brought him so favourably under their notice, that when the office of City architect became vacant, he was elected to that office. Generally, in the election of officers, the efficient discharge of duties is looked to, not any undue partiality, 7373.—Mr. Travers has not given a fair or correct representation of the City, when he states that the corporation now belongs to the class of small shopkeepers, 7374.—Is in the ward of Candlewick, and can state from his own knowledge that the members returned from the different wards adjoining his own are wholesale dealers. Is himself the only retail dealer; and that scarcely a fair description of his position, as his principal business is as a wholesale and export dealer. Has also large mercantile transactions with China and the East Indies, 7375.—His principal occupation is not of a retail character. Has another large wholesale business close by. The fact of having a shop does not prevent his being invited to take part in large commercial transactions. Is chairman of two companies, director of a dock company, and a director of one of the London insurance companies. Feels therefore that he may be allowed to represent his class, and disabuse the minds of the Commissioners of the impression that they do not fairly represent the trading interests of the City, 7376.—There are men in very large trade now connected with the corporation; perhaps not men whose names are eminent in the world. During the last quarter century a new class of business has sprung up, that of public companies, and those gentlemen who style themselves South American or West Indian merchants can find time to attend to them, as there is a payment connected with them, though they cannot attend to the affairs of the municipality. For instance, Mr. Powles, a South American merchant, has no time to attend to the affairs of the City where he carries on his business, but has time to give to various public companies for which he is paid. This is a part of their profitable business, but it should not necessarily cast a reflection upon that class who, perhaps equally competent to give their judgment in important matters, devote their time to avocations for which they receive no remuneration, 7378.—Of the 200 common councilmen not above twenty-five live in the City, 7379, 7380.—It would be most desirable that all the mercantile classes should co-operate in the management of the municipal affairs of a City like London, but it would be most difficult to bring in the first-class merchants and bankers of the City, though, if the position of alderman or common councilman be estimated by the duties performed, it must be one of the greatest honour and importance, 7381, 7382.—If a first-class merchant were disposed to take his share in the business and functions of the corporation, there would be no indisposition on the part of the traders to elect him, 7383.—Does not believe there is any jealousy between the wholesale and retail traders on either side, 7384.—Having been appointed one of the deputation to confer with the directors of Southwark Bridge, is able to state the position in which that question stands. Although the Bridge House property is already occupied, and pledged to a large amount, so that no part of it could be used to purchase the bridge, still, if the directors would meet the corporation in an equitable spirit, they would make an effort to find from their own funds, in conjunction with the Government, some reasonable amount, to make the bridge available for the public. The directors had stated that they expected to get 300,000*l.*, but the common council heard they were disposed to take a smaller sum. A deputation of four gentlemen, therefore, waited on them, to ascertain their views as to price. They were furnished with a report of the select committee of the House of Commons in 1836, giving a precise account of the net amount of profits received by the bridge company. Found, that in 1848 the entire net proceeds were 1,875*l.* per annum. The deputation expressed to the directors their opinion that they might reasonably moderate their demand of 300,000*l.* The directors replied, "We will not promise you that the proprietors will take that sum; if you do not agree to it now, the probability is, when you come again you will have to pay a much larger sum." In the face of this, thinks it was not fair of Mr. Thomson Hankey to state that the City showed an incompetency to provide for the wants of the public; on the contrary, the corporation have shown every desire to provide for their wants. In addition to the sum to be paid for the bridge, it was ascertained, that probably 150,000*l.* more might be required to make the approaches necessary for the public traffic. Has before him a report of the Royal Entertainment Committee. The Commissioners have asked several witnesses the cost of the ordinary banquets and feastings of the corporation. Brings this document forward only to show, that in getting up entertainments, considering the position of the City and the occasions which give rise to them, they are done with all due economy. In a City like London, which has so long been associated with the functions of the Government and the monarchy, it is useful to continue these entertainments, as a means by which the highest personage in the state, the ministers and nobles of the land, may meet the middle classes of society. There is a letter in the report referred to, which shows that Her Majesty was very pleased to receive the loyal welcome which she had at that time. It has a tendency to strengthen the general links of society. Another good effect of that expenditure of the municipality is, that the French municipality responded to an invitation which they in common with all connected with the Exhibition of all Nations received. They invited the municipality of London back to Paris, and a friendly interchange of civilities took place. Looking to the expenditure of the banquets, according to a report of the 3d of July 1814, to the allied sovereigns and the Duke of Wellington cost 25,000*l.*; but on the contrary, at this last entertainment 5,000*l.* was voted for it, and a balance of between 100*l.* and 200*l.* was returned into the chamber. Was chairman of the committee, and had no personal expense, 7385.—The two entertainments were not of the same kind; the former were dinners. Of course the propriety of such expenditure must be measured by the state of the exchequer. In the year following the report of 1817 there is a report of the Finance Committee on the corporation difficulties. In that report it is stated that there is debt due to the Bridge House fund of 33,000*l.*; 25,000*l.* in 3 per cent. consols due likewise; due to the Norwich bank 10,000*l.*, to Sir Richard Carr Glyn 5,000*l.*, Mr. Chamberlain's interest 1,508*l.*, claim of Mr. Remembrancer, one of their own officers, 17,000*l.*, Mr. Solicitor, 6,000*l.*, showing a debt of 92,508*l.*, which, from the nature of the items, was of a pressing nature. The condition of things is very different now, which justified a limited expenditure of that kind for the public objects I have named. Has been ten years connected with the corporation, and can confidently state that the charges of corruption and jobbing are utterly untrue, 7386.—The committees of the common council conduct the details of the business referred to them, 7387.—The committees have no general control over the officers; that is with the court. The assistance of the officers is required by each committee according to the business laid before it, 7388.—Thinks it would be a dangerous principle to leave more to the discretion of the officers. The details should be carefully looked over by the members themselves, 7389.

DAKIN, THOMAS, Esq. (Second Examination.)—Has been a member of the common council, and also of the Irish Society, and was elected deputy governor of that society three years ago, 7417-7419.—It is an annual office; by charter the members are elected for two years, and then go off in rotation, 7420.—The origin of the Irish Society was, that in the reign of James I. the province of Ulster was forfeited to the Crown, and they were anxious to settle it with Protestants from

England and Scotland. It was offered to the citizens of London, on condition of their erecting fortresses, taking possession of the country, cultivating and defending it against attacks. There were also certain terms of payment to the monarch. The 12 companies of London advanced sums of money to the then Government, for which they had this portion of the province of Ulster parcelled out among them. At that time the companies and the corporation of London were almost synonymous; in time, however, a separation took place, and the property was then divided among the companies in proportion to the amount originally subscribed, 7421.—Is not aware that any money was distinctly advanced by the corporation. At the time of the division a portion of the property was considered indivisible, and left under the control of the Irish Society. It consisted of the town lands of Derry and Coleraine, the fisheries af the rivers Bann and Lough Foyle, 7422–7423.—The Irish Society is a part of the corporation elected from that body, but entirely distinct. The corporation has no other than a visitorial power over them, that is, if they could be impeached for any breach of trust the corporation could step in and inquire into their management of their funds, 7424–7428.—The funds of the Irish Society are mainly returned to Ireland, in the shape of charitable benefactions for the support of schools, charities, and bridges, 7429.—Is not aware that there has ever been any surplus funds. The Skinners Company had an action against the Irish Society for some of the indivisible property, and in the course of that litigation they contracted a large debt. If there were any surplus, should think, according to the charters, it would be under the control of the society if they did nothing contrary to the trust, 7430–7433.—The entire cost of the Irish Society is restricted to 600*l.* a year. The expenses in London are 600*l.* a year, besides a secretary, to whom they pay 500*l.* a year, a messenger and a clerk, 7434.—It appears that the receipts for the year 1852, including a balance of 1,556*l.* from the previous year are 12,775*l.* The governor's salary is charged upon that amount, but the main expenditure is for schools and charitable purposes, 7435.—When the debt is paid off there will be a surplus, and does not doubt that the Irish Society will apply it to improvements for the benefit of the property, 7436–7437.—The Irish Society has no jurisdiction in the boroughs of Londonderry and Coleraine, except as owners of property there. They contribute towards the expense of the town council of Londonderry, and when necessities arise in that part of Ireland are the first applied to. When there was a question of the erection of a college for the education of the youth of that neighbourhood, the Irish Society manifested a desire to give a large donation and a yearly sum for the support of it, 7439–7441.—There is a payment made to the municipal authorities of Londonderry by the society. When they required a supply of water to the City they were assisted by the society, 7442–7444.—Nothing occurred with regard to the byelaws made by the corporation of Londonderry whilst witness was a member of the Irish Society, 7445.—Has never heard of any proposition for the sale of the property of the Irish Society; on the contrary, they pride themselves on their management of that branch of their duty, and consider it a creditable example that those parts which are under the jurisdiction of the Irish Society and the companies of London present a cheerful and flourishing aspect, and those parts without their jurisdiction indicate poverty and neglect, 7445, 7446.—There is a distinct management of the estates of the companies and the Irish Society, 7451.—If the Irish Society were to neglect their duty believes they would be amenable to the corporation of London, which has a visitorial power over them, though no case has hitherto arisen in which they have been called on to exercise it, 7452–7453.—The Irish Society submit to the corporation a paper showing their receipts and expenditure, which is presented annually to the Court of Common Council, 7454.—Thinks these estates are economically administered; there is no disposition to multiply needless offices, nor to give excessive salaries, 7455–7457.—Thinks the corporation watch these points; and as all their members are constantly moving through the Irish Society they have a knowledge of the trust, and always retain some feeling of interest in it, 7458.—The common council have the appointments connected with this society; they annually appoint the governor, also the members, who recommend the deputy governor, but the common council appoint him, 7460.—The Irish Society appoints to the places connected with the management of the property in Ireland, 7461, 7462.—Does not doubt that the total amount of the separate estates of the companies would be greater than the Irish estates, 7463, 7464.—The companies have a resident agent and officers to manage their separate estates in the north of Ireland, like the Irish Society, 7465.—In accordance with the charter the members of the Irish Society must be members of the corporation, and at one time were obliged to belong to one of the 12 principal companies, but that is not the case now, 7466–7468.—Is not aware of there being any opinion that the companies are not adequately represented by the Irish Society; they have each their own portion, received for the amount they contributed. Has already referred to the litigation with the Skinners Company, 7470.—If there were any available surplus it would be employed in the improvement of the property, 7471, 7472.—The corporation has no interest in the rents received by the Irish Society. They have never interfered in the management of the property. It was considered very desirable that, by their interference, the duration of the members serving should be increased to four years. The question was referred to the law officers of the corporation, who decided that the corporation had no power over the Irish Society to alter their arrangements, except they could be impeached in some breach of trust, and then they would have a visitorial power over them, 7473–7477.—The present state of things is, that estates in the north of Ireland belong to the Irish Society; they are elected by the corporation; they manage the estates; the whole income is expended for the benefit of the property, 7478.—The accounts are audited by a sub-committee; the deputy governor for the year takes the control of the financial department; the audited statement of accounts is printed, and sent annually to the members of the corporation of London, to the 12 companies, to peers and members of Parliament connected with the government of Ireland, and is also inserted in the newspapers published in the County of Derry, 7479.

DALTON, The Rev. CHARLES B., M.A. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is rector of Lambeth, and attended in consequence of being summoned, 4094, 4095.—The banks of the Thames adjoining the parish of Lambeth are in very good repair, but are not high enough. Whenever there are high tides the water overflows the banks and damages the property; many dwellings of the poorer classes are affected in that manner, 4096–4098.—At the spring tide the water overflowed the banks, and injured the property of the barge builders and the residences of the poorer classes. Two years ago there was a very high tide, and the misery to the poor was very great, so great that there was a public subscription; it cost a considerable sum to pump the water out of their rooms, 4099.—No representation has been made to the corporation of the City on the subject. Is not aware that the corporation have anything to do with it. Understands Mr. Edward's statement to be, that none of this inconvenience took place before old London Bridge was removed. Since receiving the letter from the secretary of the commission, has made inquiry among the watermen on the river, and was told that before London Bridge was built this did not take place. It is argued that, although the City are not responsible for repairing the banks of the Thames, yet, as they built London Bridge, it was their duty before they did so to take care to require the holders of property to raise the banks and provide for the consequences which would ensue, 4100, 4101.—Is not aware that the City has done anything to repair the banks of the river in the parish of Lambeth. Those high tides referred to do not happen frequently, 4102. To protect Lambeth adequately against the effect of those tides would be attended with great difficulty and expense. Believes the banks of the Thames in Lambeth belong to the lord of the manor, and the owners of the property, though they cannot drive a pile into the river without the permission of the City, 4103.

DAVIES, JOHN EBENEZER, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has heard the evidence with respect to those fees, which he corroborates. The fees are received by him as secretary, 8454–8458.

DAW, JOSEPH, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is principal clerk under the Commissioners of Sewers, 5909.—The Commission of Sewers in the City is appointed by the common council under the Act of Parliament

passed for the purpose, 5910.—This is a local Act, confining its provisions to the City of London, 5911. —Since the time of Charles II. the corporation have continued to appoint the Commission of Sewers, 5912.—The commission consists of the lord mayor the recorder and the common serjeant ex-officio, and all the aldermen and deputies, one commoner from each ward, except the ward of Farringdon Without, from which there are two commoners on each side of the ward, 5914.—It is a corporation commission, 5916.—After their appointment they execute all their functions totally irrespective of the corporation of London as a body, 5917.—It has always been considered desirable that they should have this sort of independent power, deriving their revenues entirely from rates upon the inhabitants of London, 5918.—Part of their revenue is derived from the consolidated rate. They are not only a commission of sewers, but also for paving, lighting, and for sanatory works; as commissioners of paving, for executing improvements, 5919.—All these powers are given under that commission, 5920.—The Act of Parliament refers to all these powers. The Commissioners of Sewers effect improvements, (which they have done within the last thirty years to the amount of nearly 100,000*l.*) under the Metropolitan Paving Act. The same power is invested in every paving trust in the metropolis, 5921.—They have the power of making two rates, the sewers' rate and the consolidated rate, both these rates upon the same assessments, 5922, 5923.—The limit is, that they may not make the consolidated rate to exceed 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in the year, or the sewers' rate to exceed 4*d.* in the pound, 5924.—Conceives the assessment is not up to the full value of the rental, 5925.—The assessment is made by the aldermen and the common councilmen of each ward. The Act of Parliament provides that it shall be made from the poor-rate assessment, unless the poor-rate assessment be deemed, in any case, a wrong one, in which case power is given the commissioners to amend it, as they may think fit, upon the advice of surveyors to be appointed, 5926.—Have not for some years gone to the full extent of their power in making the rates, 5928.—A 1*d.* rate produces about 4,500*l.*; the rental is estimated at about 1,100,000*l.* Have not raised the consolidated rate to the full amount for several years past, 5929.—The consolidated rate would produce, at 1*s.* in the pound, about 54,000*l.* Some years ago they had a 1*s.* 1*d.* rate, that was followed by a 1*s.* rate. For the last two years it has been a 1*s.* 3*d.* rate. The sewers' rate has been 4*d.* in the pound for several years till last year, when it was made 2*d.*, and in 1846 and 1847 it was only 2*d.* in the pound. They are still reducing the sewers' rate; the probability is it will be even less than 2*d.* in future, 5930.—Taking one rate at 4*d.*, and the other at 1*s.*, the taxation would be about 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound, 5931.—The only three rates levied by the corporation are the police rate, the consolidated rate, and the sewers' rate; the same collector collects all three, 5934, 5935.—It might save time to consolidate the three collections, but does not see any advantage that would result from it, because the poundage would be the same; it is as low at present as it could be fairly reduced to, 5937, 5938.—Would wish the three rates to agree in all cases, 5939. —States the duties of the sewers' commission as relates to the consolidated rate, 5940, 5941.—The whole of the lighting, paving, and other sanitary works are done by the commission, 5943.—The duties under the sewers' rate consist of the construction of new sewers, reparation, cleansing, and supervision of sewers, and construction of private drains, 5944.—Does not think any inconvenience arises from the separation of the City commission from the other commissions of sewers north of the Thames. There is the best possible feeling between the two, 5945.—The district of the other commission of sewers surrounds the City commission on every side north of the Thames, 5946.—The advantages of a separate commission of sewers are these: the City have effected all the works which are necessary for the City of London at the cost of the inhabitants of the City, therefore it would be very unfair that they should now be subjected to taxation for the cost of the drainage of surrounding districts. Then again, the ancient and prescriptive right of self-taxation for these purposes has been with the City for so many centuries, that it would be unjust, unless there were strong reasons, to deprive them of it. With respect to lighting the City through the intervention of the commission, there has been a reduction of 25 per cent. within the last five years in the charge for gas to the public lamps, 5947.—The Act gives the commissioners the power of widening the streets wherever they think it necessary, 5948, 5949.

De Jersey, Mr. Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been connected with the corporation about fourteen years, 7541.—Is a solicitor, 7542.—Resided thirteen years in the City of London, now resides out of it. His offices are in the City, 7543.—Is a member of the common council, 7544.—Refers to the evidence of Mr. Bennoch in question 1156, and explicitly denies that the object of the prosecutions there referred to was to get money, by convicting the wholesale dealers of trading by retail, so as to oblige them to become free of the City. The object was simply to increase the constituency. When the bill was passing through Parliament, it was thrown out upon the ground that there was no application from those who were interested as freemen of the City or householders to obtain the bill, and in consequence it was resolved by a majority of members of the Court of Common Council, that traders in London should be summoned to take up their freedom. Mr. Bennoch asserts "this was an insane resolution." In answer to a following paragraph respecting bills prepared for Parliament to effect reform, does not think it possible they should be defeated by a combination of their own officers. When the site of the Excise Office was sold by the corporation it was covered with old decayed buildings. The Government, when they purchased it, laid out 120,000*l.*, or 130,000*l.* and then it was sold with those buildings in addition, 7546.—Mr. Bennoch says "the market will not be finished under 400,000*l.*, or 500,000*l.*" Witness is a member of the Markets Improvement Committee. The work is open to public tender, and is given to individuals who will do it in the best way, at the least possible cost. The Commissioners questioned whether so much land was necessary for a cattle market. Lord Palmerston recommended the purchase of more than the corporation had thought necessary. Does not believe one inch of this land will be sold on building leases. Believes it is systematically incorrect "that the corporation are unwilling to support any plan for the improvement of the bridges, and were goaded into the improvement of London Bridge." Mr. Bennoch himself proposed some plan for a bridge, but his gradients and statements were found very inaccurate when tested in the Court of Common Council. He objects to New Cannon Street, which appears to witness one of the best improvements for taking off the traffic from the docks and other places, consisting of heavy waggons. To prevent its being thrown upon Ludgate Hill, a small street is projected connecting Cannon Street with Blackfriars Bridge. Thinks Mr. Bennoch's opinion with regard to the appointment of chairmen of committees most incorrect in every sense of the word, 7547.—The number of committees might be reduced, but not to any considerable extent, which would be injurious. It is desirable that a man should be a member of more than one committee, by which means he acquires a knowledge of all the business before the corporation, and that is the great check to jobbing and corruption, 7548. —When acting as chairman of the City Lands Committee for Mr. Ashurt, who was unable to attend, there were during the year nearly seventy meetings, 7549.—Each committee has regular monthly meetings, besides extra meetings and meetings of sub-committees, 7550.—They sometimes meet two or three times a week, and at times sit from twelve till five o'clock, but in some cases the business is done in an hour, 7551–7554.—Thinks the working of the system of allowances given to committees has been practically beneficial, though should not, perhaps, have been willing to introduce it. Denies Mr. Bennoch's assertion "that gentlemen are placed upon the Navigation Committee who have scarcely anything else to do." It is true there are men in the corporation who have little or nothing to do, and so far have greater opportunity of giving their services to the corporation. Another witness names two parties who are said to be the only parties acquainted with navigation. Thinks every man of business can bring an amount of intelligence and information to bear upon the subject of the committee to which he is appointed. Feels no difficulty in the Navigation Committee, and thinks it highly beneficial that these matters should not be left to the guidance of a mere officer, but that there should be a controlling body, to hear the necessity of any step and the proposed remedy. Explicitly denies "that when any gentleman shows himself particularly au fait upon a certain point, he would probably be excluded from the committee, because they fancy he has some private interest." Has no hesitation in saying such a person would be appointed. Mr. Bennoch refers to Blackfriars Bridge, and says "We have two conflicting jurisdictions, the Bridge House Committee and the Navigation Committee." He speaks of an accident which took place in the neighbourhood of the bridge. This did not occur from any thing which had been done to the bridge, but from the bed of the river being washed away, which left the piles supporting the bridge without any support outside, and caused them to bulge. The committee, under the advice of Mr. Walker, had a quantity of material thrown into the river, and the piles were restored to their original position, 7555.—There is no City engineer, 7556.—Upon questions of importance some eminent engineer is consulted, 7557.—Mr. Leach is consulted on matters connected with the Navigation Committee. Mr. Walker and Sir John Rennie are likewise employed. On the subject of sewers thinks the system adopted in the City is productive of the greatest practical good. Lives now in the neighbourhood of Brixton, and is painfully conscious of the difference between the two. Made an application nine months ago to the General Board of Sewers, which is still unattended to. In the City, an application at Guildhall would have immediate attention. With respect to the Irish Society, a printed statement of the receipts and expenditure is sent annually to every member of the common council. Mr. Bennoch thinks it an unwise resolution to have fixed the expense of the chamberlain's office at 2,372*l.* 10*s.*, as he concludes that when a vacancy occurs an incompetent clerk might be appointed, who must have 800*l.* a year. That is not so. When a vacancy occurs, it is referred to a committee, and in the present case a gentleman has been appointed at 500*l.* a year. Mr. Bennoch and my lord mayor speak of a combination of the office of comptroller with those of the Bridge House comptroller and the solicitor. The two comptrollerships might possibly be amalgamated, but thinks it impossible that one man should also perform all the duties of solicitor, 7558.—The corporation have many trusts to perform, but all those trusts bring with them their peculiar duties, 7559.—Does not think the business of the corporation could be much simplified with its present duties, and it appears impossible to reduce the offices to the extent of 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* a year, as suggested by Mr. Bennoch, though witness has been rather distinguished in the corporation by a desire to reduce offices and vote for a reduction of salaries. When it was recommended that the chamberlain should have 2,500*l.*, moved that the salary should be 1,000*l.* Agrees with Mr. Woodthorpe and Mr. Leach as to the working of the Navigation Committee, and concurs in the opinion of the latter that it would be undesirable to introduce into that committee members of the Dock Companies, or men who had any local or personal interest. At present the Navigation Committee appears a most independent body, and well calculated to carry out the objects necessary for the public interest, 7560.—Has served two years on the committee, 7561.—Thinks the conservancy of the river is managed in an efficient manner, so far as the committee have power, but believes they are restricted to a considerable extent in consequence of the existing litigation with the Government, 7562.

Delafield, William, Esq., and Horatio Nelson Fisher, Esq. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. Delafield.) Is a partner in the house of Combe, Delafield, and Co., 599.—Mr. Fisher, who has conducted the suit between the City and his firm, will give any information required, 600.—(Mr. Fisher.) States that Combe, Delafield, and Company are brewers. Statement with regard to the City claiming to measure the malt brought up to London by Combe, Delafield, and Company, 601.—They claimed to measure the malt. They filed another bill against Combe & Co., in July 1839, in consequence of the refusal, which was answered in 1840. A bill of discovery was filed in the metage suit in March 1840, setting out certain documents, and praying to be allowed to inspect those documents, 602.—The portage suit was commenced in 1835, and the metage in 1839. The porters have an office in Tower Street where all their business is transacted. The City put in answers to the bill of discovery in the metage suit. The answer of John Hurcomb and John Eayres filed in December 1850, 603.—They are two of the heads of the porters. Answer of the mayor and Henry Woodthorpe, the Town Clerk, was filed in January 1841. A third answer from the City and Mr. Woodthorpe was filed in February 1842. On the third answer, moved the court to get the papers shown, 604.—They admitted the possession of certain documents, but refused to produce them. Order from Lord Justice Knight Bruce, then Vice-Chancellor, for inspection of the documents, 605.—The documents were mentioned in the answer of the City and in the bill of discovery. Obtained order from Lord Abinger, Chief Baron, for a discovery in the portage suit, 606.—Both suits were in the Court of Exchequer. Saw some of the documents which Lord Abinger gave liberty to inspect, but they were not of much use. The portage suit came on before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. Certain issues were directed by him to be tried at Winchester Summer Assizes; that was in January 1842. Obtained order from Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce to examine documents of the City, supposed to be of great importance in both suits. Moved that trial of those issues should be put off till they had the privilege of inspecting those City documents. Appeal to the Lord Chancellor lodged against the Vice-Chancellor's order in the metage cross suit, and trial of issues put off in consequence. The appeal was argued before Lord Lyndhurst in January 1843; judgment given December 1845. Lord Lyndhurst confirmed the order of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce. City appealed to the House of Lords. Suit began in October 1835. The thing is still tied up in the House of Lords, 607.—States that the appeal was given upon a collateral point, the refusal of the City to give up certain documents, 608, 609.—The documents are charters and other City documents which, it is thought, will prove that the claim which the City make is confined to the City or some part of the City, or as between seller and purchaser, where it would be very useful, 610.—The City claims a public right affecting the whole population of the metropolis from Staines to Yantlet Creek, by prescription, and charters supporting it, 611.—The City withholds the knowledge of public documents on which they ground claims affecting a large population both in and beyond the precincts of the metropolis, 612.—The result of the delay is that the claim of the City has not been enforced against Messrs. Combe & Co., 613.—The issues have been settled. Statement of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, 614.—The portage suit stands over till the appeal to the House of Lords with reference to the order in the metage suit for seeing those City documents is decided, 615.—One suit hangs upon the other. Messrs. Combe's wharf is out of the City, 616.—The right claimed by the City extends from Staines Bridge to Yantlet Creek in Kent, upwards of 100 miles of river, 617.—Thinks it has cost Messrs. Combe about 2,000*l.* Reads evidence of Mr. George Stewart Amsinck, 618.—Thinks the 3¾*d.* or 4*d.* for 10 quarters mentioned in Mr. Amsinck's evidence would be for porterage only. Is not a fair comparison of the price of labour, 619, 620.—Does not know what lastage is. Thinks it would be necessary, in putting it in the sacks, 621.—Is not prepared to say how much Messrs. Combe would have lost a year.—(Mr. Delafield). About 1,000*l.* a year, 622.—(Mr. Fisher.) Thinks it very hard to put Messrs. Combe to the expenses from which they can derive no benefit, 623.—There have been cases in which the parties have given in because they were afraid to resist the City. Knows of one case, 624.—They were general corn factors and dealers, 625.—Believes this claim is enforced on parties who live out of the metropolis but within the jurisdiction of the City, 626.—The claim extends to all sorts of merchandise landed on the shore of the Thames for a considerable distance above and below the City of London, 627.—Believes this claim is enforced wherever it is worth the while of the City, 628.—The claim extends all the way from Staines to Yantlet Creek, 629.—Messrs. Combe and Delafield hold their premises on the north side of the river, under a lease from the Duchy of Lancaster. States that they had the evidence of the Secretary of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a view to escape by that means. Does not think the Duchy have the privilege, although he attempted to make it out, 630.

D'IFFANGER. (See George's Evidence.)

DILLON, JOHN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a merchant in the City of London, and partner in the firm of Morrison, Dillon, and Company, wholesale warehousemen, in the City of London, 650, 651.—Does not sleep in the City, but has been engaged in business there since the year 1818, and did reside there for many years, 652, 653.—Never was connected with the common council, 654, 655.—Is less acquainted with the affairs of the City than he was some years ago. In the year 1833 a Commission was issued upon the subject of the corporation. At that time a committee was formed of freemen to inquire into the abuses of the corporation, with a view to communicate with the Commissioners. Was appointed chairman. Produces a report drawn up by the committee on that subject. The committee consisted of 28 gentlemen, one now a member of Parliament for the borough of Lambeth, Mr. Williams, also Mr. Travers, deceased, Mr. Pritchard, Mr. Pearson, and Mr. Alderman Wire. He mentions these names to show the competency of the parties to make the inquiry. Some very important questions, such as police and sanitary questions, have since arisen, and extended the inquiry. To make the present corporation perfect, must extend it beyond the present area and limits of the City, 656.—Arrives at this conclusion from the necessity of uniformity with regard to police, and with regard to sewerage, 657.—Thinks it quite possible that some plan might be devised which should provide for a uniform system both of police and sewerage for the whole of the metropolis, without altogether abolishing the municipal system of the City. Should not propose the immediate and total abolition of the corporation of the City, but recommends that endeavours should be made to frame a more perfect system, by constituting as corporations Finsbury, Marylebone, Lambeth, the borough of Southwark, and so on; and that, having formed a series of corporations, you might, by means of boards to superintend the sewerage and police, without danger establish a more perfect system, 658.—One of the most important of the evils in the present system is the mode of making freemen of the City of London. Gives particulars of the mode of admission, 659.—Has no reason to believe that the corporation of London in early times exempted the larger wholesale merchants and traders from fines, while they exacted them generally on the admission of traders, upon grounds of public policy, but thinks it may have been so. A state of things of a very anomalous kind has arisen; while the poor are exempted because they cannot pay, the rich are so because by custom they are not called upon. An immediate and easy remedy for this state of things would be, that the freedom should be granted as a right, not as a privilege; every person who lived or traded in the City should by that fact become a citizen; and no fine should be exacted, except a small one for the mere purposes of registration, 660.—A nominal fee; not for the purposes of revenue, 661.—If it were a mere nominal sum, sufficient to defray the purposes of registration, it would be in effect nearly the same thing as doing away with the freedom altogether, and adopting burgesses, as in other corporations, 662.—Sees no advantage whatever in maintaining a connexion between the freedom of the companies and the freedom of the City, 663.—Is a member of the founders' company, 664, 665.—The feelings and opinions prevailing in the companies with respect to their connexion with the corporation are so various that he cannot classify them, 666.—There was a prevailing wish on the part of the companies to maintain a connexion with the City freedom. Most of the persons who are members of the City companies are also free of the City. They act in both capacities, and would retain their rights and interests in both, 667.—Has been told that some of the companies at present insist upon their right to compel persons exercising the trade of which the company bears the name to take up the freedom of that company, but is not well informed upon the matter, 668.—Has heard of actions being brought in which that point has been brought to determination, 669.—Admits that the corporation of the City has many defects. Judging from his experience, believes that whatever alterations are made in the corporation there will still be a reluctance to undertake municipal duties. Has witnessed several unsuccessful attempts to form a chamber of commerce in London. There is in these matters an essential difference between the commercial bodies of London and other cities, so that if the City corporation were reformed, an inclination would not be created on the part of the merchants of the City of London to take part in the management of municipal affairs, 670.—It was much more the habit a generation or two back for the principal bankers and merchants to reside in the City than it is now, 671.—Thinks it likely to have had great influence in causing the difference to which he has referred, 672.—It is natural that persons should feel more interest about the municipal offices of the place where they reside than they would feel if their residence is quite unconnected with their place of business, 673.—Should suggest that the three large constituent bodies in the City of London should be reduced to only one. The constituency under the Reform Act has worked a considerable difference in the constitution of the City, and removed many objections, 674. Can see no objection to the constituency formed for the purpose of voting for members of Parliament. The qualification of that is the 10*l.* householder, 675.—In order to vote for members of Parliament they must reside within seven miles; but still they, as liverymen, have not necessarily any interest in the municipal corporation or the welfare or rights of the City. They need not be engaged in business. They need not live within the City. That is the first constituency. The second is the constituency of the common hall, and is composed of the liverymen of the trading companies, of which one is called the watermen's company, whose votes are known by the name of the "'long-shoremen." The third constituency is a ward constituency for the election of aldermen and local officers, and consists of resident householders, being freemen. There is no longer any necessity for the voters being freemen or liverymen of the companies. Should suggest in place of the two first constituencies one for all the elections of the City, 676.—Sees no reason for keeping up the connexion between the companies and the freedom of the City, 677.—The general constituency should be totally independent of the companies, 678.—At present some of the officers are elected by the aldermen, some by the Court of Common Council, and some by the large constituency at common hall, 679, 680.—Very much inclines to a liberal policy in such matters, but can imagine some offices which had better be confined to the appointment of an active and limited body, 681.—Judicial offices and others, 682.—Thinks that the chamberlain should be elected by a large constituency at common hall, 683.—Has not considered the subject much, but thinks that the objection to any form of election is the chance of its being corrupt or misapplied, and suspects that the office of chamberlain is one which it would be better not to give into the hands of a few, 684.—Reasons for making this distinction: the fear of its being given from corrupt motives, or from favouritism, instead of fitness for the office, 685.—Thinks that an office which is given away either by the Court of Aldermen or the Court of Common Council is more likely to be given by favour than when it is bestowed by an election in common hall, 686.—Thinks that the election of lord mayor has become almost a matter of rotation among the aldermen, 687.—When there is a fear of a contested election, the uncontested election is likely to be decided by what would probably be the result of a contest, 688.—Would make the constituency in common hall much larger than at present, by the admission of a greater number of freemen. Corruption would be extremely difficult, 689.—Cannot say whether he would alter the limits of the wards; the principal public duties which they have to perform is the election of aldermen. Every alderman is a magistrate and justice of the peace, not only for and in that ward, but for the whole City for life. Cases have occurred in which a constituency of 50 or 100 persons in some of the smaller wards have appointed a man to be, as they thought, their alderman, neither knowing nor caring about the circumstance of his becoming their justice of peace. Thinks this a very unbecoming and injudicious proceeding, 690.—Is not aware that any of the wards have charities connected with them as wards, 691.—As to the advantage of retaining the division into wards, can give no opinion, 693.—The City is but a small area, 694.—The object for dividing and mapping it out into certain precincts for electoral purposes was self-government, and the appointment by the residents of a particular spot of their own officers, 695.—It is only as a justice of peace that an alderman becomes an officer in respect to the whole City of London, 696.—The Court of Aldermen acts for the whole City in its collective capacity, 697. Sees no reason for maintaining a division into wards in so small a district as the City of London, 698.—Considers local government a very desirable thing, 699.—Has never considered the case of the borough of Southwark, but believes that it stands in an inconsistent and incongruous position, 700.—Is in favour of a stipendiary magistracy, 701, 702.—Would appoint barristers of a certain standing, and pay them salaries, for discharging magisterial duties. The lord mayor and aldermen would then be relieved from their magisterial duties, 703, 704.—The connexion between the companies and the corporation of the City should cease, which would involve the total destruction of the Court of Common Hall, as at present existing, but it would then become a common hall formed of freemen of the City, instead of liverymen of the companies, 705–707.—Suggests that the interference of the companies in the City matters should be entirely abolished, 708.—Is not aware of any other connexion between the trading companies and the corporation. Has an impression that they are joint trustees for some purposes. The Royal Exchange is held under some kind of joint trusteeship between the corporation and one or more of the City companies; and there is a connexion between the corporation and the companies with regard to their Irish estates. These might have many matters of account between them, but no question of public principle. The funds and accounts of the City require revision. Has never found a man who is able to say what is the amount of the revenues of the corporation. The accounts should certainly be stated and audited more particularly and clearly than they have been, 709.—Thinks the auditors have been incompetent persons, but does not recollect the names of any recent ones, 711.—Looking at the corporation of the City in connexion with the map of London, would suggest the propriety of extending the area of its jurisdiction; but to this there are grave objections. Corporations might be given to the surrounding boroughs, 713.—From such four or five corporations, boards might be appointed, either by some federal union or some other means, 714, 715.—It would not be desirable to abolish municipal institutions, but to remodel and improve them, 716.—Should not propose any other alteration. The City would remain with its limits as a corporation, 718, 719.—Proposes that there should be a municipality of Finsbury, Marylebone, Westminster, Southwark, and Lambeth, 720.—Thinks it desirable that the police should extend over the whole of the metropolis, and not, as at present, be divided between the metropolitan police and the City police; and that the sewerage of the metropolis should be placed under a single authority, as also the regulations with regard to lighting and paving, 721–723.—Sees no reason why the supply of water should be taken out of the hands of private individuals or companies, 724, 725.—Repeats that the administration of justice in the City by the magistrates should be transferred to stipendiary officers appointed by the Crown, 726.—Assuming these measures to be carried into effect, very few functions of a municipal nature would remain for the corporation of the City and for the other corporations of the metropolis. The view he has taken may perhaps tend to the same result, but it would be more safely and gradually obtained, 727.—The corporation of the City is in possession of a very large income, independent of rates or local taxation, 728.—Thinks it a matter of great importance, with a view to corporation reform, that the good administration of that large income should be provided for, 729.—It is a legitimate object of corporation reform that endeavours should be used to apply the income of the corporation to as beneficial objects of a public nature as possible, but that it should be done under public control, and not by Government, 730.—The income of the corporation ought to be exclusively under the control of the corporation, 731.—The property of the City cannot be fairly applied to objects out of the City, 732.—Thinks it possible to find within the limits of the City objects of public utility to which the whole of the income might be applied, 733.—The widening of the streets would be a very material object, and improving the port and public buildings, 734.—Has had no experience of the privileges of the City with regard to porters and meters, 735, 736.—His warehouses are situated in the ward of Cripplegate, 737.—Has never employed the sworn porters of the Corn. The result of these dues has been shown to be that ships are driven from the Thames to the Severn, because in the one they can clear their cargo for 14*l.* or 15*l.*, and in the other for 50*l.* or 60*l.*, Bennoch, 1252.—The corn duties, and other duties of that nature, are paid by the inhabitants of the metropolis generally, Tyrrell, 7251, 7252.

Tonnage. Paid to the corporation, Williams, 2798.—Are collected in the river, and the coal tax levied beyond the limits of the City, Merewether, 4825.—Particulars of, Baylis, 7090–7116.

Wine. Are collected by the same person as the tonnage dues, Baylis, 7090–7094.—The duty is 4*s.* 9½*d.* per ton of 252 imperial gallons, ib. 7112.—It is a uniform duty on all varieties of wine, ib. 7113, 7114.—The wine duties are paid weekly into the chamber, ib. 7117, 7118.

ECCLESIASTICAL PATRONAGE:

The corporation have some ecclesiastical patronage; they are proprietors of the advowsons of St. Peter's, Cornhill, and St. James's, Duke's Place, and alternately St. Margaret Pattens, Hale, 7515, 7516.

EDUCATION:

Mr. Brewer is publishing a work, which will show that the citizens of London have done more for the promotion of education than any other class of persons, Hale, 7517.

EDWARDS, Mr. GEORGE. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—The house in which he is a partner is engaged in the manufacture of linens in Scotland, and they sell their goods in London on the premises which they occupy in the City. Is one of the resident partners in London, 2840, 2841.—They have never had any difficulty in carrying on their trade, except that on one occasion it was required that the persons employed should be freemen instead of their own servants, 2842.—He and his partner are engaged in receiving goods made up in a certain state from Scotland. They require to transpose them, and put them in a new shape occasionally, 2843.—They receive a quantity of goods in a certain shape, and it is convenient in selling them to put them into another, and instead of sending them to calenderers out of doors find it more convenient to do the work at home by their own people. Some of the freemen of London thought they had a monopoly of the right to this work, because it was a calenderer's business. One of the partners was summoned to appear before the aldermen, who declined to interfere. Has no other complaint to make, 2844–2848.

ELECTIONS:

The City bill gave the liverymen a power of electing in conjunction with the householders, and to householders the monopoly of voting in ward elections, Pulling, 891.—Court of Aldermen claim extensive power over, ib. 892.—Describes the corrupt means used to secure elections in the City, Mills, 1004.—Not much corruption at the City elections, Hyde, 1542.—Non-resident voters for a member of Parliament do not refuse their expenses, Wallis, 1413, 1414.—In common hall are badly taken. Poll clerks have no official register. Many poll merely to get the fees for the day, ib. 1428.—Less money expended in City municipal than parliamentary, ib. 2896.—Bringing up distant voters adds to the expenses of City elections, ib. 2899.—Mr. Moon's contested election as alderman cost from 500*l.* to 600*l.*, spent in canvassing and parties. No man received a shilling for his vote, ib. 2900–2903.—For the office of Chamberlain, between Mr. Scott and Sir John Key, much money was spent on both sides; distant voters had to be paid their expenses and loss of time, Rose, 2908–[2913].—Complaints against the present system of, Bennett, 4179.—Suggestions for doing away with Bribery Act, ib. 4186.—If the system cannot be reformed it should be abolished, ib. 4655.

Common Hall Elections. With bribes varying from 1*s.* to 10*l.* can buy over the 400 liverymen, Acland, 417.—Common hall elections are a complete farce, ib. 2108.—In common hall, are conducted in a manner far from satisfactory, Scott, 4650–4654.—The election in common hall of the mayor, the chamberlain, the sheriffs, the bridgemasters, the auditors, and the ale connors, are all directed by a particular charter. The election of the recorder is with the aldermen. Supposes it is because the aldermen originally exercised all the powers of the corporation, particularly those connected with the administration of the law. The other officers are elected by the common councilmen, as representatives of the citizens, ib. 5033.—Provisions of the bill proposed in 1851 as to the right of voting at elections, Merewether, 5056–5108.—The effect of the bill would have been to deprive the livery companies of their monopoly of the elections at common hall, ib. 5078.—Does not think Mr. Alderman Humphrey was justified in his observation that he had been asked for a subscription to promote the election of Sir J. Key, Lord Mayor, 7145.—The common hall elections should be strictly confined to the election of lord mayor and sheriffs, ib. 7158.—There is much bribery in those elections, the candidates buy votes by the hundred. The agents hand in the names of the voters, and the contract is, they are only to be paid for those who vote for the party, Harrison, 7293.—In the ward elections it is sufficient that a person should be a freeman and a resident in the ward. As far as the franchise is concerned, freedom alone is necessary, Merewether, 5029.—At the annual wardmote elections there were not above two changes in the election of those common councilmen who formed the corparation last year, ib. 6774.

ELECTION, CONTESTED, between Sir John Key and Mr. Scott. (See Chamberlain.)

ELECTORS, MUNICIPAL. (See Municipal.)

ELLIOT, JOHN HAWKINS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a common councilman for about five years. Has taken great interest in the examination of corporation affairs. Has for many years considered it not so useful a body as it might be, 1074.—Is a wholesale warehouseman in the City, 1075.—And resides there, 1076.—The wants of the metropolis have outgrown the corporation, which consists of men quite incompetent for the great and difficult matters intrusted to them. Self-government in London is almost impossible, as the most intelligent and influential men only spend a few hours there, and feel no interest in the municipal affairs of the City, 1077.—Thinks the first evil consists in the magistracy, which consists of twenty-six aldermen elected for life, who have neither time nor qualifications for their office. In addition to their duties as magistrates they are also members of the common council, and of various committees of the court, where they have a preponderating influence. Would relieve London of its alderman-magistracy, and have two paid police magistrates for the two offices of the City, appointed by the Crown. The aldermen take their places at the quarter sessions, but as they do not understand law, they get restless, and cause great disturbance. The business is conducted by a judge. The same applies to the Central Criminal Court, 1079, 1081.—Has known an alderman take his seat to adjudicate upon a case when his own partner pleaded either for plaintiff or defendant, 1083.—And of another going from prison in the custody of an officer day by day to dispense justice. No notice was taken by the corporation. The two police courts in the City are, by the Corporation report, carried on at a cost of more than 5,000*l.* a year. The twenty-three paid police magistrates in the metropolis cost altogether but 45,000*l.* a year, 1086.—The 5,000*l.* does not include the salary of the recorder. Believes the two cases to be parallel, 1087.—There is one police obtaining over nineteen twentieths of the metropolis, the total cost of which is 400,000*l.* a year. The City district has a police of its own, conducted at a cost of more than 40,000*l.* a year. Thirteen years ago an attempt was made to institute a uniform police over the rest of the metropolis, and it was then estimated that the police of the City might be well managed for 25,000*l.* a year, in addition to the cost of the metropolitan police. The City raised a cry about their rights, and the Government gave way, provided they formed their police on the model of the metropolitan, 1087. The City police is as efficient as it can be, cut off from the metropolitan, 1088.—The commissioners of sewers are a distinct body in the City, subordinate to the metropolitan board of commissioners. Does not think it desirable to disturb them, as in cases where it is necessary to have a united action they are always ready to act with the metropolitan commissioners. Having relieved the corporation of those important functions which ought to belong to the imperial authority only, submits that, for all the rest, the City of London should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Municipal Act, which will indicate whence the funds are to come to pay for the police and all other services, 1090.—Thinks there is a provision in the Municipal Act that stipendiary magistrates should be appointed by the Crown, and paid for by the rates; but if not, there are funds in the City. The lord mayor alone costs 25,000*l.* a year; so by stripping that office of some of its costs there would be funds for any new services which might be required, 1091.—By the plan which he proposes, the corporation might be reformed without clashing with the sympathies of the citizens, by extirpating it all together. Thinks the management of its estates would bear a fair comparison with that of the national estates of the Woods and Forests, 1092.—Would leave the charitable trusts in the hands of the corporation, reformed under the new Municipal Act.—By a proper management of the affairs of the City, enormous amounts might be saved for metropolitan improvements; and to show that there is no lack of funds, observes that the expenditure for 1852 for municipal purposes amounted to a tax of 5*s.* in the pound, and reckoning the rental of the City as 1,000,000*l.*, the expenditure for municipal purposes for 1852 was equal to 17*l.* per house, 1095.—Of the money so expended, about 146,000*l.* was derived from the City rents, tolls, &c., and about 120,000*l.* was raised by rates, 1096.—

ELLIOT, JOHN HAWKINS, Esq.—continued.

As in Marylebone, 1097.—An examination of the yearly abstract will show the distinction between the rents of the City and the tolls levied on the public, 1098.—The rates paid in the City for paving, &c. are quite as high as in Marylebone, 1099.—The rates are uniform over all the parishes, 1100.—They pay church rate, and all other parochial expenses in the City, independently of the municipal expenses, 1101.—With regard to the means of educating their children in endowed schools which the citizens of London possess, states that there are charities in the City, for instance, the City School, which enables them to give children a first-rate education at a very low price, 1102.—This school is in the hands of the corporation, 1103.—They have just built the Freeman's Orphan School available for the orphans of freemen till the school is full. They are now about electing them, 1104.—It is partly supported by the funds derived from the tax imposed upon the tradesmen of the City who are not allowed to commence a retail business unless they take up their freedom, and also the large fines wrung from those who do not find it convenient to be sheriffs. When any tax becomes obnoxious, the corporation take care to secure it for a particular and often a very good purpose, 1105.—There is a toll on the transit of commodities into the City. The corporation laid that fast to the amount of 5,000*l.* a year, by Act of Parliament, for the improvement of Holborn Hill. Thinks the power that the corporation have of interfering with Parliamentary business to the extent they do a great evil. Does not see why the inhabitants of the central district should possess a power which the people inhabiting the other districts have not, 1106.—The corporation have a remembrancer, whose duty it is to attend the House of Commons, and inform them if any Act of Parliament is proposed which can be considered hostile to their interests, 1107.—Some time ago they introduced a clause into an Act of Parliament without any public discussion, which gave them the power of levying a toll upon coals to the distance of twenty miles round St. Paul's. By reforming the corporation in the manner before described all such inconsistencies would be done away, 1108.—The corporation have great Parliamentary influence, 1110.—The coal tax has been misrepresented with regard to the corporation; it is 1*s.* 1*d.* in the ton. The corporation retain as much as is yielded by 4*d.* out of the 1*s.* 1*d.*, 1111.—The rest is under the control of the Woods and Forests, for improvements beyond the City. That is not to be complained of, provided the City apply their share properly, 1112.—Believes the part of the fund which is applicable to City purposes is perpetual, 1112a.—In a scheme of municipal reform, would recommend that the coal tax remain as it is now for ten years, as it is easily collected, and does not press hard on the consumer. Sees no advantage in making coals very cheap, as it would increase the fog and smoke in London, and render it more unhealthy, 1113.—Thinks that even if London has been deprived of some important branches of trade by the comparative dearness of coals, it has been an advantage, for the above reason, 1114.—But does not think it has been practically much the case, 1116.—With regard to the coal tax restraining the consumption of the poor as well as the superabundance of the rich, the cheaper things are, the more extravagantly they are used, especially by the poor, 1117.—Although coals are dear now it does not do to reason from the prices of one market day, 1118.—Thinks it advisable that the coal tax should be continued, and the proceeds entirely applied to metropolitan improvements, not only in the City. Knows no other way of raising 200,000*l.* a year so conveniently, 1119.—The application of the 75,000*l.*, being the corporation's share of the coal duties, is not very clear in the cash abstract. For the year 1852 they give the products of the corn and coal tax (by the corn tax is meant the metage dues, out of which they derive a profit of 10,000*l.*), the sum of 73,000*l.*, and they show, as the appropriation of that fund, 20,000*l.* spent for City improvements. Believes the rest was merged in the ordinary City expenditure. Considers it but fair to say that the corporation are now spending more money for useful purposes than they have done for many years. There is an item down of 20,000*l.* for public improvements, another 19,000*l.* for building lodging houses for the poor, 58,000*l.* for the new metropolitan cattle market. The difficulty in removing the old Smithfield market another instance of corporation narrow-mindedness, 1120, 1121.—Considers the City privilege with regard to metage and porterage disadvantageous to trade, as tradesmen are obliged to employ privileged persons at a greater charge than others would, which renders commerce in the City more expensive than in other towns, 1122.—The functions with respect to the conservancy of the river are in the hands of the navigation committee, which is composed of some members of the council, and a proportion of aldermen; persons one would suppose to be quite incompetent; but would not disturb an organization which has existed so long, 1123.—With regard to the borough of Southwark, would relieve it from the trifling jurisdiction which the City now has over it, and provide for its wants in the same way as those of Marylebone, 1124.—Considers that the size of the metropolis defeats the main objects of municipal government, namely, a knowledge of the local circumstances of the place, 1125.—Is not prepared to extend the Municipal Act to Finsbury, Southwark, &c. till the practical result of an improved municipality has been seen in the City, 1126.—It is in the power of those boroughs to apply to be admitted within the Municipal Act, 1127.—Does not think there has been any such move in any of those boroughs, except when they have been instigated to it by the corporation, 1128.—The general outline of his proposition is, to extend the provisions of the General Municipal Act to the City of London, placing all judicial functions in the hands of officers appointed by the Crown, and paid out of the City funds, and to incorporate the City police with the metropolitan, and to leave the board sewers as it is at present, with exclusive City jurisdiction, 1129, 1130.—Would entirely do away with the Court of Aldermen, 1131.—Would not disturb the livery or trading companies except in so far as they interfere with the freedom of trade; would deprive the livery of the power of electing the lord mayor and chamberlain, and by bringing the City under the Municipal Act would do away with all anomalies and absurdities, 1132.—Would get rid of all elections in common hall, and do away with the custom of liverymen residing within seven miles voting for Members of Parliament, 1133.—Would abolish the qualification of freedom, and consider every man free who lives in the City, and a burgess by the very fact of his having lived there a certain time and paid taxes, 1134.—Would assimilate the condition of burgesses in the City to that of burgesses under the general Municipal Act without exception, 1135.—Proposes that the burgesses should elect the town council, and the town council appoint the necessary officers. The aldermen in the new municipalities have scarcely any function except that of town councilmen, 1136.—The City now consists of twenty-five wards which are very unequal in their extent. Proposes that the City should be divided into twelve wards to return altogether 180 councillors, 1137.—Thinks that the difficulties with regard to the charities belonging to the present wards as wards might be got over, 1141.—That the old boundaries might be maintained for the purpose of administering the charities, while they were altered for electoral purposes, 1142.—Does not think the charities are considerable, 1143.—Witness as a common councilman has taken the usual amount of interest, and attended the committees as well as he could; but as the business of the corporation is carried on in the middle of the day, it prohibits men who have any avocation to perform from giving due time to it, 1144.—The court of common council is orderly in its proceedings, 1145.—It consists of 232 persons, 1146.—Which is very numerous as compared with other towns; it nearly doubles Marylebone, 1147.

ENTERTAINMENTS:

Some account of the expense of the banquet given to the allied sovereigns in 1814, contrasted with the entertainment to Her present Majesty, Dakin, 7385.

ESTREATS:

Facts of a case of prosecution in which the securities were forfeited, and query whether the fines belonged to the sheriffs or the corporation, Gray, 2914–2925.—Knows a case in which the corporation, having had a fine of 10,000*l.* set over to them, divided it among the sufferers from the delinquencies of the man who paid the fine, Wire, 7959.—In all places, unless by particular charter or grant, the estreats go over to the Crown. In Middlesex those which arise in connexion with the City of Westminster go to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, ib. 7975.

Evidence Act:

Gives a power to a Court of Common Law of granting an inspection of the charters, Pulling, 857.

Farebrother, Charles, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been an alderman of the City of London for 28 years. In pursuance of a resolution of a committee of aldermen, attends as senior alderman to express their entire approbation of the statement made by the recorder as containing the opinion of the Court of Aldermen, 7222.—Wishes the Commissioners to understand that though the suggestions of the lord mayor may be perfectly correct, still his statement is not the statement of the corporation. In answer to a question of the Commissioners to the lord mayor respecting the power of the Court of Aldermen to appoint police magistrates, states that by the Police Act passed of 1838 a power is given to the Court of Aldermen, in the event of their being unable to attend, to appoint such magistrates or persons as they may deem proper. There are a variety of charities, the administration of which is left by will to the Court of Aldermen for the time being. They are responsible, as all other trustees are, to the proper court for neglect of their duties, and may be dismissed from the trust if improperly carried on. Mentions this to show the distinction between these and other charities which are mixed up with the City of London generally. The Irish Society does not manage any portion of the estates which belong to different companies. But there was an Act of Parliament constituting a society for managing certain estates, in which the City have rights, and in which different persons have particular rights. In the Vintner's Company they have only an annuity chargeable out of those estates received by the City, and paid over to the company. The corporation of the City of London does not interfere with any estates which are the separate property of the different companies, 7223.—There is a committee now sitting to consider certain improvements and alterations to be recommended to this Commission, composed of aldermen and common councilmen, 7224.—Cannot say what is the precise constitution of the committee, but it is appointed for that special purpose, and is the same that drew up the statement submitted to the Commission by the recorder on a former day, 7226.

Farebrother, Charles, Esq. (Second Examination.)—Stated in former evidence, that there was a power given in the Police Act to the magistrates in the City to appoint further magistrates. Stated that the Act passed in 1838, but finds that it passed in 1839; and the power referred to is contained in that Act, the 2nd and 3rd Victoria, chapter 94, section 6, and is confined to the appointment of the commissioner of the police, 7268.

Fees:

Not one penny of the 74,000*l.* for fees appears in the City accounts. States how the gross sum was ascertained, Williams, 2804–2808.—The corporation have endeavoured to do away with fees, and to give their officers fixed salaries, Scott, 4527–8.—Thinks the practice of taking fees from the public for admittance to the galleries in the court at the Old Bailey very objectionable, more especially so now, for there is in the rest of the court no room for the public at all, though nominally open to the public, Wortley, 6502, 6503.

Fellowship Porters:

The fellowship porters are excluded from the London Docks for various reasons, Cattley, 1300.—Paid to them in nine months the sum of 1,939*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, Keeling, 1624.—Charges reduced one halfpenny a quarter, Hales, 1654, 1655.—Case in Commercial Docks, ib. 1657.—The body of free porters of the fellowship of London is not a corporation itself, but they claim their rights of labour under prescriptive right from the corporation, Brown, 3061.—The number varies with the amount of business to be done by them. Each fellowship porter, upon his admission, has to find two sureties, who give a bond in 40*l.* each for his honesty and general good conduct, ib. 3070.—The owners of the mills on the banks of the river have themselves excluded the porters; the dock companies have done the same, and make a profit on the labour. The fellowship porters petitioned the common council in the year 1847, calling their attention to the poverty brought upon the members generally in consequence of that portion of the employment being taken away from them, but from that time to the present they have not had any assistance from the corporation, ib. 3090–3092.—Thinks the corporation might more effectually protect their privileges if they were inclined, ib. 4018.—When a member of the corporation in 1833, witness brought in a bill, and passed an act through the Court to gradually reduce and ultimately abolish, if it was thought necessary, the fellowship of porters, Pearson, 5544.—The alderman of the ward of Billingsgate is always governor of the fellowship of porters, and his deputy is deputy governor, Bower, 6968.—Statement as to the fellowship of porters, ib. 6973–7018.—Gives full particulars about the rulers and porters, Lawrence, 7033–7089.—The system of fellwship porters is acceptable to the trade who come within the privilege, ib. 7088.—The porters do not derive any great benefit from the fellowship; it is considered a great advantage to the great bulk of the mercantile community, even in its decrepid state, Lord Mayor, 7173, 7174.—The porters have had their privileges interfered with, ib. 7175.—A conference has been held by several members of the corporation, and an agreement beneficial to the community at large has been come to; it will pass through Parliament, it is expected, with their sanction, ib. 7176.—The decrease in the annual payments to the fellowship from 1,604*l.* in 1841, to 770*l.* in 1851, alluded to by Mr. Lawrence, arises from the monopoly of labour by the dock companies, who will not admit the fellowship porters. They get the work done for 1*d.* per quarter, and charge from 2½*d.* to 3*d.*, Rushton, 7899–7912.

Ferguson, Sir Robert Alexander, Bart., M.P. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a member for the City of Londonderry for 24 years, 8140.—Resides within a mile of the town, on one of the perpetuity leases of the society, 8141.—Is well acquainted with the property of the society, 8142.—Enters into particulars as to the litigation between the Irish Society and the Bishop of Derry, and contradicts some statements made on the subject by Mr. Anderton in his evidence. With regard to the free school spoken of by Mr. Anderton, when King James granted Derry, &c. to the City of London, he seems to have expected that there should be a school. There is a small district in the possession of the society, which it is believed was intended for a school, which was reserved out of the division of the county among the companies, 8143.—That impression has arisen from papers produced during the proceedings of the Skinners Company against the Irish Society. Enters into particulars. The society have come forward since 1831 to support a school, but it is merely done as a gift at pleasure, so that the payment can be stopped at the will of the society at any time, 8144.—Believes the society are not only competent but bound to make a grant in perpetuity for the endowment of a school, 8145.—The present school is now deficient in funds for its support and for the repair of its buildings, 8146.—It would otherwise be extensively useful, and able to compete with the royal schools of Armagh, Dungannon, &c. Statement as to the estates of the royal schools in the counties, 8147.—The society, as trustees for the purpose of the plantation, being bound to give any surplus in their hands, after performing what they are called upon to do by their charter, to the London companies who furnished the funds from the outlay of which the society obtain their income, are incapable of performing properly the part of landlords. Thinks the constant change which takes place in the society makes it impossible that they can manage the property beneficially, 8148, 8151.—Thinks it would not be a breach of trust to manage the land as it is done in England, but does not think there would be sufficient funds. 8152, 8153.—The House of Lords avoided deciding whether the surplus should be given to the companies. Statement to prove that the society have not the power of doing their duty. Thinks something should be done for the town and district, as in the case of the ecclesiastical property, and Trinity College, Dublin, 8154.—Does not include the property of the companies, 8155.—Besides the measure adverted to, witness thinks there must be a definition of what the trusts and duties of the society are; their payments to the corporation of Derry ought not to be optional; if the corporation have a right to them, the right should be declared. Since the society granted the 1,200*l.* a year, they have not treated the corporation as they ought. Gives an instance, 8156.—Considers that an enormous part of the income of the Irish Society is spent in management and litigation, and that the litigation is not fairly carried on, 8159.—Some mode of simplification should take place to obviate that evil, and if there were grants in fee farm, that would do so, 8160.—Thinks three per cent. upon 25 years purchase of the present property would yield a larger sum than the net proceeds of the rental of those estates, if the charges of management are to go on in the proportion they did between 1817 and 1847, there are valuable reversionary interests which would bring in much money. The litigation in which the society has been engaged, with regard to the perpetuity leases, has been carried on most unfairly to the tenant. States full particulars, 8162.—Does not claim any peculiar privileges for the tenants of the society which should interfere with the general right which the community have to the advantage of the proceeds, as largely and as fully as they can be made, of the entire property; but thinks, as they are in possession, and have expended large sums on the buildings, they should have the right of pre-emption, 8164. —Thinks the deputations to Ireland would be very useful, were the members of the society less fluctuating, 8165.—The management of the affairs of the society rests practically with the London secretary, 8166.—The governor is elected annually, but has never known him changed when once appointed, 8167. —The present governor has gone over frequently to the estates, 8169.—Every Irish proprietor's affairs are of a very complicated kind in dealing with a large tenantry, so the difficulties of the society are very great, owing to the constant change of its members, 8170.—The tenants of the society are worse off in their relation to their landlord than those of any other proprietor which witness knows, both in the manner in which they are treated and the uncertainty in which they are as to how they will be treated should anything happen. Gives an instance. The society have given up for the last two or three years the practice of sending deputations over, but they now send what they call visitations, 8171.—The relation between the society and the corporation of Derry should be defined; if the corporation have a right to support, they should get it, 8172.—From the first it was considered that the corporation had a right to a fair sum for the support of the magistracy. In their first proceedings there was a certain district called the 1,500 acres allotted to the corporation. States full particulars as to the 1,500 acres. The corporation have no property now, 8173.—Thinks, if a certain payment in aid of corporate purposes were made by the society to the corporation of Derry, and the principles of the Acts which have passed with regard to tenants under the estates of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and with regard to Trinity College, were applied to the estates of the society, the inhabitants of Londonderry and its neighbourhood would be satisfied, 8174–5.—Thinks the present constitution of the society most objectionable, but is not prepared to suggest any mode of improving it, 8176–8185.

FERGUSON, Sir ROBERT ALEXANDER, Bart., M.P. (Second Examination.)—He did not say that the Irish Society had no right to build farm houses, but that they would have no funds to do so if they looked first to discharge the duties of their trust. Reads extracts from the answer of Alderman Thorpe, governor, and Henry Schultes, secretary to the Irish Society, in the suit of the Skinners Company. Mr. John Claudius Beresford, in the same cause states, that if the recommendation of Alderman Alsop had not been adopted, the city of Derry would have gone to decay. Also that the common building lease now granted for the City of Dublin is for 999 years, which leases were not considered advantageous by all the tenants, from the first condition in the letter from the Irish Society of 30th August 1766. In the town of Coleraine, the ancestor of Lord Waterford wished not to take these renewable leases, but, having done so, the society compelled him to continue them. With regard to the conversion of these leases into fee farm grants, submits extracts from the judgment of the master of the rolls in Ireland, 8514.

FINANCE COMMITTEE. (See Committee.)

FINLAY, MR. JOHN. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a liveryman of the blacksmiths company. Has had a residence in Fenchurch Street upwards of 40 years. Is a tailor and draper, 4270–4272.—Has taken an active part both in the election of aldermen and common councilmen; has also attended the election of sheriffs, and has attended Common Hall. Is a guardian of the City of London Union. Has been serving on a committee for some time in which the City of London School is mixed up with St. Saviour's and several of the out-parishes of which there is great reason to complain. Was a mover of a certain resolution at the Common Hall, whereby there was a committee formed of the livery companies, who successfully opposed the attempt on the privileges of the livery of London, 4273.—Refers to a bill brought into Parliament one or two sessions ago. Has some observations to make to show the nature of the connexion between the livery companies and the Irish Society; has some complaints to make, 4274.—The Irish Society are trustees for the City of London, and they have not fulfilled their trust, 4275.—The property of the Irish Society belongs to the livery companies, 4276.—It has been disputed so far as this, that they absorb all the money. Has the accounts sent to the blacksmiths' company yearly from the Irish Society in which there is generally a small balance, but the larger amount is absorbed either in visiting Ireland or dinners, 4277.— The property managed by the Irish Society belongs to the companies, yet no large income accrues. The evil arises in this way, there are persons upon this trust who have no interest in it. This society was formed exclusively of members of the livery companies. At that time it was arranged they should be taken from the twelve companies. Afterwards it was extended, and it was said that they should be taken from the livery companies; but of late, since the alteration in 1837, many persons are on that committee who are not liverymen, and consequently have no interest in the Irish Society, 4278, 4279.—Does not think it is necessary to take the management of the Irish Society entirely out of the hands of the corporation, but thinks if the original intentions were carried out that would be all that is necessary, 4280. —As to what was the original state of things, witness reads a report of the common council showing that the Irish Society were trustees for the 12 companies, 4281.—It has been disputed whether they are trustees of the 12 companies. They only send a printed paper containing an account. The society goes over annually and makes a pleasure trip at the expense of the twelve companies, 4282.—Witness would exclude from the Irish Society all who are not members of the companies, 4284.—Would make no other alteration, 4285.—Complains of the union which is formed between the schools in the City of London Poor Law Union, and certain other unions of parishes. Is chairman of a committee who have been in communication with the Poor Law Commissioners for some months. The City is taxed for the benefit of the out-parishes in that particular, 4286.—A committee was formed to oppose a certain bill in Parliament, in March 1852. Finds from the minutes there have been many such committees formed in Common Hall. The town clerk had no power to summon the committee. At last witness applied to the mercers' company, and they very liberally took the matter up, 4287.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENTS:

There are many complaints in the Lord Mayor's court with reference to, Acland, 456.—It is almost necessary in a large commercial city, Merewether, 4848. —The peculiarity of the custom of foreign attachment is, that it gives a remedy against the debtor of the defendant; approves the custom, ib. 4861–4869.—Approves the custom, and gives opinions thereon, Gurney, 5750–5764.—It is a custom peculiar to the City of London, and one or two other cities. Believes, from experience, that it would be a very valuable custom to extend to all commercial communities. Knows of no injurious effects it could produce in country districts, Wortley, 6586–6488.—There is a difficulty about the attachment of goods; states difficulties, ib. 6490.—New rule with regard to attachments; has considered the question whether it is consistent with the custom, and hopes it is so, ib. 6493.—The nature of foreign trade has altered, but nothing seems so just and equitable as taking the property of a debtor to satisfy his debt, if found within the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction being answerable for the due execution of the law Merewether, 4857–4859.

FORTY-FEET WAY:

After the fire of London there was a clause introduced into an Act of Parliament which required that a passage of 40 feet should be continued from the Temple to London Bridge. There was a complaint made against the corporation that they had not maintained that 40 feet way. City's opposition to Mr. Calvert's application to repeal that clause, Merewether, 5357.

FRANCHISE:

The bill proposed in 1851 would have had a double operation upon the livery with respect to the franchise; it would have admitted freemen, not liverymen, to vote at common hall elections, and it would have disfranchised liverymen who were not occupiers, Merewether, 5096.—No alteration of the municipal franchise would affect the parliamentary franchise, ib. 5104.

Bishopsgate Within. Many influential commercial houses in the ward of Bishopsgate Within have no vote for common councilmen, aldermen, nor at common hall; therefore desires the extension of the franchise, Jones, 7798.

FRANCHISE, MUNICIPAL. (See Municipal.)

FRANKS, GEORGE, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a citizen and solicitor of Derry, 8127.—States that it was under a very unconstitutional coercion on the part of the society, that the arrangement was made for their paying 1,200*l.* a year to the corporate body of Derry. Enters into particulars, 8128–8131.—Formerly the Irish Society interfered with the citizens of Derry in the election of their members of Parliament, and recently they interfered in the appointment of a recorder, 8132.—Believes that now they do not interfere with Derry in any manner. Cannot agree with what has been said of the liberality of the society in regard to the renewal of leases. States two or three instances of their illiberality, 8134.—Would remove the power of interfering in the appointment of officers of the corporation of Derry from the society, and oblige them to give a permanent fund for the support and good government of the City. Thinks especially that they should put the recorder in such a position as to be independent of any influence whatever, 8135.—Would have all payments made by the society towards the salaries of the municipal officers obligatory, not optional, that all suspicion of partiality be removed from the officers, 8136.—If the Irish Society are not bound by the charter to pay the officers of Derry, the citizens should make some rate to do it themselves. With regard to renewable leases, witness suggests that if the society has not the power to alter the obsolete covenants he alluded to in his statement, they ought to apply to the Legislature to authorize them to do so. There should be a power similar to that already alluded to in the Ecclesiastical Temporalities Act, 8137.—If all the town property of the society were sold, it would do more good than any system of management, and have a great effect upon the prosperity of the town. Speaks from experience, having seen the effects of the Encumbered Estates Act, 8138, 8139.

FREEDOM:

Recommends that it should be granted as a right, not a privilege, Dillon, 660.—Sees no advantage whatever in maintaining a connexion between the freedom of the companies and the freedom of the City, ib. 663.—Was frightened into taking it up by a lawyer's letter, and paid 12*l.* 10*s.*, Hyde, 1499.—The amount derived from freedom has fallen off, Scott, 4595.—The object of proceeding against persons to compel them to take up their freedom was not with a view to raise money, but to increase the constituency, Merewether, 5089.—In the year 1844 a very elaborate inquiry was made into the entries in the corporation books with reference to freedom. In page 74 of this document, a minute account is given of the fees which were then payable, which, when contrasted with the reduced fees which are now payable, will point out the gradual reduction of them, ib. 5226.—The fines remitted when the freedom is taken up, Pearson, 5629.—Complains of the power which is entrusted to the corporation to prosecute a small tradesman, a retail dealer, in the manner they have done, for not taking up his freedom, Gentry, 6704.—Mr. Acland gives a table of fines for admission to freedom, showing that to 1834, when the fines were about 30*l.*, there were 1,000 persons annually admitted, and that after the reduction was made the admissions gradually decreased, and imputes

the cause to a reluctance to associate with the class of persons who constituted the corporation. Witness thinks the Reform Act of 1834 removed a great temptation to persons to take up their freedom, Blake, 7483.—Does not agree with Mr. Bennoch in question 1156, but thinks that obliging dealers to take up their freedom was done simply to increase the constituency, De Jersey, 7546.

FREEMEN:

Until the year 1835 the freemen were necessarily all members of a company, subsequently the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council decided by an ordinance, that a person might acquire his freedom without being primarily a member of any one of the guilds or liveries, Acland, 80.—A bill was brought into the House of Commons last session, to compel occupiers to take up their freedom; but the preamble not being proved, the bill was lost, ib. 95.—A freeman may not employ a non-freeman to the prejudice of a freeman, ib. 504–506.—One of the most important evils in the present system is, the mode of making freemen, Dillon, 659.—Produces a statement of the number of freemen from 1800 to the present time, Bennoch, 1159.—Freemen can elect members of common council, not being liverymen. Then again, persons who are freemen, and not on the parliamentary register, cannot vote for members of common council, —ib. 1247.—City obliged to employ them; could get work done cheaper by non-freemen, Williams, 2795.—Should have as many apprentices as they like, Pillow, 3035.—Cost of becoming a freeman, Lawrence, 4083.—The alteration of the rights of the freemen in 1835 was under the power of the before-mentioned charter, page 470 in Norton's book, Merewether, 4994.—The persons who vote in common hall are freemen, with the superadded qualification of being liverymen, ib. 5026.—The rules now followed by the corporation with respect to preventing persons exercising a retail trade in the City who are not freemen are byelaws; one passed in the reign of James I., and the other in the reign of Queen Anne. They are to this effect, that no person shall carry on trade within the City unless he is free, ib. 5175–5176.—Knows of nothing but that Act of the 11th of George I. to exclude a man who is not a liveryman, but a freeman of the City and of a company, from attending a common hall, called by the Lord Mayor, were he to insist on doing so, ib. 5353.—There have been about 679 freemen admitted each year for the last seven years; last year there were 883 in consequence of the large number of parties ordered to be summoned; these proceedings were instituted to enlarge the constituency, Sewell, 6250, 6251.

FREEMEN JOURNEYMEN:

The whole system of freemen journeymen should be abolished; it produces no advantage except to the man himself, Woodley, 3005.

FUNDS:

Particulars of those which the corporation have the management of, Williams, 2799.—Funds of the City are very small, not above 150,000*l.*, Wilson, 4400.—The different courts and committees have different powers of drawing out of the funds; the usual mode is by the signatures of seven members, Scott, 4452.

GAUGER:

Is a very useful officer, appointed by the City for the purpose of general reference by merchants with respect to wines and oils, Kearns, 2324.

GENERAL PURPOSES COMMITTEE. (See Committees.)

GENTRY, Mr. HENRY. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Complains of the power which is entrusted to the corporation to prosecute a small tradesman, a retail dealer, in the manner they have done, for not taking up his freedom, 6704, 6705.—Has had his goods taken from him; was summoned; appeared before the chamberlain, and stated his case; put in his plea, and the reason of his objection to take up his freedom. This was in the former part of 1853, 6706–6709.—Told the chamberlain he had been a severe sufferer, and stated the circumstances; upon which the chamberlain said "Two months, Mr. Gentry," 6710, 6711.—At the end of the two months an action was brought against him, 6713.—Was a retail trader within the City, who had not taken out his freedom, 6714.—Understood they had tried the question with the rich men, and lost the action,

6715, 6716.—Witness was proceeded against; they took about 25*l.* worth of goods, and detained them a month, then they were sent to a common councilman to be sold, 6717.—Supposes it was done under the direction of the City solicitor. Did not know the amount of the demand; was told it was between 8*l.* and 10*l.*, 6718—Does not know what the goods realised; they sold three lots out of four, 6719.—Saw Mr. Pearson a couple of months ago; till then had never seen any sort of document respecting the sale. Thinks it was between 13*l.* and 14*l.*, 6720.—Does not remember the exact amount claimed from him, 6721.—Was summoned again with many others after that, before they had rendered any account of the sale. Appeared before the City solicitor, who was at that time officiating for the late chamberlain, who was then ill. Stated the circumstances of the case. The solicitor said he would forego the costs, and if witness would agree to take up his freedom, most likely they (does not know who he meant) would give the penalty back, 6722.—There was about 20*l.* value they did not return, and you can take up your freedom for 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, 6723, 6724.—So that to enforce the claim of 6*l.* was put to the cost of 20*l.* Makes some remarks upon the report framed by the corporation, and states further particulars of his case, 6725, 6726.

GEORGE, Mr. CLEMENT; D'IFFANGER, Mr. THOMAS; and HODGES, Mr. EDWARD. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. George.) Appears as one of a Committee from the Marylebone Vestry, to lay before the Commission the resolution passed there, relative to the coal duties and the tax on carts, 2273.—The inhabitants of Marylebone complain of this tax, which is computed at 22,000*l.* per annum, being placed upon them without having any share in the representation of the body which imposes this tax, or receiving any equivalent for it. Witness here enters into particulars of complaints, 2274.—There is a 4*d.* rate and a 1*d.* rate amounting to 5*d.*, which the City of London have had from ancient times. Thinks that ought to be abolished. An 8*d.* rate was conceded during the time of the Duke of Wellington's administration for the approaches of London Bridge. Believes the money raised by the City was discharged in the year 1852, and the amount anticipated by Act of Parliament will have been paid off in 1856. It is in order that no further extension of the coal duty shall be imposed, that they apply to the Commissioners, 2275.—At present that part of the proceeds of the coal tax which is appropriated to the general improvement of the metropolis, is distributed by the Board of Woods and Works, but no part of that has been expended on the parish of Marylebone, 2276.—The improvements in New Oxford Street have brought over the thoroughfares of Marylebone a large railway traffic, which costs them thousands per annum to provide for it. It has also drawn the whole of the poor in their low localities, and by it increased their poor rate considerably, 2277.—The best plan to be pursued would be to allow those coal duties to expire and not renew them. A general improvement rate, combined with representation at the Board would be a very proper course. In Marylebone they are desirous of having a voice in all local taxation, 2278, 2279.—Thinks no persons so well qualified to execute the public improvements in London as those who reside in the district, 2280.—The amount raised by the coal duties would easily be raised by a rate, 2281.—If the improvement to be made appears to be of a metropolitan nature, he would then levy a rate upon the whole of the metropolis, but if it is a local improvement he would confine the tax to the neighbourhood itself. Calls attention to the tax upon carts going into the City of London. It appears by the returns of the City to be but a small sum, 5,000*l.* or 6,000*l.* a year, but no doubt as it is farmed it amounts to considerably more. It has been the policy of the Road Trusts, the Metropolitan Trusts especially, to extend the ambit of turnpikes; yet the City of London, pursuing a contrary policy, maintain the system of tolls. A person going into the City for a carpet has to pay for the pattern of the carpet he takes with him and for the carpet he brings back. The men collect the tax with great avidity. Thinks that the tax also stands in the way of the City markets, 2282.—Admits that they have the right, but it ought to be put an end to, 2283.—Has no more remarks to make on the tax upon coals, or carts, but wishes to make one or two remarks upon the subject of municipalities. Is one of the elected Vestry.

They are under Hobhouse's Act; and also special Acts giving them the control over the churches they build, and over the poor, and over the pavements, 2284, 2285.—For certain purposes there should be a central board. The less it has the name which has hitherto existed the better. In their own vestry, there are men of high position who are eager to get elected as vestrymen who would not like to be called common councilmen or aldermen. The qualification of vestrymen is to be rated to the amount of 40*l.* to the poor, 2286.—(D'Iffanger, Mr. Thomas.) Marylebone has never applied to be incor-porated, in consequence of the expense, 2287, 2288.—The parish wishes that Marylebone itself should form a municipality. It would be desirable that Marylebone, St. Pancras, and Paddington should form separate municipalities, 2289.—Marylebone is larger in point of population than the City of London, and as it is so extensive, and there is so soon to be a New Reform Bill, if those three parishes could form municipalities, it is more than probable that the Government might concede a member to each, 2290.—If the whole of the parliamentary borough of Marylebone were incorporated under the Municipal Act, the area would be too extensive. The borough extends from Highgate as far as Kensington, 2291.—Thinks there are more people than in Liverpool or Manchester, 2292.—The population of that area would be too large for that municipality. The present officers find they have quite sufficient to do to regulate the affairs of Marylebone parish, and it would cause great confusion should it be incorporated; in fact it would not be a benefit if the borough were incorporated into a municipality; it would be a great boon if there were three municipalities. Thinks the existing parochial government and the parochial feeling would resist it, 2293, 2294.—They would prefer municipal government, 2295.—Even if they desired to be formed into one corporation, but they have never formally applied, the expense and difficulty have been so great, 2296, 2297.—Is not prepared to say how the application can be made, 2298.—Supposing London were parcelled out into municipalities, each one having its separate council, it would be possible to have a combined council for the whole of the metropolis, which should embody the representative principle, and have powers of taxation for general metropolitan purposes. Such a plan would be very acceptable to the parish of Marylebone. The principle there is that there should always be representation wherever there is taxation, 2299, 2300.—(Mr. George.) Believes the parish of Marylebone has never applied to be incorporated. Considers that the establishment of any municipality in the parish of Marylebone would take from them the amount of power they now possess. Is against incorporating Marylebone, but would rather take the good example of the working of Hobhouse's Act with our local Acts, and compulsorily apply it to all sections of the metropolis, and from the elected vestry select so many persons to the central board, which might be the corporation of London, if you pleased so to call it; then when they meet let them elect their president or head, calling him mayor, or president, or what they like. This plan would involve a separate municipal government for each parish, 2301, 2302.—The plan would work well even in a small parish. Take the small parishes comprised in the Strand Union; you there cluster certain small parishes together for the purpose of electing poor-law guardians. Do the same with those and other small parishes for municipal purposes, 2303.—Has no objection to combining the three parishes of the present parliamentary borough of Marylebone into a single municipality beyond this, that in the arrangement of a municipality you would take from them the privileges they already enjoy and give them to the central board, 2304.—Marylebone would be gainers by the general provisions of the Municipal Act, because every important improvement is by that Act vested in them, 2305.—The only objection witness can see to it is this, that in a cluster of parishes or boroughs, all merging into each other, there must be some of those matters taken from the locality and made central; for example, sewers, police and general improvements. The metropolis might be fairly represented by one central board, which should be the concentrated essence of all the vestries of municipalities round London, though it is witness's individual opinion that the parish of Marylebone would object, 2306, 2307.—Thinks there would be a strong parochial feeling against the combination or the three parishes under one municipal government; as they have hitherto been separate, their interests seem so little in common. States other reasons, 2308.—(Hodges, Mr. Edward). Thinks from what he has noticed, having had a great deal to do with public meetings, and the expression of public opinion in the parish of St. Pancras, and something, though to a less degree, in Paddington, that they would prefer a municipality which would include the whole of the three parishes, for this reason, that the same staff of officers and the same machinery could be used for the whole of the municipality, 2308.

Gibbs, Mr. Henry Stephen; Alston, Mr. David Thomas; Wickenden, Mr. James; and Bennett, Mr. Benjamin. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. Gibbs.) Appears before the Commissioners as one of the proprietors of the oyster grounds at Queenborough, and also as a member of a deputation of oyster companies and proprietors generally, 2222.—Alludes to companies in Essex and Kent; they are nine in number. Some of the oyster fishery grounds are managed by proprietors only, others are managed by companies, 2223.—The deputation witness represents, has been agreed to on the part of all those companies, seven of which are in Kent, 2224.—They have repeatedly met, but more particularly within the last week, to consider the question which they are desirous to lay before the Commissioners, 2225.—The permanent body only meet upon special occasions, when called together for any particular purpose, 2226.—The other gentlemen are members of the same deputation, 2227.—The trade in oysters carried on in the City of London is most extensive; is desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners to the abuses in the metage, porterage, and City dues. There are upwards of 50,000*l.* laid out annually between the parties whom witness and the other gentlemen represent, 2228.—The purchasing season may last from two to three months in the year only, 2229.—That is the extent of the trade to the City of London. There are other parties who receive a large number of oysters which are called rail-borne. That oyster trade is carried on by very enterprising men in the locality of Billingsgate, and they are wholly exempt from the taxes alluded to, 2230.—Such is not the case with those fish they represent, which are called water-borne oysters, 2231.—They, the companies only, generally send their oysters by water, but in the event of a fog, or anything which prevents vessels from sailing, then some of them avail themselves of the rail; but that is very seldom, 2232.—The principal subjects to which witness wishes to call attention are the meters, then the porterage and City dues. Mr. Alston sends up to Billingsgate, probably, every year to the extent of from 35,000 to 40,000 bushels of oysters. A tax is levied upon those oysters, to the amount of from 1*s.* 2*d.* to 1*s.* 3*d.* per bushel, 2233.—(Alston, Mr. D. T.) The amount of all the City dues levied upon witness's trade, is about 800*l.* a year for meterage only. Adding the porterage and the other City dues, it would amount to considerably more. The article is taxed, but the porterage is paid by those who buy. If the oysters come up by land there is nothing to pay, 2234, 2235.—It suits better to bring oysters by sea as the vessels are warehouses for them, 2236.—The City metage is not any advantage to an oyster trader, 2237.—The oysters must be measured to be sold on board. One of the principal grievances is, that the article is measured by people over whom they have no control; and not only pay heavily for having that work done but the public come in and pay as well; therefore the men who measure the oysters have it in their power to do injustice, because they receive money from the public, when, in point of law, the public have no right to pay at all, 2238.—Everything is done by the City measurement, 2239.—It would be necessary under any circumstances that the oysters should be measured before they are sold to the public, 2240.—According to the law laid down by Baron Alderson, the meters are to do the work for 8*s.* a score for the first 100 bushels; afterwards at the rate of 4*s.*; if they do not do it themselves, they hire people to do it. If the public pay them as well, it is to be considered not only as a gratuity, but a double tax, 2241.—It would be considerably too large if the whole payment were what the oyster traders pay to the City officers, 2242.—(Mr. Gibbs.) If they were left to themselves, and there were no interference on the part of the City, they would then have a control over their own servants and measure their own property. Should take care that the measure so employed were legalized by the City, and that their own men did the duty of measuring and shovelling. The work could be done more cheaply and equally conveniently, 2243-2245.—(Mr. Alston.) States the amount he calculates he pays for metage 800*l.* a year; but for the trade 3,000*l.*, 2246.—Thinks he could get his oysters measured by his own servants for half the money it now costs him, 2247.—Besides paying about 800*l.* to meters, then comes the porterage upon the article, 2248.—If he has oysters up by the railway he can go and place them in Billingsgate Market for sale without any porterage, metage, or anything of the kind. If he sends a bushel out of his boat to be sold at the same place in the market, it costs 5*d.* a bushel for metage, then 4*d.* for having them measured, and then it costs 6*d.* to take them up into the market by means of porters again, 2249.—Oyster merchants pay the meters 8*s.* a score on the first 100 bushels delivered upon each voyage to market, afterwards 4*s.* per score. The meters put men down the hold whom they ought to pay themselves, to measure the oysters, but they manage to get the public to pay them. Some of them get more than 4*d.* a bushel, 2250.—Metage is a nominal measurement, no service at all. The measurement is done by fellowship porters appointed by the deputy meters, 2251, 2252.—(Mr. Gibbs.) The oysters are sold in the boats afloat, 2253, 2254.—(Mr. Alston.) Many of the poor people who come down would do the porterage themselves if allowed to do so, 2256.—(Mr. Gibbs.) Proposes that the oysters should be measured by the seller's own servant. The buyer is present at the same time, and the deputy meter who it has been stated was appointed by the City, that he might do justice to both parties, is not there. They send their servants, who are very independent about the measures one way or the other; when they go down in the hold, they go there without any charge to the meters, who have the exclusive right of saddling the proprietors of the oysters with 4*d.* a bushel, or 8*s.* a score. The men so employed in the hold are desirous to receive their 4*d.* per bushel also; that they consider is a sufficient compensation, and it frequently occurs that they will receive more than that, for the express purpose of giving an excess of measure; therefore, if they receive an excess of 1*d.* upon the peck, or 2*d.*, which is frequently the case, the proprietors lose, as a matter of certainty, from three pennyworth to six pennyworth of oysters, 2258.—Is not aware that any of these meters stand between the buyer and seller in any other large town, 2259.—Has no doubt a remedy could be provided securing to the public justice in the shape it desires. Oysters are generally sold in pecks of four to the bushel, 2260.—The large buyers of oysters would immediately detect anything wrong in point of measurement, 2261.—It frequently occurs, that the persons who actually measure the oysters, being the servants of the City deputy-meters, cheat the sellers, being bribed by the purchasers to give over measurement, 2262.—The men who measure have no right to receive anything from the buyer, but they do receive a douceur, and they are induced by that to give a false measurement in his favour, 2263, 2264.—Witness also calls attention to the tax of 2*s.* for each fishing vessel which comes up to Billingsgate. It is levied by the Marine Society, which has an office in Bishopsgate Street, 2266.—The corporation have nothing to do with it, but it increases the expense of those vessels, and it compels the party who engages them for the purpose of conducting or bringing up his oysters, to pay a larger freight, 2267.—The Marine Society is a society for bringing up lads for the Mercantile or the Naval Service, 2268.—Cannot understand what authority they have for levying that tax. Calls attention to the large sums of money which have been and are annually expended by the various oyster companies. They do not stop at 50,000*l.*, that is only the expenditure during the oyster season for purchasing. After that comes an expenditure of double that amount distributed among various persons connected with the water in their different fisheries. The oyster fisheries alone have employed by those means and do employ from 10,000 to 15,000 persons annually, all of whom are brought up to the sea, and form by that means a nursery, which is beneficial to the nation, not only in the mercantile but in the naval department, to the extent before stated. Speaks from experience, being a seafaring person. They are some of the best sailors afloat, 2269.—The neighbourhood of Colchester, Burnham, Cheney Rock, Sheerness

Queenborough, Whitstable, Feversham, Rochester, and Milton, is the locality of the oyster fisheries. Has nothing to do with the arrangement of the stalls of Billingsgate. Adds that the corporation are desirous to remedy the evil complained of, but it appears at present they have no power to do so, 2270–2272.

GILTSPUR STREET COMPTER. (See Prisons.)

GOODEN, JAMES C., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is desirous of appearing before this Commission in connection with the conservancy of the Medway by the corporation of the City of London, 1327.—Is a yachtsman and sketcher, and hearing of vast devastations upon the land committed by the water, was induced to address Sir Francis Beaufort on the subject, who ordered a survey of the river between 1850 and 1851, the conclusions from which may possibly involve the future existence of Chatham Dockyard, 1328.—The City, as conservators of the Thames and Medway, have not maintained properly the embankments in either river, 1329, 1330.—Is not aware that they have ever applied any part of their funds to the embankment of the Medway, though it is clear they are under obligation to do so from the charge laid down by the common sergeant at Gravesend in 1616, as detailed in Stowe 1618. Is not a civil engineer, 1331–1334.—It is difficult to trace by whom the embankments were originally made. Edward III. owned embankment marshes, and in Dugdale it occurs that this district was governed by the law of Romney Marsh, which presupposes that there was embanked land, 1335.—About eighty acres of land in a single parish in Gravesend beach, have been lost since the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1336.—The Admiralty resurveyed the Medway in consequence of witnesses letters in 1850, therefore the Commission can obtain authentic information from them as to what occurred, 1337–1339.—The Medway now exists only as an archipelago of marsh islands, 1340.—Cannot suggest any measures which the City would now be likely to adopt. The case is hopeless. Came forward to show that they had neglected certain duties as to the embankment of the Thames and Medway, and that serious consequences are threatening the dockyard, 1340–1344.

GOODMAN, SAMUEL ROBERT, Esq.—(Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been principal clerk to the lord mayor since the year 1843. This office continues from one mayoralty to another, 6271–6273.—Witness here states the duties of his situation; is a sort of legal adviser to the lord mayor. Is not a solicitor, 6274–6278.—The salary attached to his office is 500*l.* a year, and 150*l.* in lieu of certain freedoms. Receives 50*l.* a year for copies of depositions. The whole income from the office is 700*l.* a year, 6279, 6280.—His whole time is now given to the duties of his office, business has increased so much, 6281, 6282.—The lord mayor takes the chair in the magisterial court at 12 o'clock. The court is kept open till the business of every applicant is attended to, but never closed before two, 6283–6285.—The court is always open; the lord mayor sits every day, unless other courts require his attention. There is another in Guildhall, and there are two petty sessional courts always open, 6286–6289.—In the absence of the lord mayor, another alderman attends, 6290.—Makes statement respecting the expenses of the court, in explanation of some charges which have been made against them. The gross amount of expenditure is 1,738*l.*, 6291–6293.—Does not know the expenses of the other court, 6294.—Witness was appointed by the Court of Aldermen. Presumes he holds office during good behaviour. It is not an annual appointment. Calls the attention of the Commissioners to the subject of the recovery of tithes in the City, 6295–6297.—Under the 37th of Henry the Eighth there was a tithe of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound upon the rental of the City parishes generally. It is made upon the average of the poor rate. It is very productive. The Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Henry the Eighth makes the tithe recoverable before the lord mayor as lord mayor. It says, any person not paying his tithe shall be imprisoned till he has agreed with the curate for his tithes. There is no limit to it by the Act of Parliament, 6298–6303.—The imprisonment has never been enforced since witness has been in office, 6304.—The order for payment has been effectual in producing the money or causing a settlement, 6305.—The tithe only remains now on eleven parishes; it is payable to the incumbent, 6306.—Those tithes are precisely similar to a poor rate, or a borough rate, or a police rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound. That is the operation, but it is not carried out in the same way, 6307.—There is a power of imprisonment without the power of distress, 6308.—The occupier, if he does not pay, is brought before the lord mayor, and if he thinks fit, he can commit him till the money is paid. The clergyman would no doubt be able to collect his tithes, if he had the ordinary power of distress, without any power of imprisonment. Apprehends that would be the proper mode of recovery, 6309–6311.—The question was brought before the Government in 1830. The corporation have no interest in the matter, 6312, 6313.—The lord mayor is called on to exercise a jurisdiction to which a reasonable objection may be made. It is a very unpleasant duty to him. The law does not obtain in other parts of England, 6314, 6315.

GOODMAN, SAMUEL ROBERT, Esq. (Second Examination.)—Wishes to make a remark upon a statement in No. 6696, that Mr. Alderman Wire sat on a case where his partner was solicitor and the prosecutor his client. The explanation is simply this. Mr. Alderman Hunter issued a warrant, and the prisoner was brought up from Devonshire in custody on the 5th of June. On that day Mr. Alderman Wire happened to be sitting. It was the last case, and, knowing he was connected with the company, endeavoured to get another alderman to sit, but could not do so. Suggested that sufficient evidence should be taken to justify a remand, himself beginning to examine the witness, when prisoner immediately put in a written confession of his guilt, which he had previously prepared. The case was remanded till the 7th, when Mr. Alderman Wilson sat, heard the evidence, and gave the prisoner the usual caution; he repeating the confession of his guilt, was committed by Alderman Wilson for trial, 7864.—Mr. Alderman Wire certainly did not interfere in the adjudication of the case further than to remand the prisoner, 7865, 7866.—Mr. Alderman Wire is the only alderman who is a practising attorney, 7868, 7869.

GORE, JOHN ZACHARIAH. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a sheriff's officer and sergeant-at-mace of the Lord Mayor's Court, 6938.—Was employed by Mr. Pearson to levy an execution upon the goods of Mr. Gentry, 6939.—Has been called upon to explain the circumstances to a committee of the Court of Common Council. Will read draft of statement, 6940.—The amount to be levied under the writ was 8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*, 6941.—Gives account of additional expenses, 6942.—A sufficient portion of Mr. Gentry's furniture was sold, and the rest returned, 6943.—There was no complaint of illness of his wife, she was attending to her domestic concerns at the time. Hands in scale of his charges in the Lord Mayor's Court, 6946.

GRAY (Mr.):

Some particulars respecting his claim for the estreats, Wire, 7954–7974.

GRAY, Mr. HENRY TRIMBEY. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a citizen and freeman of the Drapers' Company, 2913.—Was once engaged in a prosecution in which the City of London took some part, 2914.—States the facts. Witness prosecuted a gang of swindlers in 1847, their names being Gardner, Holliday, Seager and Loup, residing in Pancras-lane, and carrying on business in a fraudulent manner, having various counting-houses in different parts of the City. Among others was robbed of a portion of property, cordage for shipment, to the amount of 297*l.* At the commencement of the prosecution was given to understand that the cost of it would be merely nominal; that it would be under 25*l.* As witness proceeded with the case he found that it involved many other cases; there were 49 witnesses to be sent for on behalf of the prosecution to ensure a conviction; the prosecution involved the loss of his trade to a great extent, besides occupying time. The expenses were so much larger than were anticipated, that it was found necessary to open a public subscription. Messrs. Travers, Baron Rothschild, and others, gave subscriptions, and the corporation of the City gave 50*l.* in aid of the fund. The case was brought on for trial in December 1847 at the Old Bailey; succeeded in convicting three men; two escaped—Loup and Herman Casel, whose sureties were forfeited. The attorney's bill amounted to 352*l.*, the subscription amounted to 304*l.* There was a deficiency in means to pay the solicitors, independently of losing goods, time, and the private expenses it incurred. Was advised to pay the solicitor 250*l.* on account of his bill, leaving a balance of 102*l.* Petitioned the Lords of the Treasury on behalf of the estreats which had been forfeited from this Herman Casel's sureties. Received a communication from Mr. Reynolds, the purport of which was, that when the money was paid over there would be an order given in the Exchequer to receive the estreats of Herman Casel's sureties; made several applications, but finding the estreats were not paid into Her Majesty's Exchequer, inquired the addresses of those two sureties; found that they resided within the jurisdiction of the City of London; sent to the corporation of the City; on applying to them went with Mr. Barber to the office of the under-sheriff, Mr. Wire, to get his support in recovering the estreats, and assist in recovering the amount by a petition to the corporation. Mr. Wire at the outset promised his able assistance. In the course of the twelve months which elapsed witness went several times to the secretary's office, and then received a letter from Mr. Potter, saying that he had received the fines from Herman Casel's sureties, 100*l.* each; advising witness to petition through the City solicitor. Mr. Wire told witness, in the presence of his friend, who knew quite to the contrary, that the fines were not received, nor were paid into the secretary's office, and that they never would be paid; Mr. Wire must have known that the fines had been received. Witness then petitioned the City solicitor by the wish of Mr. Potter. Received no answer, and was then advised to make a public appeal to the Court of Common Council. The petition was presented by Mr. Norris ofAldersgate-street; when the petitioner came forward Mr. Lawrence was sheriff elect; and opposed the petition, on the ground that the money belonged to the sheriffs. Mr. Lawrence's motion was carried, that the money belonged to the sheriffs; afterwards the petition was presented in another form, giving them credit for 50*l.*, which they had voted to witness, and asking for 150*l.*, the balance of the amount which they had received. The court generally terminates soon after four o'clock, and this was brought forward just about that time by Mr. Taylor, and was overruled by the majority, there being only 20 persons present instead of 40. It was all lost, and there the affair terminated. Mr. Hilliary waited no longer for his bill; he put it into another attorney's hand to get taxed, and the balance of 102*l.* was brought down to 63*l.* Received a communication from him to attend the taxation of the bill; witness offered no obstacle, nor did he seek to resist the payment; this happened on Wednesday, and on Friday, witness on going home found an execution in his house from Mr. Hilliary's solicitor, who was Mr. Carroll, 2915.—There was no further notice given than to attend the taxing master, 2916.—Had arranged to settle it with Mr. Hilliary, by paying 20*l.* on the Monday and 10*l.* a month afterwards, but on Friday morning there was an execution in the house. Got the money together and paid 9*l.* 16*s.* costs. The 200*l.* has been received, and has been paid into the secondary's office and transferred to the corporation, and the corporation have entirely closed the doors against him, or any application of his for the purpose of recovering the money, 2917.—The money was paid by those sureties into the secondary's office, 2918.—It was paid to Mr. Potter, who received it from the under-sheriff on behalf of the corporation, 2919. Understands that estreats have been actually given to the sheriffs, and Alderman Lawrence said they should have to pay certain expenses at the Old Bailey if the sheriffs were deprived of their right to the fines and estreats, 2920.—It was never disputed by the corporation that they had received it, 2921.—Mr. Wire was the under-sheriff at the time, 2923.—During the time the prosecution was going on witness was offered the sum of 500*l.* to make a flaw in the indictment, so that the whole of the prisoners might be acquitted. Rejected that offer. After the trial was over wrote to the City solicitor, asking the aid of the corporation to assist in prosecuting Herman Casel, should he be apprehended. Was offered 250 sovereigns to give up the judge's warrant, to allow Herman Casel to come to England. The offer was made by agents of theirs in the presence of a respectable gentleman, a Mr. Dearsley, of Billingsgate, a fish salesman. Rejected the offer, as every other bribe and temptation which has been offered. Had 500 copies of petition printed and have circulated them among the members of the common council, but have received no remuneration from the corporation except the first 50*l.*, 2924.—Claims it on the ground that it is a very hard case that he should have been put to this expense and been almost ruined, and they should refuse all assistance in the matter. It appears as if there was a certain party connected with the corporation who invariably carry the day. Mr. Sheriff Wire, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Deputy Harrison, and Mr. Hall invariably side together; had witness succeeded in getting their assistance he would have obtained his object. If any member of the common council would ask for an account of the estreats and amerciaments which are levied within the jurisdiction of the City for any definite period, it would throw great light upon the case and upon where the 200*l.* was paid. Has never heard of those estreats being accounted for by any inquiry, 2925.

GREENWICH PIER ACT:

Mr. Pemberton, in his evidence, No. 2992, on the Greenwich Pier Act, says a clause was inserted, "saving the rights of the Crown," instead of "any rights of the Crown," which merely implies a reservation in case there should be any, Tyrrell, 7253.

GRESHAM COLLEGE:

The lectures are not largely attended, except those on music and astronomy; the lecturers are persons of known character and reputation, Merewether, 6740.—History of, Bennoch, 7269.—Endeavours to show what has been the state of the college, and the conduct of the professors since its foundation. Gives his account up to the year 1755. Thirteen years after, in 1768, the college was sold. Continues the history of the college to the present time. Ventures to suggest whether, under the late Charitable Trusts Act, the trustees, if anxious to make their lectures more in accordance with the wants of the present day, might not apply to the Charity Commissioners for a scheme for the purpose of rendering the funds at their disposal more serviceable for public purposes, Waddilove, 7270–7272.—Particulars of the purchase by the Government, in 1768, of the land and property of Gresham College, for an annual rental of 500*l.*, Merewether, 7578.

Committee. Have refused to agree to the proposition submitted to them (by the committee for establishing a mercantile and maritime college in London), of raising on the Gresham College foundation "a mercantile and maritime college," which is so much wanted, instead of expending 1,200*l.* or 1,300*l.* per annum on lectures, which, with the exception of the music lecture, are hardly ever attended. Gives full particulars of the correspondence, Bennoch, 7269.

Estate. The nature of Sir Thomas Gresham's will is to give the property mentioned between the corporation and the Mercer's Company; they both appoint committees, who act sometimes together and sometimes separately. Under their care the Royal Exchange was rebuilt after the fire of London, and again after its destruction by fire in 1835. The City's moiety of the last rebuilding to the 31st December, 1846, was 84,267*l.* 3*s.*, Merewether, 5331–5337.—The land, which was the site of Sir Thomas Gresham's house, was sold a good many years ago to the Government; it was then converted into the excise office, ib. 6728.

Trust. Gives a statement of the receipts and expenditure of the City's moiety of Sir Thomas Gresham's estate for the year ending October 10, 1852. The City, acting as joint trustees, have from time to time advanced large sums of money above the amount received as trustees, Dakin, 7353.—The amount of charities under the Gresham trust is 284*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.* for almsmen, 55*l.* a payment to poor prisoners, ib. 7361.

GURNEY, RUSSELL, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Holds the office of judge of the Sheriff's Court. As judge of the Sheriff's Court presides at the Small Debts Court by Act of Parliament, 5730.—The appointment takes place by the common council, 5731.—Has held the office since 1850. Previously, from 1830 to 1845, held the office of common pleader; for the next five years was not connected in any way with the corporation, 5732.—Judge of the Sheriff's Court is an ancient office. When the Small Debts Court was created, it was provided that the judge of the Sheriff's Court should preside as judge of the Small Debts Court, 5733.—The salary is 1,200*l.* a year without anything additional, 5734, 5735.—Is not theoretically debarred from private practice, 5736.—Practises to some small extent, 5737.—Is required to attend in the Small Debts Court from two to three days a week. Is also in the Commission of the Central Criminal Court, and has to attend there occasionally, 5738.—Has to attend in the Central Criminal Court first of all for the opening of the court and the swearing of the jury, every day the judges are there. Has to keep the Third Court full; there is the recorder in one, the common sergeant in another, and, when the judges are not there, has to take the Third Court. Besides that, there has been an arrangement that each is away for one session; so that there are two sessions in the year when either the recorder or the common sergeant is absent, and then has to sit the whole session, 5739. —His time is pretty fully occupied with his different judicial duties, 5740.—Anciently there was the judge of the Sheriff's Court for the Poultry compter, and a judge of the Sheriff's Court for the Giltspur Street compter. Latterly, there has been only one person appointed to both offices, 5741.—With reference to the word "employment" used in the Act constituting the Small Debts Court in the City, there has been no complaint made as to the difficulty of finding out who has employment in the City. Every body has stated it to have been a great improvement. There were a great number of clerks in the City who obtained credit by virtue of their employment, but people could not find out where they lived, consequently there was a difficulty in serving them. The creditor knew where they were employed, and knew, therefore, what court would have the jurisdiction. The words used in the first Small Debts Act were supposed to include those cases, and parties were sued where the business of their employers was carried on. It was held that the words must refer to a man carrying on his own business, and not his master's business, 5742.—Last year there were between 10,000 and 11,000 plaints in the Small Debts Court. A great many of them were not tried, being settled the day before hearing, 5743.—Out of those there might be thirty cases in which there was a jury, 5744.—The jurisdiction extends to debts of 50*l.*, 5745.—Thinks the cases which come into this court are rather more important than those of other County Courts. In Liverpool and Manchester it might be the same, 5746.—There is a distinction in this court between debts under 20*l.* and debts under 50*l.*, with respect to the plaintiff being entitled to costs if he sues in a superior court, 5747.—A case can be stated in appeal if the amount is between 20*l.* and 50*l.*, 5748.—Practised for many years in the Lord Mayor's Court, and can give any information respecting it, 5749.—Thinks upon the whole the custom of foreign attachment is very beneficial, but that some alteration is necessary. In the custom of foreign attachment, there is a good deal of power placed in the hands of the attorney concerned for the plaintiff, and a good deal depends upon the mode in which his practice is conducted. Formerly, there were only a limited number of attorneys; their offices were of great value, and they were responsible to the Court of Aldermen for the way in which they exercised their duties; so that there was a great check upon their conduct, which, now that it is thrown open to the whole of the profession, there is not; and that may render necessary some precautions which were not found to be necessary previously, 5750.—Thinks it would be a good custom for the whole of the metropolis, and in large commercial towns where there is a local tribunal by which it can be enforced, 5751, 5752.—The practical effect of it is that it enables the plaintiff to get at money belonging to the defendant in the hands of a banker, and there are a great many occasions on which property can be obtained, where it is not in the hands of a banker, 5753, 5754.——Is decidedly in favour of the custom, 5756.—Thinks some alterations are required in the amount of bail which is required to be put in, in cases of foreign attachment; having no reference to the amount of the property attached, but only to the debt sought to be recovered; and in one or two other respects, which can be mentioned. There are, undoubtedly, some facilities for fraud, which ought to be corrected, 5757.—The amount of bail ought not to exceed the amount of property attached, 5758.—The effect of the custom is that the debtor's debtor is brought into court, 5759.—If he admits having the money, he suffers judgment by default and does not appear, 5760.—In case of disputes between him and the defendant, then he must come into court, 5761.—Thinks there is a hardship in the rule which provides that no costs shall be paid, and that the garnishee ought to be entitled to his costs; he never gets nor pays costs, 5762.—It has been held that if the garnishee admits the debt and pays the money, a recovery against him would be a protection to him in a dispute between him and the actual defendant, 5763.—Any party besides the defendant who claims the money attached, may come in by filing a bill of proof, 5764.

HALE, WARREN STORMES, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been connected with the corporation, and taken an active part in it for 28 years. Is a wholesale manufacturer of stearine and composite candles, and an importer of Indian produce. His business is in the City, but resides at Hampstead, 7496–7499.—Is at present on two committees by virtue of being deputy of the ward, and on two by an act of common council; those are the City of London school, and the orphan school, 7500.—The committees are so arranged by the corporation that there are seldom two sitting at the same time, 7501–7503.—Gives very frequent attendance, and invariably attends the meetings of the school committees, 7504, 7505.—Has been chairman of the City of London School Committee since its appointment in 1834, and of the orphan school since its appointment two years back, 7506.—The corporation have been left trustees for various bequests, and have faithfully discharged their duties, and have always taken great interest in the subject of education. In 1828 a member of the corporation, Mr. Peacock, endeavoured to convert a useless institution, called the London workhouse, into what promised to be practically useful. This institution was established in the reign of Charles II. for the reception of destitute persons frequenting the City; this continued till 1829, when the alteration in the poor law rendered it useless. For months there were no inmates, and an Act was obtained for the abolition of it. The gentleman above named endeavoured to obtain the proceeds of the lands for the establishment of a corporation school, of a liberal character, without religious distinction; but the House of Lords inserted a clause that the principles of the school should be according to the Church of England. The corporation subscribed 2,000*l.* towards it, but from its restrictive character few other persons subscribed, and it could not be sustained. In 1825 the corporation appeared before the commissioners under Lord Brougham's Act to inquire into the various charities of England, The sum of 19*l.* 10*s.* had been left by Mr. Carpenter, town clerk in the reign of Henry VI., to clothe, board, and educate four boys, 4*l.* for each boy, and 3*l.* 10*s.* to the corporation for the management of the fund. The will for the personal property has been found, but not the will devising the freehold property. There are four houses in the City, and ground at the eastern side of Tottenham Court Road, at a rental of about 900*l.* a year. The corporation, thinking that not sufficient of the money was expended, sent four boys to Tonbridge school, at 80*l.* per year for board and education, and 20*l.* for clothing. In 1832 was on the City Lands Committee, and the bills came before witness; suggested to the corporation that they ought to expend the whole of the proceeds of the property, and proposed to establish a school on the site of the Honey Lane Market. The corporation adopted the suggestion, and proposed to expend the whole of the 900*l.* a year to found some scholarships in memory of John Carpenter, and at the same time take the produce of the lands of the London workhouse, about 300*l.* a year, and make it a part of the endowment. The House of Lords opposed the appropriation of the 300*l.* The bill passed in 1834, appropriating the 900*l.* a year, and the school opened in 1837. The building was erected at an expense to the corporation of 20,000*l.*, independently of the ground. In consequence of omitting the 300*l.* a year, it had been lying useless till 1848. Suggested to the corporation that that money, with the fines for the sheriffs, and for parties taking up their freedom, which together would be about 1,000*l.* a year, might be applied towards a school for the orphan children of freemen. Was requested to furnish them with an estimate of the probable expenditure of such an institution. Calculated that for 100 children the sum of 2,500*l.* a year would be required, and the corporation agreed to furnish this additional sum out of their own funds. It was necessary to have a bill to repeal the Act of 1829. The bill passed the Houses of Parliament almost without opposition, and witness is chairman of the committee appointed to carry out the provisions of the Act. The expense of the building will be from 18,000*l.* to 19,000*l.*, when fit for occupation, to accommodate 70 boys and 30 girls. A portion of the number have been elected, and the schools will shortly open. Attendance at the Church of England not compulsory. Produces a copy of the rules and regulations, 7507, 7508.—The head masters of King's College, the City of London school, and the London University, were to select three of the best qualified candidates for the office of master of this school, and the one chosen happened to be a master in the City of London school. He will have a salary of 300*l.* a year, a residence, and some other benefits. In 1834, at the time of passing the Reform Bill, a gentlemen suggested it would be better to commemorate that event by erecting reform almshouses than by mere illumination. He made an appeal to the public, but they did not respond to it; the corporation subscribed 1,500*l.* to that object, and the projectors proceeded to purchase the ground, and erect 16 almshouses, with two sets of apartments in each, for 16 widows and 16 married couples. But it was found that merely giving shelter was not the benefit it was thought it would be, and they had no funds to carry the object further. The corporation then took it off their hands, repaired the cottages, and added 8 more, and allowed 25*l.* per year to each married couple, and 15*l.* to each widow, and two tons of coal to each party per year. It has entailed an expense of about 900*l.* or 1,000*l.* a year on the corporation, 7509.—The Corn, Coal, and Finance Committee has the appointments; and as it is composed of a member from each ward, they draw lots for priority, and then consult their own ward before appointing the party, who must have been a housekeeper of the City, and not less than 60 years of age 7510–7514.—The corporation have some ecclesiastical patronage; they are proprietors of the advowsons of St. Peter's, Cornhill, and St. James's, Duke's Place, and alternately St. Margaret Pattens, 7515, 7516.—The appointments are made by election by the common council. St. Margaret Pattens is worth about 300*l.* a year, St. James's, Duke's Place, about 60*l.* a year, but the corporation have increased it to 200*l.* a year out of their own funds. Mr. Brewer is publishing a work, which will show that the citizens of London have done more for the promotion of education than any other class of persons, 7517–7519.

HALES, EDWARD, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is engaged in the corn trade, carries on business in the Corn Exchange. Office in Bush Lane, Cannon Street, 1630, 1631.—Has been in business 25 years in London, does not reside in the City, 1632,1633.—Was a member of the committee appointed for the purpose of supporting a memorial presented to the lord mayor, aldermen and common councilmen of the City, on the subject of the charge for metage on corn, 1634.—The committee was appointed about 18 months ago by the corn trade, on account of the grievances they felt they were under, in paying a heavy charge for metage and porterage. Hands in a copy of the memorial, 1635.—The committee fairly represented the corn trade, and drew up their memorial for the purpose of calling the attention of the City and the corporation to their grievances, and asking them to relieve them, 1636.—They complain of the heavy charge for metage and porterage, and the way in which it is collected, 1637.—What they wish the City to do is to reduce the charge and to collect it in one uniform way; there are now twenty-five different modes of charge, 1638.—When the City received the memorial the committee received a communication from them inviting them to embody their views in a report, which report witness produces, 1639, 1640.—Witness then read the substance of the correspondence which took place between the corn dealers and the general purpose committee of the common council, 1641, 1642.—The trade in the port of London would be satisfied to have the supervision of the City corporation, provided they had it at a moderate cost, 1644.—The advantages of a proper supervision are, that with the immense trade now carried on in London in corn, some protection is required both for buyer and seller. The the certificate of a corporation standing so high as the City of London would be a great satisfaction to the public even if they had to pay something more for it, 1645.—Thinks it a great advantage to have the metage performed by some independent authority, 1646.—There are no less than twenty-five different charges made, 1647.—Produces a statement of the charges, 1648.—Thinks that the City authorities now are anxious to set the whole thing to rights, but such abuses have crept in under the old system that there are some persons who might be injured by any alteration. They therefore wish to keep the system as it is, 1649.—Thinks that the City are losers by the present system, 1650.—The meters in the City of London get three farthings for the work performed, and the City three farthings or more as a due, for doing nothing, 1651, 1652.—In the corn market there is a distinct item charged as dues besides fillage, porterage and metage, it belongs to the Corn Exchange. The charges of the fellowship porters were reduced about twelve months ago about a halfpenny a quarter, 1653, 1654.—The London Docks, the St. Katherine's Dock, and West India Docks reduced their charge in the same proportion about the same time, 1655.—The claim for metage and the claim for porterage do not rest upon the same legal ground. The fellowship porters have been thrown overboard lately by the City, and the City now say the trade can employ what men they like on the river; but if the corn is in the dock the dock companies prevent their employing their own men. Witness has a case now in the Commercial Docks: a claim was made of about 200*l.* which witness refused to pay, but told the fellowship porters the captain employed them—he did not; they then commenced an action against witness, but did not continue it, 1657.—The right of metage claimed by the City is unconnected with the boundaries, of the City, and much more extensive. Reads a report of a select committee appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the sale of corn. The report was in 1834, 1658, 1659.—The fellowship porters were appointed by an Act of the Corporation of London some two hundred years ago as stated in report, 1660.—Thinks the system with regard to the measurement of corn a very bad one all over the kingdom. With the exception of London there is no corn sold in any large town but by weight, and in most of them it is weight combined with measure. In almost every town the weight of the bushel varies, 1661.—As an individual, would prefer corn sold by weight and measure combined. It is the only true test, 1662.—The charge at Liverpool, for instance, is twopence per quarter for metage and porterage, and a halfpenny per quarter for weighing. The duty is performed by private individuals, and that they charge to the consignor. The cargo of corn is consigned to Liverpool, and the party receiving the consignment makes a charge for it, 1663.—The corporation should interfere in the matter in the port of London. Thinks it would be satisfactory to the trade, 1664.—All witness wants is security, high standing and respectability. A body which has been established so long as the corporation of London is the best they can have for the purpose, 1665.—Should have meters authenticated by some public body of credit, 1666.—Does not wish that the porterage should be connected with the City; it was stated in their report that the crew of the vessel should be called upon to do their portion of the work, otherwise the City could scarcely do the work so cheaply as put down, but witness has altered his opinion lately on thinking more of it. The most satisfactory way would be if the City would make a charge of a halfpenny or three farthings per quarter for employing one man who should be an educated, respectable and responsible man, who should supervise the metage, standing by and doing very little manual labour, and then let them provide the labour for doing the remainder of the work in the best way they can, 1667.—Thinks in short that the metage should be superintended by some public independent body, and the porterage left to private individuals, 1668.—The City's right is one which should be exercised rather for the accommodation of the public than as a means of raising a tax upon it. Does not think that the corn trade in London would object to pay the City a very liberal tax for the supervision of it, 1669.—It would not be necessary to have it twice measured by the City meters, namely, out of the ship and out of the granary. If you send for the City meters you must pay 2¾d. per quarter; you have it done by your own granary keeper for a penny per quarter, therefore the City meters are never sent for, 1671.—It is not compulsory upon any one to employ the City meters to measure corn out of the granary; with respect to some articles which come on board ship to London, such as linseed and corn in bags, the same plan is adopted as in the case of nuts, 1672.—Believes that the City have the right to meter all corn, 1673.—If English corn comes to London and is not sold, would advise the City to give the parties to whom it belongs the right of having it measured or not, as they would prefer; if sold would insist upon the right. This management would act very well if buyers and sellers chose to agree to it, 1674, 1675.—If public meters were provided by the corporation, even though the charge were higher than it ought to be, the trade would in 99 cases out of a hundred resort to them; here reads a letter from Mr. Stead, who was forty years established in the corn trade in Norfolk, 1676.—Would make the metage compulsory with regard to foreign corn, because the customs require that foreign corn should be metered by a sufficient authority, 1677.—The customs do not measure foreign corn; they take the meters bills in London, and supervise it in the outports, but it is wretchedly done, 1678.—The customs do not measure the corn which comes into the port of London. They trust to the City measure, 1679.—They take just the same trouble with regard to Indian corn, on which there is no duty, 1680.—During the last few years corn has been sold a great deal by weight. Believes that in time all corn will be sold by weight, 1681.—Thinks it best that it should be sold both by weight and measurement as it is sometimes, 1682.—Were the element of weight in the sale of corn introduced, it would be a very simple system, and would only entail the expense of another man, for which one halfpenny a quarter would be ample, 1683.—There is often a difference of 10 lbs. a bushel between good and bad wheat, 1684.—In landing large quantities of wheat it is impossible to sack it all, but as much is done so as can be, to avoid a second measurement; the City have taken a great deal of trouble in the matter latterly, Mr. Alderman Muggeridge has been giving a great deal of information in the matter. A Gloucester merchant said the other day that he hoped the metage charges would not be reduced, as it would interfere with the trade of Gloucester. Witness believes he said before that the customs exercised no supervision over the metage on board ships in the river, but the fact is, that they send an officer on board, 1685.

HALL, T. H., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the common council, and has been chairman of the Improvements Committee for some years, 7308, 7309.—The functions of that committee are the improvements in the City and the districts outside the metropolis, 7310, 7311.—Is a wholesale hat manufacturer. Has been chairman of the Improvements Committee for six years. Was for ten years a member of the London Bridge Approaches Committee, and on the retirement of Mr. Richard Lambert Jones was placed in the chair, 7312–7315.—This committee meets very constantly. They conduct the examinations of those who have claims upon them as if they were a jury, leaving the value of the freehold or leasehold property to their adviser Mr. Bunning, who tells them the amount they ought to pay. There is sure to be present some one who knows the neighbourhood, so that every claim is sifted to the utmost, 7316.—In the case of any great improvement the suggestion comes from the Improvements Committee, or by a petition from the locality; it is then discussed by the Court of Common Council, and if approved by them the scheme goes to Parliament for obtaining an Act. If the Act is obtained it is then referred to the committee to carry it out, and to treat with all the claimants under it, 7317–7321.—This committee has had to deal with claims to the amount of 1,200,000*l.*, which they have settled for a much smaller sum, 7322.—There may be an architect on the committee, but the corporation do not desire it; they wish all the members to be disinterested, 7323.—In matters of expediency the committee decide themselves, but if it is necessary the solicitor is asked if such an agreement is the same as a lease; the lease is then referred to a competent person to value, and in the large amount of settlements made by the committee scarcely a claim has been carried to a jury, 7324.—The general principle of the corporation is that the details of the executive business should be transacted by committees, and the officers should merely advise and carry into execution the decision of the committees. The committee report annually to the corporation the whole business they have transacted; and after having carried out the Act of Parliament thoroughly, report the result of it, that they may judge whether it has been carried out at the value originally fixed, giving the corporation an opportunity of testing that. The corporation are constantly devoting part of their property to improvements, and yet Mr. Bennoch in 1182 speaks of the corporation being goaded into improvements. In question 5265, Mr. Bunning is asked whether the improvements in Cannon Street will not considerably increase the value of the property belonging to the City. That question did not receive a sufficient answer. Says at once that they will not increase the value to the extent of one shilling. In reference to questions 5268, 5269, and 5270, begs to observe that where every street must be cut through at the expense of many thousand pounds, what improvements shall really be made must depend upon the means there are for making them. There is now a report before the corporation for continuing the new line of street to Earl Street, at an expense of 195,000*l.* If approved, means must be adopted for raising the money, and an Act of Parliament applied for. With respect to Clerkenwell, the old improvements commissioners, having expended the funds entrusted to them, besought the corporation to take it up, and as 50,000*l.* had been expended on a street which was of no use till the other was completed, the corporation took great trouble to carry out a work which was not within the City, and agreed to receive 88,000*l.* and to charge their own estate for three years longer with 11,500*l.* per annum, 7325.—This 11,500*l.* was given out of their general estate. The corporation have a prescriptive right to the 4*d.* duty on coals, which duty they have charged with the large improvement in Cannon Street, 7326, 7327.—Thinks it quite reasonable that, out of a fund like the 4*d.* coal duty, derived from payments made by the whole metropolis, the corporation should consider the interests of those out of the precincts of the City, and they are most ready to do so. Is authorized by the corporation to say that there is now a contemplated improvement for raising the valley of Holborn; the amount required is 333,000*l.* Does not know how so large a sum, and 125,000*l.* for another purpose, is to be raised. The corporation are ready to assist all in their power to carry out these great improvements. About four years back a fire took place at the back of Holborn Hill; the corporation immediately bought the property to prevent the houses being rebuilt. The corporation cannot let ground in Clerkenwell, along that line, till they have the Government's sanction to improve Holborn valley. Thinks the object must be met by the Government as well as the corporation. Mr. Bennoch in 2051, 2052, says "money is charged for lodging houses, and not a brick has been laid." The fact is, the money was charged for the purchase of freehold ground, not for the erection of houses. The improvements now pressed upon the corporation are Holborn Hill, Earl Street, and several others, involving an expenditure of about two millions for streets only. In addition to that, a large sum is wanted to widen London Bridge, and if the engineer cannot sustain Blackfriars Bridge, a larger expense will be required for a new bridge, 7328, 7329.—If there is a scheme of improvement fairly proposed it is always sent to a committee, who always refer to Mr. Bunning the City architect; the corporation decide which of the various schemes proposed shall be adopted, and determine whether they have the means of carrying it out, 7330–7334.—The corporation invariably refer every improvement to Mr. Bunning the City architect, who takes an enlarged view of the subject, and reports to the corporation, 7335, 7336.—The committee invariably say which plan of improvement ought to be done first. Thought he had explained that the plan must be brought before the corporation before they will refer it to committee; the committee then report what they think desirable, then the corporation decide whether they will adopt the report or take some other more desirable, 7337.—The corporation do not allow the committees to suggest to them; the larger body refers particular suggestions to the smaller, not the smaller to the larger. Observes that the Commissioners have examined several witnesses with respect to Southwark Bridge. The corporation are now taking means to obtain an account of what state the bridge is in, and then will come the question of the value. As it will involve a great outlay of money, they have looked at it before they undertake anything. In 4396, Mr. Edward Wilson is asked if "a gentleman who had not given his attention to such subjects could judge of the effects of an embankment of the River Thames?" No such question can arise in the Navigation Committee. The corporation have taken the best advice they could procure on the subject, that of Mr. Walker and Captain Bullock who have laid down a line which the committee have not power to deviate from, 7338.—With regard to the system of managing the conservancy of the river, there is scarcely an institution in the world which is not susceptible of some improvement, but must decidedly negative the opinion that the committee are incompetent to perform their duties, 7339–7340.—The present body are independent, they give their decisions firmly, and believes they would be generally sanctioned; as Mr. Norris said, if anything would be injurious it would be to have private interests on the committee. Mr. Clement George says the corporation have a 4*d.* and a 1*d.* rate. That is a mistake, the 1*d.* rate was given up. Admits that in Marylebone much improvement has not been carried out, but that rests with the Government. The corporation are not answerable for that. Mr. George says the corporation are an irresponsible body; it is not right to say this of a body which is elected annually. The city pay 9*d.* towards metropolitan improvements, beyond their own 4*d.* Thinks the Commissioners must see that the City has not been injured by the corporation. It is rising in character to a great extent; its business is becoming almost wholly wholesale. Was on the committee nominated in 1834 at the suggestion of Mr. Williams. Can that body be bad which granted to a gentleman known to be a reformer a committee which he says was all it ought to be? He speaks of the mansion house as the corporation's great feasting house. The corporation no more feast at the mansion house than the House of Commons at the speaker's. In 2819 he says the 8*d.* duty is expended in City improvements; this is not the fact, an enormous sum has been paid over to the Board of Works. Mr. Travers is asked if he knows the ordinary business of the common council? He says he does not. He is in the Court of the Fishmongers Company. Believes they have in a small way some of the duties the corporation have in a large one; they manage the small debts, but believes they have some pay for it. Mr. Hankey called your attention to the question of London Bridge. The corporation have not the means of doing what they wish. In 954, 955, 957, Mr. Pulling says, the City officers are too numerous. He himself is a victim to the desire of the corporation to decrease the number. He was a candidate for the office of pleader, but the office has not been filled up. Mr. Bennoch says, the committees desire to take the most inefficient of their body for their chairman. To show that the corporation do not act as Mr. Bennoch says, witness was one who joined in the report to the corporation in 1835 for a reduction in the allowance to committees, and though he reduced the allowance of the Committee for General Purposes from 500*l.* to 200*l.* he was unanimously elected to the chair two months after, 7341.—The corporation have resolved that a certain amount should be continued to each committee to secure the attendance of the members. Thinks it quite right that some allowance should be made to committees, as most of the common councilmen live out of town, and where are they to get their dinners, 7343, 7344. —This allowance is given for needful refreshment, and has sometimes not been given till the business has continued to so late an hour as to require it, 7345 —Thinks that if there was a comfortable place, as there is at the House of Commons, to which gentlemen could withdraw a few at a time, coming back again to business, they would not require a dinner after. In 2029 Mr. Bennoch says, "so general has the tendency become to elect relatives of the members of common council, that it is now one of the byelaws of the court, that the son of common councilmen shall not be eligible so long as his father continues in the corporation." Witness brought forward that motion, and at that time Mr. Bennoch said, "the motion was nothing but a censure upon the court, and he did not see why, if the son was more competent to perform the duties of the office than any other person, he should be shut out from the chance of election." Mr. Bennoch was the gentleman who opposed the motion of which he now expresses his approbation, 7346.

HANKEY, THOMSON, jun., Esquire. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is a merchant of the City of London, 1686. —Last year filled the office of governor of the Bank of England, 1687.—Has been a merchant upwards of twenty-five years, 1688.—Occasionally sleeps, but has never regularly resided in the City, 1689.—Has never been connected with the corporation of London, nor have any of his partners, 1690, 1691.—There are scarcely any of the leading merchants who take any part in the corporation. Thinks it is because the merchants have withdrawn their residences from the City, and because the duties which attach to members of the corporation are so onerous, 1692, 1693.—It is very undesirable that the merchants as a body should have no voice and take no part whatever in the corporate affairs of a town in which they carry on their business, 1694.—Does not think the merchants would consent to take any part in the corporation while it is conducted as it is at present, 1695.—Does not think the great merchants in the City take any part in the parish business of the City, 1696.—They are unwilling to give up their time, and they admit that as an excuse for not attending to duties which they would feel themselves bound to attend to if it were made a matter of emulation and pride on the part of those on whom such duty should devolve, 1697.—In order to induce the merchants to become connected with the corporation certain duties which are now imposed upon members should be taken from them. Alludes to magisterial duties and a great many of the ceremonies, 1698.—Refers to the description of pageantry which surrounds the great offices of the City, 1699.—The duties of hospitality which are exercised by the lord mayor might be discharged less ostentatiously, 1700. —These duties as exercised by the present lord mayor are by no means undesirable, but the annual entertainment at Guildhall is a very useless expense, 1701.—The object of bringing the members of Government in communication with the City of London would be better attained at the Mansion House than at Guildhall, 1702.—Could never hear a single word of the speeches at the Guildhall, although he always had a seat of honour, 1703.—Thinks there is no interest taken in the lord mayor's show, except by idlers and children, 1704.—The tradesmen consider it an annoyance, 1705.—The lord mayor ought to move about in a carriage of sufficient state to show his importance, but as at present it makes him ridiculous, 1706.—It is every year more ridiculous, 1707.—The only thing that calls to mind former times is the coach; the attendants and allegories are got up from Astley's, 1708.—It is no longer like the processions of the middle ages, 1709.—It would be more absurd if the lord mayor were left out, it would be a procession without a meaning, 1710.—The chief magistrate ought to exercise splendid hospitality, 1711.— The entertainments given by the mayor of Liverpool are conducted in a much quieter manner, which ensures respect and esteem by the corporation, 1712.— It is the habit of the mayor to entertain distinguished visitors, who go to Liverpool, publicly, 1713.—At the dinner at Guildhall the body of the hall is filled with common councilmen and their families, 1714.—It is merely an opportunity of giving a certain number of people a dinner, 1715.—The corporation might be framed so that the merchants would be willing to act in conjunction with the corporation, 1716.—A merchant might consent to be lord mayor for a year, who would not consent to be an alderman for life, 1717.—Thinks the duties of the corporation by no means useless but inapplicable to the present state of affairs.—Statement with regard to the best system for municipal government of the City, 1718.—Has never had anything to do with the corporation as a merchant. Thinks the more the traders are left to themselves the better, 1719.—Alludes to the whole metropolis when he speaks of the mayors of different departments, 1720. —If there were corporations for the other parts of London the City might remain one also, 1721.— There should be corporations for the various boroughs, which should unite for joint action, 1722.— London might be divided into a number of municipalities, some for the north and some for the south of the river, 1723, 1724.—There are certain objects of municipality which should be assigned to each separately, and certain others for which they should be combined, such as widening streets, building bridges, the supply of water, and the sewerage and drainage, 1725, 1726.—The inaptitude of the corporation shown in its conduct about the bridges. London Bridge is not large enough; they are debating whether they shall give 250,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* for Southwark Bridge. This ought to be an antecedent step to altering London Bridge, 1727.—The Government ought to provide thoroughfares suitable to the wants of the people. They have left the building of bridges over the Thames to private enterprise, 1728.—Have no other means of building bridges than by asking Parliament for a vote of money, 1729.—That money need not be paid out of the general Exchequer, 1730.—The limits of the coal dues extend 20 miles round London, 1731.—Coal dues are levied on inhabitants of metropolitan districts, 1732.—Thinks the inhabitants would consent to pay any taxation necessary for the efficient building of bridges, sewerage, lighting and water, 1733.—Is not aware of any means of levying a tax without a special Act of Parliament, 1734.—Must resort to one of the two funds, the City or General Exchequer, 1735.—Thinks that by such a union of municipalities as he has sketched out, a tax might be effected for purposes of metropolitan utility, 1736.—It would be better to raise the tax as a property or house tax than by the coal dues, 1737.—Thinks it would be possible to form a metropolitan board of works, with a power of taxation co-extensive with the metropolis, 1738.—The element of popular election would make it work better and be more popular, 1739.—If London were divided into municipalities, could form a board by taking two or three members from each, giving that combined board power of taxation, 1740.—The public would like a system of that sort better than the tax on coals, 1741.—The interest of the Government might be guarded by the First Commissioner of the Board of Works, or some person appointed by Government, being a member of such Board, 1742.—One or two merchants have alluded to the formation of a Chamber of Commerce, 1743.—Thinks neither Chambers of Commerce nor Tribunals of Commerce are at all desirable; that they are no use but a great deal of harm; that is the general opinion of the merchants; unless presided over by judges of as high character as those who preside over our law courts, it would rather add to the expense of litigation than diminish it. Supposes from the general use of them on the Continent, they are found to be of some use. The chambers of commerce in our large towns have a tendency to become mere political bodies, 1744.—Does not know how the Chamber of Commerce works at Liverpool. Thinks they would work better in country towns than in London. Commerce is so subdivided in London that there are few subjects in which there can be a common interest. Gives instances. The trades have all their own Chambers of Commerce in their own trades, for instance the West India Association, the Baltic Coffee house, Lloyds and the Jamaica Coffee-house. Has never found any difficulty in communicating with the Government since he has been in trade, 1745.—Liverpool resembles London very much in the particulars mentioned. Has not the same means of communicating with Government. Even at Liverpool the principal trades have their exclusive unions, 1747.

HARBOUR MASTER:

The duties of the harbour master are to enforce certain regulations and provide proper moorings and anchorage for shipping, Kearns, 2037.—Very efficient, Wilson, 4393.—Are highly efficient officers, Leach, 6449.—There are four statements as to their salaries and their duties, James, 6864-6891.—All efficient men, Turnley, 7721.

HARRIS, Mr. EDWARD. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a sworn deputy-meter of the corporation, 7977.—Appointed by the Committee of Corn, Coal and Finance, 7978.—Is paid at so much per last, or per hundred quarters, 7979.—The meter waits at the office till an application is made, when he takes the job according to his seniority. His duty is then to proceed wherever it may be on the river or in the docks within the distance the corporation may claim, and to measure whatever quantity of grain he is required by the factor or buyer to measure; to keep an account of the same; to render an account to the custom house officers; to endorse the order upon which he works, for the settlement of the freight; he gives a certificate to the satisfaction of the buyer and seller, which is evidence in the courts of law; and books the work finally at the office, so that a correct account may be taken and the collection made upon it, for all which the meter is held responsible, 7980.—Though the porters are not admitted into the docks, the meters are invariably, 7982.—Formerly the custom house officer kept a tally against the meter's account. Some time ago the Board of Customs rescinded that order. Now, when the meter has done whatever quantity he has to do, he signs the officer's book for the amount, and it is merely checked on the opposite leaf by comparison with the meter's account, 7983.—Is exclusively a corn meter,

7986.—The porters' duties have diminished of late years in consequence of the ships going into the docks. The meters' work has diminished to some extent by the introduction of railways, the charter of the corporation only including water-borne grain, 7987.—Does not know that the quantity imported into London has increased of late years. Taking the average of five years from 1847 to 1852, the quantity generally measured has been 4,409,032 quarters, varying slightly, including coastwise and foreign, 7988–7992.—There is occasionally some litigation about measuring consigned corn, which means corn bought in the country and directed to a party in London; but generally, when the grain is sold, there does not appear much difficulty about it. If they take it without the meter, they take it for the amount it is sent for, and have no guarantee. Mr. Acland states that the situation of the working meters is a highly lucrative one. They have a laborious duty to perform, and the deleterious nature of the work inclines them to diseases, and sometimes renders them prematurely unfit for labour, 7993, 7994.—In consequence of this a fund has been established, which is paid out of the earnings of the working men, who only earn upon the average just sufficient to keep themselves respectable. The meter's office, from the origin, has been a self supporting place, 7995.—The operation requires practice and sometimes great exertion, 7996.—When found competent to discharge the duties, they are passed by the Board of Corn Meters, who have the management of the office as a sort of delegation from the corporation of London, 7997.—Whether it would be desirable that the same persons should not be employed the whole year in the same business, it being an unhealthy occupation, raises a question whether parties could be found having other occupations to fill up their leisure time. The work is not regular. A short time since about 400 vessels arrived in a short space of time, and kept them employed constantly for four weeks, 7998.—In other ports in this country it is the invariable practice to have sworn persons to execute the duty, 7999.

HARRISON, EDWARD, Esquire. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is deputy of the Cornhill Ward, and therefore one of the corporation, 7280.—Has been connected with the corporation sixteen years; in that time has filled several corporate offices. Has been chairman of the Freedoms Committee; also attends to day as a member of the Commission of Sewers, the chairman not being able. Is on the consolidated committee, and is appointed by the corporation one of the four gentlemen in the Metropolitan Commission of Sewers. Has also been up to the present time on the Improvements Committee, 7281, 7282.—Is a stationer. As an old member of the corporation, wishes to call the attention of the Commissioners to certain evidence referring to the character of members of the corporation at the present time compared with a former period. That evidence is highly objectionable, and cannot be justified by facts. Passes over the evidence of Mr. Acland. The evidence of Mr. Travers is of much importance, because in answer to question 209 he states, he has not directed his attention to the municipal concerns of the City of London; and in 211 says, "he believes, in common with most of his class, that the corporation of London is in a most unsatisfactory condition; its system is quite unfit for the requirements of the present day." Believes Mr. Travers is the son of the late Mr. Travers, who was connected with the reform measures of the City of London. As he speaks of a class, presumes he must mean the gentlemen with whom he is associated to promote certain political views, 7283, 7284.—Mr. Travers is a wholesale grocer; perhaps he means the opinion of the class of wholesale grocers. He is a man of great respectability, therefore his opinion thus expressed gives pain to gentlemen who have been many years in the corporation. In answer to questions 212 and 215, he says he would sweep away the corporation and local government of the City altogether, and would have no municipal body of any kind in the City of London. Would next refer to No. 1181. That witness, speaking of the corporation, says, they have never led, but have with great difficulty been dragged at the tail of popular opinion, and that the merchants now spurn them as something loathsome. The answer to 1216 is, "That it is not possible to propose a plan which would give the corporation of the City of London power to conduct its affairs so as to conduce to the advantage of the whole metropolis." In 2146 Mr. Samuel Morley says, the citizens of London look at it with feelings of repugnance. With regard to the sewerage, in 234 Mr. Travers, and in 722 and 723, Mr. Dillon, say the management of the sewers is very unsatisfactory, and should be placed under a single authority, also the paving and lighting. In 1726 and 1718 Mr. Thomas Hankey makes two observations which answer each other, therefore passes them over. Wishes now to show that these remarks cannot be justified by facts. The corporation have endeavoured to increase the constituency; and with regard to the sewerage, before there was any pressure from without, were very anxious to improve it, applied to Parliament, and obtained from the Government powers larger than had been given to any body of commissioners, powers for regulating the consumption of smoke, which worked favourably for twelve months, which power has since been given to the metropolis generally. The sewerage of the City is now completed, so that there is not a court, street, or lane, which has not a proper drainage, and believes the rate for this year will not exceed a penny in the pound. The Commissioners of Sewers are also in treaty for a large plot of ground for the purpose of a burial ground. It has been objected that there can be no unity of action between the Metropolitan and City Commissioners, when great public works are under construction. There is now a very large and important scheme under consideration for the drainage of the entire northern side of the metropolis, and nothing can be more useful for the public good than the co-operation of the two bodies. Thinks that, as the City Commission have completed their sewerage, it would not be just to unite them with the Metropolitan Commission, and call upon them to contribute towards similar works in other districts. The whole of the expenses of the works executed by the Commission of the City are under seven per cent. on the amount rated, which, compared with the amount which other commissions have expended in a similar way, is very small, as it also includes the salary of the officer of health, and the inspectors of the department. The whole of the rates upon property in the City of London at the present time amount to 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound, that includes the consolidated rate, police rate, sewers rate, and City of London Union, 7285–7290.—Similar rates in Marylebone come to 3*s.* 6*d.*, and in St. Pancras to 3*s.* 9*d.*, 7291, 7292.—Believes that he has now shown the City has done its duty to the public in reference to the sewerage and sanitary state of the City, and managed their works more economically than any other board has managed similar works. Wishes now to say a few words with regard to election in Common Hall. There is much bribery in those elections, the candidates buy votes by the hundred. The agents hand in the names of the voters, and the contract is, they are only to be paid for those who vote for the party. States this from his own personal knowledge. There is also another way in which you have to pay for getting a hall, as it is called. The voters ought to pass through the respective wickets, and was called on to pay 5*l.* a hundred to some person for having allowed what appeared to be non-voters to pass through a particular wicket. The corporation have twice tried to alter this, but the opponents were too strong on both occasions. It has been said that the corporation would prefer to appoint an incompetent to a competent man on a committee. From his own experience knows this is not the case; for instance, Mr. Hall has been continued chairman of the Improvements Committee for some years, because he knows the nature of the business; again Mr. Lambert Jones was kept by the corporation in the chair, from the commencement of the improvements at London Bridge almost to the termination of them, because he understood every department of the business, 7293, 7294.—Does not know that there would be any advantage in reducing the number of the corporation, except in saving the time of some of the members. Does not say that the corporation is not susceptible of improvement, but that as they are constituted they have done their best to promote purposes of public usefulness, 7295.—Is one of the consolidated committee; thinks the business might certainly be done with a smaller number, as the whole committee rarely meet. Such a circumstance as a member coming in to vote upon an important subject without having attended the whole proceedings may have arisen, 7296–7298.—Having much time to devote to public interests, should not find it more satisfactory to devote the whole time to one committee, 7299.—There are sometimes three or four committees in one day, but not often at the same hour. Cannot attend them all, 7300–7302.—Under the present arrangements of the corporation a rule cannot be laid down, that a member shall not be put upon more than one important committee at the same time, 7303.—Has been a member of the Navigation Committees four years; used to attend pretty regularly, 7304.—In consequence of the litigation going on on that subject, does not think the business of that committee is transacted in a manner beneficial to the public; otherwise thinks the committee quite competent, and their arrangement of the conservancy most satisfactory, 7306, 7307.

HARVEY, DANIEL WHITTLE, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is commissioner of police, appointed under the Act of 1839, and has continued so from that period, 6504.—The salary attached to the office by Act of Parliament is not to be less than 800*l.* a year. It was also determined that the commissioner should be furnished with a suitable residence in addition to his salary, and for four years subsequent to witness's appointment he was allowed 200*l.* a year in lieu of a house till one was found. In 1846, the working of the City police was made the subject of inquiry by the Court of Aldermen, and also by a committee of the Court of Common Council. The Court of Aldermen came to a unanimous resolution, based upon their entire approbation of the management of the police, that the salary of the commissioner ought to be 1,200*l.* a year, the increase to take place from the month of June previous. As the amount of salary rests with the Common Council, that opinion was certified to the Police Committee, and they, after having gone into the working of the police very minutely, came to a unanimous and very gratifying resolution as to the manner in which the police was conducted, and expressed the opinion that the commissioner's salary ought to be 1,000*l.* a year, and 200*l.* a year in lieu of a house. The 1,000*l.* a year was granted to be paid from that period, but the 1,200*l.* a year, has never been paid, and is still due, nor has any provision been made for a house, 6505.—Those are the whole of the emoluments attached to the office. It is the third clause of the Act which fixes the salary, 6506, 6507.—Witness here states generally the duties he performs as commissioner of police. The undivided responsibility is peculiar to the commissioner's office. In the metropolitan there is co-ordinate authority given to three commissioners, 6508.—The men who are made constables in the metropolitan district are appointed by the Home Office; that is, so far as the Act of Parliament declares they shall be so. In effect they are for the most part appointed by the Commissioners, but in the City the appointment is wholly with the commissioner, as is their discharge. He is amenable to no one, either in the one case or in the other, 6509.—There is no police committee in the City which superintends the control of his office. Under the City Police Act the common council has the power to appoint a committee, and to depute to that committee, if it thinks fit, all its functions, so that whatever the Court of Common Council can do, that committee can do; but what they can do relates to what may be considered the civil branch of the police, such as raising the finances and attending to the complaints of persons who may object to the rate, and all that applies to the financial branch. So far as regards the working of the police in the appointment of men, and in dealing with them, and in making rules, &c. that rests entirely with the commissioner. In the early stage of his appointment made rules and regulations. Produces the same. They have remained the same from that time, 6510.—The rate of pay of the constables of the City has been raised since the first of January, 6511.—The application of the men for an increase of pay was made to himself; that was transmitted by him to the Court of Aldermen; it became a question whether it belonged to the Court of Aldermen or to the Police Committee, one or both, to entertain and deal with that application. It was eventually dealt with, and a scale of increased pay, based upon his own recommendation, was sanctioned by the committee, 6512.—That scale is considerably higher than that of the metropolitan police generally, 6513.—Did not communicate at all with the authorities who superintend the metropolitan police before that increase was made. Circumstances existed in the City, calling for an increase of pay, which would not apply to the Metropolitan Commission, 6514.—Undesirable that a previous communication should be made to the metropolitan authorities upon any subject, without being prepared to a considerable extent to adopt their view. No train of reasoning based upon their own policy could have altered his judgment, because it was based upon necessity, 6516.—Whether, as a matter of public policy, it is of importance that the police of the metropolis generally should be looked upon as a whole in some respects, opens quite another question, 6517.—As commissioner of the City deemed it much more important to conciliate his own force than to consider how it might operate upon others. Has a very exclusive responsibility, 6518.—The communications of the metropolitan police with the City police have always been most amicable, 6521.—His jurisdiction extends about a mile and a half in one direction and a mile in another, 6522.—It extends over the City proper, not over the river, 6523, 6524.—The whole of the Thames along the City as well as without the City is under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police, 6525.—With reference to the complaint that that space of ground between high and low water mark, on the bank of the Thames, was not protected, and is infested with bad characters, called on Mr. Saward yesterday, and went over the locality, so as to be able to state more correctly that it is not a locality which would justify sending men to walk up and down the shore, among barges and timber lying there, night after night, 6526.—They do not interfere, with the ground between high and low water mark within the City jurisdiction, except in the neighbourhood of Blackfriars Bridge, where children descend the steps to bathe. This is unseemly, and sometimes dangerous, and therefore the police occasionally look after them; but so far as watching the strand in the same way as they do the street, they do not undertake it, nor consider it their duty so to do, 6527.—The constables of the metropolitan police do not consider it their duty to watch this strand; they are constantly moving up and down the river, and from their boats see what is going on, 6528.—They consider that their duty, 6529.—No difficulty arises, nor any inconvenience to the public, from doubts as to the jurisdiction under which the strand is placed, particularly in connection with the river force, 6530, 6531.—Does not consider that strip of land within his jurisdiction, 6532.—Most of the landing places within the City are approached by ways which are private property, 6533.—The Thames police is a river police. The Metropolitan Commissioners never send their policemen within the City on the dry land. It would be necessary, if they acted upon the 5th section of the Metropolitan Police Act, and watched the strand, to send them into the City, 6535–6537.—They are not in the habit of sending persons out of their regular beats within the City, 6538.—Does not believe that any attention is necessary, either in the law or the practice, with regard to the efficient watching of the strand on the river side in the City; but if the two forces were made one force, the operation in that respect might yield some advantage, 6539.—The Temple is within the City for police purposes, 6540.—The City police do not go into the Temple. At the beginning they expressed a wish to have their own constables, 6541.—They pay the police rate. If the Temple were to call upon the police authorities to supply them with protection, looking at the fact that they pay as other persons do, they should comply; and if they could not spare men from their existing force, they must increase it. They would be entitled to protection if they chose to give a notice that they require it, 6542, 6543.—Serjeant's Inn is in the City, and is watched by the police. St. Bartholomew is partly in and partly out of the City. There is a small district there which is extra parochial, and it is a very nice question to whom it belongs, 6545.—They have no police of their own. Inconveniences occasionally arise as to the boundaries of the City and the metropolitan district. For instance, in Charter House Square, which is in that neighbourhood, there was a robbery some time since, which was made the subject of investigation, the back premises being in the metropolitan and the house in the City district, 6547.—Though all the evidence that the Commissioners have had before them testifies to the efficiency of the City police, it is capable of being made more efficient, and it ought to be so. The accommodation at the chief office is very defective when compared with the large sum which the corporation pay. The chief office and the residence of the commissioner are one and the same thing. The chief office ought to have a separate entrance, and a separate exit, in case of and serious disturbance, 6548.—The head police station in the City ought to be better than it is. A gentleman comes there, and is shown into a room more or less occupied by a dozen constables and persons connected with individuals who have served their period of imprisonment, and who come to claim whatever chattels may belong to them, 6550.—In Scotland Yard there is an access in front, and another for all purposes of numbers from behind, 6551.—The system might be made more efficient if in the City the detective power were connected more directly with remote places of commercial importance. It is one of the strongest and perhaps the only strong reason that suggests itself in favour of the union of the two forces, that there would be a detective power which would be almost irresistible in its utility. What the metropolis wants is a real independent detective force, efficient for its objects, in all places, 6552.—If there was one general metropolitan police established, thinks the heart and centre of the system should be in the City, 6553.—No doubt the head office of the metropolitan police was placed in Scotland Yard, to be near the principal offices of the Government, it being at that time a Government office, 6554, 6555.—It would be one of the most pernicious steps that could be taken, as it regards the interests of the City, to merge the City in the metropolitan police without very important reservations. Has statistics which perhaps may be useful in illustration of this question. The City police rate is 7*d.* in the pound, 6556.—The City also makes an allowance from its own funds. The corporation is for that purpose the government; it does for the City just what the general government does for the rest of the metropolis; besides which, in the case of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington, the City paid 2,000*l.* out of their own funds. The metropolitan police is at this time assessed at 6*d.*, which against the City is a difference of 1*d.*, or 4,000*l.*, but in effect the metropolitan do pay 7*d.*, and for this reason. The rate in the City is levied by the committee, who pay all the expenses attending the collection. In the metropolitan police the different parishes are called upon to pay a net sum of money equal to the 6*d.*, but what it costs them to raise it is an additional charge, 6557.—Supposing the City were united to the metropolitan district, under the notion that it would be an economical arrangement, it would be a great loss to them, because at this time the inhabitants of Marylebone are paying very nearly as much as they do, and witness questions very much whether they have half the force. They also have a chief authority in the City, no other district having that advantage. Have also the advantage of a small area and a rich and dense population, 6558, 6559.—If thrown together, with districts which have a large area and a thinner and not so rich a population, they would be losers, but it would be beneficial to the others; others would get the benefit of their income; the question is whether the City would get the same amount of protection, 6560.—Possibly, if it were all united, there would be a saving of some small portion of the machinery, perhaps 2,000*l.* a year, 6562.—Has made many inquiries as to whether any difficulty now arises between the City jurisdiction and the metropolitan jurisdiction, and the answer of the officers is this, that there is not so much jealousy between the respective forces who are upon the confines of the different districts as there is between their own officers in reference to their own divisions or beats, 6563.—Under the City Police Act, upon an emergency, with the consent of the Secretary of State, the City Police may go into the metropolitan district, and a metropolitan man may come into the City with the sanction of the lord mayor, but it is only upon emergencies, 6564.—In the case of the pursuit of a common thief or a pickpocket just upon the frontiers of the City, a City constable pursues him into the metropolitan district. Its detective men go as much into Marylebone as they do into the City, 6565.—The man is a constable out of the City if he has reasonable cause, 6566.—With regard to petty cases there is no difficulty on either side in pursuing a delinquent beyond the jurisdiction either of the City or the Metropolitan Police, as the case may be; and with regard to great occasions, such as public riots and so on the two forces may be interchanged upon application to the lord mayor or Secretary of State. The commissioner must be incessantly at his post, unless allowed to be away by the sanction of the Secretary of State and of the lord mayor; and with that sanction he can appoint the next person in authority. To obtain this sanction upon any occasion for a short time would be quite impracticable; therefore the commissioner is either obliged to be incessantly at his post, or if he leaves it without sanction he is subject to all the responsibilities which may arise in his absence. Therefore if the City police is to continue, there ought to be some person of equal authority under the particular circumstances, 6567.—There are two metropolitan commissioners, and they can mutually arrange their periods of absence. There is another very serious evil, and that is the existence of an interior irresponsible police. At the Mansion House there are officers who, if they are not clothed with all the powers of police, are exercising police functions, and that very much to the prejudice of the ordinary police, 6568.—These men are old officers of the corporation, paid 150*l.* a year each, but they are amenable to nobody, 6569, 6570.—Speaks of the two Forresters. The practice acts very perniciously and unjustly to the public and the public force, who fancy that the cream of the cases is lapped up by other persons, 6571.—They pick their cases. They are old officers who were connected with the Mansion House before the Act passed. They are always to be found or heard of at the Mansion House. Does not know that they have a regular office, 6572–6576.—Has mentioned it to some gentlemen of the Court of Aldermen, and they say, if they are removed others will not be appointed in their place, 6577.—There are two; should say there are a couple of hundred constables sworn in at the Mansion House exercising the functions of constables, but not amenable to any one, 6578, 6579.—They are sworn in by the lord mayor as special constables. Under the Metropolitan Act, the Commissioners have the power of appointing those men and of discharging them, but it is not so in the City, 6580.—This double system is in every way objectionable. Such as it is, it is under the control of the lord mayor, 6581, 6582.—The committee of the common council do not at all interfere with the police, except so far as raising the funds, and also receiving from time to time reports which witness may have to make, 6583.—They deal with all cases involving expenditure, and settle the contracts for the police, 6585, 6586.—Witness has no control over the contracts except to complain, if the articles, which are supplied, are not proper. The commissioner has the power to determine what the clothing shall be. The committee decides upon the rate of pay. The recent increase in the rate of pay was made by the committee at the instance of witness, 6587–6590.—They looked entirely to the efficiency of the City police, 6592.—There are some private watchmen in the City, who are constables, and they are sworn in in the way spoken of, 6593.—The Post Office have 6 or 8 men belonging to witness. When any one comes and asks for a constable, he is required to pay a scale which has been fixed by "the committee, and that money is paid to the chamberlain," 6594, 6595.—Does not think the Temple watchmen are constables. It is very undesirable that there should be those independent constables all over the City, 6596, 6597.—It is not the case in any other part of the metropolis, 6598.—Has a list of the places to which metropolitan constables are sent. The commissioners receive 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* a year from those sources, 6599.—The parties apply to the metropolitan police for constables. The metropolitan police are empowered to swear constables for the special purpose of protecting the Palace. There is some particular form of oath in that case, 6600.—They are answerable for the general maintenance of the peace, and the security of property in the metropolis; and, therefore, they ought to have the agents of their administration under their control. 6601.—The control witness has over the City police is greater than that of the Metropolitan Commissioners over their police. He appoints the men, and can dismiss them without reason, if he pleases. The system in the City is as good as witness can make it, 6602–6605.—The district of the metropolitan police extends considerably to the east of the City, 6606.—Never heard of any inconvenience arising from the distance between those parts and the principal office of the metropolitan police; each district is presided over by a superintendent, who is for that purpose the chief of the district, 6607.—Is aware that when the City bill was first introduced it was not proposed to have any superintendent at all, but to govern the police by a committee of common council. The superintendent was an after thought. What is termed popular control would in some instances be palatable; that is to say, that there should be more control in the hands of the common council, 6608–6610.—There never has been any Parliamentary inquiry into the City police since it has been established. There was a committee of the House of Commons which sat in the year in which the Act was passed, 6611, 6612.—That committee came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to have a separate system for the City police, 6613.—Their first recommendation, before the present system was in existence, was, "To consolidate the several constabulary forces of the metropolis and the City of London and the river Thames under one authority, responsible to the secretary for the home department." The City made four objections to this arrangement, first, that it differs in many ways from other parts of the metropolis, and requires a differently regulated police. This, witness thinks nothing of, as all the constables have to learn their duties. Second, "The inconvenience it would be to the inhabitants of the City to have to apply to the commissioner at Whitehall with complaints against constables." This is a true objection. The third is, "That the taking away the power of managing its own police would be an interference with the charter of the City." This is a legal question. And the fourth, "That the inhabitants would lose by being deprived of the contribution which is now made from the corporation funds towards the expense of the City police;" but whatever the City does now, the Government must do if the forces were united. The corporation would be gainers of above 10,000*l.* a year, 6614–6619.—The principal reason why more policemen are required in the City is the crowding of the great thoroughfares. The great obstructions in the City are in the neighbourhood of Cornhill and Cheapside especially, and the streets leading to both; they are Fleet Street and Newgate Street; Newgate Street at times is blocked up, 6620.—If the new street is constructed in continuation of Cannon Street, it will ease Cheapside, but not Ludgate Hill, unless they have a diversion down to Blackfriars, 6621.—Since the great increase in the size of the metropolis, the old thoroughfares of the central part of the City have become inadequate to the traffic, 6622.—The number of obstructions which occur in the thoroughfares in the course of a day or a week is pretty well implied in the number of summonses. Another reason why more police are required is that the City is deserted at night; people leave their premises unoccupied, and very insecurely fastened, depending on the police. The City police has always been found very efficient, and on the late occasion of the Duke of Wellington's funeral it was found quite adequate to perform the duties required, without any assistance from the metropolitan police, 6623–6625.—If there were a detective force which should be a London force, it would be very desirable, 6626.—Does not think it would be possible to separate the detective force from the common police so as to have it under two branches, 6627.—At present there is a detective police force for the City, and another for the metropolitan district, 6628.—The detective police of the City might be made much more effective. It is not so strong as it ought to be. Would have under the executive control two or three men at each of the outports and great towns, 6629–6630.—The arguments for concentration are very strong in the case of the detective police. Such a detective force might be established in London as would make it scarcely possible for any large offender to escape, 6631.—There are 12 detectives in the City, and they receive 30*s.* a week. In the metropolitan district they receive two guineas a week, 6632.—The City pay their detective less, and the common policemen more, than the rest of the metropolis. Knows of no reason for this difference, 6633, 6634,

HAYWOOD, WILLIAM, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is engineer to the City Commission of Sewers, 5950.—States the duties he performs in connexion with the corporation, 5950, 5951.—There is a Building Act in the City, 5952.—Witness believes he is the only officer in the metropolis who has any control over ruinous buildings, except the district surveyor, 5953.—The district surveyors are under the Metropolitan Building Act, 5954.—That Act applies to the City; their jurisdiction is not concurrent with witnesses, but they do not clash at all. Witness has a more prompt power than they have, and is generally called on to give the commission advice on all sanitary matters which come under their control, 5955, 5956.—The sanitary police of the City is in a very satisfactory condition, 5956*a*.—There is a medical officer attached to the commission of sewers. Whenever the medical officer finds, from the detailed returns of the registrar-general, that deaths have occurred in premises of a nature which leads him to infer that the condition of those houses is unsatisfactory, domiciliary visits take place by the inspectors; they report what sanitary works are required to be done, and orders, upon recommendation of the officer of health, are issued by the commission for the execution of those works. Those orders have amounted to between 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* annually, 5957.—The medical officer of the commission makes an annual report, and also weekly reports of what he advises to be done in the interior of premises which are reported by the inspector of nuisances to be in an unsatisfactory condition, 5958.—The City had an Act which empowered them to enforce the regulations for lodging-houses, before there was any similar power in the metropolis. These powers are exercised in a very efficient manner, 5959–5961.—Witness has nothing to do with that inspection; it rests with the medical officer and the inspectors of nuisances; but if anything is to be done in the interior of those premises which require works to be done compulsorily by the commission, it falls within witness's department. There are six inspectors of nuisances under the commission; they are inspectors of pavements, they take charge of the scavenging and dusting, have the general superintendence of the public ways, and indeed the whole of their respective districts, 5962.—Every house which has been registered by the commissioners as a lodging-house has a card affixed in each room, stating what sex is to sleep in the room, the number having been determined by the medical officer. These regulations are enforced, 5963, 5964.—If these regulations are contravened, the proprietor is summoned before the commission, 5965. (Mr. Daw) The course is to summon the party, if he disobey the orders of the commission, or do not act up to them, before a magistrate. There is a fine for disobeying the order of the commissioners, 5967. Thinks the inspection might be more efficiently done if it were with the more continuous assistance of the police by night, as it is by night that the nuisance of overcrowding occurs, 5968.—The police have periodically given assistance. In the rest of the metropolis the Lodging-house Act is carried into effect by the police, 5969, 5970.—The police have examined several of the lodging-houses and made their reports from time to time, 5972.—There are not in the City many common lodging-houses in which persons are indiscriminately received at 4*d.* or 5*d.* per night, 5973.—In the neighbourhood of Smithfield there used to be some such houses, but they have been got rid of. Believes that the operations of the commissioners of sewers in that respect have been the cause of closing a great many of them, 5974. (Mr. Haywood.) Has never observed any evil result from the separate commission of sewers for the City, 5976.—The only shadow of a reason assigned for the desirability of annexing the City to the general commission for the metropolis has been that it was just possible that the corporation might object to the external commissions draining through their area. Such a thing is not at all likely to have existed, and at the present day it would be perfectly absurd to suppose any commission having an outfall sewer could object to any external commission draining through that sewer. At the present time there are more outlets provided at the City boundaries than are likely to be immediately wanted by the metropolitan commission, and if at any time a junction with the City sewers is required, the application to connect those sewers is generally complied with within a week or two, by the City commission, and the work executed within a month. The extensive area under the metropolitan commission of sewers obliged them to separate the area into districts, under the charge of different officers, who co-operate, when necessary, in precisely the same manner that the officers of the City commission of sewers co-operate with those of the metropolitan commission of sewers whenever it is essential for the public benefit. Considers there is great practical benefit in the contract of the pavings being joined to that of the sewers, particularly in a district so peculiar in its traffic, &c. as the City of London, 5977, 5978.—Whoever takes charge of the paving, as a matter of course, takes charge also of the lighting and cleansing of those pavements and the projections over them, 5979.—The water and gas are wholly independent of the commission, but the commission can compel the owners of property to have a proper water supply on their premises, 5980.—There is scarcely a house in the City that has not been looked to; there has been a vast deal done. Believes there is not a house in the City that has not a daily supply of water of some kind, 5981.—In the year 1849 the commission applied for a new Act, giving them extensive controlling power, and they obtained it. The City was the first section of the metropolis which possessed the power of compelling the abatement of the issue of opaque smoke from furnaces, and since that time nearly all the furnaces have been so altered that the smoke is consumed. It is the only section of the metropolis which possesses power over slaughter-houses, and of regulating the way in which slaughtering is done, and power of seizing and confiscating diseased cattle or food unfit for human consumption, 5982.—Does not think there is any part of the metropolis where more care is taken for the accommodation and convenience of the public, and the huge traffic which rolls through the City streets. The restrictions which existed upon persons breaking open pavements, and with respect to boards and scaffolds, have all been made either more stringent or wholly new within the last four or five years. Entirely new rules and regulations with regard to all those matters brought under the control of the commission by their Acts of Parliament have been made, and the result has been most beneficial to the citizens and the public generally. Thinks that on the whole the sewerage of the City of London has been well carried out. They have recently been enabled to reduce their rate to 2*d.* in the pound, and will shortly reduce it to 1*d.*; and it is not that the City has had less sewers to provide within its area, and less difficulties to contend with than other portions of the metropolis, for it would be difficult to find any portion which has had more to do or more difficulties to contend with, 5983.—Thirty or forty years ago, that which it is a statutable offence now not to do, when called upon, it was a statutable offence to do at all. The sewers which were then constructed were for surface drainage only, and they do not answer their purpose so well or so efficiently as the sewers of more recent years. Believes that in a few years the old sewers will be remodelled and adapted to the exigencies of the present day, and then the sewers of the City of London will be in the highest possible state of efficiency, 5984. (Mr. Daw) In all usual cases the occupier is assessed, but the rate is recoverable from the landlord on small property where the rental is less than 25*l.* a year, 5985.—The levy is on the occupier, but in case of the rent being less than 25*l.* a year, the owner is assessed upon a composition, and it is recovered from the owner in that case, 5986, 5987.—In all cases it is intended that the immediate incidence of the sewers' rate should be upon the owner. In cases above 25*l.* a year the tenant can recover from the owner, unless there is any clause in his lease or agreement to forbid it; he then deducts it from his rent, 5988, 5989. (Mr. Haywood) As an evidence of the co-operation which exists for the public benefit between the City commission and the metropolitan commission, has been associated with their engineer as regards works which mutually affect the jurisdiction of the metropolis generally. Was associated with Mr. Frank Foster in 1851 in the preparation of his general scheme for the interception of the sewage flowing into the Thames. Is preparing with the engineer to the metropolitan commission the details of a scheme for that purpose, 5989*a.*—There has always been a disposition between the two commissions to co-operate for purposes within the sphere of their duties, but the necessity for such co-operation occurs very rarely indeed, 5990.

Up to 1846 was a merchant connected with business in Derry, and had taken an active part in all matters connected therewith for 25 years; is now disconnected both with trade and with the corporation, 8013.—Is one of the deputation from the north of Ireland for inquiring into the management of the Irish Society in Derry, and reporting the same to this Commission, 8014,

8015.—The deputation from Londonderry were elected by a meeting of the tenantry, and from Coleraine they were deputed by the town commissioners, 8016.—The deputation consists of eight gentlemen, 8018.—Believes they represent fairly the feelings and views of the majority of the tenantry, 8019.—Has communicated with the other members of the deputation, so as to ascertain their views, 8020.—Up to the time when the reformed corporation came into operation the Irish Society had paid the municipal officers, but after that time they declined to pay them. Witness, as head of the corporation, thought it right to inquire into the grounds of the claims of the corporation on the society, and presented an address, stating his views on the subject, to the corporation, which was confirmed by them; and in October witness came over with a deputation, and waited on the Irish Society to make known their grievances, but nothing followed for several years, 8021.—The contribution to the corporation was given in 1831 for the first time; it was withdrawn in 1832. In 1834 petitions were presented to the House of Commons complaining of the Irish Society. The society then resolved to pay the corporate officers of Derry; continued to do so till 1841. On the passing of the Municipal Reform Act the Society again withheld their grant, although they had expressed great anxiety for the reform of the corporation. The citizens of Derry remonstrated, and were again preparing to go to Parliament, when the Irish Society yielded, and are now paying 700*l.* a year to the corporate officers, and 500*l.* a year toward the improvements of the City. Gives a short history of the connexion of Derry with the Irish Society. The plan of colonizing the north of Ireland originated with James I., in 1608. He declared the nature of the project of plantation in Ulster as not for his own profit but for the welfare of the kingdom. In 1609 King James addressed peculiar motives to the corporation of London, in which he said that the late ruinated city of Derry, and one other place at or near the castle of Coleraine, were the best places for London to plant, and it goes on to state that "These towns his majesty may be pleased to grant unto, not only corporations, with such liberties and privileges for their good government, &c., as shall be convenient, but also the whole territory and country betwixt them, out of which 1,000 acres more may be allotted to each of the towns for their commons, rent free, the rest to be planted with such undertakers as the City of London shall think fit," and would also buy from the possessors the salmon fishing of the river Bann and Lough Foyle, and bestow them upon those towns. In January 1609, those propositions were converted into articles of agreement, and it was agreed that the City should pay 15,000*l.* to be expended on the intended plantation, and 5,000*l.* for clearing private men's interest. This agreement states that at Derry 200 houses should be built, and room left for 300 more, and that 4,000 acres next adjacent to Derry should be laid thereunto, bog and barren mountain to be no part thereof. Then there are 3,000 acres to be laid to Coleraine. The 7,000 acres laid to the city of Derry and town of Coleraine, one to be in fee farm at the rent of 53*s.* 4*d.*, and the city of Derry and town of Coleraine and 7,000 acres of land to them are to be holden of the king in free burgage. Then the whole of the county is granted. The county has since been conveyed in divisions to the twelve companies who advanced the monies, and the city of Derry and town of Coleraine are held by the soceity; the society have intercepted many free gifts which were made to the towns. Calls attention to the fact that it does not appear that the Crown received any money from the corporation of London for this grant, except 12,000*l.* paid as a fine in the reign of Charles II., 8022–8026.—The whole county belongs to the companies, excepting the church land and some native freeholds, 8027.—Believes the liberties of Derry were taken off the county of Donegal, and the liberties of Coleraine from the county of Antrim. Statement as to the origin of the society. Believes the corporation of London never advanced anything towards the settlement of Derry and Coleraine. The companies advanced the money to the corporation, and the entire county was conveyed to them as a compensation, 8028, 8029.—The corporation handed the money over to the society, who disbursed it. In 1613 a charter was granted. Statement as to the charter, 8030.—With regard to the officers of Derry there is no direct provision made in the shape of property for their sustenance, the whole property being conveyed to the Irish Society, 8031.—On the 26th March 1615, King James complained of the proceedings of the society; the corporation then sent over Alderman Proby and Matthew Springham, with specific instructions how to act, which prove that there were considerable duties which the common council thought they were bound to perform at that time. Here witness shows the proceedings, 8032.—The first instructions sent over were with reference to the plantation before the charter, and the second were subsequent to it, 8033, 8034.—In answer to the second of these instructions in 1616, the commissioners report to the king that Derry had already out of the 4,000 acres 3,217 acres, and for a free school they had allotted 300 acres. In 1623 the corporation of Londonderry made a complaint to the commissioner for Irish causes, that out of the 4,000 acres directed by the charter to be laid to Derry only 1,500 acres had been apportioned to the corporation towards the maintenance of the mayor and officers, which were insufficient for the purpose, not being worth 60*l.* per annum. They are now worth 2,400*l.* The king complained in 1624 through the privy council. Witness states some of the complaints, reads the answer made by the corporation of London, 8035.—The first complaint of the citizens of Derry against the Irish Society is that the 1,500 acres which is in their hands ought to be in the hands of the City, 8036.—The claim is founded on the answer of the society to King James, 8037.—Witness argues that the society, being incorporated for the protection of the rights of Londonderry and Coleraine, ought to have protected them in the possession of the 1,500 acres, 8038.—The way in which that land came into the possession of the society was this: The 1,500 acres were granted to the Bishop of Derry in the reign of Charles I. The corporation had a lease under the bishop; when the lease expired they applied to the society for assistance, the bishop not renewing. The society did assist them, but instead of returning the lands to the city of Derry they kept them themselves, 8039.—Witness does not think the city of Derry had any legal claim, but the crown had certain intentions in granting this property to the society, which have not been carried out, 8040.—The corporation were never out of possession till they applied to the society, 8041.—Between the bishop and the society the agreement was settled by Act of Parliament; the rights of the crown and of the corporation were reserved. It is stated in the charter that bog and barren mountain were reserved as to the city of Londonderry belonging. Witness reads the same, and observes that there might be a question of titles yet between them and the society, 8042.—Has no doubt the payment of 1,200*l.* a year to the officers of Derry by the society has been contingent upon claims made by the corporation of Derry in reference to these disputes, 8044.—The allowances made in the way the society make them to Derry are objectionable in point of principle, 8045.—As maintaining the control of a body residing in London over a corporate body in Ireland, 8046.—The property ought to be laid out for the good of Londonderry and Coleraine, and some of the funds be applied to paying the corporate officers, 8048.—The mayor of Derry, the recorder, the town clerk, and the serjeant at mace, are paid from those funds, 8049.—The mayor receives 300*l.* a year, 8050.—Derry is a rising town, 8052.—The corporation make borough rates, 8854.—Which are applied to the general purposes of the corporation, 8055.—They are limited to 4*s.* in the pound, 8059.—The expenses defrayed by the corporation are the sewerage of the town, the supply of water, and gas, 8057.—Objects to the Irish Society as landlords, to the short tenure they give, and to the standing order passed in 1847, that no lease be granted in perpetuity, and no determinable leases be renewed till within three years of expiration, 8060.—The greater part of Derry and that part of the neighbourhood is held by leases for lives and for years, and renewable for ever, 8061.—Those leases were granted in 1766, as the town was then nearly in a state of ruin, owing to the short leases, 8062.—The property held under the lease system is prosperous; the income amounts to 2,500*l.* a year. They require from the tenants, in order to carry out the law and convert them into perpetuity, from 100,000*l.* to 150,000*l.* 8063.—The Irish Society send everything to the House of Lords. Witness questions whether, being trustees, they ought to employ their public purse to give such a sum of money for exacting 40 or 50 years' purchase for renewals which do not injure their interest, but which benefit the tenants,

8064.—Complains that the society refuse to renew leases till within three years of their expiration, which deters people from establishing manufactures in a way that they otherwise would. Questions whether they are justified in having spent 22,000*l.* in the last ten years in law expenses, and whether certain gentlemen, acting as trustees, were entitled to take, in ten years, 4,900*l.* as fees to their own members, 8067.—Complains that a large sum of money is spent by the society on expenses of deputations and entertainments, which ought to go to the benefit of the property, 8070.—There is little purely agricultural property under the society but those 1,500 acres, 8072.—Does not think the society can ever be serviceable to Derry and Coleraine as it is at present composed or constituted. States reasons, 8073.—Believes the property of the companies of the City of London generally is well managed, but there must be an injury to any kind of property from the want of a resident landlord, 8074.—If the Irish Society had a proprietary interest their conduct ought to be considered liberal, but if on the other hand, they act as trustees, they have indulged in expenses which they ought not, 8076.—With regard to what is called "tenant right," there is always a regard had in the towns to the party who has built the houses, and expended money upon them, 8078.—But with regard to country districts the usual mode is to value the land with its improvements, and leave the houses the property of the tenant. In 1713 a similar standing order existed in the society, 8079.—Thinks it would be a great advantage to the country if the land were sold, and set free in the hands of private purchasers. With regard to the towns would adopt some schemes similar to the ecclesiastical form of leases. Thinks that the Crown, having given the lands for public purposes, should see that the society is competent to undertake the management of it, 8080.

HAZLETT, WILLIAM, Esq. (Second Examination.)—With regard to the charge of three guineas for the renewal of leases, the clauses in the society's leases are of such a nature as to throw a great deal into the power of the society. States one case in illustration of that. States another case to show how the business of the society is managed. The facts which witness stated as to how Derry became possessed of that property and was afterwards dispossessed by the society, with the words of the charter and of the articles which preceded the charter, form a primâ facie case showing that the corporation of Derry are entitled to some substitute for 1,500 acres, for the common holdings, and for the Sheriff's Mountain, which have been taken from them. The municipal commissioners for Ireland examined into these matters, and commented upon them with considerable severity, 8333, 8334.—Supposes that those transactions to which he has referred constitute the ground upon which the society now makes that allowance for municipal purposes to Derry which they do not to Coleraine, which has its own property, and is consequently independent. Suggests that the plan of granting leases in perpetuity, upon the same basis as ecclesiastical leases are granted in Ireland, is not at all inconsistent with permitting the sale of the property to tenants either before those perpetuities are completed or after. In Coleraine the quantity of leasehold property is much smaller than in Derry. Thinks that both plans might be carried out at the same time. Witness's reason for referring to the difficulties which the society make with regard to their leases was for the purpose of showing the terms on which the leases were granted, namely, that by granting those leases the society precluded themselves from the benefit of all future improvements; and, having received 37 per cent. as increase of rent at the time as a consideration for so doing, it seems very ungracious in them to ask a sum of money for those renewals equal to twice the purchase of the fee of the society's interest in those leases, retaining at the same time the full amount of rent, fines, and fees, to which they are at present entitled. 2,500*l.* is all the rent they derive from those leases, but they ask a sum which their own counsel states amounts to from 100,000*l.* to 150,000*l.*, 8335.

HICKSON, WILLIAM EDWARD, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has given great attention to the subject of the corporation of London and municipal institutions generally, 2693.—Was formerly commercially connected with the City, but has not been so connected for many years. Is painfully reminded of the necessity of a Commission of Inquiry, and of efforts being made to improve City local administration by the local rates he is called on personally to discharge every year in the parish of St. Dunstan, Fleet-street, 2694.—Has not been an habitual resident in the City for fifteen years; but still retains chambers and occasionally sleeps there, 2695.—Has not carried on trade in the City for fifteen years. Was proprietor and principal conductor of the old Westminster Review for eleven years. During that time frequently wrote articles on the subject of administrative improvement, many of the questions relating to the corporation of London, 2696.—Has never been a member of the common council, 2697.—The object in view has been to show the necessity of a better system of local government generally both for the internal affairs of the City, and in its relations to the whole metropolis. Does not think the charge of personal corruption applies generally to the members of either the court of common council or court of aldermen. There are among them as honourable men as are to be found in any municipal constituency of this empire, and they may be regarded as a fair average of the middle class. The question of City reform is not one of particular abuses, but of consolidation of useless establishments and general simplification. Is of opinion there is not a city in the world in which local burdens ought to be so small as in London, nor one in which they are at present so heavy, 2698.—Speaks with reference to direct taxation of local rates, and indirect taxation; also to the immense trust estates which ought to be made available for municipal objects, 2699.—Statement of the mode of keeping the accounts of the corporation, 2700.—Must demur to the statement that they are the mere recipients of 8*d.* for coal duty, and that all they have to do with it is to hand it over to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. With regard to establishment expenses the sum that appears for the lord mayors in the City estate account is 6,000*l.*, but it is well known that he receives in addition about 2,000*l.* in fees at the Mansion House. This 2,000*l.* does not appear at all in any City account, 2701, 2702.—It may possibly appear in the account which the corporation gave to the last Commissioners, of the emoluments attached to the office of lord mayor. Is not acquainted with any of the annual financial statements of the City in which it occurs, 2703, 2704.—In all well-regulated municipal establishments, the fees of office appear in the accounts. The public has a right to know what it pays, whether in fees or any other way, 2705.—The object of the present inquiry, and of City reformers, is to discover what the public pays altogether, directly or indirectly to the officers of the corporation, not merely what they receive in a corporate capacity. Instances City tradesmen's bills to illustrate the general complexity of the corporation accounts referred to, 2706.—Divided management does not of course necessarily imply divided accounts. A report has been printed, dated July 28th 1853, of the salaries and emoluments of officers of the London corporation which amounts to 55,000*l.*, but does not include the lord mayor's salary or fees of office. The Commissioner of the City police and his chief officers are omitted, likewise the district surveyors and their fees, and officers connected with the metage charges—in fact salaries and emoluments amounting to 50,000*l.*, and yet the committee appointed in March last, to inquire into it, make no reference to its incompleteness, 2707.—It does not profess to be a complete return. It is an instance of that suppressio veri, which in its effect, unintentional perhaps, is tantamount to the suggestio falsi. Seeing one of the witnesses has quoted it as complete, produces a statement of the salaries, fees, and office allowances of officers and clerks of the London corporation in 1833, signed by the officers themselves, and presented to the revenue committee of common council in 1835. Even this account was incomplete at the time it was rendered. The common council give out that matters have improved since then; the facts are these: There has been some reduction of office expenses, and there has been some increase of their offices; some have been abolished and new ones established. Salaries have been given in lieu of fees. The fees in 1835 amounted to near 70,000*l.* a year received by officers of the corporation in sums not passing through the City accounts. That amount has been reduced, including fees connected with the metage dues, but not all the trade dues. Speaks of fees of the same miscellaneous class received by the lord mayor at present, of which Sir Peter Laurie made a return in 1833. They have been in various instances reduced, but should say the salaries and emoluments of officers connected with the corporation fully amount to 120,000*l.*, 2708–2710.—In a few cases the fees go into the hands of the chamberlain, and appear in the City accounts, but that is not the general rule, 2711.—Does not include in the sum named, fees for the admission of freemen; the amount for them is now small. If the Commissioners wish to obtain an accurate account of these receipts, the question of compensation to the City officers is one of the first matters upon which it will be necessary to decide. Knows there are many honourable men, officers of the corporation, desiring to give the fullest evidence on the subject, but feeling the necessity of having regard to the interest of their wives and families, they will appear with reluctance before this Commission. Would recommend that a retiring pension of two thirds of existing salaries and emoluments should be given to officers superseded under any bill which may be passed in consequence of this inquiry, 2712.—Undoubtedly the corporation at present do not know the amount of fees annually received by many of their own officers. Declines to specify any of those officers, 2713–2715.—Thinks it more important to obtain accurate returns of the expense of each individual office, than merely the salary and emoluments of each individual officer. For example, the chamberlain's salary is stated at 2,500*l.*, but including his clerks, the office costs 4,600*l.* So with the town clerk, his salary out of the City estates is put down at 900*l.*, and his emoluments 982*l.*, but in the City estates account, in addition to this 1,882*l.*, his clerks and office expenses are 2,787*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, making 4,679*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, which rule applies more or less to all offices of the corporation of London. In contrast with these general remarks with reference to the corporation of London, gives "an abstract of the accounts of the Municipal Borough of Leeds for the year ending September 1st 1853." This account does not include paving, lighting and cleansing; nor the poor's rate, which is under separate management, 2716.—The City account does not include the poor's rate, but that for Marylebone next following does, 2717.—That parish is a remarkable instance of comprehensiveness in municipal matters of administration. Its vestry, in reference to useful matters of expenditure, really enjoys more power than the corporation of London. For instance it has the management of the churches. Receives the pew rents of seven different churches and chapels in the parish, and pays the ministers' stipends, lecturers' salaries, and visitation fees out of the general funds; and includes all the customary branches of municipal administration for a very extensive district. The population of Marylebone is 157,696; inhabited houses 15,826; area 1,490 acres; all in one parish. The City of London is subdivided into 110 different parochial districts, which occupy only an area of 600 acres; an extraordinary anomaly in our metropolitan system of municipal government. The rental as assessed to the poor rate is 866,454*l.*; as assessed by the police commissioners and county magistrates, it is 987,548*l.* The expense in respect to lighting this parish is 11,711*l.*; the police commissioners 24,688*l.* The difference in respect to police as compared with the City is 20,000*l.* per annum. The expense is less by nearly one half, although the area to be watched in Marylebone is more than twice that in the City, 2718.—The parish of Marylebone pays the expense of the police to the police commissioners for the metropolis; it is charged upon the poor rate, as is also the county rate, a fact to be remarked, otherwise the figures as to the burden of the poor rate might mislead, 2719.—The vestry have no share in the management of the county rate, or police. All they have to do is to pay the sum called for by the commissioners of police. Refers to it now as part of the general question of consolidation. It was proposed when Government first established the metropolitan police, to place the whole of London under it; and the Commissioners estimated that the City might be watched for 25,000*l.* per annum. The corporation resisted that proposition, and succeeded in getting the management exclusively in their own hands, and the result is, regarding the financial question alone, that the City police cost 40,000*l.*, and the Marylebone 24,000*l.* per annum, 2720, 2721.—The police commissioners estimate for 25,000*l.*, appears in some of the Parliamentary blue books, 2722, 2723.—Gives an abstract of the accounts of the parish of St. Marylebone for the year ending 31st December 1852.—The corporation maintains its own prisons, at a large expense, and there is no corresponding expense in Marylebone, except as it contributes to the county rate. The conservancy of the river and many other expenses fall upon the City, and not upon Marylebone, therefore the comparison can only properly affect particular items of expenditure; but this account is submitted as suggestive of the economy and advantage of a general consolidation of establishments in place of a system of divided management. Now proceeds to a general view of the revenues of the City and its local burdens. Regards the present inquiry into corporation abuses as something more than a question of abolition or modification. It is one of reconstruction. What kind of municipal government should supersede the existing worn-out, antiquated, and effete institution; and what powers should be entrusted to the new municipality in its relations to the metropolis as a larger municipality? Produces "An account and in part an approximate estimate of the sums collected for public and charitable objects by different local bodies, within the City of London, for the year 1852." All those objects should be embraced in the new municipal government to be provided for the City. The indirect taxation levied through the officers of the corporation amounts to 333,702*l.* 8*s.* First the 4*d.* duty on coal, which they claim as their private property, 57,591*l.* 10*s.*; the 8*d.* duty on coal, 113,559*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*; the 1*d.* duty on coal, 14,297*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, amounting altogether to 185,448*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, 2724–2729.—The chamberlain says, "the 4*d.* duty was given to the corporation for ever by the 5th and 6th of William and Mary." Gives a statement of other items of indirect taxation; likewise of the local rates directly collected by the corporation. The poor's rate amounts to 88,475*l.*, being 35,000*l.* more than the poor's rate in Marylebone. Estimates the ward rate, which is in some measure, a corporation tax, at 4,000*l.*; the church rates, tithes, and Easter offerings, at 70,000*l.*, though it is impossible to get accurate figures for this item, for churchwardens and clergy have generally been more backward in making returns than even the corporation. The tithes are in some places paid to the parishes as rectors in their own right; in others, direct to the clergy, 2730, 2731.—Is not giving corporation receipts alone, but the whole municipal receipts of the City, over which a new municipal body properly constituted, should exercise a general surveillance, with a view to the reduction of existing burdens. The total of the City local rates is 277,488*l.* The next branch relates to trust estates for public and charitable objects. First, the real estate of the corporation, including fines for the renewal of leases, produced last year 99,112*l.*; the Bridge House estate, 47,021*l.* The different charities, as taken from the report of the Charity Commissioners in 1837, the parochial charities, 38,703*l.*; those administered by different chartered companies, 85,685*l.*; the five Royal hospitals, 128,763*l.*; and sundry charity estates, 3,298*l.* Estimates the increased value of this property at 10 per cent., being 25,000*l.* upon the last four items. These trust estates for public and charitable objects amount to 427,585*l.* Gives statement of the whole of the City revenues, amounting to 1,107,154*l.* Population, 129,128; area, 600 acres; inhabited houses, 14,693; rental to police rate, 1,020,000*l.*; number of parishes within the walls, 97; without the walls, 13; ex-parochial inns of court, 13; wards, 25, but including Bridge Without, 26, 2732.—Includes tithes and all charges relating to the Church, as necessary to a complete view of the local burdens, and because in Marylebone all such charges are made through the vestry. In other counties charges for church building and repairs commonly appear in the municipal accounts, 2733.—It is undoubtedly a practice in some municipal administrations for parochial charities to be included in one common system of management, 2734.—It is impossible to state, with any accuracy, what is done generally in the 185 cities and boroughs placed under the Municipal Reform Act as to including in borough accounts charities which belong to a parish. The rule in one municipality is not the rule in another. The defect of the Municipal Reform Act was that it did not sufficiently define what were to be the functions of the new corporation. The question of the proper province of municipal administration had been very little considered, and there has been no end to the local Acts since obtained, and continuing to be obtained, by different municipal bodies, extending their power of municipal administration. Hopes that in framing a new constitution all the powers which such a governing body should possess will be conferred at once; and, among them, powers for controlling the present wasteful church expenditure. A new municipal board should have power to take proper steps for a consolidation of these numerous ecclesiastical divisions, by conferring with the bishop of the diocese and the clergy generally, to frame a bill for effecting the object, 2736.—Believes that in Marylebone there was a special Act of Parliament, by which the rights of the Duke of Portland were purchased, and the vestry was enabled to deal in that manner with the churches in that parish, 2737.—The object in drawing up the statement put in was to collect all the local expenses of a public nature, whether of the corporation or of other bodies within the precincts of the City, with a view to the general consideration of the whole question, principally to that part which relates to the powers which should be given to a new municipal board, 2738, 2739.—The statement as to a total of 600,000*l.* a year is made up by taking what is called the corporate estate, which, with the Bridge-house Estate, amounts to 200,000*l.*; then the gross receipts of the coal duties, about 200,000*l.*; then the rates directly collected by the corporation, such as police rate, consolidated rate, and other rates before enumerated, with the 70,000*l.* returned by the Revenue Committee of the Court of Common Council in 1833, as received indirectly by the officers of the corporation, 2740.—Does not recollect that there appears in any of the published accounts a separate item for fines, estreats, and amerciaments. Thinks there has been some misapprehension on the part of previous witnesses with respect to the first item of the coal duties. The 4*d.* duty is what the corporation call their property. It has been stated that it was chargeable with the burthen of the City improvements. The amount appears under the head of "Offices," in the account of the City estate, as applicable to general purposes; but the corporation have made it chargeable with 20,000*l.* in aid of City improvements. This has been done, not under an Act of Parliament, but by a by-law of the corporation, 2741.—Understands the minutes to mean that they have borrowed money for City improvements, and mortgaged their coal duties to that amount. Does not know for what length of time they are mortgaged. It was stated that the 8*d.* duty was simply handed over to the Woods and Forests, in consideration of the cost of making New Oxford Street, New Victoria Street, and the expenses generally of some improvements at the West End. That is the general impression of the members of the corporation at this present moment, as made by their officers; but it is a very inaccurate one. Up to the present year, 1853, the 8*d.* duty was mortgaged for improvements executed within the City, and under the direction of officers of the corporation. Has brought a statement of the loans secured upon that duty from 1831 to 1853. The first was the remaining part of the 96,000*l.* borrowed before, for the debtors' prison, 1,000*l.*; ditto of the 5,000*l.*, for the improvement of Moorfields, 1,500*l.*; ditto of the 80,000*l.*, for the site of the new post-office, 61,000*l.*; London Bridge approaches, 1,000,000*l.*; removal of Fleet Market, 250,000*l.*; removing the site of the Royal Exchange, 150,000*l.*; ditto 40,000*l.*, New Farringdon-street, 25,000*l.*, showing a total of 1,535,600*l.*, raised for improvements in the City exclusively, and administered by officers of the corporation. Believes the whole of these loans are not fully paid off at the present moment. The corporation, or their officers, have been financially responsible for nearly the whole of the 8*d.* coal duty since 1831, namely 1,535,600*l.* Up to the present time the proceeds of the 8*d.* duty would have been absorbed in City improvements, 2742–2744.—The interest and repayment of loans have absorbed nearly the whole of the revenue received within that time, 2745.—Is not prepared to say how much of the revenue from the 8*d.* duty for 1852 has been used for City improvements exclusively, 2746.—Puts down this item in the account of City revenues, because the corporation have hitherto administered the largest part of the proceeds of the 8*d.* duty, and are still receivers of the money. Every citizen of London ought to have an accurate statement of how and by whom that money is collected, what charges are made for its collection, and what securities are taken that the whole of the 8*d.* duty shall first be raised, and then applied to the objects intended by the Legislature. The coal duties are collected in different establishments. The corporation are obliged to employ officers connected with the railway companies, and it is desirable to know what securities are taken against a possible understanding between the inferior class of those officers and some of the large coal owners, so that the full amount of duty which ought to be levied shall come into the public coffers, 2747.—The 8*d.* duty now annually produces 113,000*l.* net, 2748.—Does not know how much of it the City has paid in any recent year to the Commissioners of Woods and Works, 2749.—An increasing sum is paid over to Government, but that is very far from being the whole question, 2750.—In some cases the Office of Woods and Works have had the right of examining the plans, 2751.—Undoubtedly they have not the same control over the improvements in the City as over those in New Oxford Street and other places. The corporation are not only responsible for having spent, within the last twenty years, 1,500,000*l.* out of the 8*d.* duty; but for having retarded, to a very great extent, by the sectional and antagonistic spirit of their institutions, the progress of metropolitan improvements generally, especially at the west end of London, 2752.—No doubt the whole of the 8*d.* duty has been raised by Act of Parliament. A sum of 1,500,000*l.* out of it has been expended in the City since 1831, and a further sum secured for general metropolitan improvements on the prospective receipts of the 8*d.* duty, amounting to 753,000*l.* Gives statement of the loans so secured, 2753.—Nearly the whole of the charges in the above-named statement are for improvements in districts without the City. The prospective 8*d.* duty is mortgaged for those improvements, 2754.—The statement that the whole of the 8*d.* duty is handed over to the Office of Woods and Works is an error. Some portion of it is still liable for old mortgages, 2755, 2756.—Should think a large portion for last year, 1852. But the fact that 1,500,000*l.* has been administered by the corporation seems to be evaded in the statements to this Commission. With reference to the 1*d.* coal duty it is not an exact statement that it was given to the City in consideration of the expenses of collection. All the coal duties are subject to separate charges to the officers of the corporation for collection. The gross receipts of the 8*d.* duty are not applied to improvements. A portion of them is subject to charges of the corporation; so, also, in the 1*d.* duty. Both these items ought to be brought into the accounts of the corporation of London, 2757.—The 1*d.* duty is the fund out of which the Coal Exchange has been built. That also has been exclusively administered by the corporation up to 1845, since which time it has been paid to the Office of Woods and Works for general improvements; so says the return of the late chamberlain, 2758, 2759.—Thinks that every municipality should be at liberty to tax itself to any extent it thought proper, and enjoy absolute control over the funds which the ratepayers in the municipality are willing to contribute from their own pockets. But it is a very different thing to allow a local body to waste funds belonging to the public generally. The City of London might have the direction of City improvements to the extent of funds which it could raise within itself by direct taxation; but funds, raised from the inhabitants of the whole metropolis, ought to be under the administration of a metropolitan board. The limitation of municipal expenditure to the resources of a municipality is generally an efficient check to local abuse. It is unquestionable that the funds raised by the 8*d.* coal duty, for the approaches to London Bridge, have not been economically applied, nor the funds raised for building the bridge itself. Mr. Charles Fowler, the architect of Hungerford Market, obtained the first class premium for the best design, but he was set aside through the local influence of the bridge contractors, exerted in favour of another architect. The erection of London Bridge was contracted for by Messrs. Joliffe and Banks, at the sum of 426,000*l.* The Act for building it received the Royal Assent July 7th, 1823. It appears by a report to the Court of Common Council, that the corporation had spent up to the 3rd of December, 1831, upon the bridge and its approaches, 1,426,145*l.*, one million sterling more than the original contract, 2760.—The City of London, over which the jurisdiction of the corporation extends, is only about one twenty-fourth part of the uncovered area of the metropolis, and one-twelfth part of the area built over, 2761.—On some occasions the corporation appear to represent the metropolis, but it is one of the prerogatives to which they have no claim, and which should be taken from the local government of the City, and given to the metropolitan municipality. With respect to the conservancy of the river, and metropolitan improvements, thinks that the power of interfering with any measures that affect the interest of the whole metropolis should be taken from the corporation and placed in other hands. Shows Sir Christopher Wren's plan for the improvement of the City after the fire of London, which could not be carried out owing to the obstructive spirit of the corporation of that day. Notwithstanding the security of the Act to which Mr. Pulling referred, the corporation have allowed the river to be encroached upon and built over, and this process of encroachment is still going on; see an instance in a building on the south bank, erected in 1850, which projects twelve feet into the river beyond the stairs of London Bridge, destroying the ornamental character of the bridge, and which would interfere with any future plans which the Government may have to embank or throw open that side of the river as a public thoroughfare, 2762.—The building referred to is a large block, let to different parties, partly as chambers, partly as wharf warehouses. Knows that in several improvements going on, the obstructive spirit of the corporation has affected their progress. Since attention was first drawn to Mr. Martin's plan for the embankment of the river, has been led to inquire into the nature of the obstacles which have occasioned the delay. Finds that they have arisen chiefly out of a contest about the proceeds of the 8*d.* coal duty. The committee of the House of Commons which sat upon metropolitan improvements, from 1838 to 1840, reported in favour of a number of improvements at the West End, especially as connected with New Oxford Street, which it was thought could be effected by a surplus anticipated of the 8*d.* duty, over and above the amount granted for the London Bridge approaches, &c. But the corporation having been accustomed for many years to administer the whole proceeds of this duty were extremely disinclined to relinquish their grasp, and they brought forward a plan for improving the approaches to the Royal Exchange. The two parties were in mutual opposition. The surveyors to the corporation, Mr. Richard Lambert Jones and Mr. Higgins, were continually before different committees of the House of Commons, giving evidence against the plans of the Woods and Forests, and attempting to show that many of the proposed improvements were not required, and others could be executed for a smaller sum; their object, of course, being to secure a larger residue of the 8*d.* duty, for the administration of the corporation. In the report of 1838, question 137, Mr. Jones is found giving evidence against the necessity of pulling down Middle Row, Holborn. Again, in question 1201, he objects to Mr. Pennethorne's plan of a new street from Leicester Square to Long Acre. In question 1,227 he is giving evidence against the line proposed from Bow Street to Holborn. The result of this was that the suggestions of the corporation were to a considerable extent adopted. They cut down the sum destined for metropolitan improvements proposed by the Woods and Forests, from 638,000*l.* to 390,000*l.*, and most seriously marred them. For example, it was originally proposed that there should be a new line of street from Waterloo Bridge to Upper Gower Street and the Regent's Park, of the same character as Regent Street, which is the kind of thoroughfare the metropolis ought to have had in connexion with Waterloo Bridge. As now carried out it is one of the most unsatisfactory improvements we have seen effected, 2763.—Mr. Pennethorne proposed that Bow Street should be continued into High Holborn by a perfectly straight line. From economical considerations, suggested by the corporation, that line was given up, and it is now a crooked line by turning round a sharp angle to the left, and widening Belton Street. There are old houses on the one side and new ones on the other; and the value of the frontage has been so much affected by it that half the ground is not built on to this day, 2764.—Cannot now state the precise sums of which the application was disputed. A number of Acts have been passed in reference to the coal duties since that time. The first question raised was about the application of a surplus of 200,000*l.* Subsequently it was determined to extend the 8*d.* duty to 1862, 2765.—The money which has been spent in City improvements of late years has been ill applied in this sense, that none of those improvements have been sufficiently considered in reference to the wants of the metropolis as a whole. Refers to the widening and continuation of New Cannon Street. As a local improvement it may be considered a satisfactory one; but, in reference to metropolitan objects, it is not the arterial communication that ought to have been carried out. It brings the whole traffic of the eastern part of the metropolis into St. Paul's Churchyard, and down the steep and narrow declivity of Ludgate Hill into Fleet Street, which should have been avoided, and a new main street made leading from London Bridge direct to Charing Cross. Before this improvement was set on foot, the Committee of the House of Commons had recommended that there should be an embankment on the north bank of the Thames, from Charing Cross to London Bridge. It would then have been easy to have made this new artery of the City run on to the new embankment at Blackfriars Bridge, and then at once to Charing Cross by the shortest route, 2766.—The metropolis being left without adequate municipal representation, an obstacle to constructive improvement, before any metropolitan improvements are submitted to Parliament, they should be referred to some body which should collect the sentiments of the metropolitan constituency generally, 2767.—The corporation, as the chief municipal body of the City of London, ought to have taken upon itself the poor-law administration. The proposition that the City should, for the administration of the poor rate, be formed into one union, was successfully opposed by individuals seeking personal appointments under the local unions they wished to create. The City having three unions, when one would suffice, has cost at least 300,000*l.*, 2768.—Under one union the poor would have been more efficiently relieved, 2769.—The whole of the extra expense has been a mere charge of establishment management. The poor have greatly suffered by the existing system. Statement in confirmation, 2770.—There are at present three unions in the City of London, the City of London Union, the West London Union, and the East London Union, 2771.—Had there been no corporation in existence when these unions were formed, they would probably have been consolidated into one. The extravagant expenditure of the City of London workhouse may perhaps be traced to a spirit of Mansion House emulation, 2772.

HICKSON, WILLIAM EDWARD, Esq. (Second Examination.)—States his views with regard to the remedial measure desirable to be applied to the municipal government of London, keeping in mind that the local interests of the City should always be considered in relation to those of the other metropolitan districts by which it is surrounded. First, with regard to free trade; next, the application to the City of London of the first clause of the Municipal Reform Act, respecting charters and prescriptive rights, and the conservancy of the river, which is at this time the subject of a Chancery suit between the Woods and Forests and the corporation. It has already lasted many years, and no one knows when it will terminate, 2946.—Believes that, before the Municipal Reform Act, the conservancy of rivers was vested in other corporations, 2947.—It still exists in the case of Liverpool, but cannot be certain. Would not restore this conservancy to the corporation of London, nor to any strictly municipal body. Would have it provisionally handed over to the Woods and Forests till a special department for rivers and watercourses is provided. Would not restore the City corporation the right of excluding the City from the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police. Gives reasons, 2948, 2949.—Fears misapprehension might arise from an answer given at his last examination, in reference to the proportion of the area of the metropolis to the City. Has since ascertained that the area watched over by the metropolitan police is as much as 700½ square miles, by a body of 5,600, while the City of London only occupies an area of 1½ square miles, watched over by 500 policemen, exclusive of City marshalmen, ward constables, and private watchmen of the Tempie, the large banks and warehouses. Connected with this subject of administrative functions is the propriety of abolishing the right of general taxation, such as coal duty, wine duty, apprentice fees, and others. If it is proposed to abolish indirect taxation, in the shape of exclusive privileges affecting fellowship porters and others, instead of making a new corporation, it would be better to make an end of all imposts of that kind, 2950.—There are many reasons why the whole 4*d.*, 8*d.*, and 1*d.* duties should be abolished. When sitting as a member of the Hand Loom Inquiry Commission some time ago, had a good deal of evidence brought forward, showing that the pauperism which prevailed in places where the trade of woollen and silk weaving had formerly flourished was owing to the high price of fuel. Thinks if there is to be a duty at all, it should be levied at the pit's mouth, not in the port of London, and the drawback allowed upon coal carried to those parts where there are no coal fields, 2951.—This observation applies more to the coal duty as a general tax than a tax for local purposes, but as we are considering whether the power of levying coal duties is to be given to the new corporation, it comes before us now from the extreme dearness of both food and fuel in London, 2952.—Is not proposing that the whole proceeds of the coal tax should be applied to the City of London, but merely stating the principle upon which to proceed if there is a coal tax, but thinks it is a tax which a free trade government should get rid of. Has always insisted on the propriety of these coal duties appearing in the annual accounts of the corporation of London. Very little is known of the gross proceeds of the coal duties, and of deductions for collection. In the collection of duties of those that come by railway, the corporation is obliged to associate itself with the railway companies. The rule is, for the railway companies to send an account of the number of tons carried, certified by one of their officers, and for the corporation to take it for granted that no more have been imported by railway into London. If the duties are continued, there should be a much more searching inquiry than has yet been attempted. Would wish to know how much ought to be received, what is received, how much stays by the way on its passage into the London coffers, what precautions are taken to prevent coals being smuggled into London; for instance, coals deposited twenty-five miles from St. Paul's might easily be brought within the prescribed boundary along the turnpike road by waggon, 2953.—This would not be worth while for the whole distance, but it would for five or ten miles. Thinks a great deal of coal finds its way within the prescribed boundary without paying duty. The corporation employ scouts upon the high roads to check these proceedings, but this is an objectionable system. Does not know how much of the loans raised upon the coal duties remains unredeemed. Gives calculations to show that a single penny rate (which might be called a coal duty compensation rate) on the rental of the whole metropolis would produce the amount. 2954.—In addition to the penny rate, a fund sufficient for the ultimate redemption of the rate might be raised by a separate assessment on the owners of furnace chimnies, 2955.—With regard to the separate sewerage of the City, would not limit the powers of the municipal board in that or any other matters by any other rule than a general subordination of all local interests to public interests, and an accordance with the common laws of the land. But the direction of the main sewers and outfalls of the metropolis should be intrusted to a board representing not a section but the whole. Hopes ultimately to see a board composed of men of special qualification for the task, appointed by a metropolitan council, 2956.—Would give the local body every power they could exercise in a proper manner, always arranging that the greater interest should be able to overrule the less. In paving the City of London the side streets might be left to the paving board appointed by the municipal council of the City, but a metropolitan supervision is required over our great arterial communications. Under the present divided and conflicting jurisdiction, we see them under repair, from one cause or another, all the year round, 2957.—With regard to great measures of improvement affecting the whole metropolis, would have a metropolitan board. Would give the district municipality full power to effect district improvements, but would have all local plans submitted to the metropolitan board in the first instance, so that they might be made to accord, 2958.—Does not think that the lighting need be taken from the local municipality, but would have a general understanding that its bye-laws might be overruled either by the Legislature or a municipal council for the whole metropolis, whenever they interfered with metropolitan interests. Would give to the municipal council of the City the power to elect a board of guardians, to carry out for the City the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act. Shows that that Act has failed in the City. Would propose to give to the new municipal corporation the consolidation of the numerous City parishes. The burden of church rates is very serious, and as long as the present system is maintained, there can be no reduction, as every parish, however small, must have its separate staff of officers, 2959.—There are always some connected with parochial administration who have particular reasons for proposing the building of a new church, or the repairing an old, and large sums are continually being expended upon such objects. Mentions several instances. Among the functions to be given to a new municipality should be that of conferring with the ecclesiastical authorities, and preparing for Parliament a bill for the consolidation of City parishes into fewer districts, 2960.—A measure of consolidation would affect the funds relating to both ecclesiastical and secular objects. Would also give to the municipal council of the City power to assist by a committee the new charity commissioners in their investigation, and to employ a legal officer as a public prosecutor where necessary. The next point is the subject of a municipal elective qualification. There are different kinds of constituencies for the various local boards, and is inclined to think, upon the whole, the best is that of the Poor Law Amendment Act,—the qualification of electors voting for a board of guardians, which gives a vote to all rate payers and owners of property, 2961.—This involves a system of plural voting, which is not urged as its chief recommendation, but wishes to show that resident household suffrage would not meet the case of the City, as most of its principal men are not resident there, 2962.—Would not be afraid of out-voters being brought up for these municipal elections, as in this case the out-voters would be a class of men not likely to be influenced by local jobbing. The great danger to be guarded against is, the canvassing private friends whenever patronage has to be exercised, or some profitable contract obtained. A quorum of guardians sufficient for a board is often made with difficulty; but when new appointments are to be made, or contracts for clothing or provision given, then there is a full attendance; the reason is, that parties interested have been going from guardian to guardian soliciting their attendance and votes, 2963.—The system of out-voters has a tendency to increase the expense of elections, but not, as under the Poor Law Amendment Act, to any great extent, 2964.—Under the Poor Law Act the owners of property are allowed to vote by voting papers, which materially limits the expense. Thinks it a great improvement in the mode of election, and would much like to see it extended to the Parliamentary franchise, 2965, 2966.—Believes that it has worked satisfactorily where it has been tried, and in some cases has overruled public-house influence, and rescued a parish from jobbers. The question of qualification involves another, and that is, the constitution of the London chartered companies. Hitherto no person has been allowed to vote at common hall elections without having taken up his livery in one other of those corporations. The chartered companies therefore form a part of our existing municipal constitution. In modifying that constitution, what is the constituency these companies should represent for the future, and what is to be done with the funds which they claim as their private property, and which, at the lowest estimate, are supposed to amount to 250,000*l.* per annum. Should like to see the parties clearly defined by Act of Parliament who are to hold this property, and the uses to which it is to be applied, 2967.—These funds are chiefly derived from estates, but those estates were purchased with the produce of municipal fines. Within the last forty years no person could take up his livery at a less expense than 50*l.*, 2968.—If the connexion between these companies and the City was severed the fines would cease, but the property they have produced would continue to exist, 2969.—The purposes for which these estates will be used has to be defined. The last Commission sought an explanation from the chartered companies of the nature of their property, and what they did with it, but they declined to give any information, and can only be compelled to do so by Act of Parliament. Thinks that this Commission should have its powers extended, or that a new commission of inquiry be appointed, assisted by men able to form a sound opinion of all the points at issue. Would rather divide the whole of this wealth between the masters and wardens of these companies, when, perhaps, it would be made a better use of, than that the existing system of eating and drinking should be continued. Another point is, the system of representation. It is time to lay down some consistent rule on that subject, 2970.—All elections should be so conducted that every elector should be able to exercise an intelligent choice, which in case of election by large batches is impossible, 2971, 2972.—Would recommend that every elector should have but one representative, 2973.—Would divide the City into ten wards. Would have ten candidates elected in each ward, but every elector in each ward should vote for only one of them. Begs to put in a paper containing the sketch of a scheme of municipal representation, which has been carried out, and works satisfactorily. Does not fully agree with the latter part of this scheme. Would not make the aldermen magistrates; and supposing the municipal council of the City to consist of 100 members, would give them power to elect from their own number 10 aldermen and a mayor, 2974.—It should be obligatory that the mayor should be chosen from the body of common council, as it is necessary that every individual elected to an important office should have had some previous training, and it is generally best that he should have passed through the inferior offices before he arrives at the higher, 2975–2977.—This system has debarred the first-class merchants from accepting the office of chief magistrate, because the sphere of usefulness open to them in the corporation was of too circumscribed a character; but give them something to do for the effectual benefit of their fellow citizens, and they would allow themselves to be put in nomination for a municipal election, 2978.

Hopwood, Mr. Samuel Weymouth. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Attends this commission in the capacity of clerk to the commissioners for paving of St. Andrew's Holborn and St. George the Martyr. Is instructed to attend to object to the continuance of the street toll levied upon carts of non-freemen entering the City. The commissioners have petitioned the House of Commons, and also the common council, with a view of obtaining the abolition of this toll; but the petition, when presented to the common council, was not considered in any way, but ordered to lie on the table. The manor of Hendon is exempted from this toll by charter. The principal thoroughfare from the City traverses the united parishes, and that is Holborn. They have no toll whatever to assist them in maintaining their streets; the whole of the burden is raised by rates upon the parishioners. Holborn alone costs 700*l.* a year to keep in repair. If relieved of the City traffic that expense would of course be much reduced, 4288, 4289.—In many instances the parishioners object to the amount of the toll, particularly those engaged in the corn trade. Even a laundress's cart in coming from the eastward to the City pays a toll of 2*d.* When they hire vans, the toll is always taken into calculation, 4290.—They pay every time they go into the City, 4291.—The mode of compounding for the tolls is to purchase your freedom, 4292.—Supposes owners of carts might compound with the lessee of the toll to pay so much a month, but has never heard of an instance, 4293.—Although there are not bars at each of the entrances to the City, they have appointed toll collectors, who immediately distinguish the cart of a freeman by its bearing the City arms, which it usually does, or by some other means, from that of a non-freeman, 4294, 4295.

Hubbard, J. G., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a governor of the Bank of England, 632.—Has been for twenty-five years a merchant in the City of London, but has never resided there, 633–636.—As a merchant, his only connexion with the corporation of the City has been on the arrival of grain ships having to apply at the Mansion House for the Lord Mayor's order to the sworn meters to measure the cargo, 637.—Does not complain of the system of the City of London with regard to the metage of corn. The order costs 5*s.* 6*d.*, 638.—Has no cause to complain, either as to their charges or the manner in which the meters perform this service, 639.—Does not consider the charge immoderate, 640.—The meters measure the cargo, 641.—Knows nothing of the constitution of the corporation, 642.—Was once invited to take an alderman's gown, but declined. States reasons, 643.—Knows very little of Liverpool or any other great town; but knowing what was required for the office, if accepted, in the City of London, came to the conclusion that it was impossible for him to accept it, 644.—If it could be possible to put the office of lord mayor upon a higher footing, so as to make it appear that one's duty required it to be accepted, it would then assume a totally different character; but hardly knows what would be the office of lord mayor in such a case, 645.—The amount of pageantry which now surrounds the office of lord mayor would be no inducement to a first-rate merchant to accept the office, 646.—Is not intimately acquainted with any member of the corporation, except one alderman who served the office of lord mayor, and is a member of the direction of the Bank of England, Alderman Thompson. Has not been so situated as to learn anything of their constitution, and has formed no opinion on the subject, 647, 648.—Cannot say whether any difference has taken place in the magisterial functions since the passing of the Municipal Reform Act, 649.

Humphrey, John, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been an alderman of the City of London between 18 and 19 years, 8338, 8339.—Is a governor of the Irish Society, and has been so since 1843, 8340.—The governors are elected according to the charter; they must be aldermen of the City. They are elected in the Court of Common Council assembled in February in every year. The new members are also elected; it has been the practice for years to re-elect the governor. He is sworn in with the deputy-governor and the other new members, 8341.—It is not the practice to re-elect the deputy-governor. He is elected in the second year of his membership. The Court of Assistants go to a ballot at their last meeting in February, and whoever gets the majority of votes is recommended to the Court of Common Council to be the deputy-governor, and is generally elected, 8342.—It is the habit of the governor to take an active part personally in the management of the affairs of the society. Witness, since he has been in that office, has invariably been at the meetings, 8343.—The charter calls upon the Court of Common Council to elect five aldermen and eighteen members out of the commonalty of the City. They were formerly appointed from the twelve chief companies; but they now elect from all the companies, and also from the freemen of the City, the assistants to the governor and deputy-governor of the society, 8344.—They hold their offices for two years. The charter says half of them must go out every year, and they are not re-eligible till a year has passed. There is nothing to prevent their being then re-elected. It sometimes happens that they do not get re-elected, 8345.—There are two committees of the society, one is the Law and Parliamentary Committee; that committee is formed at the beginning of the year, of nine members, the governor and deputy-governor. If there are any solicitors they are always put upon this committee, which does not change. Then there is a sub-committee, consisting of eight members, with the governor and deputy governor, who consider every memorial and all other matters connected with the business of the society. That committee is partly changed every month, 8346.—Those committees usually sit for two or three hours once a month, and oftener if the business requires, 8347, 8348.—They take all the memorials of different parties connected with the society's estates, &c., into their consideration, and go through all applications for money, for donations, and for any improvements in buildings, &c., &c., that may be required, 8349.—There are many memorials requiring things to be done which the society cannot go into at all. With respect to the 1,500 acres, they had that subject before them for a number of days in the years 1847 and 1848. The corporation of Derry sent a memorial with a deputation to the society respecting claims which witness thought they could not receive until it was ascertained that the deputation had full power to enter into such an arrangement as might be mutually agreed upon, so that no dispute might afterwards arise on the part of the corporation of Derry. The deputation went back to Ireland and returned with the document, sealed by the corporation of Londonderry. Witness reads the document. They had a number of meetings with respect to that subject, and agreed at last to a resolution, which was signed by witness, the deputy-governor, and all the members of the Irish Society present, and also by the four gentlemen who came from Derry authorized with that document. Reads the resolution, 8350.—Considers that agreement as pledging the Irish Society to the grant mentioned in the agreement, 8351.—Does not believe that there would be on the part of the Irish Society a moment's hesitation in paying the money. From witness's knowledge of the corporation of London, and of the 130 members elected to the Irish Society since he has been governor, can speak positively of the deep anxiety always felt to fulfil their obligations; and though this grant may be said to be, from time to time, subject to the approval of the Court of Assistants, feels quite sure that they would always feel themselves legally and equitably bound to pay the 1,200*l.*, 8352.—There is no doubt the society felt they had a claim in equity upon them. Being trustees, as they are, for the benefit of that part of Ireland, the society believed, and still believe, that there was an equitable claim upon them for the benefit of the corporation, 8353.—Formerly the corporation of Londonderry was part and parcel of the corporation of London. Their byelaws were sent up to London to be approved of by them, 8354.—Thinks the business of the 1,500 acres had partly to do with this agreement. They had been for years claiming those 1,500 acres, although it has been shown by Act of Parliament that they had no legal claim whatever. Considered that the only way of getting rid of this claim, which had been settled 150 years ago, was to endeavour to settle it amicably, 8355.—Believes that that constituted the main inducement to make this grant, and also a wish to come to a harmonious understanding with the corporation of Derry, 8356.—Have made no agreement with the town of Coleraine to devote a stipulated sum for public purposes there. When those gentlemen arrived at Londonderry, at the first town council held at Londonderry, it was moved, seconded, and resolved unanimously: "That this council think it due to the honourable the Irish Society to record, by a vote of the corporation, their great satisfaction that the disputes for some time past so unhappily existing have been terminated, and that in such a manner as to exhibit the good feeling and the liberality of the society, and to lead to the reasonable expectation of the speedy improvement and prosperity of the borough. Signed, Alexander Lindsay, mayor." This resolution was remitted, and they have not heard any complaints since. Sir Robert Ferguson told the commission that they made a claim for 5,000*l.* in the case of the waterworks. It is quite true, that claims are made for compensation before committees of the House of Commons to a much greater extent than it is anticipated the parties will ever get. The water-mill there was to be greatly injured by taking away the water. The corporation gave the tenant who held the lease 1,500*l.* for his interest in the water, and at the end of his term the society will be deprived of the greater part, if not the entire of the water of the mill. There are about 29 years of the lease to run, and they gave 510*l.* So in the case of the cemetery, they took away near 17 acres of land in the best part of Derry, producing a rental of near 50*l.* per acre, and it will produce a large revenue to the corporation of Derry, it being a public cemetery. The society asked 1,500*l.*, not the full value of it; but 1,000*l.* was accepted and paid. They immediately put that 1,000*l.* out to interest, in order to pull down all those horrible mud cottages which are filled with large families of the most wretched description, and to lay out 1,000*l.* every year to rebuild all those poor people's cottages, that the society may have model cottages throughout their estates, as an example to the county, and to give them the opportunity of living in a different style to that in which they now live. That could not be done before, because in 1843 there was owing of money borrowed about 15,000*l.* Sir Robert Ferguson has said that they borrowed it without any security, but if they did so they have been enabled to repay the same with interest. They have paid all the law expenses which were owing to the amount of nearly 20,000*l.* They only got out of debt last year; and do not now owe one shilling. They have still kept up, and considerably increased their schools and charities; and, now coming into their rental free from debt and law expenses, they will be enabled to confer greater benefits in improvements, schools, &c., &c., both at Coleraine and Londonderry. To show what they wish to do mentions a little circumstance connected with the bequest of Mrs. McGee, a lady in Dublin, who about eight years ago left 20,000*l.* to establish a Presbyterian college, for the education of young men in preparation for the Christian ministry of the Presbyterian church in Ireland. There were three trustees, who considered whether it should be at Belfast, Coleraine, or Londonderry. They could not get sufficient assistance from the inhabitants of Coleraine, therefore they then went to Derry, the inhabitants of which came forward rather liberally, and the trustees then came to the Irish Society, Sir Robert Ferguson being at the head of the deputation. It was agreed to give them 20 acres of land down by the lower part of Derry, suitable, as they said, and convenient to the town, as the town was increasing in that direction. About three or four months ago they found there was some little difficulty about the present occupiers; therefore they bought land on the opposite side of the road, of a Mr. Gilliland, giving 1,800*l.* for less than seven acres, and rent about 20*l.* per annum; and they still wanted the 20 acres of land, that they might use it for the benefit of the college. It was then suggested that as they could not give them that land, they should give the trustees 500*l.* Thought that was insufficient, and suggested that they should at once recommend to the county to give 1,000*l.*, 8358.—They went over to Mr. Gibson, and he thought they were wrong in not endeavouring to get possession of the 20 acres of land. They afterwards sent the society a letter, thanking them for the grant; and they are to receive 1,000*l.* when the building is completed, according to the plan, 8359.—The detail business of the society is done by the committee which witness speaks of. The agent in Ireland, Mr. Wm. Green, manages the house property and the farms. He receives all the rents except the fisheries rent and slob reclaimed, which are paid into the banks of Derry, Coleraine, and London, 8360.—When any small point arises with regard to the detailed management of the property, if there is anything which they require, either in Derry, Coleraine, or any part of the county, they memorialize the society, and that memorial is sent to Mr. Green, in Derry; he reports upon it, and gives his opinion in writing, and that report, when it comes to London, the committees go into and form their opinions, 8361.—Thinks he has some discretion left to him upon trifling points, but that he would not like to do anything without consulting the society, 8362.—The committees of the society are not numerous. The Law and Parliamentary Committee consists of the governor, the deputy-governor, and nine of the members; the sub-committee consists of the governor, the deputy-governor, and eight of the members, 8363.—Small points are sent to the secretary and he lays them before the committee when they meet, and they are discussed and decided on. The committee state what their opinion is to the court, and the court ratifies or not the report of the committee, 8364.—Does not know whether the London secretary has much knowledge of landed property, but he knows the condition of all the property which belongs to the society, 8365.—Is in the habit of consulting him with regard to those improvements which arise, involving the details of the management of the estates in Ireland. It was said the other day that he was elected for life; that is not so. The secretary and the general agent in Ireland, and all the other officers, are elected annually, 8366.—Thinks he (witness) has sufficient personal acquaintance with the Irish estates to be able to form a judgment upon those points, 8368.—It was very properly said here that the society are a moveable body. If a society understands the claims of the parties, and they afterwards go out in February, and new ones come in who may be prejudiced in some way against the opinions or decisions of the former members of the society, sometimes little difficulties arise in the management of the affairs. They have a surveyor in Ireland, who is annually elected; he advises with Mr. Green upon all matters relating to the estates, 8369.—Generally speaking, they follow the advice of their resident agent and surveyor with respect to small points of detail. Mr. Green is a very kind-hearted man, and sometimes he gives an opinion in favour of the tenants, more than the Irish Society think is required; they do not therefore always agree with his recommendations. Gives an instance, 8370.—Considers the prospects of the Irish Society to be very good, 8371.—They do not owe a shilling, and they hope to have a considerable surplus yearly, which it is intended to expend on the improvements of their property in the county of Derry, 8372.—Their income last year amounted to 10,000*l.*, 8373.—Formerly the expenses of management were much greater than they are now, and thinks they might still be reduced, 8374.—The expenses of management in Ireland at present are 116*l.* for general agency and petty expenses; salaries to agent, and deputy vice admiral and surveyor 840*l.* In England there are incidental expenses, such as the wages of a clerk and messenger, taxes, coals, gas, printing, &c., &c., 376*l.*; secretary's salary, 500*l.*; the fees to members, &c., &c., according to the standing order, must not exceed 600*l.*, 8375.—There are always expenses for law, 8376.—Thinks the law expenses for the current year might be put down at 300*l.*, 8377.—Has no doubt that 2,000*l.* appears to be a very large expenditure for the management of a trust fund of this description, but, considering the low rents and the immense extent of property under the management of the society, the case is altered, 8378.—Is not aware of any means by which they could be diminished unless they had all their establishment in one place, 8379.—Substantially the government of the society is in London; it is so provided in the charters of James and Charles, 8380.—If you have a body of gentlemen forming a society like this, they expect to receive some small remuneration for their attendance, and they are paid to a certain extent. What witness has received averages from 18*l.* to 30*l.* a year. The deputy-governor has nearly as much; the amount of line money paid last year to all the members was about 204*l.* The next point is the salaries of the officers, they seem to be the only other large amounts which could be reduced, 8381.—It would not be desirable to underpay them, as you would run the risk of their jobbing in some other way, 8382.—Does not think that it would be desirable that the property should be sold, the proceeds invested, and the interest of the money administered in the same way as the proceeds of the estates are. The property could not be sold by the society without public competition. The tenants would get different landlords than they now have, who would exact every shilling of rent from them. In the case of Mr. Babington and Mr. Moore, who have each a lease, with 41 years to come, if these farms were sold, they would not be able to get renewals upon such good terms as they could from the Irish Society, 8383.—Does not think they could be sold to produce as much money at three per cent. as would enable the society to confer all the benefits which it now does on the community, for which the society was created, 8384.—The whole of the expenses could be saved; you must put down at least one-half for the expense of management in Ireland, so that the trust might be fulfilled, 8385.—The society would be disposed to give, to persons really anxious to improve the property, as long leases as they could. It is, however, quite a different question if the tenant asks for a lease in perpetuity. Believes nearly the whole of Coleraine and a great part of Derry is at this moment leased in perpetuity, and the society think that the parties, generally speaking, have not carried out the covenants; the consequence has been that the improvement of the property has not taken place to the extent which the society could have wished to see, 8386.—With regard to waterside property at Derry, has no doubt the society would give their tenant Mr. Munns a long lease at a moderate rent, if he would pull down and rebuild in a substantial and uniform manner. The warehouse he has built as a spinning mill is one which he would not be allowed to erect on the City property in London. In Belfast there are buildings carried up in a very spirited manner. The answer is, "We in Derry have not money, and cannot do it here," 8387.—Has not seen any valuable buildings, on long leases, belonging to the society, except in the case of Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington; they have improved their farms, and put buildings on them which are creditable to them and to the whole of the county, 8388.—The society are quite willing to give Mr. Munn a sufficient term upon which he might improve his property at the waterside, if so inclined, 8389.—There was an old standing order made in 1832, and printed and published in 1847, the object of which was to improve the property as much as possible, and to prevent jobbing. Is sure that the society has been and is prepared to grant long leases, if they are assured of the improvement of the property, 8390.—Long leases have been given in the case of improving tenants. Mr. Moore's first lease was 41 years, and the society added 20 years to it, and he now wishes for a further term of 20 years, 8391.—Thinks that the rule, not to allow tenants to renew till within three years of the expiration of their lease, if constantly acted on, would be an effectual bar against all improvements in the hands of a tenant. The society is prepared now, if a man has a lease with 10 or 15 years to run, to grant him such an extension of his lease as would give him sufficient opportunity of repaying himself for the money which he has laid out, 8393.—Does not think that disposition of the society has been sufficiently known in Derry to induce those who may take advantage of it to do so, 8394.—It is desirable that that disposition should be generally known in Derry, and acted upon, not as a matter of favour, but as a matter of principle, 8397.—Believes the property of the society to be simply a trust property; they never look only to Derry and Coleraine, but give donations throughout the whole county for charitable purposes; they pay 430*l.* a year to the free school which has been spoken of; they keep a school at Coleraine and pay the master 65*l.* a year, the mistress 40*l.*, and other sums to the school, amounting to 250*l.* a year, 8398.—The inhabitants of Coleraine complain that they do not receive a fair share of the funds which the society have to distribute, which complaint can be justified, for nearly the whole of Coleraine is on perpetuity leases, therefore the society have no power to improve the property. With respect to the fisheries mentions that, when Sir G. Hall had them, he paid the society 1,250*l.* per annum, and he under-let and mortgaged them; they have now let them to Mr. R. Allen for 5, 7, or 10 years. He pays 2,325*l.* a year. With respect to the difficulty in dealing with fishermen, wishes to mention that the society, after paying 3,000*l.* and some hundreds to their solicitor in Dublin, for fighting the battle about the advowsons of the Bishop of Derry, received a bill from him up to 1842 for 5,762*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* After a long dispute he at last agreed that they should pay him 3,000*l.* in discharge of this 6000*l.* bill, which they did, and he gave a receipt in full for his account up to that time, 8399.—Does not see that this property, involving all this litigation, is an unfortunate one for trustees to hold, they having been in possession for so long; does not think any one could manage the estates better than the society does, 8400.—The Irish Society have not been as cautious in avoiding litigation as a private proprietor would have been. They would have got into an expense from 8,000*l.* to 10,000*l.* more in the advowsons' suits if witness had not set his face against it, and with the support of the then society put a stop to litigation, 8401.—Nothing can be better than the condition of the society, now they are out of debt, and in a position to do all the good contemplated in the charter. If the expenses of management were reduced, the money saved would also go to the improvement of Londonderry and of Coleraine, 8402.—There is a law suit at present going on, the consequence of the decision of the majority of the court to try whether they could not obtain some benefit from the perpetuity leases being converted into fee farm rents, 8403.—At the time that part of Ireland was confiscated to the Crown, the money that the corporation of London required to erect and build the city of Derry and the town of Coleraine the companies were compelled to find, which was paid to the City of London, and the City created the city and town. After that was done, the London companies required some return for the money so advanced, and there was a distribution of the lands between the twelve companies. After apportioning their allotments of land in Londonderry, the charter gave to the corporation of London the right to the city of Derry and borough of Coleraine, with the fisheries, and certain other things which they had to manage in trust, to the benefit of those two places, 8404.—The original object was to create and improve those two towns of Derry and Coleraine, and to encourage the Protestant religion in those two places, 8405.—Generally speaking the Irish Society does not give contributions to Roman Catholic chapels and schools, 8406.—The tenants of the society are generally Protestant but not exclusively, 8407.—There is no preference given to one religion over another, 8408.—Thinks the original objects, as expressed in the charter of James, have been substantially fulfilled, 8409.—Was not a member of the society when the suit of the Skinners Company was commenced, 8410.—The circumstances which gave rise to the suit were these. The society, instead of laying out their surplus rents and profits in the improvement of Derry and Coleraine, had accumulated a sum of money which they divided among the twelve companies, about 500*l.* to each company, 8411.—The society was not in debt at that time, 8412.—The Skinners Company, finding that no further surplus was coming, brought an action, and said that the Irish Society were merely trustees for the companies, 8413.—That action was brought in consequence of the discontinuance of the practice of dividing the surplus among the companies. The corporation, moreover, threw open, about twenty-two years ago, the election to the society. Formerly the governor and assistants must have been members of one of the twelve companies. They found that in practice they had not a sufficient number of men belonging to the twelve companies, and threw the election open, and allowed any person to be elected who was a member of any other of the City companies, or a freeman of London. That continues to be the case up to the present day. There are some members now who do not belong to any company, but are only freemen, 8414.—That alteration was made by a resolution of the Court of Common Council, 8415.—The decision of Lord Langdale was to the effect that the Irish Society were trustees only for public purposes, 8416.—When Lord Lyndhurst had given his judgment in the House Lords, witness immediately said, "This certainly confirms my opinion that the surplus money that we have from rents and other sources in Derry and Coleraine must and ought to go to the benefit of those two towns, and it ought not to accumulate, to be given to the companies at all; because, if it does accumulate, the companies would claim the surplus, 8418.—If there are preferable objects for disposing of the society's funds in other parts of the Irish plantation, they give a portion of them to those other places, 8419.—Poor Presbyterian clergy may have come to the society and applied for a donation for building or improving a chapel. They have taken that into consideration, and at times given donations for those purposes, 8419.—Does not consider that to be beyond the fair powers entrusted to them, 8420.—According to the present practice, the whole of the annual income is distributed for the benefit of the Irish plantation, 8421.—No portion is intended to be applied to the benefit of the twelve companies, as far as the present Court of Assistants are concerned, 8422.—The present views of the governing body are that the whole of the income should be appropriated for the benefit of the county of Londonderry, 8423.—The Irish Society conceive that they are justified, as trustees, in erecting buildings on their property. That is witness's opinion. Sir Robert Ferguson says that they have no right to do so. They are going to erect farm buildings for Mr. Osborn, a tenant, of a character which will show to other parts of Ireland what the society can do. They are also going to demolish some shocking places, where there is an accumulation of filth and wretchedness beyond all idea, and to drain and lay out the district, and build model cottages for the people who live there, 8424.—It has not been the practice for the society to erect buildings or drains; the tenants get their property at rents which would enable them to do it themselves. They have their farms generally on long leases and on very moderate terms, and they ought to lay out their money according to the covenants of their leases. Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington have laid out a great deal of money for improvements in their two farms. The society has not had money, 8425, 8426.—The common council have no power of applying any portion of the rents of the Irish Society to any purpose, either relating to the corporation or any other, 8427.—No attempt has ever been made by the corporation to interfere with the disposition of the funds of the Irish Society. With respect to Mr. Alderman Alsop, a sort of idea has run through the corporation that he and some members of the twelve companies, and others, received a pretty good compensation for all these perpetuity leases; it was a sort of job that was perpetrated. A dream has run through the society that there was a quid pro quo, 8428.—Does not think the transaction was beneficial to the town of Derry, 8429.—The Irish Society have not meddled in politics in later times, 8430.—On one occasion 3,000*l.* was put down as having been spent in an election at Coleraine when Mr. Alderman Thorpe was a candidate, 8431.—Inquired as to truth, and was told less than 1,000*l.* was taken from the funds of the society and expended in Coleraine, 8432.—That was about the year 1830, 8433.—Alderman Thorpe was governor of the society at that time. Mr. Babington wishes to show that he has been very much ill-used; he has a long lease at a very moderate rent, and if he were to say to the Irish Society, "whatever the value of my farm is now, will you give me a longer lease," is sure they would renew his lease from 40 to 61 years, provided he would pay the increased value, if any, of the farm from the end of his present term; does not think the society would give him a 21 years lease at the present rent. Dr. Miller has two farms, one his own and one his uncle's; he wished to have the two put together. Suggested that if they were put together the society would be inclined to give him a 61 years lease; directly he thought he could get a 61 years lease he said, unless I have a 99 years lease I will not take it. When he found the society would not give him a 99 years he wished to have a 61 years lease; then the society said no, you can have 20 acres to build upon for 61 years, but the remainder you can have at the present value for 21 years. Then he considered himself aggrieved, and said he had no opportunity of improving the property, 8434.—Thinks it would be better that the management of the society should be conducted on uniform principles, but it is impossible, 8435.—The body should remain on the society at least four years or even longer, 8436.—Their number at present is too great, 8437.—In the present instance the only opinion on which you can rely are the Irish authorities, the surveyor, and the resident agent, 8430.—Knows all the tenants in Ireland pretty well, and understands their wishes and wants, and with the entire management of the property would undertake to make them happy and contented, 8439.

HUMPHREY, JOHN, Esq. (Second Examination.)—It is quite true that leases in perpetuity are renewed every seventh year. According to the lease one year's rent is claimed of parties holding perpetuity, leases. They pay two years' rent every seventh year, which amounts to 2,515*l.* and odd. The secretary receives three guineas fee in addition to his salary at the renewal of those leases, for which he does not account to the society, 8451, 8452.—There are about 255 leases in perpetuity, which make about 800*l.* and odd every seventh year, being an addition of about 112*l.* per annum to his salary of 500*l.*, 8453.

HUSTINGS. (See Courts.)

HYDE, Mr. GEORGE. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a citizen of London for seventeen years, 1495.—Is in trade as sealingwax maker and stationer, 1496.—Resides at 61, Fleet Street, 1497.—Is totally unconnected with the corporation, 1498.—Was compelled to take up his freedom in 1846, being frightened by a lawyer's letter, and then paid 12*l.* 10*s.*, 1499.—Has never been a common councilman, and from his knowledge of the working of the constituency of London, should not feel honoured at being asked to take the office, 1500.—Has not paid particular attention to the working of the corporation system in detail, but has as connected with the working of the constituency upon the common councilmen, aldermen, lord mayor, and chamberlain, 1501.—Has seen many defects in the constituent body in the City of London, 1502.—The wards are too large, the constituency too narrow; its composition not worthy the City of London, 1503.—There would be as little difficulty in enlarging the constituency as in equalizing the wards, 1504.—The inequality of the wards is one of the glaring defects of the corporation of London, 1505.—Would not take the liverymen as the basis for the franchise. Would take as freemen those who have a decided interest in the City, 1506.—Would select occupiers paying rates as the constituency, and would preserve the franchise of the liverymen only as occupiers, not as liverymen, which is a most defective body, and within the last 200 years has become an exclusive one, which exclusiveness has worked much evil. It has tended to corrupt the representation, and to militate against the interests of the corporation of the City, 1507–1509.—Would make the aldermen as responsible as possible, and would have them elected every three years, 1510, 1511.—Would maintain a separate court of aldermen, and keep up their magisterial powers. In Liverpool they are not a separate court, but magistrates for the time being, 1512–1514.—Would reduce the present 26 wards to twelve, 1515.—Would combine the small wards, and divide Farringdon Without, 1516.—The radical defect in the corporation of London is its constituent body. Should go back to the old custom, that every occupier of a year and a day should be able to vote for the common councilmen, lord mayor, aldermen, and every corporate officer. The liverymen should have no exclusive privileges. Gives a case, 1517.—Would retain everything useful to the corporation, and would propose that every corporate officer should be elected in common hall by the whole constituent body of the corporation, 1518, 1519.—There should be a difference between the City of London and other towns, 1520.—The principle of taking the parliamentary constituency as the municipal one is open to grave defects, 1521.—Would preserve the title of lord mayor, but do away with the tinsel of the mayoralty, diminish the expense and increase the utility. You could get no better magistrates than the aldermen. Would make Southwark a municipal body totally independent of the City of London. Protests against the exclusive privileges of the livery, which are only of recent date, 1522, 1523. —Would restore the law to what it was before the act of George I. The law of the country has always presumed that all occupiers are freemen by right, 1524.—The accounts of the City of London are not kept in a businesslike manner, 1525.—Knows nothing of the financial accounts, 1526.—The common council should have the command of the corporate funds, and the exclusive power of voting money. There are too many corporate officers, and the payment too large. The emoluments of the chamberlain are about 3,200*l.* a year. The contests for the office are very expensive, but as it is virtually for life, it is worth while to spend 5,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* in the election. The contests for lord mayor are also very expensive. Does not believe there is any direct payment of money out of the corporate funds for the contest, 1527–1530.—Took part in the election in which Alderman Harmer was a candidate, in which the expenses incurred were for the purposes of indirect bribery. Was not on the committee, nor a voter, 1531–1536.—Contested elections in the City are very expensive, but thinks they would be much smaller if the constituency were larger, 1537–1541.—Does not think there is much corruption in the City elections. They are better than they were, 1542, 1543.

Improvements in the City:

There is now a report before the corporation for continuing the new line of street to Earl Street, at an expense of 195,000*l.* If approved, means must be adopted for raising the money, and an Act of Parliament applied for, Hall, 7325.—There is an item down of 20,000*l.* for public improvements, another 19,000*l.* for building lodging-houses for the poor, 58,000*l.* for the new metropolitan cattle-market in 1852, Elliot, 1120. The 4*d.* duty on coals, being levied on the whole metropolis, should be applied to public improvements, but is claimed by the City. Two millions of money are required for the improvements proposed by the corporation, Pearson, 5594-5602.—Shows and explains a map of the improvements which have been made, not only in the City, but at the west end of the town, by the Corporation, Key, 5907.—Improvements are going on in Threadneedle Street, Mark Lane, Dowgate Hill, and the formation of a street from Farringdon Street to Clerkenwell, Bunning, 6102.—In the case of Cannon Street the claims sent in for that line amounted to 1,177,153*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; they were settled at about one third less; about 300,000*l.* will be obtained back again in the rents; the loss is about 500,000*l.*; and the rest is made up by the sale of the frontages, ib. 6103-6106.—If the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty had been sufficient, between this and the year 1862, to pay off the debts specially affected to it, the ratepayers could not have been called on for an equivalent payment, as the corporation have no power to call upon them to contribute sums for improvements, Tyrrell, 7248.—Supposing a general power were given to levy an improvement rate, in lieu of the coal duty, thinks there would be difficulty in getting parties to agree to such a rate, and the money would not be so immediately and readily applicable as a fund arising from a certain duty like the coal duty, ib. 7249.—Those now pressed upon the corporation are Holborn Hill, Earl Street, and several others, involving an expenditure of about two millions for streets only, Hall, 7329.

Improvements, Holborn:

Is authorized by the corporation to say, that there is now a contemplated improvement for raising the valley of Holborn; the amount required is 333,000*l.* The corporation are ready to assist all in their power to carry out these great improvements, ib. 7328.—The City pay 9*d.* towards metropolitan improvements beyond their own 4*d.*, ib. 7341.

Improvements Committee:

In 1834 caused one of Wylde's maps of London to be marked with all the improvements called for by the wishes of the inhabitants, Dakin, 7361.—There have been immense improvements in the City during the last 30 years, not only in the abolition of offices and so on, but in the streets, Jones, 7798.

Income:

Of the City of London about 100,000*l.* or 130,000*l.* a year, Wallis, 1485.—Manner in which income of the corporation is employed, Cotton, 1825.

Inquest Men:

Thinks the continuance of the election throughout each of the 26 wards of the City of a score, or thereabouts, of inquest men, to serve upon the inquests for the ensuing year is an annoyance, because the duties of the inquest have almost entirely passed into the hands of paid officers appointed by the corporation, Waterlow, 2591.—Articles of the charge of the wardmote inquest; the oath of the foreman of the inquest; the oath of the rest of the inquest, ib. 2599.

Irish Society:

Statement with regard to, Acland, 553–556.—The committee has nothing to do with the management of the property belonging to it, Bennoch, 2040.—Is an independent society, and keep their own accounts, ib. 2134. — Patronage of eighteen Irish livings, Williams, 2814.—Particulars with regard to the management of the Irish Society, Finlay, 4275–4284.—The connexion between the corporation of London and the Irish Society is not very intimate, but some of the members of the corporation form the governor and assistants of the Irish Society. Does not think any jurisdiction is exercised over the municipalities of Londonderry and some other towns, Merewether, 5324–5330.—Does not see the use of it in its present position, Lord Mayor, 7211, 7212.—The Irish Society does not manage any portion of the estates which belong to different companies; but there was an Act of Parliament, constituting a society for managing certain estates in which the City have rights, and in which different persons have particular rights, Farebrother, 7223.—The office of deputy governor is annual, Dakin, 7420.—Origin of it, ib. 7421.—The lands of the Irish Society are Derry and Coleraine, and fisheries of the River Bann and Lough Foyle, ib. 7422, 7423.—Members elected from the corporation, ib. 7424–7428.—Expenditure and receipts of, submitted annually to the Court of Common Council, ib. 7434–7454.—No jurisdiction in Derry and Coleraine except as owners of property, ib. 7439.—Their part of the Irish estates better managed than the London companies, ib. 7445–7453.—The Common Council appoint the officers, ib. 7460.—Action with the Skinners Company, ib. 7430–7433.—The companies have a resident agent and officers to manage estates, ib. 7465.—Members obliged to be members of the corporation, ib. 7466–7468.—The corporation do not interfere in the management of the property, ib. 7473–7479.—The corporation has a visitorial power over it, ib. 7473–7477.—The accounts are audited, and annually sent to the corporation of London, the twelve companies, peers and members of Parliament connected with Ireland, and inserted in newspapers published in Derry, ib. 7479.—Has been a member of the Irish Society. After all the obligations of the trust are performed, the companies who originally contributed the money would be entitled to any residue, and not the corporation, which was only the medium by which the money was conveyed, ib. 7487–7490.—The affairs of the Irish Society are well managed, Blake, 7489–7495.—The members appointed by the corporation. 590*l.* 15*s.* allowed for attending fifty-four meetings, and their entertainments. Much property in Derry and Coleraine manager by an agent. Byelaws of the society. Receipts and expenses, Anderton, 7619–7694.—No necessity for so many members to visit the estates in Ireland, ib. 7696.—Restricted to giving aid to the locality of Londonderry and Coleraine, Jones, 7755.—Perpetuity leases discontinued as detrimental to its interest, ib. 7766.—Formerly appointed the recorder of Derry, but now the appointment is with the Crown. The society has no patronage, ib. 7770–7772.—Statements respecting it, ib. 7742–7797.—Its duties are incessant; secretary's salary somewhat increased. Decision in case of Skinners Company is, that the twelve companies are entitled to the surplus incomes. Causes of great expenses to the society. Up to 1831 it was necessary to be a member of one of the twelve companies to be eligible as a member of the Irish Society, since then every freeman is eligible, ib. 7748–7758.—Byelaws of the corporation of Derry and

Coleraine submitted to it, Anderton, 7774–7777.—Allow the corporation of Derry 700*l.* a year, ib. 7759–7770.—Secretary of, salary increased from 300*l.* to 400*l.* a year, ib. 7783.—Expenses of governor, deputy governor, and members limited to 600*l.* a year, ib. 7783.—Property under the lease system prosperous; income, 2,500*l.* a year, Hazlett, 8063.—Send everything to the House of Lords, ib. 8064.—Can never be serviceable to Derry and Coleraine as at present constituted, ib. 8073–8080.—Complains that they manage their property in a way inconvenient to the tenant, and very expensive as trust property, Babington, 8084–8091.

Rural Property. About 3,000 English acres; rental between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* a year, and none laid out on the property, ib. 8099–8105.

Leases. Not granted in a way to encourage tenants to improve, ib. 8107–8113.—Draws a distinction between the property of the Irish Society and that of the City companies, ib. 8114.—Thinks the constitution of the society most objectionable; it throws the entire government of this plantation into the hands of the London secretary, Colquhoun, 8119.

Derry. Brings forward a case to prove the injurious effects of the standing order with regard to the renewal of leases upon the city of Derry, and two or three cases to show the grasping propensity of the Irish Society, ib. 8120.—Objectionable that the bye-laws must be submitted to the Irish Society, ib. 8124–8126.—Particulars concerning the payment of 1,200*l.* a year by the Irish Society to the corporation of Derry, Franks, 8127–8137.—If all the town property of the society were sold, it would do more good than any system of management, and have a great effect upon the prosperity of the town, ib. 8138, 8139.—Particulars as to the litigation between the Irish Society and the Bishop of Derry, Ferguson, 8143.—(Free School.) Believes the society are not only competent but bound to make a grant in perpetuity for the endowment of a school, ib. 8143–8147.—Their payments to the corporation of Derry ought not to be optional, ib. 8156.—Considers that an enormous part of the income of the Irish Society is spent in management and litigation, and that the litigation is not fairly carried on, ib. 8159–8166.—The relation between the Irish Society and the corporation of Derry should be defined. From the first it was considered that the corporation had a right to a fair sum for the support of the magistracy. There was a certain district called the 1,500 acres allotted to the corporation. States full particulars as to the 1,500 acres, ib. 8173.

Coleraine. The Irish Society do not give the same assistance to the corporation of Coleraine as they do to Derry, M'Gonegal, 8189.—The property of the society in Coleraine is about 3,000*l.* a year, Some account of the property. Complaints of not getting long leases, whereby the advancement of the town has been retarded, ib. 8190–8227. It is decidedly the general feeling of the people of Coleraine that it would be a great benefit to the town were the Irish Society got rid of altogether, ib. 8227–8232.—The society do not contribute to the municipal purposes of the town of Coleraine as they ought to do as trustees; they have given several donations for religious and educational purposes, Bellas, 8240–8244.—Thinks the best course to pursue would be to sell the property, and devote the receipts to the good of the town. The citizens mostly think that the influence of the society is not beneficial, and that their management of the property is not conducive to the general interests of the town, ib. 8250–8254.—Out of 3,000*l.* received yearly by the society from Coleraine, only 1,000*l.* is spent for the benefit of the town, the other 2,000*l.* is squandered in expenses of management, &c. Enters into particulars, Knox, 8264–8273. It is impossible for the society to act with any great liberality to their tenants, and at the same time act faithfully to their trust, ib. 8257.—The short leases injurious to the property, ib. 8280.—Would sell the property. At from twenty-eight to thirty years purchase the income would be equal to that now received, and there would be much more improvement going on, ib. 8277–8287.—The deputations to Ireland quite useless, ib. 8295–8300.—More expense and litigation in the society's estates than in any other; they have spent 33,000*l.* in litigation in twenty years, ib. 8304–8307.—Instances of mismanagement, illiberality, and injustice of the society, ib. 8308.—The quantity of leasehold property is much smaller in Coleraine than in Derry,

Hazlett, 8335. Statement respecting, ib. 8333–8335; Colquhoun, 8336; Stuart Wortley, 8440.—Mr. Munns and his son have taken an active part in bringing the complaints of Derry before the commission. Believes the society have taken steps to intimidate them. States particulars, Colquhoun, 8336.—The governors are elected according to the charter; they must be aldermen of the City. They are elected in the Court of Common Council, assembled in February in every year. The new members are also elected; it has been the practice for years to re-elect the governor. He is sworn in with the deputy-governor and the other new members, Humphreys, 8341.—It is not the practice to re-elect the deputy-governor. He is elected in the second year of his membership. The Court of Assistants go to a ballot at their last meeting in February, and whoever gets the majority of votes is recommended to the Court of Common Council to be the deputy-governor, and is generally elected, ib. 8342.—It is the habit of the governor to take an active part personally in the management of the affairs of the society, ib. 8343.—Further particulars respecting the society, ib. 8344.

Leases. Leases in perpetuity are renewed every seventh year. According to the lease, one year's rent is claimed of parties holding perpetuity leases. They pay two years' rent every seventh year, which amounts to 2,515*l.* and odd. The secretary receives three guineas fee, in addition to his salary, at the renewal of those leases, for which he does not account to the society, Humphrey, 8451, 8452.—There are about 255 leases in perpetuity, which make about 800*l.* and odd every seventh year, being an addition of about 112*l.* per annum to his salary of 500*l.*, ib. 8453.—They have no funds to build farm houses, if they looked first to discharge the duties of their trust, Ferguson, 8514.—In the town of Coleraine, the ancestor of Lord Waterford wished not to take those renewable leases, but having done so, the society compelled him to continue them, ib. 8514.

IRISH PROPERTY:

The London companies are generally popular in the north of Ireland. They have very much improved their property, Knox, 8301.—Their tenants are allowed for all they spend in draining, ib. 8302.

JAMES, Mr. CHARLES HENRY. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the harbour masters of the port of London, of which there are four, 6864, 6865.—They are of different grades, 6866.—There is a principal harbour master, 6867.—The junior receives 300*l.* a year; the next 350*l*; the next 400*l.*; and the next 500*l.* That was the case in 1852, 6868.—The duties are to enforce the due observance of the bye laws, and perform all such things ordered by the Port of London Committee; to keep the books, and attend on views or in committee when required, 6869.—Has held the situation nearly fourteen years, 6870.—The nomination rests with the lord mayor; but a harbour master cannot be appointed without having passed an examination by the Trinity House, 6871, 6872.—Does not communicate directly with the Navigation Committee, but takes instructions from the head harbour masters, though perfectly conversant with the mode of transacting business in the committee, 6873, 6874.—They regulate the navigating, mooring, unmooring all ships in the Thames, except in any docks made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament. A very large number of vessels enter the river, but the accommodation in the docks was only taken advantage of by one-fifth of the whole number of vessels, 6875.—Has to watch the state of the bed of the river from time to time, 6876.—No considerable works are required for the removal of the shoals, 6877.—A few of them should be deepened, but thinks it dangerous to meddle much with them, as Mr. Leach has shown that by the removal of Old London Bridge even the tide ebbs lower and rises higher than it did previously, and the removal of shoals would have a still greater effect, 6878.—Does not agree with Mr. Powles that the dock officers should have a voice in the Port Committee. Does not think they would attend unless when the interest of their particular dock was concerned, 6879.—Does not know of any questions between the Conservancy Committee and the Docks. Their interests are all well cared for, 6880, 6881.—The committee have considerable knowledge of their business. They are elected for four years, one fourth only going out every year. They do not sit simply as a committee, but act as a jury and argue the point, 6882.—There are a good many shoals, but the only obstructions to a very free navigation of the river are the Whiting shoal, the Barking shoals, the Cold Harbour shoals, and one a little below Erith, 6883.—Shoals accumulate again very slowly when once they have been deepened, 6884, 6885.—Witness's time is fully occupied, 6886.—Gives directions personally for mooring and unmooring all vessels which enter into the port of London. Takes soundings when required, 6887–6889.—There are three divisions of the harbour; one at Limehouse, one at Greenwich, and one at Gravesend; and the head master superintends the whole, 6890.—Resides at Limehouse. There are two assistants to the harbour masters, 6891.—The Admiralty has an officer to superintend the shipping near the dockyards, 6892.—They do not interfere with the mercantile shipping, 6893.—That is exclusively under the control of the Navigation Committee, 6894.

JONES, Mr. JOHN. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a liveryman of the Turners Company. In trade, but not in the City, 1544–1546.—Is not a common councilman, 1548.—Wishes to see the companies brought into greater activity by giving more attention to the education of the apprentices of those respective trades which the companies represent, 1549, 1550.—Thinks it a great injustice to the City itself that the design of the corporation has been to throw out the companies, and that they have not elected or allowed men to buy their freedom who are not members of a company, 1551, 1522.—Would prevent any person being on the list of freemen who is not a member of one of the companies, 1553.—Would as soon allow an ignorant man to be a member of the university as let a man who has no trade have any voice in the City, 1555.—Should have no objection to people who reside in the City and carry on business there voting for common councilmen. But for aldermen and all the other higher offices, thinks the livery alone ought to be called into requisition. The reason witness makes this distinction is, that the livery is the most valuable body in the kingdom; they are the choice men of all trades; and when the livery meet together and give their opinions in common hall, does not think that the Government of the country can get a better opinion of what the respectable and intelligent public want than by hearing what the livery of London say, 1557.—The elections in common hall are only conducted in a satisfactory manner when the public interest is at stake, 1558.—Has never been applied to, to be bribed. Does not believe that there is any bribery, 1559, 1560.—With regard to the sheriffs, the liverymen do not seem to have cared about them. A man of any money, who desires to get into power, uses certain means of bringing a few supporters around him, and so obtains the show of hands. Knows this as a fact. Was at one time in Guildhall at the election of a sheriff, when a number of men came in and applied to a man there, who gave them all tickets. Witness offered one of them 5*s.* for his ticket, and then 10*s.*, but they refused, 1561.—Does not know the value of the tickets, 1562.—It was at the election of a sheriff a short time ago, Mr. Croll was the sheriff. There were barely 150, or from that to 200, liverymen there, including the ticket men, 1563–1566.—The elections of chamberlain have been conducted in a satisfactory manner, 1567.—At the election of sheriff there is a great neglect of duty on the part of the liverymen. The office of late has fallen into dishonour. Wishes to maintain the connexion between the companies and the City. The courts of the companies might exercise a very great and beneficial influence in causing apprentices in the respective trades to be well taught. The members of the courts of the different companies ought to be elected by the livery, 1568.—The companies are not closely connected with the trades they profess to represent, but thinks they might be made so, 1569.—Belongs to the Turners Company. Is a watchmaker. Does not believe that the watchmaking trade is closely connected with the corporation of turners; nor are the fishmongers closely connected with those who sell fish. This is what witness would try to alter. Wishes that all the members of the company should be carrying on the trade of which the company is nominally the head, 1570–1574.—A barrister the other day gave evidence before the Commissioners, who is a member of the spectacle makers' company, because it is a cheap company to buy into, 1575.—Would not allow this to be done, but would make the admission fee very small, so that a working man of good character could gain admission into the companies. Confesses that there are certain pecuniary advantages in the case of distress and old age that lead to the admission fee being so high, 1576.—Believes that the whole body of the citizens of London was originally a combination of trades. The companies are very ancient, 1577, 1579.

JONES, WILLIAM, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has lived in the City since 1821, and has been a member of the corporation from 1832, 7737.—Is a solicitor residing in Crosby Square, but has a country residence in North Wales, 7738, 7739.—Has been a common councilman for twenty years, 7740.—Has taken an active part, having been on the General Purposes Committee, the Bridge House Estates Committee, the Blackfriars Bridge Repairs Committee, the Markets Committee, of which was one year chairman, the City Lands Committee, the Secondary's Committee, and the Law Bills Committee; has been a member of the Irish Society, and deputy-governor. Thinks much has been said unjustly, to the prejudice of the corporation, 7741.—Was connected with the Irish Society in 1843 and 1844, 7742.—The terms of the charter do not preclude re-election after an interval to this committee; but men are ambitious to get upon the Irish Society, and do not wish to interfere with each other's turn or rota to be put on, 7743, 7744.—It is respectable and agreeable to belong to this committee, 7745, 7746.—Has unquestionably a favourable impression of the management of the society, 7747.—Its duties are incessant; not by the committee or society alone, but the officers are constantly in communication with Ireland. Nothing is done there which is not submitted to the consideration of the society here. Thinks, therefore, that though the expenses are large, and might probably be reduced, though not to any great extent, it does not bear any analogy to a gentleman's estate, 7748.—Sees that the secretary's salary has been somewhat increased. Cannot say whether he is underpaid or overpaid, 7749.—In 1831 there was a change in the constitution of the society. Up to that time it was thought that to belong to it, it was necessary to be a member of one of the twelve companies, who divided the surplus income among themselves, instead of applying it as now to public purposes, 7750.—Believes that the effect of the decision come to in the case of the Skinners Company is, that the twelve companies are entitled to it, 7751, 7752.—After the payment of the debts in which they have been involved, thinks it is possible that there might be a surplus, after the public objects which the company is bound to attend to are accomplished. The law expenses no doubt are enormous, but were indispensable to preserve the property to the society. Large sums were expended in defending their right of fishing in Lough Foyle. The same with regard to their advowsons. No doubt, had the society presented to those livings when they had the opportunity, they might have retained them, though they are now in more legitimate hands. There was also a long dispute with the Bishop of Derry about 1,500 acres of land, of which he had got possession, but it was recovered back. The expense in the suit with the Skinners Company was about 8,000*l.*, 7753.—The society is restricted to giving their aid to the locality of Londonderry and Coleraine, 7754.—It does not confine itself to the boroughs; it gives to charities and schools without the boroughs, 7755.—Does not think it necessary that all that part of Ireland called the plantation should be under the supervision of the society in the promotion of charitable objects; the plantation, except as to the City of Londonderry, and the town of Coleraine, and the fisheries and ferries, and town lands, having been divided between the twelve companies, who are so interested in the maintenance of their own proportions that they never make any claim upon the society. In fact they are expending nearly the whole of their income, acting with the greatest liberality towards their tenants, 7756.—Thinks the effect of the decision in the case of the Skinners Company is, that the surplus, if any, is divisible among the companies, 7757.—Up to 1831 members eligible for the Irish Society, it was thought, must be members of one of the twelve companies, therefore they always elected those members in the Court of Common Council; but in 1831 every member of the court who was a freeman was declared eligible. It was at that particular time, that instead of dividing the money among the twelve companies of which they were members, the society took a different view of the matter, and considered that they were trustees for the benefit of the cities of Londonderry and Coleraine, and the plantation generally. From this time the annual accounts have been printed and distributed. Has no remembrance of the companies having applied for any aid from this indivisible fund towards improvements within their respective allotments. Cannot say whether it would be applicable for the purpose if required, 7758.—Formerly Londonderry had lands, houses, and a variety of property for the purpose of maintaining a corporation, but from bad management they got so involved in debt that the whole property was taken in execution, when the allowance of 700*l.* a year was given for the corporate offices, before the Irish Municipal Act, which was in 1840. There is an item in 1841, "Corporation of Derry, towards the support of the magistracy, 820*l.*," 7759–7761.—Without this allowance they would have had to levy a town rate upon the society's tenants, which would have caused complaints, 7762–7763.—Thinks Derry and Coleraine are the only boroughs in Ireland that have no town rate for this purpose. There is a sum included in that 700*l.* a year of 90*l.* 10*s.* Irish money (now 80*l.* sterling), which was always received by them as rent from the Bishop of Derry in respect of the 1,500 acres of land before alluded to, which, in consequence of a breach between the bishop and the corporation of Derry, and the disclosure of the facts by them to the Irish Society, the society recovered back. They fancied they ought to have the benefit of it, and petitioned the corporation of London to compel the Irish Society to give up the 1,500 acres of land to them, or to make them the allowance they asked for, 7764.—In consequence of the leases granted, a great part of the town of Londonderry belongs indirectly to the society, 7765.—An immense quantity of it is held on perpetuity leases, other portions on building leases, and some on ordinary leases, which used to be for forty-one years. The perpetuity leases are very prejudicial to the interests of the society, therefore have been long discontinued, the society buying in the reversion when they have the opportunity. When deputy-governor went to Ireland with a deputation, consisting of the governor, Mr. Alderman Hughes, Mr. Alderman Lawrence, Mr. Thomas Henry Hall, the chairman of the Improvements Committee, Mr. Collingwood, and the secretary. Were fully occupied there for a month, attending several days at the town hall at Londonderry to hear complaints, visited every farm on the estate, and inquired upon the spot into every subject of complaint, 7766.—Doubts Londonderry being a flourishing town, though there are many wealthy people. There are two farms held by Mr. Moore and Mr. Babington, which would be an ornament to any country. Spent the 300*l.* voted for the deputation. Had to entertain public characters, agents, and all official persons, and does not hesitate to say that each member of the deputation had to dip into his pocket to make up the deficiency, 7767, 7768.—The recorder of Derry was appointed before the Municipal Act, and the corporation refused the services of a recorder; but the society thought it a necessary officer. The appointment used formerly to be with the society, but it is now with the Crown. The society has no patronage by those payments, 7770–7772.—Cannot tell how a town rate would affect tenants holding leases in perpetuity. Is quite sure the discretion the Irish Society has used of paying those officers fairly is a wise one, 7773.—The society do not now interfere in the local politics of the borough. Formerly they used to say, "I nominate so and so, and hope you will return him." With regard to byelaws they, under the charter, are subject to the approval of the Irish Society. In or about 1730 they would not adopt them, and there was considerable difficulty about them; then, when the municipal corporation inquiry took place they attempted to get rid of that obligation, but believes, by reference to the Irish Municipal Corporation Act, it will be found it was continued in the Irish Society, and after a considerable contest. The lord lieutenant has also a veto upon those byelaws, 7774.—This power is never exercised arbitrarily, 7775, 7776.—After the passing of the Irish Municipal Corporation Act, the corporation of Derry submitted their byelaws to the Irish Society, and the society approved of them, 7777.—Does not believe there is any legal instrument by which the society are bound to pay the 700*l.* a year to the municipal officers of Derry, but thinks they are legally liable to the 90*l.* 10*s.* before referred to, 7778.—Was not on the society when the allowance was granted, 7779.—Nothing of the kind is done in the town of Coleraine, because it has never applied to be incorporated under the Irish Incorporation Act, 7780.—The society's house in London was built for the purpose of keeping the muniments belonging to the society, part of which were burnt when there was a fire in the Guildhall some years ago, 7781.—The building consists of four rooms and domestic offices where the porter and his wife live, 7782.—The salary of the secretary has been increased from 300*l.* to 400*l.* a year, in consequence of the increase of his duties. The expenses of the governor, deputy governor, and the members of the society, are limited to 600*l.* a year, whatever the number of meetings may be. Besides doing all they can for the promotion of the plantation, the Irish Society seek to improve the connexion between the two countries. There is a meeting called a court meeting, which must be regularly held once a month. After the business is over the society dine together, and invite the members of Parliament and other gentlemen connected with Ireland generally, and has constantly heard them speak in the highest terms of the advantages the society had conferred upon the country. When in Ireland, upon the deputation, it was a matter of considerable difficulty to get through the business. For instance, a gentleman applied for the renewal of a lease of a farm granted 40 years before. The tenant in possession likewise made a claim, and having greatly improved the property it was a reasonable claim, but there was much difficulty in shaking off the first claim. It has been the object of the society for years to get immediate tenants instead of intermediate holders. Thinks great advantages arise from a deputation going over every two or three years, as they have an opportunity of inquiring into circumstances on the spot, but does not approve of members going by themselves, 7783.—No deputation goes twice, or scarcely ever, because no member remains more than two years on the society. Has no doubt this diminishes any advantage there might be in members going over and obtaining a personal knowledge of the estates, 7784, 7785.—There is nothing in the charter to prevent their re-election after being one year off the society, 7786.—Believes there is a greater desire to be on that committee than on any other connected with the corporation. Cannot account for it, but that there is rather a more social party, meeting Sir Robert Ferguson and other gentlemen who are pleasant to meet, 7787–7789.—There is no travelling unless there is a deputation; there used not generally to be a deputation, but latterly there have been occasionally deputations for two or three years following. When witness went was received by the authorities in Dublin. Kept the purse, and should not have paid the expenses of any individual if they had not kept together during the whole period while in Ireland, 7790–7794.—It has been said that men in a certain mercantile position in the City object to become aldermen, on the ground that it is derogatory to the character of a first-rate merchant to become one. Is of opinion that they are disinclined only because they cannot, or think they ought not to devote the time which is necessarily required for the duties of the office of an alderman. Thinks the aldermen, from their business habits and information, are better able to discharge the functions of magistrates in the City than paid magistrates. Does not agree with Mr. Cotton that they depend upon their clerks for information, except when an intricate question of law arises, and the legal knowledge of the clerk may be useful. There are some very able men as county magistrates, but thinks they are more in the hands of the clerk at petty sessions than the City aldermen. Some objection was made to Mr. Alderman Wire having sat on a case where, it was said, his partner was solicitor, and the prosecutor his client. Thinks him incapable of sitting under such circumstances to adjudicate on the case, and believes, if the case is explained, a different view will be presented, 7795.—In the counties any person who has been an attorney and wishes to retire from business must have his name struck off the rolls in order to be a magistrate, 7796.—Thinks the justices are appointed by the Privy Council. The mayor for the time being is the magistrate under the Municipal Corporation Act, and they appoint a certain number of magistrates. Whether the aldermen shall be elected for life depends upon whether they are to be magistrates or not. If magistrates, they ought not to be periodically elected. If not to be magistrates there is less objection to it, 7797.

JONES, WILLIAM, Esq. (Further Examination.)—Omitted to mention having been a member of the Navigation and Consolidated Committees. With reference to the appointment to committees and chairman of committees, the two wards of Bishopsgate Without and Within, though under one alderman, are separate with reference to their members. Belongs to the ward of Bishopsgate within. After the election of St. Thomas's day, meet to return to the common council the names of the members proper to fill the vacancies in the different committees, being careful to select those best qualified to undertake the duties from their personal knowledge on the particular subject. Any member of the Court of Common Council may object to those members being put on committee, if they think fit. According to the 38th standing order, no member can be on more than one of the following committees: the City Lands, the Bridge House Estates, the Navigation, the Coal and Corn, and the General Purposes, except in the case of one or two wards, which only return four members. No member can be chairman of a committee who is not in his third or fourth year, that he may be perfectly acquainted with the duties before he is called upon to act as chairman. The chairman has to preside over the general meetings, the sub-committee, and to attend every Court of Common Council, when he has a report from that committee to render. He must be qualified to give the court information to their satisfaction, that they may see that the committee have arrived at a right conclusion, otherwise the report is rejected or sent back for further consideration. Was on one occasion, though only in his second year, recommended for election to the court in preference to two in their third year, as having a better knowledge on the subject. Mentions this in contradiction of a statement that the man is appointed who attends the greatest number of dinners. The selection of chairman to the Navigation Committee is always made from the most experienced persons. Generally the committees work well. Thinks Mr. Ambrose Moore entirely ignorant upon the question of the working of the corporation. He says, "If you reduce the numbers and simplify the forms of the corporation, I believe more respectable men will join it. The higher class of citizens of London will be directors of banks, of dock and other companies, and will attend fairly to the business of those associations." The directors attend because they are well paid; the members of the corporation attend because it is their duty to attend. Presumes that the higher class of citizens he alludes to are gentlemen so occupied in business that they are ever ready to make excuses for not serving any offices in connexion with the corporation, not that they have any personal objection to it. Mr. Moore states, "The system of dinners in the common council is necessary, because of the character of the men in office." The allusion to these dinners appears a mere bugbear to the public mind, for the purpose of creating a prejudice against the corporation. Some of the committees have those dinners after their monthly meetings. Thinks there is nothing objectionable in them. Many little misunderstandings which have arisen in the warmth of debate in the morning may be explained away at the festive board. They dine at five, and many members have left the table by half-past seven. The money expended on them is beneficial in giving the tradesmen occupation and advantage. The members attend as punctually upon the unpaid and undined committees as upon those which have dinners. Differs with Mr. Williams as to the expense of the mayoralty being 25,000*l.* He says the Mansion House is the great feasting place among the corporation. Has been in the corporation 20 years, and has not dined there more than 20 times. Agrees with Mr. Norris in the propriety of putting the control of the cash under the united jurisdiction of the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, instead of the Court of Aldermen alone, but has no wish to take the office of justice of the peace from the aldermen. They discharge its duties in an efficient and exemplary manner. Mr. Norris thinks they should not be eligible till they have passed the office of lord mayor; and with the small number of aldermen, as he proposes to divide the City into 12 wards, "about half might be supposed to have passed the chair, and those who have not should be subject to periodical election." Is of opinion the number of aldermen cannot be reduced with benefit to the City if they are to act as magistrates. Nevertheless would alter the wards so that they should be more uniform in their extent and representation, depriving some of the small wards of their aldermen, and giving them to the larger wards. There are many influential commercial houses in the ward of Bishopsgate Within who are not now represented, because they have no vote for common councilmen, nor for aldermen, nor at the common hall; therefore desires the extension of the franchise. The corporation have affirmed that principle as a body, by the bill which they proposed to Parliament. Denies Mr. Norris's insinuation as to the application of the funds of the Market Committee. Was chairman during a long Parliamentary inquiry in 1845, over which Mr. Ormsby Gore presided, upon the subject of Smithfield Market. Never dined once at Bellamy's, or spent one shilling that was under the control of that committee for such purpose as Mr. Norris insinuated. There have been immense improvements in the City during the last 30 years, not only in the abolition of offices and so on, but in the streets. The land tax in the City is two shillings in the pound, whereas believes that in Marylebone it is one-eighth of a penny in the pound, 7798.—It is the ordinary land tax, 7799.—Does not complain of it; but it is a hard case upon the tenant to be subject to such inequality, 7800.—In taking a house should inquire what land tax and assessed taxes there are, and what the rate to the poor is, 7801.—The amount of the land tax arises from the City having been more populous than it is even now, therefore the tax rather increases by the decrease of the houses; in Marylebone it was assessed upon a district where there were no houses at the time, and they had only their quota to make up, 7802.—The land tax is an aggregate charge upon the City of London, obliged to be raised, and that is sub-divided among the several parishes, &c. Belongs to St. Helen's parish, where it may be said double tithes are paid. The first tithe is to the lay impropriator, who only allows the incumbent 20*l.* a year out of it, therefore a voluntary rate is levied for the clergyman, 7803.—The lay impropriator is a private individual. It was alienated in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when the tithe was let for 70*l.* a year, subject to this annual rent-charge of 20*l.* for the religious instruction of the parish. Had those tithes remained in their integrity they would now amount to 800*l.* a year; but many of them have been redeemed by their owners, and the impropriator paid the consideration, 7804.

JURY:
They are returned by the sheriffs' officers, who are paid by the City, Pulling, 925.—In cases at the sessions believes grand juries to be perfectly useless, Adams, 7230.

KEARNS, W. JOHN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.—Is connected with the City of London, 2309.—As wharfinger, 2310.—Is not connected with the corporation, 2311.—Has no grievance to state, is aware that in matters connected with his trade certain grievances in the case of merchants and importers exist, of which the metage is one, and it is most injurious to the port of London, 2312.—A metage upon corn and fruit, viz. nuts and apples, is claimed by the City; the duty on nuts and apples is not only injurious to the public but also to the port, by preventing foreigners sending cargoes here on speculation. Unlike the Crown duties, which are not levied on goods landed if subsequently exported to another country, Spanish nuts change hands frequently at 6*d.* a bag profit, out of which metage would be 2*d.*, and porterage 2*d.*, 2313.—If landed at Southampton metage would be claimed in London, if sent here by rail or lighter, 2314.—The amount of metage would be about one half what it is now, did the City not interfere, 2315.—Only a very small portion of the goods mentioned would be measured if City meters were not employed. The necessity which now exists for the presence of the meter causes great delay. If the matter rested with the Crown there would be no difficulty, 2316.—The importer is now subject to a double inconvenience, to a payment for which he gets no equivalent, and to delay, 2317.—The joint effect is seriously detrimental to the fruit trade, 2318, 2319.—The metage does not apply to all fruit, but to apples, nuts and onions, 2320.—Does not think the City fruit meter is any protection to the importer or purchaser, he only regulates the metage at the time of landing, 2321, 2322.—The charge for porterage ought to be reduced one half, 2323.—The City gauger is a very useful officer appointed by the City for reference by merchants with respect to wines and oils, 2324, 2325.—It requires great experience to tell the gauge of a cask. The gauger is a check against the officer who gauges for the customs, and also against his correspondent, 2326.—The charges of the City gauger are very moderate, 2327.—Thinks the gauger a very beneficial officer, 2328.—The fruit porters consist of 40 men, and as they are not equal to discharge the different fruit ships that fill the port of London, their numbers are made up by the hangers-on. Of these men, who are mostly great thieves, there are very few ships which enter the port of London, but suffer from the robberies committed by these men, 2329.—The corporation have no power over any but the fellowship porters, 2330.—Does not know who has the control. Has watched a man and been perfectly satisfied his object was plunder, and attempted to remove him from the ship, but the police refused to remove him unless given in charge, which could not be done till a robbery had been committed, and he would appeal to the fellowship and would retain his place, and the moment he had an opportunity would pocket whatever came in his way. Convicted one man last year whom he had known six or seven years working with the fellowship, and was not aware till he was in custody, that he was not a fellowship porter; he turned out to be only one of the hangers-on, who was so mixed up with them that it was impossible to know that he was not one of the fellowship, 2331.—Complains of the inefficiency of the control over the fellowship porters and their followers, 2332.—Is put to no expense individually; the merchant pays them about 50 per cent. more than he should for moving his goods, and the wharfinger is put to no expense, but runs risk of being robbed by the men forced on his premises, 2333.—He pays exactly double the amount he would under an open system, besides the inconvenience of having no control, 2334, 2335.—Thinks the whole of the experience of the navigation committee is comprised in two gentlemen, Mr. Turnley and Mr. Phillips, who are no doubt excellent men for the purpose, and practically acquainted with the subject, 2336.—Thinks the harbour master well selected and that he is a clever man, and no fault can be found with him or his deputies, and his arrangements, considering the extent of the river, are excellent. The duties of the harbour master are to enforce certain regulations and provide proper moorings and anchorage for shipping. The duties of the committee are of a higher order, and comprehend the properly preserving such lines of demarcation as shall ensure safety to the buildings on the river banks and the bridges, piers, and watercourses, which might be injured by improper alterations or encroachments. Is of opinion from the present mark of the tide at high water, that if straight lines are adopted, and stone or brick walls are allowed to take the place of old piles where the water now flows, a useful river will be converted into a rapid current, and the result be most disastrous. The river Thames is of too much importance to be intrusted to men who however respectable know nothing of its sets of tide, currents, eddies, bights, points, banks, or bottoms, who never think of the effect of a strong northerly gale or a month's rain, 2337.—Thinks it would be impossible to improve the police courts. Has been present there and always found great patience exercised by the magistrates, and a great desire to arrive at the truth, and none of the petulancy which the press have sometimes repressed in the paid magistracy. Is perfectly unacquainted with the gentlemen, never having had the honour of knowing a single alderman, but fancies they are well selected to fulfil the duties of the station they hold, and are well supported on points of law by the gentlemen who assist them, 2338.

KEELING, HENRY LEVY, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an inhabitant of the City of London, 1581.—Is a fruit and general produce broker of the firm of Keeling and Hunt, in Monument Yard, 1582–1584.—Calls the attention of the Commissioners to the exaction levied by the City meters upon the article of fruit imported from abroad, 1585.—The meters are not applied for by the importers, but they claim the right of attending and superintending the cargoes and making their claim for payment accordingly, which amounts to a considerable sum, 1586.—The amount that is claimed by the City meters is so much money taken from the importer without any benefit to him, inasmuch as their services are not required either by the Crown, by the importer, or by the buyer or seller, 1587.—They invariably enforce the claim of measuring; it was resisted some eighteen months ago, but finding it was being investigated by the committee of general purposes of the City, could not interfere, but trusted to them to give them that redress to which they were entitled, 1588.—Is not aware that any decision has been come to by the committee, 1589.—The duty on oranges and lemons was levied in a different manner before the reduction by the late tariff. The customs authorities now became the meters. They attend with their own officers as meters and the charge is saved, 1590.—The articles with respect to which the City claim to have their own meters employed, or at least paid if not employed, are nuts, onions, apples, and pears. There is one sort of nut upon which they do not claim metage—the Para nut, which is imported from Brazil. If they are entitled to claim metage upon other articles which are sold by measurement, this ought not to escape, and if this is entitled to escape they cannot enforce it upon others, 1592, 1593.—The effect of the course which the City took upon the subject of oranges was, that they gave up their right to measure oranges and lemons under the new duty, but it did not weaken their claim with respect to articles which they had before been in the habit of measuring, 1594.—The clause in question emanated from the City; it was introduced into the Customs Act which of course excludes the City now from any claim upon fruits upon which the duty is levied by measurement, by an Act of the Crown. 1595.—In levying the duties, the Customs measure a small portion which serves as a sample, estimating the rest according to the amount of the sample, 1596.—The City meters superintend the measurement of all cargoes brought in bulk, and the meters interfering in behalf of the Crown take a report of their measurements. The Crown keep a check upon the landing, and when the measurements are made up they agree with the meters, and upon their return the duty is levied, 1597.—The City meters compel you to submit to actual measurement as well as to payment, 1598.—Would require that the cargoes should be measured if the metage did not exist, 1599.—The Customs would employ their own officers provided the metage did not exist. At Liverpool no metage is required, consequently the Crown have to do the work for which they are paid, 1600.—In the outports the officers of the Crown take the place of the meters. They would measure the whole cargo if it came in bulk. Gives an instance in the article of chesnuts, 1601, 1602.—If the duty were altogether abolished the City would still claim the right of measuring them, 1603.—These articles likewise paid City dues, from the 1st of October 1851 to 30th June 1852, 208*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* without any value being received or assistance given, 1604.—183*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* was for metage, 22*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* for lord mayor's dues, and 3*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* for corporation dues. If a cargo is sent to one of the outports it is exempt from charges: these are the points which witness complains of and considers require redressing, 1605.—This difference drives importations of this kind from the port of London, because if you send to Liverpool you would have 10*l.* less to pay than if you send to the port of London, 1606.—The meters appoint deputies to collect the statistical account from the Custom officers, and levy the duty without rendering any assistance to the article in question, 1607.—Does not know the amount of purchase money paid for the office of meter, but knows that the revenue which those same gentlemen have from the metage of fruit and potatoes is stated to be about 5,000*l.* per annum, 1608.—The four meters together from the taxation levied upon those particular articles, 1609–1610.—They pay their deputies out of this, but that can be but a very small proportion, 1611.—The same meters that measure fruit measure potatoes, but have nothing to do with corn, 1612.—The metage is not only inconvenient with regard to the money payment, but one is compelled on all occasions to submit to it. The goods arrive, and the Customs themselves, for their own protection would see that everything was properly delivered, and levy their duty without the interference of a second party. The goods are deposited in warehouses, and when they are sold they are all remeasured, 1613.—By the City regulations is compelled to have goods measured whether it is wished or not,

1614–1616.—They not only make an estimate but go through the whole process of measurement. Does not think that the measurement causes delay, but the inconvenience is in the unnecessary charge, 1617–1620.—At one time they threatened resistance to the claim of the meters, and in fact withheld the payment for a time, but felt averse to take the law into their own hands, and preferred to agitate the question to get it redressed generally not individually, 1622.—With regard to the wharves, when they became private property, the proprietors took the labour of the fellowship porters into their own hands. They had to pay them to a large extent. Paid them in 9 months 2,000*l.*, whereas the same fruit brought to the legal quays would be subject to the charge the fellowship now make. It therefore becomes identified with the metage question, 1623.—Paid in nine months the sum of 1,939*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* to fellowship porters of the City of London, 1624.—Does not think the charge exorbitant, but complains that they are not allowed to exercise their right of employing the men that they think proper, 1625.—Thinks that although they were not losers in a pecuniary point of view to any amount, that they might get the labour accomplished at a cheaper rate, 1628.—As far as the fruit trade is concerned it is well managed, and witness does not consider it to be overpaid, 1629.

KEY, Sir JOHN, Bart. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the office of chamberlain since June last, 5837.—There was a contest for the office, 5838.—The statement made by Mr. Rose that witness's election cost 7000*l.* is not correct. Never had any communication with Mr. Rose, 5839.—Thinks his election cost about 5000*l.*, 5840.—While the election was going on, expenses were incurred to a great extent without any very accurate knowledge on the part of witness as to what the object of them might be, 5841.—From the principal agent finds that during the course of the contest 80 cabs were kept at 1*l.* a day waiting to bring up the voters; there were 60 clerks employed. There were persons brought up from various parts of the country, some of whom had their expenses paid, others came at their own expense, 5842.—Believes the expenses of the conveyance of non-resident voters did not exceed the amount of the actual cost, 5843.—The expenses of canvassing agents were a large item, 5844.—Had several agents, from the peculiarity of the circumstances, 5845.—Thinks a very small amount was expended in refreshment for voters. The bill at the hotel where the committee always met, was not much above 100*l.* for refreshments, 5846.—Believes there are a certain number of persons, not exceeding 300, though represented by the agents to amount to 2,200, who come and vote, and have money for their loss of time for the day, 5847.—The total expenses of his election did not certainly exceed 5,000*l.*, 5848.—Has regularly discharged the duties of the office since his election. It is an office of great responsibility inasmuch as the chamberlain is responsible for the whole of the City funds. During the last year, the receipts for which he was responsible were 1,219,511*l.*; payments 1,229,242*l.*, making a gross total of money passing over the counter 2,448,753*l.* This is not altogether cash; but the amount of actual money received by the chamberlain was about 800,000*l.*, the actual revenue of the City being about, say 200,000*l.*, 5849.—He gives a very large security, and is confined by a deed into which he enters as to the mode in which those sums are to be dealt with, 5850.—The amount of security which he gives is 30,000*l.*, in responsible parties who must be approved of by the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee and by the Court of Aldermen. Every month he is obliged to present his accounts before the committee, and if there be any sum appropriated or deposited in a manner which they do not approve of, or if there is a larger balance than they think proper, at their recommendation an alteration is made. When there is a sum of money beyond the amount which the chamberlain is authorized to have at the bankers, he must deposit it on certain securities; it is generally lent upon what is called calls, because there is less risk of loss upon any sum of money being suddenly demanded than there would be by investing it in the funds. The nature of this security being the security of the person borrowing at call, with the collateral security of either City bonds or Government security, 5851.—At the present time would obtain a larger interest if it were lent at call, than if it were invested in the funds, 5852.—The whole of the responsibility in respect to the application of the funds in the hands of the corporation at any moment is vested in the chamberlain. If any loss occurs from his mismanagement, he is the person responsible for it, 5853.—That part of his business, to a certain extent, involves the business of a banker. 5854.—In making an arrangement with respect to the employment of those funds, he principally advises with the banker, chief clerk, and probably with the broker, 5855.—Does not take any detailed instructions from the committee of the common council, but every month he lays before them his accounts, 5856.—The banking part of the business occupies a considerable portion of his time. Above a certain sum all amounts are paid by cheque; several cheques are signed in a day. Never signs a cheque without ascertaining that there is a proper warrant for it, and that the committee, by whom the cheques are warranted, have not overdrawn the amount placed to their credit. Again all small sums under 100*l.* are paid through the desk of the cashier. Feeling responsible for it, sees every night what payments have passed through his hands, and so as to all payments which have been made to him. The number of payments passing through his desk alone in the course of the year are 10,535, and receipts 9,088, total 19,623. The office occupies his attention from ten in the morning till five in the evening, and is sometimes obliged to take papers home with him afterwards, 5857.—There are other duties attached to the office but not of so responsible a nature, 5858.—Whenever an office falls vacant, the common council refer it to a committee to consider the duties, the emoluments, and so forth, to see if any change can be advantageously made. In witness's case that was done. There are a number of duties which devolve upon the chamberlain; one is to admit persons to the freedom of the City; another is to hear and decide all disputes between masters and apprentices, which frequently occur; the chamberlain has the power, when he thinks necessary, to commit an apprentice to Bridewell, 5859.—The numbers of those cases of apprentices are uncertain, 5860.—It is a jurisdiction peculiar to the City, 5861.—A justice of the peace possesses no such power under the general law, 5863—If a master does not fulfil the duties which he is bound by the indenture to fulfil, the apprentice has the power of calling him before the chamberlain. If it is his opinion that the master has neglected his duty or that the apprentice has neglected his, the chamberlain adjudicates between them. It sometimes happens that there is no chance of their ever acting together, and he discharges the parties from the bond into which they have entered, 5864.—He has the power of cancelling the bond with the consent of the parties, 5865.—Complaints by the master against the apprentice are considerably the most numerous, 5866.—The ordinary nature of the jurisdiction is to interfere in cases where the master complains against the apprentice, 5868.—A great number of the cases are decided by giving judicious advice to the apprentices, 5869.—In other cases where they are obstreporous, and those complaints have been repeated, they may be committed to the Bridewell. In nineteen cases out of twenty they never get to the Bridewell; but when they do, generally the next day a very penitential letter comes to the master to intercede for them, 5870.—Generally finds, by letting a case stand over for a fortnight, and telling the apprentice that the result will depend upon his conduct whether he goes to prison or not, he hears no more of it, 5872.—Has never had one female apprentice before him, 5873.—Believes there are not a great many female apprentices in the City, 5874—Thinks this jurisdiction is attended with beneficial results; it leads the master to act in a greater spirit of kindness towards his apprenti[illegible]; and if the master does not teach the appren[illegible] the branches of his trade, if he is disposed to make use of him as a servant, or in any way not intended when the boy was bound apprentice, it is very beneficial in calling him to a sense of his duty, 5875, 5876.—In London apprentices are apt to get into very bad associations, and sometimes a little lecture from the chamberlain, and the dread of the Bridewell, may arrest them in an evil course, 5878.—Apprentices committed by the chamberlain are kept separate from criminals who are committed to Bridewell, 5879.—Captain Williams states that the comptroller sometimes exercises the power of committing apprentices to Bridewell, that would be in case of the absence of the chamberlain from ill health, 5880.—The comptroller acts as deputy in that case, and for the admission of freemen; in no other case does he do so, 5881.—Thinks the statement made by Captain Williams that the number of apprentices committed to this prison average about ten a year is correct, 5882.—He says "confinement in the prison acts most mischievously on boys." Witness's experience has been rather the other way, 5883.—Never commits an apprentice for above ten days, 5884.—Suppose an apprentice came and complained that his master had ill treated him. If it were a case in which his master had ill treated him so far as that it amounted to an assault, should send him over to the other side of Guildhall, and he would be left to the ordinary law, 5885.—Apprehends if there was a continuance of ill usage on the part of the master, or if he neglected to teach the apprentice his business, there would be power to cancel the indenture. Has not had such a case, 5886.—Since his appointment there has been a case in which he has interfered on behalf of an apprentice, 5887.—Has told the master the duties he should perform, and he has promised to rectify the cause of complaint, and has told the apprentice that if the ground of complaint were not removed he was to come again, 5888.—Is not quite sure, in the case of a master neglecting his duty, whether he would have the power of cancelling the indenture without consent, 5889.—All the freemen of London are admitted through the chamberlain, 5890.—Has never given any directions to issue notices to those persons who do not take out their freedom. Some time ago sundry notices were sent out for the purpose of enlarging the constituency rather than with any other object, 5891.—Another duty is to receive from the town clerk the names of the several persons presented by the wardmote inquests as carrying on business within the City, and not being free; to cause such persons to be summoned before him, and to direct prosecutions in case of non-compliance; to attend the lord mayor and all common halls and common councils, and on all state occasions, and deliver over the City regalia to the lord mayor upon his being sworn, 5892.—Attends all common councils and Courts of Aldermen. If any member has any question to ask as to the financial affairs of the City, must be prepared to answer him. Does not attend the whole time, but his duty is to be present at every court. The chamberlain has to receive all rents, profits of markets, tolls, and other revenues of the corporation, with which he is annually charged by the comptroller, to make all payments on account of the corporation, and to ascertain that such payments are by warrant or order of competent authority and conformable to the various resolutions and orders of the Court of Aldermen or Common Council, and to keep accounts thereof, and to arrange the same for the purpose of affording any necessary information thereon. There are 4,000 tenants, paying 103,095*l.* annually; that includes the receipts from the prebend of Finsbury. Besides that, there are monies in the nature of coal duties and others to be received, amounting to about 700,000*l.* more, 5893.—Mr. Scott said that the profits on all the balances were brought to account, and that a sum was assigned to the chamberlain not greater than 2,500*l.* a-year, but that some years it had not amounted to that sum. That is the case; the sum is 2,500*l.* a year; is not aware whether it has always amounted to that. Formerly the chamberlain was paid in a different manner, 5894.—At present the entire emoluments of the office can never exceed that sum. Begs to call attention to the answer to Question 353. The witness says, "An overture was "made to Mr. Scott during the contest that his situa- "tion should be improved pecuniarily if he would "resign, and a threat conveyed that if he persisted "in the poll after a certain time, he would lose the "appointment, for that the new chamberlain would "appoint some one else." Distinctly swears that no such overture was ever made—nothing of the kind passed, 5895.—Has the power of dismissing any clerk in the office without any authority from the Court of Aldermen or the Common Council. The chief clerk and the cashier, when they are admitted, must be approved of by the Court of Aldermen, and also by the Coal, Corn, and Finance committee of the Common Council, 5898.—The appointments of the clerks are made by the chamberlain himself, 5899.—Swears that as far as his own knowledge goes, no overture of the nature described was made to Mr. Scott during the contest,

KEY, Sir JOHN, Bart.—continued.

5900.—Never heard from Mr. Scott that he was under the impression that such an overture had been made; the only communication from him was, that he should have been glad to have saved all further expense on the Saturday, when this inquiry was made; but his committee would not suffer him. Calls attention to Question 361. The inference from the answer to that question is, that the duties of the chamberlain, are performed by the clerk. Had Mr. Scott been elected he would have made a very good chamberlain, but he would have himself elected the same chief clerk that witness has now. He would not have performed the duties both of chamberlain and of chief clerk, which seems to be the bearing of the evidence of some of the witnesses; each of the clerks gives security, though to a smaller amount than the chamberlain; also calls attention to the answer to Question 312; there is a statement there made diametrically contrary to the fact. It is said that the first corruption with regard to elections began at the period there mentioned, and that the sum of 15,000*l.* was expended at that election; that there were then 400 men, called 'longshore men who were controlled by Alderman Lucas, who by his influence effectively secured the return of his friend Alderman Key. That is quite contrary to the fact. Supposes there never was a greater degree of popular feeling exhibited than on that occasion; it was about the period of the passing of the Reform Bill. Had taken a somewhat active course in forwarding that view, and towards the close of the first year of office, was waited upon by a deputation, to know whether he would serve a second time; the view being, that as he had previously done to a very large amount, and with great effect, he should lend any influence which he might possess to assist in forwarding that measure, with respect to which he had taken so active a part. The majority of the Court of Aldermen were at that time on the opsosite side in politics. The lord mayor is returned by the livery, but the livery must return two names to the Court of Aldermen, from which the court choose one. The persons who wished to carry out the objects of the Reform Bill being aware that the majority of the Court of Aldermen was against that measure, an arrangement was necessarily made with some alderman who had served once before, and who therefore had the power of refusing to serve again, that if he were returned with witness to the court and were chosen, he would agree not to serve. The alderman who was accordingly named, after having been returned by the livery and chosen by the aldermen, refused to serve, as previously arranged; that occurred three times, there being an eight days' poll on each occasion. Is quite convinced that the whole election did not cost 1,500*l.* instead of the expense being 15,000*l.*; and as to the assertion that Alderman Lucas returned his friend Alderman Key from his influence with the 'Longshore men, the most violent and hostile opponent he had at that time was Alderman Lucas; therefore, when a gentleman swears that Alderman Lucas returned witness by his influence, he swears that which is contrary to the fact, 5901.—Does not think the expenses of the two candidates together amounted to 1,500*l.* or 2,000*l.*, 5902.—Does not think his own came nearly to 1,000*l.*, 5903.—Desires to refer to Questions 340, 1455, and 1464. It is said, in answer to Question 340, that the aldermen at the late contest subscribed 100*l.* each, which is untrue. The imputation in the subsequent questions is that the money was subscribed out of the public funds. With respect to the 100*l.*, being agreed to be subscribed by the aldermen, says distinctly that no such agreement was ever made or contemplated, 5905, 5906.—No subscription was made either by the aldermen or by the officers of the corporation towards the expenses of witness's election; paid the whole out of his own funds. In answer to 2,815, it was implied that twelve of the City officers have the same income as twelve cabinet ministers, namely, 45,480*l.* Taking the twelve highest paid City officers, they only amount to 19,600*l.* Another witness swears that in reference to the Borough of Leeds, under the head of justice, the whole expense is 729*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, while the fact is that it is 5191*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, according to the statement which he himself gives. So as to the borough expenses of Leeds; the witness states them to be only 2439*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* while they are in fact 6348*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* Another witness has sworn that the corporation are adverse to all improvements. Shows a map of the improvements which have been made, not only in the City, but at the west end of the town, by the corporation. (Produces and explains the same.) Those improvements which are marked out of the City, are made out of the 8*d.* coal duty. There is already a debt of about a million upon that duty, the whole of which has been laid out upon improvements without the City, in addition to the Commissioners of parks and palaces now having the whole proceeds of the coal duty 9*d.*, for improvements entirely out of the City. This fund is also pledged to pay off the million debt contracted on that tax, for improvements made out of the City, and to which improvements the City also contributes 11,000*l.* per annum out of the City funds. Mentions this because a great outcry is raised against the City on account of the 8*d.* and 1*s.* coal duty, while Her Majesty's Commissioners of parks and palaces receive the whole of the sum of 11,000*l.* from the City funds in addition, 5907.—Further statement as to the duties of his office. A great many people have given their opinion as to the manner in which the aldermen perform their duties in their capacity of magistrates. Was an alderman for thirty years. It would be impossible to find any set of men, chosen as they are, who are more intelligent, and who attend more anxiously and closely to their duties than the magistrates of London do. In reference to a legal education being necessary, thinks that men who have lived to a certain period of life respected by their neighbours, and who have had sufficient talent to make their way in the world, are quite as capable as any other men can be of performing the duties of magistrates, a proof of which has been given before the learned judges and others, as to the numberof convictions and committals. Nine tenths of the cases which come before the magistrates are cases which do not require any legal knowledge; they are mere matters which common sense would enable them to decide; or if they do require legal knowledge, they always have a clerk of considerable legal attainments, who advises them upon those points. Apprehends that legal magistrates who are professional men, also have their clerks to assist them. Believes, from his experience, that the aldermen of London perform their duties more to the satisfaction of the citizens than any paid magistracy would do. Has also during that period attended committees of the corporation, and can testify to the anxiety always shown to conduct the duties honourably and independently, to the advantage of the corporation and the public at large. As to the sewers, has seen most of the cities on the continent, and does not hesitate to affirm that no sewers in the world are at all comparable to those of the City. There has been no jobbing during witness's experience, either in the Court of Aldermen, or in the Court of Common Council. Has seen nothing but an anxious wish to perform the duties committed to their charge. Then again the aldermen have a considerable advantage in being members of the Central Criminal Court; for though they have never interfered with the judges as to any legal point or any question which arises during the trial, they may sometimes advise as to the sentence to be pronounced. They have one great advantage in acting as magistrates there—that they have an opportunity of hearing from time to time the way in which the learned judges lay down the law on criminal subjects, 5908.

KNOX, SAMUEL WRIGHT, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a solicitor of Coleraine; was town clerk to the late corporation, and is kept on by the present commissioners, 8256.—Quite agrees with the general statement of the previous witnesses; but thinks that it is impossible for the society to act with any great liberality to their tenants, and at the same time act faithfully to their trust, 8257.—The town commissioners complain of the waste of the public trust fund. Under the present system it cannot be avoided; some local body would be more beneficial. The society receives 3,000*l.* a year from the town and fishery, which as trustees they ought to expend on the plantation, 8258.—Derry has from 7,000*l.* to 8,000*l.* a year, and complains that Coleraine has no corresponding benefit from its rents, 8259.—If proper discretion were used, the funds from the society might be spent for the general good of Coleraine, instead of used for diminishing the rates, which are not excessive, 8260, 8261.—A deputation coming over to Coleraine for a day costs 500*l.*, an unjustifiable waste of trust funds, which will continue while the governing body remains in

London, 8162.—Out of 3,000*l.* received yearly by the society from Coleraine, only 1,000*l.* is spent for the benefit of the town, the other 2,000*l.* is squandered in expenses of management, &c. Enters into particulars, 8264–8273.—Witness would sell the property. Thinks it would sell at from 28 to 30 years' purchase, and that the income would be equal to that at present received, 8275.—According to the accounts of the society in 1851, the septennial fines were 1,154*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* Apprehends that that is the amount of rents under leases held in perpetuity; the rest of the 3,000*l.*, is made up of determinable holdings and rents of fishery. According to the estimate of the value of the property, secured as it would be, thinks the produce of it would yield an income fully equal to the present rents, and that it could be administered, instead of at the average cost of sixty per cent., at no greater cost than other trust funds, 8277.—Thinks the short lease system very injurious to the property, 8280.—If some such Act as has lately been passed in reference to the estates of Trinity College and the Church temporalities were extended to Coleraine, it would be an advantage both to the tenant and to the property, 8281–8283.—If the property were sold, there would be much more improvement going on in the town. If one purchased his own rent he would be much more disposed to make improvements than if he had to look up to a head landlord, who had the means of giving him annoyance, 8285.—Agrees with the statements of previous witnesses as to the general feeling of the town with respect to the Irish Society and their influence, 8286, 8287.—The society employs the agent from Derry, who appoints two days in June and two in December for transacting business, 8288.—The agent has no power or influence, 8289.—Does not complain of there being no resident agent in Coleraine, 8290.—There are 7,000 inhabitants in Coleraine. The present commissioners are elected triennially by ratepayers occupying houses rated at 5*l.* or upwards; there are about 400 of them, 8291.—The society used to interfere in political contests; at one election they charged 3,000*l.*, 8292.—They have not interfered lately; witness thinks they are too unpopular to have any influence, 8293–8294.—Thinks the deputations to Ireland are quite useless. Produces a book with an account of one expedition and its expenses, which amounted to 340*l.*, and which witness thinks, as far as any useful results arising from it are concerned, is a fair specimen of the deputations in general, 8295–8299.—The deputations never decide anything till after their return to London. Witness complains that there is not a larger fund applicable for the general improvement of Coleraine. Gives two or three instances of the society's neglect in cases of improvement, 8300.—The London companies are generally popular in the north of Ireland. They have very much improved their property, 8301.—They grant very few leases, because all their improvements are made by themselves. The tenants are allowed for all that they spend in draining, 8302.—The society are often placed in awkward positions from their double capacity of owners of property and trustees for the benefit of Coleraine. There are, perhaps, no rents more easily received in England than those of the Irish Society, 8303.—There is more expense and litigation in the society's estates than in any others. Concludes that the fact of their being trustees, and having no interest in the property, makes them reckless of expense. The society has spent 33,000*l.* in litigation in twenty years. The clothworkers' expenses do not exceed 15*l.* a year, 8304–8307.—Thinks it would be desirable that the society should hold their property discharged of trusts, if they would adopt the system of the companies; but as there seems no prospect of that at present, witness would have them relieved from the trust. Gives two or three instances of what he considers the mismanagement, illiberality, and injustice of the society, 8308.—Thinks either of the two courses which have been suggested to the Commission, namely, that of selling the property, or that of bringing it under some such Act as the "Church Temporalities Act," would be an advantage both to the trust and the community. The society have no power with regard to sanctioning byelaws; they have no influence over the governing body of Coleraine now, 8311.—The society have made a change in the fines for renewable leases since the original leases in 1767, which increases their own income at the expense of the tenants. States particulars 8312, 8313.—Thinks it an illegal proceeding. The leases are all prepared in London, where the society insert what covenants they please, the tenants feeling their inability of resist, 8314.—The practice is one of old standing. The conduct of the society is in direct violation to their own proposal in 1766, 8316.—If those payments were remitted, the only effect would be to make a present to the tenant of the money, 8318.—It would be to the diminution of the trust fund if those fees are included in the rents and accounted for by the society, of which witness is not aware, 8319.—The property subject to this increase of rent has changed hands very often. Thinks it most injurious to the property that no application for renewing a determinable lease will be received till within three years of its expiration; the same opinion has been expressed by the Derry deputation, 8320.—The property held by the society is in many cases under the two descriptions of tenure mixed up together; one complaint against the society is, that they have refused to renew the leases of the commons to the corporation as formerly, but have let them out to private tenants. The school mentioned by the last witness was built on that property. The public bowling green has been inclosed, 8321–8325.—Does not think the society ever gave any property to Coleraine. Believes the 500 acres belonging to the corporation were obtained from Sir Randall M'Donald, 8326.—Reads an extract from a letter to prove that the corporation never had any grants from the society in or about Coleraine, except the court house and gaol, and some wastes in the town and suburbs, with some cabins and cottages thereon, which were held by lease which was to expire in 1733, 8327.—Thinks under those circumstances the funds are very badly managed, the law expenses alone amounting to 33,000*l.* in twenty years, in illegal fees to the members of the society as trustees, and in those tavern expenses, which have amounted in 20 years to 7000*l.*; that is nominally discontinued in the lists now. Witness would have been better prepared with the case, but that the deputation was only appointed on the previous Friday, at a meeting of the town commissioners, 8328.—The meeting was as numerous as usual, and the opinion unanimous as to the necessity of appointing the deputation, 8329, 8330.—By the commissioners' desire the deputation drew up a report detailing the complaints, and showing the amount of annual rents, and the amount which they considered was properly brought to the credit of the fund, 8331.—Complains of the ungracious dealings of the society in deferring to pay their subscription of 300*l.* to the repair of the church, and so obliging the rector to raise the money on his own security in the meantime, 8332.

KNOX, SAMUEL WRIGHT, Esq. (Second Examination.)—In answer to a question asked yesterday with regard to the septennial fee of three guineas, states that if the three guineas fee were remitted for the future it would not diminish the trust fund, 8450.

LAWRENCE, JOSEPH, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been established above twenty years in an extensive business as stockbroker in the City of London; is obliged to have a licence from the corporation of London, 4050–4053.—The business of a stockbroker is strictly regulated by a committee of members of the Stock Exchange. They act under the most stringent regulations; each member on his admission to the Stock Exchange is obliged to find three securities, not only for pecuniary payment in case of default, but also as recommending him in point of character, 4054.—That committee is selected from the oldest members of the Stock Exchange, not necessarily stockbrokers, 4055, 4056.—That committee is altogether unconnected with the corporation, except as to the claim the corporation sets up to oblige every broker to take out a licence. A stockbroker is obliged to become a sworn broker of the City of London; previously to which, they compel him to take out his freedom, and to give a bond, and subscribe to the regulations of the Court of Aldermen, 4057.—He engages that he will only carry on his business during the pleasure of the aldermen; that he will keep certain books in the form they prescribe. There are also other vexatious regulations. They require him, for instance, as is done in the case of brokers bargaining for goods, to give to both parties, the buyer and the seller, the names of the principals. This is impossible to be done in dealings on the Stock Exchange. They deal with a class of persons called jobbers, who are not the principals, and to whom the names of the principals are never given, 4058, 4059.—These regulations are perfectly in abeyance; never knew an instance of any interference of the City, except to compel the payment of the rent or penalties, 4060.—The amount of payment is indirectly very considerable. The amount of annual payment by each broker is 5*l.*; but, from the City claiming to regulate who shall be admitted as brokers, they oblige them to take up their freedom, involving considerable fees and expenses. Enters into further particulars of payments, fees, &c., 4061, 4062.—The present system affords no security to the public with respect to transactions on the Stock Exchange beyond that which is already provided by the committee and the common law, 4063.—The interference of the corporation in regard to the bond and the sureties they require, affords no protection nor security to the public at all, inasmuch as if a perfect stranger applies—a man who may the day before have been released as a fraudulent bankrupt—if he goes with the fees in his hand and presents himself with two housekeepers who may be two 10*l.* householders, to sign his bond, he is admitted by the payment of the fees, 4064.—No inquiry would be made into his previous character, 4065.—With regard to the committee of the Stock Exchange there is a searching inquiry. The party applying must, in the first place, be recommended by a certain number of members of the Stock Exchange, who attend before the committee invariably to answer any inquiries respecting him, and there must be three securities of 250*l.* each. Members of the Stock Exchange who are themselves known, 4066, 4067.—They have most unlimited power; they act, not only as a court of law or even of equity, but as a court of honour. They have the power of expulsion for misconduct, 4068.—If a broker were expelled for misconduct by the committee, he could no longer be a member of the Stock Exchange with a certificate of his respectability, but he might freely exercise his office as a broker elsewhere, 4069.—He acts outside, 4070.—The two sets of regulations do not clash, except in the points regarding the mode of carrying on trade already referred to, 4071.—The Stock Exchange regulations are superadded to the others. They are much more stringent, and they are constantly in operation; whereas witness never heard of a case, except the case of some public default or misconduct, which was investigated by the court of aldermen, 4072.—The City claims jurisdiction over stockbrokers, but there are great doubts as to the legality of that claim. Contends that the persons now exercising the office of stockbrokers do not come within the meaning of the term "broker," as clearly defined in the statute of the 6th of Anne, which is the only statute under which the City can claim those payments. Witness here enters into particulars and gives the case of Clarke v. Powell. There the Court of King's Bench decided under this act the broker was liable to penalties. Mr. Powell was one of the most respectable men on the Stock Exchange, he paid 1,200*l.* for penalties and law expenses; the case was decided about ten years ago, 4073, 4074.—The prosecution was instituted by the City in the name of Mr. Clarke, who was the chamberlain, on the information of an informer whom he employed for this purpose. The very Act of the 6th of Anne is stated to be brought in to put a stop to vexatious proceedings of the corporation against the citizens through common informers, 4075.—They have varied the regulations; but the City regulations on the subject of stockbrokers dates from the 6th of Anne, 4076.—The date of the institution of the committee of the Stock Exchange is about fifty years ago. The brokers used to meet before in a coffee-house. The corporation levied the fines and penalties to provide a compensation to the City for abolishing the office of garbler of spices, which was rented by them at 300*l.* a year; and afterwards there was a similar compensation for the abolition of the office of gauger of liquors in the City of London, which was found to be not only useless but mischievous; yet still 150 years after the abolition of this office of garbler of spices, when the object of providing compensation must have been satisfied a century ago, the corporation continue to levy the fines and penalties, 4077.—Strictly, the object of the legislature in creating this system was not to give any protection to the public in respect to the dealings on the Stock Exchange, but to provide a compensation to the City for certain abolished offices, 4078.—From a calculation of the amount, which is now enormous, that object has long since been satisfied, 4079.—Besides the 5*l.* for admission to the office of broker by the City it is necessary to become a freeman, and there is a very heavy list of fees payable on becoming so, 4080, 4081.—They will not entertain the application of a person to be admitted as a sworn broker till he shall have made himself a freeman of the City of London, 4082.—Witness states it cost him twelve guineas to become a freeman, 4083.—At the present time, in mercantile transactions, a broker employed by one merchant to purchase goods may buy them at a public auction without the intervention of a broker. On the Stock Exchange the broker's duty is only to one party, he owes no duty to the other, 4084.—In mercantile transactions between the buyer and seller there are frequently two brokers, one for each party. Contends that if the stockbroker had only called himself a stock factor, or stock agent, the City would never have had a pretext for calling upon him to take out his freedom, 4085.—These observations apply more or less to all brokers, but the case of the stockbrokers is stronger, 4086.—Besides the doubtful legality of the authority under which this payment is levied, there is much which is utterly degrading. Men of education, intelligence, and wealth are, by the court of aldermen, subjected to a positive engagement to carry about badges with their name and numbers, and produce it to any one who asks for it, like a cabman on the stand, 4087.—Although the pleasure of the aldermen is never exercised to suspend them, and they are never called upon to produce their ticket, they are called on to sign the engagement, and many of them feel it to be a great hardship, 4088.—Formerly, the City exacted an oath which included all these regulations, but now the oath is merely that they shall perform justly the duties of their office, 4089.—If a sum of money deposited in the hands of a broker for the purpose of purchasing stock were appropriated by him to his own use, of course the bond to the City would be forfeited, 4090.—And the bond to the Stock Exchange committee, 4091.—Suppose you proceed against the sureties under the City bond, the penalty would be taken for the use of the City, 4092.—If the City had any authority to issue a warrant, it would be quite independent of any of these bonds, 4093,

LAWRENCE, Mr. WILLIAM. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the twelve rulers of the fellowship of porters, 7029, 7030.—Has been a ruler about ten years, 7031.—Was elected on a vote by ballot of the whole body, 7032.—When a vacancy occurs, if there is any opposition, an election takes place by vote by ballot, 7033.—Candidates are proposed by the body of the fellowship, 7034-7036.—One of the porters nominates an individual, and another seconds him, 7037, 7038.—Blanks are put into one box, and the names of the candidates they vote for in another. There are so many candidates and as many cards. The persons whom they vote for they put in the ballot-box, and the other in the blank box, 7039.—At witness's election there were 1,600 polled; it was upon a vacancy, 7040.—There were two candidates, 7041.—The rulers have to attend on court days once a month, and oftener if summoned, and to see that the men attend to their work. One man is always on duty in Tower Street to supply the corn meters with men, and sometimes there is one at the potato work, 7042.—As a ruler receives 36*l.* a year, 7043.—That comes out of the general fund, 7044.—Is a collector, and has 60*l.* a year for doing duty at the hall, 7045.—Disputes between the men are settled, and complaints heard against them, at the monthly meetings of the rulers, 7046.—Every porter must be a freeman, and must pay 5*l.* on entrance, 7047.—Two or three pounds of it are given back at the death of a man, and there are several pensions which the men receive, but the funds have fallen away lately, 7048.—The governor and deputy have the power to strike a man off the fellowship if he misconducts himself, in which case he loses his 5*l.*, 7049, 7050.—The porters of the fellowship are not better paid than ordinary porters, 7051.—They are not more regularly employed, 7052.—But it is a security for them. Was better years ago. When one came to be a senior man in the corn trade it was better for him, 7054.—The employment is more regular, 7055.—The pay is not higher, 7056.—There is more corn imported into London than there used to be, but it goes into dock, and by railways; so it does the porters no good, 7057.—The importation, which gives employment to the fellowship, has been falling off for the last six years, 7058.—The fellowship have 3,500*l.* in the three per cent. consols, and 5,750*l.* in the shifter's hands, 7059.—Mr. Ruston is appointed by the corporation, 7060.—He receives four and a half per cent., and the company of fellowship three and a half per cent., 7061.—The shifter pays the corn porters every day, 7062.—He gets the money from the importer, 7063.—He suffers very few losses; if he cannot get the money the men have to repay him; if any one is bankrupt he suffers the loss, 7064.—He collects it all, because the importers live in different parts of the country, 7065.—The porters get their money more generally from him than they would from the importer, 7066.—Reads extract from Mr. Brown's evidence, 7067.—Thinks he received the sum mentioned all for himself, 7068.—The fellowship lent the shifter 7,000*l.*, for which he pays no interest, 7069.—That was in 1824, when the Act of Common Council was passed; the fund was larger then than it is now; they had more than 7,000*l.*, 7070-7072.—Before that time Mr. Ruston and his father had it on lease for a mere nominal sum, 7073.—Reads an account of the receipts of the fellowship from 1841 to 1851, 7074.—It has fallen off more than half, 7075.—The total payment last year was 1,700*l.*, and the 7,000*l.* was advanced to obtain this payment, 7076.—He does not require the whole of the 5,750*l.* now, 7077.—Thinks he ought to repay all but about 2,000*l.*, 7078, 7079.—It has been represented to the common council, 7080.—One of the potato meters receives the whole of the penny in the shilling, and pays the fellowship 130*l.* a year, 7081.—Does not think it sufficient, 7082, 7083.—The income of the fellowship is declining rapidly, 7084.—It is in consequence of the corn going by railway and into the docks, 7085, 7086.—There is great confidence placed in the body of the fellowship; a potato salesman will have a fellowship porter in preference to any body else. In consequence of the influx of potatoes they have been obliged to put on other men; one salesman, in consequence, lost eight sacks. The fellowship pay for all losses; the small jobs do not pay the fellowship, 7087.—The system of fellowship porters is decidedly acceptable to the trade, 7088.—The loss of oranges does not average above a box a year, and the same with regard to nuts and potatoes, 7089.

LEACH, Mr. STEPHEN WILLIAM. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is engineer of the Thames navigation, and of the port of London; also principal receiver of tolls, also receives the rents and fines for projections on the bed of the river, 6356.—Holds several appointments under the corporation, is paid separately for each. Witness here states salary received from each appointment. Receives from the City altogether, allowing for deductions, about 700*l.* a year, 6357-6359.—Takes instructions from the Navigation Committee entirely, 6360, 6361.—Describes how his duties are performed with regard to the river, taking the western navigation first,—that extending from Staines to London Bridge. Has the care of all the works, all the locks, weirs, towing paths, and every thing of that kind. It has been the practice of the Navigation Committee to keep a staff of skilful workmen for those repairs, 6362.—The City of London maintains all the towing paths up to Staines. The towing path commences at Putney. There are six locks between Putney and Staines. Those are maintained by the City, 6363-6366.—At times a very considerable amount of attention is required to bills brought into Parliament affecting the River Thames. Has to examine all such, and advise the committee upon them. Also has to attend every meeting of the committee, 6367.—Does very little at present, as far as engineering works are concerned, between Putney and London Bridge, 6368.—Has to advise the City upon any engineering question between those two points, 6369.—Does not interfere in any question which does not involve engineering matters. In case of encroachments upon the river it is the duty of the water bailiff to watch them. His duties extend throughout the whole jurisdiction of the City. He is a very efficient officer, 6370–6372.—In reference to the statement that has been made as to materials having been thrown into the river at Blackfriars Bridge, the Navigation Committee referred it to the water-bailiff and to witness. Made as accurate an examination as possible, and found that the vessel which had received damage could not have touched the bottom at that place, 6373.—She must have touched the bottom higher up. Had the evidence of watermen who saw her in a sinking state before she arrived at the bridge, 6374.—She was a small iron steam boat; one of those which ply at the halfpenny fares. Witness also has to receive tolls which are taken upon the Thames navigation, 6375.—These tolls are collected at the different locks and at another place in the tideway also, 6376.—Collects them by collectors, but has the supervision of them. There is not a single barge passes, subject to toll, which does not undergo witness's own check; in most cases seven or eight times over, 6377.—Below bridge, has the general superintendence of all engineering works. Has to advise the Navigation Committee upon all projections into the river, the removal of shoals, and every other work which is proposed to be carried on, and to superintend it all, 6379.—There are several shoals in the river which impede the navigation; beginning from the neighbourhood of Erith, they extend up the river to London Bridge, 6380, 6381.—The effectual removal of them would be a work of great expense, 6382.—As they are distributed at present, the funds at the command of the Navigation Committee are not sufficient for their removal; they are confined to certain objects by Act of Parliament; if that restriction were removed thinks they would be sufficient. The operations of the Navigation Committee are at present impeded by Act of Parliament restrictions on the appropriation of their funds, 6383–6385.—Thinks the state of the river is becoming worse, materially but slowly, more particularly in the upper part of the river, 6386, 6387.—The removal of Old London Bridge has produced a serious effect upon the flow of water up and down the river, 6388.—As far as the navigation is concerned the effect has been very injurious, and it has led to the sinking of Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges, 6389.—Some effect is also produced upon the ebb and flow of the tide below bridge, 6390.—Within the last year or two the Navigation Committee have had a number of self-registering tide gauges erected for keeping an accurate record of the flow and ebb of each tide. At the same time they have had a very accurate section of the river taken, so that hereafter they can judge exactly what the effect of any dredging operations or other works upon the river may have been, 6391.—The effect of the removal of London Bridge is that the river clears its bed more completely, 6392.—It carries down a greater quantity of silt into the sea; thinks that arises more from the action of the steam boats than from the removal of London Bridge. The tide runs down with greater velocity than it did before. The water becoming more muddy through the action of the steam boats, of course a greater quantity of silt will be carried down, 6393–6396.—Thinks that in individual cases very considerable damage may have been done to the property on the bank of the Thames since the removal of London Bridge just in this way, that higher tides flow up the river now than used to do before the removal of old London Bridge, therefore they may flood the country and do mischief, 6397.—It is a generally received opinion; does not think there is any record to prove it, 6398.—It is not the duty of the City to embank the river, so as to prevent it flooding the country, 6399.—That is no part of their duty as conservators of the stream, 6400.—The main duties of the corporation as conservators of the River Thames are chiefly to prevent encroachments upon the bed or soil of the river, or to regulate them, 6401.—To see that nothing is done on the banks to impede the navigation is a very important duty in regard to the navigation of the river, 6402–6404.—Whether the conservancy has much to do with the current of the water itself depends upon the extent to which the conservators' duty is thought to go, 6405.—Thinks it very essential that the control over the soil and bed of the river should be combined with the duties of conservancy, 6406.—Blackfriars Bridge may be said to be in a very dangerous state now; it is propped up, but there is no security against its settling further at any time, 6407, 6408.—Has no doubt it was the removal of Old London Bridge which affected it. It has been in its present insecure state about two years, 6409, 6410.—Believes the received opinion about it is, that the bridge itself in the first instance was built upon improper foundations, 6411.—Blackfriars Bridge is between eighty and ninety years old; it was built upon a kind of framework, with nothing more to secure it, 6412.—If the bridges are rebuilt apprehends the foundations will be taken down to a much lower level, in fact proper foundations put down, 6413.—That would not at all affect the ebb and flow of the river, 6414.—Does not consider the foundations of Waterloo Bridge secure, 6416.—Thinks Blackfriars Bridge is in as bad a state with regard to its foundations as Westminster Bridge, 6417.—Has never heard any complaint about Southwark Bridge; believes that to be solid, 6418, 6419.—The removal of London Bridge must have tended to prevent the freezing of the Thames, 6420.—As the question of the subsidence of those bridges has been mentioned, should state that, having that circumstance before them, has operated with the Navigation Committee to deter them from going on with the removal of those shoals, which interfere with the mooring of the tier of ships, with the rapidity that they otherwise would have done. The scouring of the river has taken place to the greatest extent towards the centre of it, and there its effect in the subsidence of those bridges has been chiefly shown, 6422.—Does not think the present powers of the City sufficient for them to exercise the duties of the conservancy and the protection of the river efficiently, 6423.—In the first instance they require funds, 6424.—Was directed by the committee two or three years ago to estimate what works were really required in the shape of deepening the river, 6425.—The present annual expenditure takes place under two or three different funds. First, the navigation fund. Secondly, another fund, of which the Navigation Committee have the management, is that of the rents and fines arising from projections and accommodations on the river. The third fund they have control over is the tonnage duty fund. That is a fund arising from tonnage on shipping entering the port of London, and is at present confined to paying expenses of maintaining moorings in the river, and paying the harbour-master and the necessary staff. That is about 17,000*l.* a year. It is in fact the principal fund that the Navigation Committee have to rely on, but its application is very limited. Witness here gives statement of the different funds, 6426–6429.—Thinks so far as the tide flows, and so far as vessels can be made to go which pay these dues, this fund ought to be applicable, 6430.—Suppose it is desirable to remove a shoal it is paid for either out of the corporation revenues or out of this little rental fund. Must either have the general funds of the corporation or go to a fund which the Government is now contesting with them. There is no fund of a secure nature which is applicable to the purposes of the removal of shoals, 6431–6434.—As far as the flow of the tide extends above London Bridge, estimates that 40,000*l.* is required for dredging, to put the river in a state that sea-going vessels would be able to make use of it; 18,000*l.* is required to deepen the moorings where the tiers now lie; and to remove the shoals generally, and deepen the channel, so that vessels could come to the tiers, would cost 180,000*l.* more, 6435.—There is a heavy expense required to put the locks and weirs in an efficient state. They were all built of timber, and they have been built 40 years, and are in fact worn out, 6436.—Their condition is of great importance to the land adjoining, and it is also of importance as affecting the back water of the Thames, 6437.—There are two of those locks which the Navigation Committee have just given orders shall be replaced by new ones. That is under an arrangement with certain water companies, which under the powers of Act of Parliament intend to derive their supply from the upper part of the river. That abstraction of water renders it necessary to rebuild two of those locks, so the rebuilding of two of them is provided for. The others are in that state that they cannot be repaired. It would be better to rebuild them; it would cost about 20,000*l.*, 6438.—In authorizing the abstraction of water, its effect upon the river has been thoroughly considered, 6439.—The general pur-

port of those recommendations is the rebuilding of those locks and the performing a very considerable amount of dredging, involving an expenditure of 30,000*l.*, 6440.—That being done, is of opinion that no injury would accrue to the river in general, 6441.—The City have no connection with any water company, nor with any water supply, 6442.—With respect to the statement of Mr. Powles in answer to question 1034, that the care of the navigation of the river is entirely intrusted to the corporation, wishes to state that the moorings of vessels in the river, and the whole conduct of the harbour service in the river, is defined by certain bye-laws. Those bye-laws have to be approved by the Trinity House, in the first instance, and by one of the chief justices afterwards. They go into the utmost possible detail as to the duties of the harbour masters, 6445.—The harbour-masters have to carry those regulations into effect, 6446.—The corporation make the bye-laws under which their officers act; but the bye-laws have to be approved by the Trinity House. The officer who carries them into effect is the City's officer. The appointment of the harbour-master rests entirely with the lord mayor. The harbour-master then has to undergo an examination at Trinity House. It only rests with the Navigation Committee to allot him his station, and to appoint who shall be superintending harbour-master, 6447, 6448.—The harbour-masters are highly efficient officers, 6449.—Thinks there are twelve aldermen who are members of the Navigation Committee, 6450.—The aldermen do not attend so often as the commoners do, 6451.—It is not the case that mercantile men are excluded from the Navigation Committee. Those who complain of the constitution of the Navigation Committee are most of them electors of the City; and it is their fault if they do not send those whom they consider proper men into the common council, 6452.—Those members of the committee who have no professional knowledge of matters connected with navigation interfere very much in the business, 6453.—Those members cannot perhaps judge of an engineering point, but they sit more as a jury to receive the evidence they can get upon points, and form the best opinion they can upon them. To judge by the results, thinks they perform their duties well, 6454.—Attaches some value to those official visits which the members of the committee pay to points on the river, 6455.—The most extensive one they make is one which by their standing orders is made in the month of May every year. At that time witness has to lay before them a detailed report, with the estimate of the works which he considers necessary to be performed in the river. They go through those items seriatim, and witness has to point out the spot where the works are to be done. They order them or otherwise as they think proper, and afterwards they make another visitation to see if those works have been carried into effect, 6456.—In engineering matters they must decidedly rely on witness's judgment, 6457.—To the question suggested by Mr. Powles in answer to question 1049, as to making a compound committee, partly of members of the common council, and partly of persons connected with the Trinity House and other public bodies representing the navigation, thinks the Navigation Committee, as it is constituted now is much more independent than such a body would be. If some body must be added to the Navigation Committee, possibly the Trinity House would be the least exceptional, because they are most independent; but circumstances arise which show that it is perfectly necessary that the Navigation Committee shall be as independent as possible of local interests, 6458.—Thinks, if the Navigation Committee were formed of persons interested in the trade, it would not be sufficiently independent to decide with justice, 6459.—Is of opinion that the charge made against the present Navigation Committee, of their having neither interest in nor knowledge of the question before them is not merited; but supposing it were, apprehends any difficulty of that kind might be met by having a board of reference, 6460.—The case of the Board of Directors of Railways is precisely similar to the Navigation Committee. They do not pretend to exercise judgment upon the engineering questions which are continually brought before them, 6461.—The Navigation Committee is a fluctuating body, 6462.—Thinks, by the advice of professional and skilled persons which they receive, they are competent to manage the affairs which are intrusted to them. It is always their habit, if a question of particular importance presents itself, to go to the very highest authorities they can upon the subject, 6463.—Wishes to call attention to this one point upon which the Commission has been somewhat misinformed; that is in the evidence of Mr. Martin Pratt, the secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company, in No. 2462. By a provision in the Admiralty regulations themselves, those regulations cease as soon as a vessel comes within the bounds of the port of London, and then the regulations which the bye-laws point out begin to take effect. Those regulations as to lights have been approved by a most competent body, as far as the lights are concerned, viz., the Trinity House, 6464.—In fact there is no conflict of regulations, 6465.—If parties do not show the proper lights they do not obey the regulations. The different regulations which are spoken of do not apply to the same part of the river, 6467.

LEACH, Mr. STEPHEN WILLIAM. (Second Examination.)—His opinion, that the foundations of Waterloo Bridge are not quite secure, given in evidence on a former occasion, is mainly formed upon this circumstance: two or three times dredgers have been employed by private parties to remove the shoals in the neighbourhood of the bridge, and representations have been made by the Waterloo Bridge Company to the Navigation Committee that the foundations of the bridge might be injured, if they were not stopped from working. Complaints have been made of the piles which surround the bridge, and believes the company themselves are not very sanguine as to the security of the bridge. Thinks that a settlement may be apprehended from the alterations going forward from day to day in the bed of the river, 7520.

LEACH, Mr. STEPHEN WILLIAM. (Third Examination.)—Dredges were not employed by the Navigation Committee, as stated by Mr. Powell, but by the private parties to whom they belonged, who obtained licences from the corporation to work in the river, 7529, 7530.—To take ballast from the river, private parties must apply for licences to the lord mayor, and can only work according to the conditions set out upon it, which conditions are very precise, and there is an officer appointed to see that they are carried out, 7531, 7532.—Has no doubt it was so in the instance referred to, 7533.—Admits Mr. Powell's statement as to the danger to the bridge from these operations, and that the persons dredging acknowledged their error by putting things back into their former state, 7534.—Does not think that implies an abuse of the power given them. An excavation was made of the channel on the south side of the river, believes, with the concurrence of Sir John Rennie, one of the Directors of the Company, which it was thought would divert the strength of the current and tend to expose the bridge to less danger. Possibly a greater depth was made than was prudent, and the parties were called upon by the Waterloo Bridge Company to stop it up, which they did, 7535, 7536.—The duty of the Navigation Committee is to take care of the river, and there was no damage doing to that, 7537.

LEGAL OFFICER:

Is required to exercise supervision and control over legal proceedings, Pearson, 5676, 5677.

LEGH, Mr. EDWARD. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a private gentleman living at Lewisham, 7538.—Living within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court. Is of opinion that the appointment of tradesmen and practising lawyers to be magistrates, elected by a small knot of freemen, without reference to their intellectual or moral qualifications, is very pernicious. Would relieve the recorder from the incubus of the lord mayor and aldermen, whose interference has a tendency to disturb the calm deliberations that a judicial mind should invariably possess. States a case at the Mansion House, reported in the "Times" of the 6th of June 1851, in which Mr. Alderman Wire acted as judge, and was likewise solicitor to the prosecutors. Was also the gentleman to instruct counsel for further prosecution. His partner Mr. Child was the solicitor who appeared at the Mansion House to prosecute the case before the alderman, 7539.—Alderman Wire committed the prisoner, but cannot say whether he sat as the alderman on rota when the prisoner was tried.

LICENSING ACT:

Secures the privileges of the City, Pulling, 853.

LINE MONEY:

Formerly the committees used to be paid by "line money;" that is, every member as he came in, up to a certain time, had a line put under his name, and these were paid a certain sum for their attendance; those who came afterwards were put under the line, and were not entitled to any remuneration. This practice was objected to, and the committees were then allowed a certain sum of money, to use as they thought best, Merewether, 4955.

LIVERPOOL:

The corporation appear to have a large balance at a private banker's, besides an amount in the hands of the treasurer, Scott, 4587.

LIVERY:

Some companies compel parties to take up their livery, Wallis, 1406.—The livery of London should be taken as the basis of future constituency, ib. 1407.—Within the last 200 years, has become an exclusive body, which has corrupted the representation, and militated against the interests of the corporation of the City, Hyde, 1507–1509.

LIVERYMEN:

The expense of being called to be a liverymen, which in the higher companies is 1.000*l.* and sometimes more, in the smaller companies is reduced to almost nothing, they being desirous of obtaining members for the sake of the small fees which are paid, Pulling, 946, 947.—With bribes varying from 1*s.* to 10*l.* can buy over the 400 liverymen, Acland, 417.—Would only limit the residence of liverymen to England, Wallis, 1410.—In contested elections liverymen come and exercise their franchise, but are too respectable to require to be brought, ib. 1411.—Non resident voters do not increase the expense of a contested election, ib. 1412.—Must be members of a company, ib. 1422, 1423.—The most valuable body in the kingdom, Jones, 1557.—Case to prove they should have no exclusive privileges, Hyde, 1577.—Those who do not reside in the City ought to be deprived of their franchise, Alcock, 1760, 1761.

Common Hall. Does not think it desirable for liverymen to be electors in common hall, ib. 1759.—Does think it desirable that they should retain their votes for the city officers, Bateman, 2347.—There was a resolution of the common council, declaring that the elections should be in the liverymen. Since then the liverymen have been the representatives of the great body of citizens, who ought to meet in common hall, Merewether, 4980.—Long usage has reconciled the the rights of the liverymen; otherwise would say they are an encroachment upon the general rights of the commonalty of London, ib. 4980, 4981.—In point of practice now, only liverymen attend the common hall both for elections and other purposes, but that was not the original constitution of London, ib. 5351, 5352.—Would not disfranchise the liverymen, Lord Mayor, 7181.—There are many who exercise their trust with a sound desire for the welfare of London, who have no connexion with the City beyond belonging to the livery companies; would not allow them to retain those exclusive privileges to the exclusion of those who reside in the City, ib. 7182.—Sees no objection to those liverymen who are scattered over the country having votes for the City of London, ib. 7183.—The liverymen are an unconstitutional body for municipal purposes; they were only constituted for trade purposes; if retained at all, witness would only do so as a matter of expediency, ib. 7188.

LOANS:

money from ships in the Pool, Acland, 145.—In connexion with these docks the City meters are almost nominal, Cattley, 1303.

LONDONDERRY:

Formerly the corporation of Londonderry was part and parcel of the corporation of London, Humphreys, 8354.

LONDON MUNICIPAL REFORM ASSOCIATION:

Was established in July this year, and consists of 1200 members, Acland, 9, 10.—The objects were, first, to secure to all rated occupiers an equal right of a free and full participation in the privileges which are now monopolised by freemen; and, secondly, to defend the members of this association against any prosecution on the part of the corporate officials, connected with the demand that they should take up their freedom. ib. 14.—The association resolved to give all possible aid to this commission, ib. 15.—The society have rather desired to expose the abuses that exist in the constitution of the corporation, and have not as yet considered what will be the best remedy, ib. 16.—The society has held several meetings, and has appointed a committee, who have also had several meetings, to conduct its affairs, ib. 17.—The complaints of the society have been only against the system, and not against individual officers, ib. 18.

'LONGSHORE MEN:

The statement that there were 400 'longshore men controlled by Alderman Lucas, who, by his influence, effectually secured the election of his friend, Alderman Key, Key, 5901.—By 'longshore men now is meant all those liverymen who are to be bought for tickets of 1*s.* or 1*s.* 6*d.*, who recognize their leaders in the self-constituted managers of elections, and who, by preconcert, go to the hall on every occasion of an election to hold up their hands, Acland, 313.

LORD LIEUTENANT:

Should be elected by the citizens of London for three years, Wallis, 1472.

LORD LIEUTENANCY OF THE CITY OF LONDON:

Appointed by the Crown, Anderton, 7697–7699.

THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Has been connected with the corporation since 1842, 7119.—Was only one year in the common council, during which took an active part in the question of municipal reform, 7120.—Was elected an alderman in September 1844, 7121.—Has perused the evidence given before the Commission, 7122.—Desires to rebut some evidence given by Mr. Acland in question 325 and 326, stating that money to the amount of 200*l.* or 300*l.* was spent in bribery at witness's election, the whole amount spent being 21*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* Produces the bills and receipts. Contradicts another statement made by Mr. Acland, 340, that 19 aldermen agreed to find 100*l.* a piece towards turning the scale. Answers for himself, and has no hesitation in answering for the great majority of his brethren, that they neither engaged to subscribe, nor paid anything, 7123.—Flatly contradicts a statement to the effect that the corporation funds were used at an election for the purposes of corruption, as stated by Mr. Sheriff Wallis in question 1462, 7124.—The subject has been a matter of conversation among the aldermen, 7125.—Is satisfied that the rumour of this subscription is entirely groundless. Reads extracts from the evidence of Mr. Dillon, Mr. Bennoch, Mr. Thomson Hankey, and Mr. Morley, saying that the lord mayor's show is not generally popular. Witness thinks from experience that the generality of people are very much in favour of it, 7126.—The expense of the show this year amounted to 500*l.*, 7127.—Was more expensive this year, because there were various devices applicable to the present aspect of Europe, 7128.—Does not think the present show like those of former times, but does not think the interest has abated, 7130.—It used to be rather a procession of the companies than of the lord mayor, 7131.—The amount of expense depends on the lord mayor and sheriffs, 7132.—Nothing is paid out of the corporation funds, with the exception of lighting and preparing the hall, 7133.—The lord mayor has emoluments virtually belonging to his office, in lieu of certain offices surrendered to the corporation. If there was any diminution in the expense of the show it would be a saving to the lord mayor, 7135.—No specific grant is made by the corporation for the expense of the show, 7136.—They have generally divided the amount into four proportions, the lord mayor paying two of those proportions, and the sheriffs one-fourth each. In this year it was different, inasmuch as one of the sheriffs declined acceding to the arrangement. The feast itself is attacked by Mr. Thomson Hankey and others, who say it is a very noisy occasion, and a feast which it is not desirable to continue. Reads an extract from the "Times" on the subject, which fully expresses witness's own views, 7137.—The average expense to the lord mayor and sheriffs for the dinner on lord mayor's day is about 2,200*l.*, 7138.—The lord mayor would pay 1,100*l.*, and the sheriffs 550*l.* each, 7139.—About 1,100 guests are usually invited, 7140.—The remembrancer is consulted, and the ancient custom as far as possible adhered to, 7141.—This is the only dinner of the kind during the year, excepting upon extraordinary occasions, such as when the allied sovereigns visited London; the other entertainments given by the lord mayor are at his own discretion, and from his own official income at the Mansion House, 7142–7144.—Does not think Mr. Alderman Humphrey was justified in his observation that he had been asked for a subscription to promote the election of Sir J. Key. Mr. Alderman Wire, of his own accord, at the Mansion House, said, "We must subscribe, if necessary;" it was not responded to by any of the aldermen, and it went no further. The observation was made with a view of palliating the indignation felt by the aldermen in the presence of Mr. Sheriff Wallis, who took his seat among them after having given such evidence upon oath. The court was cleared, and a general denial given, 7145.—Thinks there would be no moral wrong in subscribing to Sir John Key's election from private funds. With reference to the commercial standing of the corporation, will read two paragraphs from a "Gazeteer" of the year 1769. Does not think, taking the Court of Aldermen, 26 gentlemen could be found in any assemblage of public representatives who could vie with them in blameworthiness of private character or energy in the general administration of the objects they have in view. The Court of Aldermen as a body are possessed of wealth to the extent of between three and four millions sterling, 7146.—Can easily explain why there is a much greater separation between the merchants and the corporation now than there was in former days. In the first place, they could not trade in the City of London, unless they resided there; in the next, the representation of the City was confined to the aldermen; and a still greater reason is an undue desire to enrich themselves by their own respective callings, 7147.—Thinks the duties of an alderman are more strictly performed now than in the first years of the reign of George III., 7148.—The business of the City has increased, and the duties of a City magistrate have become more onerous, 7149.—Thinks the difference exists rather in the performance of the duties than in anything else, 7150.—The business can only have increased in proportion to the increase of the trade and importance of the City itself, 7151.—Does not think the business of the justices has increased, 7152.—Has no doubt a greater amount of time is given to the performance of those duties than formerly, 7153.—None of the present aldermen have anything more than a business connexion with the City. Witness gives his views upon the present position of the corporation, 7154.—There is generally a contest in the common hall, and of course with such a number of persons as assemble in common hall the expenditure is very serious, 7154 a.—Mr. Gibbs has held the office of bridge master for about seven years, 7155.—The salary is about 400*l.* a year, 7156.—It is generally supposed that the salary is not sufficient for the expenses of election, 7157.—Can see no reason why the common hall should elect officers of this character in public hall assembled. The election of chamberlain of London should be transferred to the common council, and that the common hall elections should be strictly confined to the election of lord mayor and sheriffs, 7158.—One municipal body would work more advantageously for the community at large than the present system, 7159.—Would have one constitutional body. The whole body should have a voice in the election of lord mayor and sheriffs. Is in favour of a constituency founded upon the ancient existing privileges of the City of London. With regard to the common council thinks the numbers are much too large at present. Would reduce the number of wards from 25 to 18. Would have the Court of

Aldermen retained for the dispatch of the business which now comes before it, and that the aldermen should, as at present, be continued for life; they should have the power of appointing two paid magistrates for the police courts of the City. The aldermen should not have the power to draw cash, except for magisterial duties, and the scale of payment should be settled by the corporation at large. The officers of the corporation are much too numerous. Would recommend that many of the offices be consolidated, especially the offices connected with the conservancy and navigation of the Thames. Likewise the consolidation of the criminal prisons connected with the City. If the offices were consolidated, and some which are nearly useless abolished, it would be a saving of at least 14,000*l.* per annum, 7161.—In the case of the two marshals they have 1,000*l.* a year, besides perquisites. One good policeman would do the duties of both, 7162.—The comptroller died yesterday morning. Has no doubt that office will form a subject of inquiry with the common council. They refer all vacant offices to a committee to consider as to their emoluments and duties, and the propriety of filling up the vacancy, 7163.—Has been requested to call a common hall for election of a bridge master, that office being vacant by death. Believing that the subject will engage the attention of the common council at their next assembly, the office is only filled up at present pro tempore, 7164.—The bridge master is elected by the common hall. The common council have upon the last several occasions of vacancies thought it right to make regulations as to the office of chamberlain, with great advantage to the working of the office, 7165.—Is justified in the observation which he has made by the statement of Mr. Brand, the comptroller of the Bridge House Estates, who stated that the office was really unnecessary, 7166.—Is not aware that any one can call a common hall but himself, 7167.—Understands that there is no immediate obligation on him to call a common hall for the purpose of filling a vacant office, 7168.—Thinks that the courts of law in the City are too many and conflicting; the Court of Hustings, the Mayor's Court, the Sheriffs' Court, and the Secondary's Court, might with great advantage be consolidated into one court. The business of the quarter sessions held at Guildhall, together with the licensing, might be performed at one session, and the quarter sessions now held at Southwark ought to be abolished, 7169.—Believes the inhabitants of Southwark, or some considerable portion of them, have a great desire to be incorporated, and the corporation of London has been approached more than once by petition, praying that they might participate in the benefits of a municipal government; but after great inquiry the corporation have always come to the conclusion that they have no power, without a special Act of Parliament for the purpose, to embody Southwark with the City for municipal objects. Does not think there is any particular objection in the City of London to a connexion with Southwark; but does not see any great advantage that it would be either to the City themselves or to the inhabitants of Southwark, 7170.—Sees great objection to very large corporations; thinks it is a defect in the present constitution that all places which are boroughs for Parliamentary purposes are not also boroughs for municipal purposes. Conceives that the inhabitants of the whole of the metropolis, if incorporated as different corporations according to the limits of the present Parliamentary boroughs, would find great advantage in the administration of their local affairs, 7171.—The inhabitants of Southwark would be much benefited by being separate from the City and incorporated as a separate corporation. Where prosecutions have been instituted it has been with the thorough conviction that public interests were consulted and promoted by ordering them. They have been undertaken from the want which is felt by all the magistrates in not having a public prosecutor. Sees great objections to committing magistrates having the power of being prosecutors, especially where the criminal has to come before a tribunal in which they themselves may afterwards be judges. Calls attention to the charities connected with the prisons of London; they amount to upwards of 1,600*l.* a year, and are applied in the discharge of prisoners in compounding their debts with solicitors. The application of these charities is open to very serious objections, 7172.—The porters do not derive any great benefit from the fellowship; it is considered a great advantage to the great bulk of the mercantile community, even in its decrepid state; but the porters themselves do not find that personal benefit which as free labourers they might find. Whatever benefit arises is to the trade, not to the labourers, 7173, 7174.—Uses the expression, "in its decrepid state," because they have been annoyed very much by actions with Messrs. Combe and Company, and they have also had a great inroad made upon their means of labour by several private Acts of Parliament, which have given power to dock companies to unload vessels from their respective docks. This has greatly interfered with the privileges of the fellowship porters. It has been under the consideration of the Court of Common Council, but is so mixed up with the question of metage that the whole will require the consideration of Parliament to place it upon a permanently useful footing, 7175.—A conference has been held by several members of the corporation, and an agreement beneficial to the community at large has been come to; it will pass through Parliament, it is expected, with their sanction, 7176.—The trade generally prefer employing porters belonging to the fellowship to employing other labour irrespective of it. Makes some observations with respect to the navigation and conservancy of the river, 7177.—The Trinity Board would be the best body to be associated with the corporation in the management of the river. If the 11th of George I. and all the subsequents Acts were repealed, all fines upon freedom, all tolls abolished, great advantages would be the result, 7178.—The Act was obtained by 15 aldermen of that day against the decided opinion of the Court of Common Council and the citizens at large; in fact the whole bane of the corporate existence has been the ulterior design of certain aldermen to get into Parliament. The above Act gave a power of election to the livery companies which is not recognized in the constitution of this country. A liveryman living in Cornwall or Scotland may come and vote for a lord mayor, sheriff, or chamberlain, while a party living in London may have no voice in the election. The Reform Bill limits the power of voting for members of Parliament to liverymen living within 7 miles, 7179, 7180.—Would have the lord mayor elected by the burgesses, according to the franchise which he suggests. Would open the common hall to the residents of London, but would not disfranchise the present liverymen of London, 7181.—There are many in the livery of London who exercise their trust with a sound desire for the welfare of London, who have no connexion with the City beyond belonging to the livery companies; would not allow them to retain those exclusive privileges to the exclusion of those who reside in the City, 7182.—Sees no objection to those liverymen who are scattered over the country having votes for the City of London, 7183.—Though it has a tendency to increase the expense of elections, 7184.—Does not think it would be advisable to adopt the franchise of the General Municipal Reform Bill for the City of London; it would tend rather to diminish than to increase that constituency, which all desire to have enlarged, 7186.—Believes, previous to the 11th of George I. a register was always made up in the wardmote by the aldermen; it was a public register, and all men were commanded under a fine to attend the wardmote when held; they were required to come and take the franchise as citizens, and they became enrolled in the wardmote. Thinks, were that system to be carried out, nothing could be better, 7187.—The liverymen are an unconstitutional body for municipal purposes; they were only constituted for trade purposes; if retained at all, witness would only do so as a matter of expediency. 7188.—Recommends the municipal franchise to be the occupation of premises within the City of London for 12 months and a day, without any pecuniary qualification, and without the necessity of residence, 7189, 7190.—Thinks they should be rated at some rate, and then there would be no difficulty in making a register, 7191.—There has been much false reasoning, founded upon the fact that the City of London is small in its area compared with other parts of the metropolis. Thinks the City as much the metropolis now as ever it was, taking the commercial aspect of it. From it emanates nearly the whole of the commerce of the southern part of the kingdom. The sleeping population is not more than 126,000, but the day population may be considered as at least three times that amount, so many who transact business in it have their residences elsewhere, 7194, 7195.—Does not consider the corporation as virtually representing the entire metropolis. As the Legislature has already decided to enfranchise other portions of the metropolis as Parliamentary boroughs they ought to be enfranchised for municipal purposes also, 7196.—If only residents in London are to be voters the constituency will only represent the minor interests of publicans, fellowship porters, and police officers. If gentlemen can be found to resort for the daily franchise of business to London, from Brighton or elsewhere, they may safely be entrusted with privileges as municipal electors. Apprehends that the freedom qualification proposed by the corporation must be abolished, or the municipality of London will grow less every year, 7197.—Every man connected with the trade and commerce of London should be liable to perform all the offices of citizenship, whether he resides there or not, 7198.—Should have hesitated in originating the coal tax, but does not think it is felt to be a grievance by any class, 7199.—Would give to the aldermen the same power of appointing a magistrate in the police courts which they now have in the election of their recorder. In reducing the number of aldermen to 18 the public interests will require one or two paid magistrates, and would give to the aldermen optional power to appoint if necessary. At present the Court of Aldermen elect the recorder; the Court of Common Council elect the other judges of the Central Court and Sheriffs' Court. Would certainly retain to the aldermen the functions of magistracy which they have at present, 7200.—The City should retain the separate jurisdiction over the police now possessed by the corporation, and would add further, that a municipality is incomplete unless its corporation has entire jurisdiction over the lighting and supply of water to the district; and thinks that if powers were given to the corporation to buy up the interests of private companies, and deal with the subject as one of municipal government, great advantage would result, 7201.—Would oppose the extension of the powers of centralization in any government, but thinks that the different municipal districts might work upon one uniform principle, and have the entire management of their own affairs, 7202.—The principle of centralization is a very unsound one, both constitutionally and in practice; contrasts the cases of Paris and London, 7203.—Would not deprive the aldermen of any power which they now possess, but in arranging a new system would leave the magistrates free from anything like the imputation that they have the power of drawing money out of the chamber for any improper purpose, 7204, 7205.—The aldermen in right of their office are connected with the royal hospitals; they have also the exclusive management of Emanuel Hospital. Also a charitable trust, conducted by the lord mayor for the time being, the two senior aldermen, and the chamberlain, for lending money to poor tradesmen to set up in business, 7206.—The City estates are managed altogether by the common council, and the aldermen act only as members of that body. The separate jurisdiction of the Bridge Trust and Irish Estates ought to be abolished, and the whole centred in the corporation at large, which might be done by the repeal of an Act of Parliament, 7207–7210.—The Irish Society manages estates in connexion with the companies; does not see the use of the Society in its present position, 7211.—It is difficult to know the exact constitution of the Irish Society. No member can serve beyond two years, and it takes him one to understand fully the business, and in another year he ceases to be a member, 7212, 7213.—In the committees of the common council they gather opinions from their officers, and pay marked attention to those opinions, but the responsibility is with the committee, not with the officer, 7214–7216.—Nothing can work better than the present system of corporate committees, and only objects to such a committee as the present consolidated committee, which sits in secret, with a great deal of mystery in its proceedings, and some of its acts have militated against the credit and spirit of the corporation. The duty of that committee is to watch proceedings, take measures, appoint deputations, go with those deputations to members of the Government, without the consent of the whole body; such steps taken by a committee have the effect of committing the corporation to a course of proceeding sometimes unwise, and at all events unconstitutional, 7217, 7218.—On every question a power should be given to their committee by the body at large. In matters of negotiation the committee depute their business to a sub-committee, called a deputation committee. It negotiates with various members of the Government, pledging the whole body, which is the most objectionable system of this secret committee, 7219.—Should say that each officer does not feel himself the servant of his particular committee, but of the common council and corporation at large. For instance the superintendent of police does not feel that his instructions are from the Committee of Police, but from the corporation at large. No committee, except the consolidated, can act, except by reference made to them by the general court. 7220, 7221.

LORD MAYOR:

Desirable that he should be elected without reference to the Court of Aldermen, Acland, 370, 371.—They can frequently save 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* out of the funds provided for them, ib. 372.—It would be preferable that the Lord Mayor should hold office for more than a year, ib. 380.—The allowance to the Lord Mayor for public entertainments is about 10,000*l.*, ib. 399.—The office is an expensive one, ib. 402–405.—Differ very much in their expenditure, ib. 411.—Has considerable patronage; has from 8,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* a year to fulfil the duties of the office, ib. 425.—Would not abolish the office, ib. 478.—Practically speaking, presented by the aldermen and instituted by the livery, but believes that the livery could appoint any citizen, not necessarily an alderman, though the custom is, that none but aldermen be appointed, Pulling, 895–900.—There are acts of Common Council which say he must have been a sheriff, ib. 900.—Thinks any eminent merchant in London should be eligible for that office, though he had taken up his freedom only the day before, which would diminish the consequence of the aldermen, ib. 902, 903.—The office could scarcely be dispensed with, ib. 904.—Takes the chair at all meetings of the Common Council, ib. 931.—He acts as speaker of the assembly, puts questions to the vote, and decides points of order, ib. 932, 933.—The Lord Mayor alone costs 25,000*l.* a year, Elliot, 1091.—A large sum of money is sometimes expended in the case of an election of a Lord Mayor. Gives an instance, Bennoch, 1236.—10,000*l.* is allowed the Lord Mayor for the year, besides other things, ib. 1393.—The absurdities attached to the office prevent first-class men from taking it, Wallis, 1418.—Have been several expensive contests for the office. Knows of two, the expenses of which amounted to 15,000*l.*, ib. 1430, 1431.—Reasons why Lord Mayor's show should be done away with, Hankey, 1700–1710.—Compares the entertainments given by the Mayor of Liverpool with the Mayor of London, ib. 1711–1715.—Ought to be elected by the whole constituency, Alcock, 1774.—Should have a liberal allowance for maintaining hospitality, Williams, 2830.—Explains statement at page 65, under the head of Charges to the Lord Mayor, Scott, 4501.—Statement as to the Lord Mayor's Court, Merewether, 4690–4699.—Duties of, ib. 4833–4836.—Statement of the expense of his office, ib. 4837.—It would be impossible for the corporation to alter the term of tenure of office of the Lord Mayor with safety, inasmuch as the duration of the office is embodied in one of their earliest charters, ib. 4989.—The average cost of the entertainment on Lord Mayor's day has been 2,200*l.*, including a sum of 200*l.* paid by the corporation. The sum of 2,000*l.* is defrayed in equal moieties by the Lord Mayor and the two Sheriffs, Tyrrell, 5476–5482.—Is returned by the livery, but the livery must return two names to the Court of Aldermen from which the court choose one, Key, 5901.—The generality of people are in favour of the Lord Mayor's show. Lord Mayor, 7126.—The amount of expense depends on the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, ib. 7132.—Nothing is paid out of the corporation funds, except lighting and preparing the hall, ib. 7133.—Reads an extract from the "Times" on the subject of the Lord Mayor's dinner, which expresses witness's own opinion, ib. 7137.—The average expense of the dinner on Lord Mayor's day to the Mayor and Sheriffs is about 2,200*l.*, ib. 7138.—This is the only dinner of the kind during the year, excepting upon extraordinary occasions, such as when the allied sovereigns visited London; the other entertainments given by the Lord Mayor are at his own discretion, and from his own official income at the Mansion House, ib. 7142–7144.—Would have the Lord Mayor elected by the burgesses, according to the franchise, which he suggests, ib. 7181.—Hopes the Lord Mayor's show will not be done away with, Anderton, 7695.—Statement respecting the Lord Mayor, Pearson, 8461.—Should be able to devote much time to the affairs of the corporation, ib. 8482.

LORD MAYOR'S COURTS. (See Courts.)

LOTT, THOMAS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the common council, 8000.—Has served on the City Lands Committee, 8002.—Was chairman of the Corn, Coal, and Finance Committee. From the year 1781 to 1852 there has been 127,384*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* voted from the City funds for charitable purposes, 8003, 8004.—It has been given mostly to City charities, 8005.—Contradicts the statement of Mr. Elliott, that the aldermen have a preponderating influence in the committees, 8006.—Would have the election of sheriffs placed in the hands of the Crown. Would object to see the aldermen discontinued as magistrates, or subjected to periodical election, having had experience of their impartiality and intelligence in the administration of justice, 8007.—The Aldermen's Court has been to a certain extent a court of conciliation. The aldermen seldom attend any but charity dinners, and they generally leave behind them liberal contributions to the charities. Thinks that the securities which the Court of Aldermen have the power of taking from brokers are too small in amount. It is not often that the clerk of the magistrate manages the case as it has been said; the aldermen prefer conducting the cases themselves. Supposing the corporation be reduced, the number attending each committee might be reduced to 12, and sub-committees altogether abolished. If the pageant on Lord Mayor's Day be found to impede the traffic in the City to any great extent, it should be confined to the procession on the water. The removal of the street orderlies was in consequence of a petition from many of the inhabitants to that effect, as it was thought that the dust which they made did great injury to the goods of the shopkeepers, 8008.

LUCEY, Mr. CHARLES. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a master of the Company of Watermen and Lightermen only a few weeks, but has been on the court for some years, 7273, 7274.—Is a freeman of the Waterman's Company, 7275.—Wishes to have a statement read, drawn up by the Court of the Waterman's Company to explain several things which have been said adverse to the company. Mr. Henry Humpheries, clerk to the company, reads the statement, 7276.—The number of persons on the roll of the company is near 8,000, also 1,680 apprentices, but probably not more than 5,000, or 6,000 working on the river; the remainder consisting of master lightermen, persons not following the business, others in the sea service, pensioners, &c., 7277.—No person taking his freedom of the Company of Watermen has a right to vote at elections in Common Hall, nor is he thereby enabled to obtain the freedom of the City of London. It does not stand on the footing of the trading companies, 7278, 7279.

LUNATIC ASYLUM:

The Court of Aldermen are on the look-out for some ground to build a lunatic asylum in the neighbourhood of the Holloway Prison, Bunning, 6040.

MACNAMARA, Mr. ARTHUR. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has sometimes assisted in elections for the City of London, principally parliamentary; assisted in the late election for chamberlain, 2882, 2883.—Has never taken an active part in any other City election, was an agent in the last election for chamberlain on Sir John Key's side, 2884–2886.—Some money was expended in that election by paying men as canvassers, flag-bearers, constables, &c., 2887, 2888.—Many voters were so paid and many who were not voters, 2889.—Has never himself paid voters more than the amount due to them for their services, for the sake of inducing them to give their votes; has heard that there were payments made to the amount of 10*s.* or 15*s.* to a man for his day's work, 2890, 2891.—Does not think there was any treating at the election. There were seven or eight days election, and the amount paid for expenses was 20*l.*, that was for the committee, 2892, 2893.—Sometime ago was employed in one or two municipal elections, 2895.—There is much less money expended in the City at municipal elections than at parliamentary elections. The livery men of London are a very respectable body of men, and very few who would take anything for their vote, 2896.—Had nothing to do with the bringing up of non-resident voters. Believes their expenses were paid, 2897, 2898.—Thinks that the necessity of bringing up distant voters adds materially to the expense of a City election, 2899.—Has several times had something to do with contested elections for the office of alderman, 2900.—A person of the name of Scales was brought forward, and his election was carried on two or three occasions. After Mr. Johnson, who succeeded Mr.

Scales, Mr. Moon came forward, he was opposed by Mr. Salomons, and there were law proceedings which lasted for 7 or 8 months. Thinks the whole of the contest did not cost Mr. Moon more than 500*l.* or 600*l.* does not believe one man received a shilling for his vote, 2901, 2902.—The money was spent in canvassing, and evening parties or dinners, 2903.

MAGISTRATES:

Aldermen generally unfit for the office of magistrates, Acland, 463.—Barristers recommended, ib. 464.—Is in favour of a stipendiary magistracy, Dillon, 701.—Would relieve London of its alderman-magistracy, and have two paid police magistrates for the two offices of the City, appointed by the Crown, as the aldermen have neither time nor qualifications for their office, Elliot, 1079–1081.—The two police courts in the City are, by the corporation report, carried on at a cost of more than 5,000*l.* a year. The twenty-three paid police magistrates in the metropolis cost altogether but 45,000*l.* a year, ib. 1086.—Thinks there is a provision in the Municipal Act that stipendiary magistrates should be appointed by the Crown, and paid for by the rates; but if not, there are funds in the City, ib. 1091.

Stipendiary. Should be appointed, if the office of aldermen be abolished, two for the Mansion House, two for Guildhall appointed by the Crown, paid from City funds, Wallis, 1480–1482.—Would have paid magistrates, who are not dependent on a solicitor, Alcock, 1768.—Thinks the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate for the City would be of the greatest benefit, Merewether, 2445.—Has never heard a complaint of the decisions of the magistrates of the City; has heard the first judges of the land admire and praise the manner in which they get through their business. Thinks, therefore, that an alderman who has gone through all the various paraphernalia of office, and arrived at that high position, is a very fit person to occupy it, Whistler, 2631.—As a class, thinks the aldermen the best magistrates in the country, Rogers, 2669.—The aldermen are the best, Wortley, 5674, 5675.—Sees great objections to committing magistrates having the power of being prosecutors, especially where the criminal has to come before a tribunal in which they themselves may afterwards be judges, Lord Mayor, 7172.—An Act passed in 1839, enabling the City magistrates to appoint the commissioner of the police, Farebrother, 7263.—The appointment of tradesmen and practising lawyers to be magistrates, elected by a small knot of freemen, without reference to their intellectual or moral qualifications, is very pernicious, Legh, 7538.

MANCHESTER:

Thinks there are 36,000*l.* lying to the account of the corporation at a private banker's, Scott, 4587.

MANSION HOUSE:

Cost of, disputed, Williams, 2794.

MARINE SOCIETY:

Levy a tax of two shillings on every fishing vessel which comes up to Billingsgate, Gibbs, 2266.

MARKETS:

Thinks it a disgrace to the City that they have not better markets, Whistler, 2631.—Statement with regard to, Williams, 2800, 2801.—Tolls of, corporation property, Tyrrell, 5417–5421.—Proceeds of markets have increased, Scott, 4595.—The City derives a considerable revenue from their markets; they are all under the supervision of the comptroller, Merewether, 5188, 5191.—A dead-meat market to be placed on the site of Smithfield, in place of Newgate Market, which is quite insufficient for the trade, Bunning, 6095.—Under the control of the Markets Committee, Taylor, 7855–7858.

Billingsgate. Particulars of price of standings, Roberts, 42–60.—The revenue derived from Billingsgate is from small tolls paid upon all articles bought and sold in the market, like tolls elsewhere, all over the kingdom. There has been an Act of Parliament connected with Billingsgate Market lately, Merewether, 5189–5191.—Though a free market, not exempt from payment for stallage, Pearson, 5626–5628.—States, a corporate officer might be called to establish the statements made that the rental of 3,000*l.* a year on that market is quite a recent charge, Acland, 8503.

Farringdon. Not available for a dead-meat market, being on an acclivity, and the approaches not good, Taylor, 7821–7828.

Hungerford. Was not opposed, nor was there any compensation stipulated, Pearson, 8491.

Metropolitan. Smithfield, Billingsgate, and Newgate Markets may be considered such, Taylor, 7856.

Newgate. A much greater nuisance than Smithfield, Taylor, 7829, 7830.

New Central Cattle. Money was spent confidentially by corporation for promoting the City's Bill for making a new Central Cattle Market. States particulars, Scott, 4660–4673.—The cost of the new cattle market will be about 300,000*l.*, including the cost of the ground, Bunning, 6130.

Smithfield. Mortgaged by the corporation for 100,000*l.* within the last few weeks, Acland, 532.—Thinks more than 1,000*l.* was expended in the opposition to the Smithfield Bill, Bennoch, 1223.—Some money must have been expended in getting up petitions against the removal of Smithfield Market, ib. 1234.—Removal of lavish expenditure of the corporation in the conflict with the Government, Norris, 4235.—Money was spent confidentially by the corporation in opposing the Government Bill for removing Smithfield Market. States particulars, Scott, 4660–4673.—Reported the bringing forward the Bill to the Court of Common Council, who referred to the Market's Improvement Committee, Tyrrell, 5388.—Had the management of expenditure incurred by the City in opposing the Bill, so far as receiving the money and paying it to Mr. Scott, who paid it over to the parties. The total amount of the outlay was 2,750*l.*, ib. 5389–5392.—In addition to the 2,750*l.* already named, there was a sum of 3,169*l.* 11*s.* for counsel, witnesses, and other usual legal expenses, ib. 5404.—With regard to the sum expended in opposing the Bill for the removal of Smithfield Market, no payment could be made by the chamberlain without a warrant, signed by seven members of the committee, Wood, 7263.—Thinks if the sum of 2,500*l.* was expended in opposing that Bill, there should be some means of arriving at the details, ib. 7265.—Some particulars respecting the proposed plan for improving the old market, 7000 electors having signed a memorial approving the retention of it. Also the plan of the new market, with the estimated cost, Taylor, 7809–7816.—The great objection to parting with Smithfield Market arises from the desire to retain all the trade within the City. Seven or eight millions per annum change hands in Smithfield; to take that to any other locality, is, to a certain amount, an injury to the trade of the locality from which it is taken, ib. 7859–7861.—The corporation have within the last half century purchased property to the extent of 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.*, which they have pulled down to enlarge the area of Smithfield, Pearson, 8459.—There were clauses inserted in the Islington Market Bill to afford compensation to the City for damage to Smithfield Market, Pearson, 8489.

MARSHALS:

The two Marshals have 1,000*l.* a year, besides perquisites; a good policeman could do the office of both, Lord Mayor, 7162.

MARYLEBONE:

Has no objection to combining the three parishes of the present parliamentary borough of Marylebone into a single municipality, beyond this,—that in the arrangement of a municipality you would take from them the privileges they already enjoy and give them to the central board, George, 2304.—This parish is a remarkable instance of comprehensiveness in municipal matters of administration. The population is 157,696; inhabited houses 15,826; area 1,490 acres. The expense in respect to lighting is 11,711*l.*; the police commissioners 24,688*l.* The difference in respect to police as compared with the City is 20,000*l.* per annum. The expense is less by nearly one half, although the area to be watched is more than twice that in the City, Hickson, 2718.—Abstract of the accounts of Marylebone for the year ending 31st December 1852, ib. 2724.

MASTERMAN, WILLIAM STANLEY, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a practising attorney and solicitor, 2348.—Has chambers at 15, Clifford's Inn, Fleet Street, 2349. Having understood that the lord mayor's court had been thrown open to the legal practitioners of London, went to the court office and there signed a roll as at Westminster, thinking to be at liberty to practise there by some order of the common council, but found that the privilege was enjoyed by six attorneys, and that one of them had commenced an action against a new attorney for beginning to practise. Has been told that those six attorneys paid the corporation for those offices. Thinks it unfair that the privilege should be taken away from those six without giving them compensation, 2350.—It is very difficult to get at facts, only states from report. The practice of that court is extremely mischievous, looking at the general policy and improved condition of laws of England, 2352.—Is a freeman of London; thought it right as many other gentlemen appeared to be freemen, to become so; went through the necessary ordeal, being then one of the householders in the ward of Farringdon Without. Has exercised right to vote for the common council on one occasion. On the 1st of August 1849, an Act passed the Legislature which professed to give greater privileges to freemen than they had hitherto enjoyed. It states in the preamble of the Bill that the Legislature thought it right to extend and enlarge those advantages; but by the second clause of the Act that not only are you to occupy warehouses, cellars, or shops, to the extent of 10*l.* to enable you to vote for this class of officers, but you are to be on the parliamentary list in addition. As a lawyer, could never see why parliamentary rights should be mixed up with municipal rights, and as a freeman thinks it unfair. Has an office in the City for which witness pays 30*l.* or 40*l.* a year, and thinks it hard that he cannot go to the Old Bailey and vote for whom he pleases. Lives at Croydon, which is beyond the boundary, and therefore loses the vote for municipal and parliamentary purposes. The fifth clause, which states the qualification of a common councillor, is the same: the result is that they keep a certain knot of persons filling these offices, to the exclusion of gentlemen who would feel a pleasure in endeavouring to do any amount of gratuitous good to the City, 2353.—There is an office still in being, known as the Secondary of London; there were two. On the death of Mr. James, who had been secondary some years, Mr. Porter being his colleague, who is now the remaining secondary, witness, considering himself fit for the office, and knowing Mr. Cotterill, who was one of the sheriffs, took the liberty of writing and offering himself to succeed Mr. James; afterwards saw Mr. Cotterill when he said he had received witness's letter and would appoint him if the office were in his gift; was told that the office was in the gift of the common council and not with the sheriff. Would remind the Commissioners that this is a very different state of things to that existing in the other counties and cities of England, where they take the wise precaution of pricking for sheriffs who, appoint their own under-sheriffs, and the result is that instead of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex being what they should be, the office is often made a kind of job; two or three solicitors are usually under-sheriffs, and Mr. Sheriff Wire, who is in practice as an attorney, is an alderman and a sheriff of the City of London; and Mr. Anderton, who has been under-sheriff twice before, is again under-sheriff; does not think it proper that practising solicitors should have the execution of writs in the sheriffs offices; in no other county or city can practising solicitors be either magistrates or sheriffs, 2354.—Does not know whether it was necessary before the Act passed to amend the 11th of George I. for a man to be a householder in order to qualify him to be a voter for aldermen and common councilmen, 2355.—If it were so this Act did extend the right. Thinks if a freeman had a room in the City he was permitted to vote, 2356.—If before this Act passed a person who occupied a warehouse or shop in the City but did not reside there was entitled to vote; then this Act would cut down his right, 2357.—If by the 11th of George I. in order to enable him to vote he must have been an actual householder, that Act extended his right, 2358.

MATTHEWS, JOHN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a solicitor, and has offices in Arthur Street West, London Bridge, 2496.—Has frequently during the last twenty years had occasion to apply to the authorities connected with the conservancy of the river on behalf of clients, either to request some privilege, or to complain of obstructions or erections in the Thames,

2497.—Most of his clients were engaged in trade as wharfingers or warehousemen, 2498, 2499.—Witness's experience of the navigation committee is, that they either want authority, or are incompetent to the proper discharge of their duty, 2500.—Has arrived at that conclusion from the practice of the conservancy, 2501.—Has had frequent personal communications with the committee, 2502.—Was in communication first with sub-committee and afterwards with the grand committee, 2503.—Thinks the sub-committee is composed of about twenty, 2504.—Witness does not think, excepting the officers, the water bailiff and the harbour masters, that there were any members of the sub-committee who had any professional knowledge of those subjects beyond what they acquired as committeemen, 2505.—Has no doubt the harbour master and water bailiff would advise the sub-committee, if required to attend, 2506.—The duties of the harbour master and water bailiff require their presence on the river to carry out the orders of the committee, 2507.—They have executive duties to perform, and are most competent to discharge them, but they require power to act, and they defer to the administrative part of the navigation committee, and thence arises all the mischief, 2508.—States the case of George Simmons, a mast and block maker of Gravesend, who brought an action against another party, to prevent them filling up and enclosing a part of the river Thames for the purpose of building houses. The plaintiff obtained his verdict, and afterwards an injunction from the Court of Chancery, restraining the defendant and all other persons from casting rubbish, or anything of the kind, into that part of the river, 2509–2512.—The City took no part in this contest, except to watch the cause, 2513.—They privately expressed an opinion that there was no custom for any person to enclose the shore of the river between high and low water mark. After the verdict, called upon the water bailiff to have the rubbish removed, but the navigation committee thought it not desirable for that officer to interfere, and the obstruction still remains, 2514.—His client has no power to remove the obstruction, the decision merely establishes the fact that he has received damage. Thinks that he might lawfully remove it, but would incur an expense of about 40*l.* or 50*l.*, 2515–2517.—Complains that the City, as conservators of the Thames, ought to remove obstructions and prevent encroachments, as they receive a large income for that purpose, but in cases of any difficulty like this, they do nothing, 2518–2522.—Complains of their inefficiency in cases where their interference would be not only useful, but just, in conformity with the legal rights of the parties, 2523.—There are other cases of the same sort with regard to bills in Parliament for erection of wharves and piers on the river Thames. Does not complain of the City requiring a clause reserving their rights as conservators, but that when these requirements have been submitted to, and a great outlay made, they do not interfere to prevent encroachments set up by way of competition to these legalized establishments. States the case of the Gravesend town pier and Greenwich pier, 2524.—When these large piers were erected, there was no agreement made with those who advanced the money; but the conservators of the river ought not to permit any erections which are not for the good of the public. The City do prevent projections in many cases; but if a person chooses to defy the City, it appears they want authority to exercise their power, or are not competent to enforce it, 2525.—The City remembrancer requires clauses to be inserted in any private bill that comes before Parliament for running a solid pier into the Thames. Upon the point of obstruction, reads an extract from a report made on January 20, 1842, 2526.—Concludes the City feel they have a defective title or really no authority to enforce the powers they claim to exercise, 2527.—Formerly the City would allow no party to encroach upon the river without a fine or rent, but latterly, supposes, for the reasons just assigned, the City has not interposed by indictment or otherwise, 2528.—The City interdict as much as possible any encroachment, but is not aware that they have ever actually removed an encroachment, 2529.—The City shows a desire to exercise its rights when parties yield, but when they are resisted, they afford no effective protection, 2530.—Does not think the corporation of London qualified to perform the duties of the conservancy of the river. The tribunal of so important a matter should consist of a permanent chairman, with legal acquirements, some parties especially connected with shipping, and also some competent to advise what ought to be done with reference to embankments, 2531.—As the conservancy of the river does not refer to the City especially, the corporation, as exercising that right, must be looked upon as representing the whole metropolis, 2532, 2533.—Should say the corporation is not fitted to discharge the duties if the officers are excluded from the committee, 2534, 2535.—It is only with reference to the port of London that the conservancy of the Thames has anything about it of a municipal nature, 2536.—Does not agree with many gentlemen who think that the privileges of the City should be interfered with. Would purge the corporation of all anomalies and incongruities, and correct every possible abuse, but would otherwise keep the City intact. If the constitution of the City is touched with the view of removing privileges, the same must be done with all other municipalities in England and Wales, 2537.—Cannot define all the privileges, but mentions several, 2538.—Would not altogether preserve the privilege of preventing any person who is not a freeman from exercising a retail trade in the City, but would distinguish between a man who has served his time to a freeman, and one who comes into the City merely for the purposes of trading. Would require that man to pay a fine, or take up his freedom, 2539.—Does not think it right the City should retain any privileges injurious to the general commerce of the metropolis. Much good would be attained were there a public auditor of the City accounts, and there might be an appeal to the recorder, so that the public might see the expenditure, and correct any improper use of the City funds, 2540.—Anything injurious to the community in the municipal institutions of London should be put an end to, 2541.—Would have the auditor appointed by Government associated with the City auditor, to see that sums of money were not applied contrary to trusts imposed upon the City, nor for improper purposes, 2542, 2543.—Would provide an independent audit of City accounts, and an independent official connected with the conservancy of the river, 2544.—Knows nothing of the system of City brokers, 2545.

MAYOR'S COURT:

Statement of fees, Gore, 6946.

M'GONEGAL, DANIEL, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a solicitor and inhabitant of Coleraine, 8186.—And secretary to the municipal commissioners of the borough, 8187.—Witness reads part of a report of a case made by the society in the House of Lords, 1839, stating that the property was granted to the society for the good of Derry and Coleraine, and that the funds have been applied to that purpose; but the people of Coleraine entirely deny that the funds have been so spent, as the society have done hardly anything for them for many years, 8188.—The society do not give the same assistance to the corporation of Coleraine as they do to Derry; they have refused several applications for aid in making improvements in the town, 8189.—The property of the society in Coleraine is about 3,000*l.* a year, 8190.—A good deal of the property is from fisheries, which they have let on short leases, and also on lives renewable for ever, 8191.—There is a good deal of house property on short tenures, 8192, 8193.—The whole of Coleraine did belong to the society, but they have granted away a great portion to parties on lives renewable for ever. The people of Coleraine think the society an illiberal body of men, and that they are seeking more than any private landlord. Gives two or three instances, 8194–8196.—From February 1846 to February 1853 the society received out of Coleraine, after allowing for their agent and poor rates, &c., 18,272*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*, out of which they gave 4,510*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* to charities. The expenditure in law, in deputations, and to themselves at meetings in London, amounted to 10,390*l.*, 8197.—The society are lords of the soil of the whole town, 8200.—They have a little rural property, 8201.—They have a valuable fishery connected with Coleraine, which was granted to them with Lough Foyle for the benefit of Coleraine and Derry. Gives two or three instances of the conduct of the society towards the people of Coleraine, namely, in claiming the slobs on west side the river Bann, and stopping up the passage of an ancient well, 8202–8213.—There is no corporation in Coleraine now, the property, which is about 600*l.* a year including tolls, is vested in the commissioners under the 9th George IV. c.82. for lighting, &c., 8214.—The property is in land, 8216.—The people of Coleraine complain that the society have taken the commons that belonged to them, and let them to a gentleman for private purposes; also, that they will not grant more than sixty-one years leases; several parties have in consequence refused to build, and the advancement of the town has been retarded, 8217.—Thinks every encouragement ought to be given to persons to improve, and that leases should be granted in perpetuity, 8219.—Coleraine is a flourishing town, 8221.—There is no manufacture there, 8222.—The milling trade is extending; there are now only two large mills, 8223, 8224.—Is not prepared to say that manufactures would spring up on that part of the property of which long leases are not granted, even if the tenure were altered, in the present position of the town, 8226. Decidedly that part of Coleraine under perpetuity leases is more flourishing and has more substantial buildings than that under short tenures, 8227. It is decidedly the general feeling of the people of Coleraine that it would be a great benefit to the town were the Irish Society got rid of altogether, 8227–8232.

Reasons why they do not take any part in the corporation, Hankey, 1692–1699.

MEREWETHER, HENRY ALWORTH, D.C.L. (Analysis of Evidence.)—Has held the office of town clerk for 11 years, 4679, 4680.—Before that time had occasionally been counsel for the corporation, 4681.—The duties of the town clerk are to attend to all the business of the corporation. He is at all times at the call of the lord mayor, the Court of Aldermen, the Court of Common Council, and all committees emanating from both those bodies. To give advice or assistance to the lord mayor when required to do so. To see that the minutes of the Court of Aldermen are properly entered in the books called repertories, and those of the common council duly entered, and printed for immediate circulation, and entered in the journals. Has clerks under his direction for taking minutes of all the committees. Some of these being standing committees, the minutes are afterwards fairly copied and regularly preserved. Has to attend upon and prepare precepts for the courts of conservancy; particularly attends, when necessary, the navigation committee, which is an important one, with regard to the regulation of the Thames, 4682.—These duties occupy the whole of his time and that of the clerks in his office. His chief clerk has been 52 years in the office, 4683.—The town clerk does not engage in any professional business except that connected with the City. Witness had the sanction of the corporation for concluding two or three cases he had in hand at the time of his election, 4684, 4685.—The salary proposed was 2,000*l.* a year; it has never really equalled that amount, except one year, when it exceeded it; and one year the committee of common council made good the amount expected, which was some years ago. Has now made another application to the committee on the subject, 4686.—900*l.* a year is paid out of the City cash; 50*l.* each from four or five different funds of the corporation. Is nominally registrar of the Mayor's Court, having appointed as deputy the gentleman who had long held that office. Certain fees are still reserved for the town clerk, among them a certain sum for affixing the City seal to authenticated documents, which go to the colonies and abroad generally, 4687.—This fee has fallen short of the estimate made upon entering the office till a very late period, when the fees of the court were reduced, which has had the effect of much increasing the business. Has communicated to the committee and common council that he does not consider himself entitled to the increased fees produced by that means, 4688.—Personally, it would be a great gratification to receive the 2,000*l.* a year, agreed upon in the shape of a salary, without any fees whatever. The common council have the same opinion, and have made reference to a committee on the subject, 4689.—Barristers and attorneys are not yet freely admitted to practise in the Lord Mayor's Court, but the subject is under the consideration of a committee. The counsel have most readily consented to give up their claim, upon the terms suggested to them by the committee, 4690.—There were four common pleaders, who, as far as could be traced back in the books, had had a regular retainer from the corporation. They had also the livery, and the privilege of demanding to be employed in all causes, 4691.—They were elected by the common council. There were also four attorneys of the Mayor's Court. The senior has the custody of the seal; the second attorney is clerk of the Hustings' Court; the third and fourth attend all the wardmotes, when there is an election, upon a vacancy, and make a return of that election to the Court of Aldermen. Mentions this to show they have peculiar duties as officers of the Mayor's Court, and have the exclusive practice in that court. Other attorneys wanting to practise there use them, paying them agency fees for doing so, 4692.—Those were some of the offices of the corporation which unfortunately some years ago were sold, with a power of alienation, so that, if alienated before their death, the office then went to their successors, therefore it had a tendency to go on in perpetuity. The corporation are desirous of repurchasing the places, and at present only one out of the four attorneys retains the power of alienating. His case is still under consideration, there being some misunderstanding between him and the committee as to whether the compensation offered included his giving up his practice, which he supposed to be materially interfered with by the new arrangement for admitting other attorneys into the court; but the committee had a notion that he would, though the court was opened, have as large a share of business as he had before, 4693.—It is the amount of compensation they might be fairly entitled to which has caused the delay. A general Act of Parliament was passed giving all parties a right to be admitted in courts of inferior jurisdiction. The matter was before the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a mandamus applied for by some individual to be admitted into the Mayor's Court, under the authority of that Act, but the attorneys of the Mayor's Court contended that the general words of an Act of Parliament did not over-ride the peculiar customs of the City. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the Act did apply to it, but a writ of error was applied for upon that judgment. It went to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which did not differ decidedly from the Court of Queen's Bench; but an objection to a return of the mandamus was taken, which was proved to be fatal, and there the matter has rested, 4694.—Upon the recommendation of the recorder, the Court of Aldermen decided that the court should be thrown open, and a number of attorneys have had their names entered upon the roll; but one of the old attorneys has brought an action against one of those so admitted, though there is every reason to expect they will act under the advice of the recorder, and eventually carry out the alteration, 4695, 4696.—The difficulty in respect to the mandamus in the Queen's Bench was, that there being no roll in point of fact in the City, was argued as a proof that the clause did not apply to the City court. The Exchequer Chamber determined it upon a technical bye-point. It was described in the return as a court of law, but it was not said that it was also a court of equity, which is the fact, 4697–4699.—There were two courts having exclusive privileges of the above nature, called Sheriffs' Courts, having a judge for each court; but they are now absorbed to a certain degree in the county court for the City of London, though there are still officers existing connected with the old Sheriffs' Court, 4700.—The words inserted in the City Act, "or employed in the City," which are not in the County Court Act, were introduced to include all clerks at the Bank, and in the numerous private and public institutions in the City, 4703.—Has not heard complaints of difficulty in discovering a man's employment in the City, 4704.—Has no superintendence over the legal business of the City, but is in constant communication with the remembrancer and solicitor about matters in their different departments, 4705, 4706.—Is not responsible for their conduct, but should think it his duty to report to the Court of Aldermen or common council any proceeding in either of the departments, which might appear contrary to the interests of the corporation, 4707.—In any law proceeding in which the corporation may be engaged, the City solicitor would consult the recorder, if it is a corporate question, or the common serjeant; if he requires further assistance, the attorney and solicitor-general are always retained as counsel for the corporation, 4708, 4709.—There is no one officer now representing the corporation in matters of that kind. Imagines, that if any interference were necessary, the recorder and common serjeant would interpose. Upon matters of difficulty, where it is necessary to consult the corporation as his clients, the solicitor applies to the common council or committee, who has the matter in charge, 4710, 4711.—Has the custody of the City charters, of which there are about 120. Produces copies of them. Mr. Hardy, of the Tower, has translated all those up to the reign of Edward III. The Charter of Inspeximus, of the reign of Charles II., includes almost all the former ones, 4712–4714.—They have never been published officially by the City, but by Lufman and by Norton, and, believes, most correctly. Mr. Norton was one of the common pleaders when he published his book, which contains 49 charters. It was subsequently edited by Mr. Tyrrell, who was at that time deputy remembrancer; so that although it does not actually bear the City stamp, it is all but official, and comprises all that is essentially contained in the charters of the City, 4715–4722.—Should certainly not show the original charters to any person in litigation with the City; but is convinced that any person wishing to obtain a perfect knowledge of the City charters might obtain it at any bookstall in London. Thinks a corporation exercising a public trust perfectly justified in shutting its muniment room in case of litigation, and in acting in all such respects as a private individual, 4723–4728.—If called upon to advise any person, or even a corporation, defending a claim, should say, "Keep your charters to yourself," 4729.—As in reality the substance of these charters is published, there can be no reason for the City preventing anybody inspecting them, and no step of the kind has been taken without the impartial advice of the best lawyers of the land, 4730–4732.—Is not aware that the present state of the charters gives rise to any litigation, 4733.—Would rather not express an opinion upon the course taken by the Legislature in the Municipal Reform Bill, with regard to the charters of other corporations. Looks upon it as one of the most unconstitutional acts that ever was done in this country, 4734.—That Act repeals all charters, so far as they are inconsistent with that Act, and no further, 4735–4739.—There are 120 charters in the book before witness, which includes all from William the Conqueror to the present time, 4740, 4741.—There are in Norton's book 49 charters, which are all the substantial ones. Mr. Pulling applied to the Court of Common Council some years ago for leave to publish all the City charters; but it was decided, that if they were published, it ought to be by one of their own officers, 4742, 4743.—Witness's opinion, divested of his official character, is, that there could be no objection to their being published. There is sufficient of their contents known for any purpose except for actual proof in courts of law, 4744.—Does not think there is any charter which contains anything material of which there is not a printed copy, 4745, 4746.—Thinks it very possible some charters may have by accident got into the hands of private indiviuals, but now the common council have provided proper rooms for their safe custody, and they are properly arranged, 4747.—Believes there are charters in the Tower not in the possession of the corporation. The charters of the City are all confirmed by Act of Parliament, 4748, 4749.—Has never had occasion to see any other charter than those contained in Mr. Norton's book, 4750–4752.—There is a standing order, "That every member of the Court of Common Council has a right to inspect the books and papers belonging to the corporation, and make extracts from them. No officer of this court shall be at liberty to show them to any person not a member of the corporation without leave of this court," 4753.—Any person, not a freeman, in litigation with the City on any right contained in a charter, wishing to inspect, must memorialize the common council on the subject, 4754, 4755.—The City charters, for the most part, have directly or indirectly the force of Acts of Parliament, 4756.—In the case of the corporation against Combe and Delafield for metage dues, to which they refuse to submit without the production of the charter upon which the claim is founded, thinks Messrs. Combe and Co. might obtain the information contained in the charter at any bookstall. What is demanded of them has been taken in the River Thames, as far back as any trace can be made. The corporation are most anxious that every thing should be done which is equitable, as well as for the general benefit of trade; and before this inquiry began, referred this question of metage, and that of corn not wanted to be measured, to a committee, and there seems every prospect of their coming to an amicable arrangement upon the subject, 4757, 4758.—There is no governing charter with respect to the constitution of the corporation. The charters speak constantly, from the earliest times of the customs of London, and no doubt the constitution of the corporation is left to the customs which are recorded from time to time by the mouth of the recorder, 4760.—This privilege was never possessed by any other corporation. These governing charters, as they are now called, generally signify the last charter granted to them, which specifies that they shall be corporations in fact and in name; that they shall have a common seal; a mayor, so many aldermen, so many common councilmen, and other officers mentioned; appoints a succession of different persons to those offices and provides for future elections. They were not in practice before the reign of Henry VI., 4761.—The corporation of London have a particular charter, which authorizes the mayor and aldermen, with the consent of the commonalty, to alter any of their customs which may require amendment, and to make such provisions as shall be for the good of the king and the public; but the Election Act of the City of London, the 11th of George I., assumes that the right of electing was in the liverymen, therefore it was found impossible to use their power against the express words of the Act of Parliament, which could only be got rid of by an actual repeal in Parliament. The power given to the City by this charter seems to be as large as words can make it, 4762–4764.—The only real distinction between the corporation of London and the country corporations, as they existed before the Municipal Reform Act, is, that the latter have overlooked and disregarded many of their old charters, while the City of London have kept alive the recollection of their old customs, which had formed them into their present shape, and they thought if they wished to alter it, they had the power of doing so under the Charter of Edward III., 4765.—There were many other corporations resembling that of London, in not having a governing charter, 4766, 4767.—The recorder satisfies his mind as to the existence of any custom by a painful and conscientious inquiry into the information to be derived from the records of the corporation, 4768.—The charters are all in such general language that they are open to discussion; but, practically speaking, there is no difficulty in applying them, 4769.—The certificate of the recorder is absolutely conclusive as to the existence of a custom, though no doubt it is subject to the decision of courts of law upon it, 4770.—If a question arises, the recorder obtains what information he can from witness, or from the registrar of the court; he then hears both parties, and from the conflict makes up his mind, 4771.—The charters themselves do not specify the customs, but preserve them. Has besides the charters a large mass of books of great antiquity, containing byelaws, and other acts done, showing usage, 4772–4774.—The existence of any custom or rule of corporate law is a question of difficult research, and, perhaps, requiring legal knowledge, 4775, 4776.—If any legal question arose, it would be submitted to the recorder and common sergeant, the two legal advisers of the corporation—perhaps with the assistance of the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, Mr. Gurney, 4777.—A very difficult point in law is involved in the consideration how a subsequent charter repeals or interferes with the provisions of a former charter. A good deal would depend upon the intent of the parties both granting and receiving the charter, 4778.—No plan has ever been contemplated of codifying the charters and byelaws of the corporation; it would certainly require a great deal of legal acumen and labour to effect such a work, and it would probably end after all in considerable error, 4779–4782.—Is not aware that any practical inconvenience arises to the public or the City from the present state of the charters. The only cases in his recollection in which the matter has come in question is that of Combe and Co., and the question as to the right of the soil and the bed of the river, 4783.—There is no governing charter of the City of London as described above. The corporation have from time immemorial regulated the number of their aldermen and common councilmen according to their own arrangements. They could not make aldermanries or give a jurisdiction to a court in a given part of the City; that requires either a charter of the Crown or the interposition of Parliament. There was an instance in the reign of Richard II., when there was a special Act of Parliament separating the two wards of Farrington Within from Farringdon Without, authorizing the inhabitants of each ward to elect an alderman, 4784–4787.—The boundaries of the City consist of the City proper, that is, the City within the walls. There are also liberties without the walls, which arose from that portion of the ground outside the walls which is necessary for the protection of the walls, 4788.—The boundaries of the City have never been changed, but you cannot look with certainty to any period before Edward III. The area contained within those boundaries is one square mile, 4789–4792.—It is difficult to state at what time the metropolis began to extend beyond the boundaries of the City, because it is a matter of remote history. No doubt originally the corpus, if one may so say, of the metropolis, was the City of London. Does know, however, that as the town increased no attempt was made on the north of of the river to extend the jurisdiction of the corporation. On the south side, no doubt, from an early time, efforts have been made of that kind with respect to the borough of Southwark, 4793–4801.—Complaints were made by the citizens of London that thefts were committed in the City, and the thieves then escaped into Southwark, therefore that borough was granted to the City, 4802.—One of the most difficult subjects in English history is to know what is the effect of these charters which were generally obtained for the purpose of keeping off the exactions of the officers of the Crown, 4803.—The present connexion of the City and Southwark is very anomalous and unsatisfactory. There has been some litigation of late years as to the power of the sheriff of Surrey within the borough of Southwark. Neither the City nor Southwark know their respective rights and duties. The inhabitants of Southwark have applied to the common council from time to time to have their case considered, 4804–4809.—The corporation have failed in doing anything on the subject, from finding it totally impracticable without legislative assistance; but believes, if a desire were expressed by the real public of Southwark either to be dissevered from or to be more closely connected with the City, that the corporation would interpose no difficulty in the way of either course being adopted, 4810–4818.—The powers and jurisdiction of the corporation are for the most part limited to their own boundaries, but their powers of police have some extent beyond. Their right of metage and porterage extends to the whole of London; the conservancy of the Thames from Staines Bridge to Yantlet Creek. The tonnage dues are likewise collected in the river, and the coal tax levied beyond the limits of the City, 4819–4825.—The corporation is the only municipal body within the metropolis. Southwark has some of the characteristics of a municipal body. It has its own courts; a court of record and a court of leet, 4826, 4827.—Has never heard that the corporation considers itself as representing, for certain purposes, the entire metropolis of London; they confine themselves entirely to their own district, 4828, 4829.—With regard to the administration of their funds, the corporation contribute to charities and other establishments out of the boundary of the City. They contributed many years ago to the great improvement in the Strand, 4830–4832.—In the City Pocket Book there is an enumeration of the different sums subscribed by the corporation, distinguishing what apply to matters without the City and what within, 4833.—The duties of the lord mayor are very numerous. He is the head of the corporation, and has to attend, more or less, to all its concerns. As a magistrate he presides at the Mansion House, assisted by one of the aldermen, when his other duties prevent his sitting there. Presides over the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council, appointing their meetings, and, upon requisitions duly signed, calls the common council together whenever it is necessary. He also presides over the Court of Conservancy, two meetings of which are held in each district, under the jurisdiction of that court; that is, in Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey; and he would, if occasion required it, hold a court of conservancy within the City. His official duties engross the whole of his time, 4834, 4835.—With respect to his election and the legal qualifications required, believes the statements in the reports of the previous commission are quite correct, particularly that in 1834, 4836.—Obtained the following statement of the expense of the office from the chamberlain. The lord mayor receives 500*l.*, as compensation on the abolition of the metage on coals. By payments from the City cash, 5,997*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*; from the common council for expenses of the Court of Conservancy, 300*l.*; from the same, 100*l.* for wear and tear of furniture at the Mansion House; income tax paid for his lordship, 228*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*; 18*l.* for a gown; cocket dues, 1,000*l.*; by "Benevolence," from the Bridge House estate, 50*l.*, probably a species of contribution to the annual festivity; certain fees at the Old Bailey, 40*l.*, and others amounting to 86*l.*, making 126*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; total 8,319*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, 4837.—The lord mayor is entitled to be summoned to the first Privy Council held after the demise of the Crown, 4838.—Upon the death of the Sovereign or other branches of the Royal Family, or upon the birth of a child of the Sovereign, a communication is always sent immediately from the Home Office to the lord mayor, 4839, 4840.—Does not know whether the lord mayor receives a summons from the Privy Council Office upon the demise of the Crown, but knows that he does attend the Privy Council; and remembers, upon one occasion, that the Duke of Wellington insisted upon no steps being taken till the lord mayor arrived, 4841.—Is not aware that any one else, not being a member of the Privy Council, is admitted when the new Sovereign is proclaimed, 4842.—Such hospitality as is exercised at the Mansion House, is not unusual in the higher ranks of English society upon great occasions, 4843.—Believes the cost of the lord mayor's show to be 200*l.*, 4844.—Does not think that on those occasions of public hospitality, the lord mayor appears in the character of the first magistrate of the whole metropolis, 4847.—Foreign attachment is a thing which is almost necessary in a large commercial city. There were many provisions in the very early charters, that merchants who traded to this country should not live in the City; therefore, if a merchant wanted to buy goods here, he would not be able to obtain credit, unless there were means of obtaining payment from him, by having the power of arresting any property he might leave behind him. Reads a provision in a charter of Henry I., 4848.—That provision would apply to all persons residing without the City, whether English subjects or aliens. In many of the charters and entries in the City books, a foreigner is a person who is not admitted into the body as a freeman, but the term foreigner is likewise applied to alien merchants, and that is the case also in the statutes of the realm, 4849–4851.—There is a similar provision in Bristol, and in most of the great seats of commerce in England. Thinks it very serviceable for the sake of the merchants as well as the creditors, 4852–4854.—It applies to all the inhabitants of the City; but no right of this kind is exercised by a corporation beyond the particular limits to which its jurisdiction extends, 4855.—It would be an equally good custom for persons in other parts of the metropolis. In a great degree the same thing is effected out of the City. There is a fieri facias against the goods of any man, 4856.—The nature of foreign trade has altered since those days, but nothing appears so just and equitable as taking the property of a debtor to satisfy his debt, if found within the jurisdiction, the jurisdiction being answerable for the due execution of the law, 4857–4859.—Believes it is the same in Dublin, because the peculiar jurisdictions of Dublin were borrowed from Bristol. Is not so sure about Liverpool, 4860.—The peculiarity of the custom of foreign attachment is, that it gives a remedy against a debtor of the defendant. It enables you to seize money in the hands of a banker; that is the principal practical operation of the custom in the City. Sees no reason why it should not be a good custom for the whole country. It appears a prompt mode of making men pay their just debts, and is frequently resorted to, and found very useful in effecting the ends of justice. There is no such power in the general law, 4861–4869. Suppose the defendant absent, and there is a disputed debt, the garnishee cannot avoid the necessity of that debt being handed over to the plaintiff, without appearing and putting in substantial bail to the full amount of the sum demanded, without regard to the amount of the debt he himself owes, or of the goods he has in his hands, 4870–4872.—If the plaintiff sues for 1,000*l.*, and attaches the debt in the hands of the garnishee to the extent of 200*l.*, that attachment cannot be got rid of without putting in bail for 1,000*l.*, or paying the smaller sum into court, 4873.—The effect of the system of foreign attachment is, to bring into court a person not a party to the original suit, to tell him not to pay over the money. It must be indifferent to him to whom he pays it, if he has the money of A in his hands, 4874.—If there are any off-setts or disputed claims between him and the defendant, he states it to the court, if he thinks fit, 4875.—The creditor who has a just debt due to him is much aided by this prompt mode of taking possession of property, 4876.—Thinks the system of foreign attachment a good custom, 4877.—It is not more peculiarly adapted to the City than to the rest of the metropolis, except that the commercial transactions of the City are very numerous with foreigners, and persons going to our colonies, and it is a convenient mode of securing money which belongs to a debtor in case he goes away, 4878.—There is another jurisdiction peculiar to the City, which is rarely exercised,—the court of delegates of St. Martin's-le-Grand, 4879.—It is not a general complaint that the custom of foreign attachment operates badly in compelling the defendant to put in bail to the full amount of the debt claimed, 4880.—The objections made recently might be remedied by such an alteration as would regulate the amount of bail to be put in by the value of the thing attached. It can be under the charter before referred to, as the real debt can be brought into court, 4881.—Supposing every householder to be obliged to attend the wardmote, there to be sworn to his allegiance, and all the inhabitants of the ward to be included in the constituency, nothing can be less objectionable than the election of aldermen. Even as it is, believes there to be a great feeling of attachment between the alderman and his ward. He appoints his own deputy and chooses the person most approved by the ward. The ward also elect the common councilmen, 4882.—There is much inequality in the size of wards and number of voters. Puts in a return prepared by the Court of Aldermen, 4883, 4884.—In 1851 Queenhithe ward had the smallest number of voters (73), and Farringdon Without the largest (783), 4885.—The last three columns of the return show the number of municipal voters residing within seven miles, and rated above 10*l.*, 4886–4888.—With regard to the ward of Aldersgate, if the constituency were taken to be the Parliamentary voters, it would reduce the number, 4889.—The aldermen hold their office for life, without a reasonable cause can be shown for their removal, and then that removal must be effected by a proceeding in a court of law, a quo warranto, 4890, 4891.—The court of the lord mayor and aldermen, or the lord mayor and aldermen in common council assembled, would have power to disfranchise an alderman. There have been instances, 4892.—The present tenure of the office of aldermen is dated several hundred years back, in one of their early charters, 4893, 4894.—Their magisterial duties are not derived from so early a charter. First, all aldermen who have passed the chair are made magistrates. At a subsequent period in the reign of George I., all aldermen, whether they have passed the chair or not, are constituted magistrates. All those who had passed the chair were made magistrates in Southwark, by a particular charter, 4895.—There are two courts in which the aldermen sit as magistrates; at the Mansion House, when called upon by the lord mayor to assist him, and at Guildhall; which duty they take by rota, and are obliged to attend or find a substitute, 4896.—Generally speaking, there is as much duty as they can conveniently attend to, 4897.—The citizens of London wish to preserve the right of electing their own magistrates, and nothing can be more beneficial for them than to retain the aldermen as they are, 4898, 4899.—When the voters are electing an alderman, they bear in mind that he will also have the duties of a magistrate to perform. They are most desirous to have magistrates of their own selection, 4900, 4901.—There is a paid clerk in each court, who would perhaps come within the term assessor, generally chosen for his legal knowledge, 4902.—The magistrates would refer to the opinion of this clerk or assessor as to the construction of a new Act of Parliament, or the particular form on which a decision is to be made; but in the execution of justice founded upon the facts of the case, they rely on their own judgment, 4903.—The aldermen receive from their clerks the same kind of assistance that a judge occasionally does from the clerk at nisi prius, or the clerk of arraigns in a criminal court. It is generally confined to matters of mere form, 4904, 4905.—The Court of Aldermen has many duties to perform; it sits upon an average about twice a month; it is never appointed to sit during the sitting of the Old Bailey Court, as the attendance of a certain number of aldermen is necessary there, 4906–4908.—The court consists of the lord mayor and aldermen. The two sheriffs attend to give their returns with respect to the prisons, which is always the first thing read after the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen and Common Council. The recorder also attends as assessor to the lord mayor. States the way in which the court is summoned, and the sort of business they transact, 4909.—The sheriffs generally remain during the greater part of the sitting of the court, but they have no vote, unless they are aldermen, which is generally the case with one of them, 4910, 4911.—No one has a vote except the lord mayor and aldermen. The recorder only attends as adviser, 4912.—The court of aldermen in some respects act judicially. They exercise a jurisdiction in all matters connected with brokers. They decide all questions arising out of the elections in wardmotes. They consider all the presentments made by the wardmote inquest. A frequent presentment is, that there are persons carrying on business in the ward who are not freemen; another is, that of inquest men who refuse to perform their duty, 4913.—All that the Court of Aldermen have to do with the proceedings of the common council is to have the minutes of the last common council read at the bar of the court, 4914.—The courts of common council are generally, but not necessarily, held immediately after the courts of aldermen, 4915.—Three days before the meeting of the common council a summons is always prepared for them, which is laid before the lord mayor for his directions respecting it. The summons contains a statement of all the business which is to come on before the common council, 4916.—The aldermen are component parts of the common council, and as such receive a notice, 4917, 4918.—The Court of Aldermen very rarely discuss subjects which are to come before the Court of Common Council, as they keep the business of the two courts quite distinct; but if anything has taken place in the Court of Aldermen which it is necessary to communicate to the common council they usually request the lord mayor to make the communication, 4919.—Each of the courts have the power of drawing for cash upon the chamberlain, but the Court of Aldermen confines its drawing to matters connected with the magistracy, the prisons, and the conservancy. They occasionally grant pensions to decayed aldermen, or the widows or children of aldermen, 4920.—Their power in drawing upon the City cash is quite unlimited, 4921.—With regard to building a prison, that is a combined question; the Court of Aldermen are bound to find prisons in which to confine prisoners, but the mode of getting funds to build it rests entirely with the common council. Committees are appointed by both courts, who confer together, 4922.—There are many subjects which are referred to committees from the two courts, viz., the admission to the freedom, the question of conservancy, &c. &c., 4923.—The Court of Aldermen has no control over the Court of Common Council; they have each their particular duties, 4924–4926.—The Court of Aldermen have no power of legislation, except in matters under their immediate jurisdiction, 4927.—The old Acts of Parliament gave all jurisdiction to the mayor and aldermen; now the powers are given to the mayor, aldermen, and commons, in common council assembled. The common council is the representative of the freemen, and embodies the whole power of the corporation; the Court of Aldermen is a Court of Record, 4928.—Formerly the Court of Aldermen used to prepare their measure or proposal, and send it up by the recorder to the Court of Common Council; and on the other hand, if the common council wanted to suggest any alterations they would prepare a measure and send it up to the Court of Aldermen by the common sergeant; but this mode has not been practised for many years, 4929.—Does not think that the common council could assume a power over matters in which the Court of Aldermen now act. The present division of business is fixed by law, 4930, 4931.—Considers the common council as the supreme representative body of the commonalty of London, but has no power over the Court of Aldermen, which is a Court of Record, 4932, 4933.—With regard to prisons, thinks it would be found extremely inconvenient if the Court of Aldermen had not the jurisdiction they have at present, 4934.—Does not think that if the common council passed a resolution that all future business relating to the conservancy of the river should be transacted by themselves it would be valid, 4935.—The present division of business between the Court of Aldermen and Common Council is fixed by law or usage equivalent to law, and neither court can disturb the arrangement, 4936.—The present mode of election of common councilmen works exceedingly well, 4937.—Does not think the present number of the court too large, 4938.—Attends all the meetings of common council, 4939.—Has never known there to be any difficulty in making a quorum of the council. Forty is the assumed number of the quorum; it works very well, 4940.—The lord mayor has the power of suspending the proceedings at any moment; there was an instance of a lord mayor who did it, but the occurrence is so rare it is hardly to be considered, 4941.—The business of the common council is chiefly administrative business, but it does perform acts of legislation; it passes bills in the same form as Acts of Parliament. A bill is brought in, read a first, second, and third time, and then passed, 4942.—An act of City legislation is complete when it has passed the Court of Common Council. Produces one of their bills, relating to fellowship porters, 4943.—The Court of Common Council usually sit about twice a month; there are sometimes special courts; last year there were altogether 31, 4944, 4945.—Much of the business of the Court of Common Council is transacted by committees, but they always report to the court, 4946.—The usual method of selecting committees is to take one member from every ward; consequently the number is about 29, besides the aldermen; all the aldermen present are usually put upon the committee, 4947–4949.—There is reason to complain of the number; there is sometimes a difficulty in obtaining a quorum of a committee, which is generally seven, 4950.—The business transacted by the committee of the common council is remarkably well transacted; could not be better done, 4951.—The average number of attendance is about 15 or 16; his clerk notes the number in a book, 4952.—Reads the standing orders, limiting the power of committees with respect to the appointment to offices, 4953.—All the places in the appointment of any committee will be found in the book referred to under the entry of the members of the committee. There is another standing order, which prevents the son of any member of the court being a candidate for any office. Reads the order. Thus every channel to improper influence is stopped by the corporation, and new standing orders are made from time to time, as necessary, 4954.—With regard to the objections to the allowances made for dinners to the members of committees of the common council, it has always been the custom of the corporation of London, for a great length of time; and it is difficult to ask persons to come and sit at uncertain hours for the performance of the duties of the corporation without any remuneration. Formerly the committees used to be paid by "line money;" that is, every member as he came in, up to a certain time, had a line put under his name, and these were paid a certain sum for their attendance; those who came afterwards were put under the line, and were not entitled to any remuneration. This practice was objected to, and the committees were then allowed a certain sum of money, to use as they thought best. These amounts are included in the standing orders, and are known to all the committees, and also the freemen, 4955.—The practice tends to secure the attendance of members, and is a more social way of applying the money, than allowing them to put it in their own pockets, 4956.—There is scarcely any department in which some allowance of the kind is not made, 4257–4259.—With regard to the election of sheriffs, Mr. Scott has fully explained the subject. Does not think the present mode of election in common hall seems to answer. Regulations have been made from time to time to confine the admission into the hall entirely to liverymen, but other people get in who are not liverymen, 4960.—There is generally great difficulty in getting persons to serve the office of sheriff; it is a very onerous and an expensive one. The corporation is at present endeavouring to arrange for a more substantial allowance for the sheriffs, and also the lord mayor, 4961.—The sheriffs' duties are onerous, in requiring constant attendance at the Criminal Courts, the courts of law on some occasions (the under-sheriff attends the Court of Exchequer and Queen's Bench on the occasion of swearing in the jury), besides the Court of Aldermen, the Court of Common Council, and the lord mayor, whenever required, 4962, 4963.—Besides all this, the sheriffs have to give attendance to what is not strictly part of their duty, but an old practice, such as charity sermons. They also present all petitions from the common council to the House of Commons, 4964.—The amount of expenses of the office of sheriff is very great. Will lay before them the returns made by Mr. Alderman Wilson and Harmer, during their shrievalty, which may be taken as fair samples of the ordinary expenditure, 4965–4967.—The fines arising from estreated recognizances are given up to the under-sheriffs, who undertake a great part of the expenses of the office, and as a remuneration for that, an arrangement takes place between him and the sheriff. The present senior sheriff, Mr. Alderman Wire, has altered the system, 4968.—It is supposed that formerly, in Lord Mansfield's time, persons were nominated to the office of sheriff who were known to have conscientious scruples about taking the oaths, with the certainty of their being obliged to pay the fine. But such an imputation cannot rest on the corporation at present, as all fines of the sheriffs are applied to a charity fund for the orphan school for the orphans of widows. The system of using the sheriffs' fines as a means of revenue is totally abandoned, and is not likely to be revived, 4969, 4970.—The sheriffs of London constitute the sheriffs for Middlesex, 4971, 4972.—The City first obtained permission to appoint their own sheriffs in the reign of King Stephen, upon payment of a sum of money; and in the succeeding reign they were allowed to select as sheriff whom they chose, and present to his Majesty or the Exchequer. Supposes there was still some interference from the sheriff of Middlesex, as they agreed to pay a fee-farm rent of 300*l.* a year, for the grant of the shrievalty of Middlesex, which they continue to pay at the present moment. The real meaning of calling them sheriffs of London was, that they were appointed as sheriffs of London; but with respect to the universal analogy throughout the country, that there is but one sheriff for a county, the two are supposed to hold the office, 4973.—At one time there was a sheriff of Middlesex besides the sheriffs of London, 4974.—Imagines the pretensions of the sheriffs to be altogether unfounded, 4975.—The pretensions of the sheriff of the county to interfere in a borough, which was not a county, was different from the pretension to interfere in a borough which was a county; and, therefore, in subsequent times different boroughs obtained grants that they should be counties themselves. The cases are not numerous, and are all mentioned in Blackstone, and more particularly referred to by Mr. Corbet, in his book on "Elective Franchise," 4976.—Does not think there is any document to show when London became a county separate from Middlesex,. 4977.—Cannot point out any advantages resulting from the law by which the sheriffs of London execute the office of sheriff of Middlesex, except that Messrs. Burchell, who act as deputies, and in whose family it has been for many years, transact the business remarkably well; and as the duty of sheriff is much more important in Middlesex than in any other county, supposes it is their great experience which enables them to do the duties so satisfactorily, 4978.—Thinks that the present division of duties between the Court of Aldermen and common council has worked satisfactorily, 4979.—Does not imagine that the duties of the two bodies were divided by any preconceived notion of the utility of the division, but that it has sprung out of existing circumstances from time to time. At one time the Court of Aldermen was certainly the governing body in the City; but their proceedings were much embarrassed by excessive numbers coming from the wardmotes into the hall, which led to their having the liverymen and only part of the freemen attend. After a time there was a resolution of the common council, declaring that the elections should be in the liverymen. Since then, the liverymen have been the representatives of the great body of citizens, who ought to meet in common hall, 4980.—Long usage has reconciled the rights of the liverymen; otherwise would say they are an encroachment upon the general rights of the commonalty of London. The 11th Act of George I. assumes that they had an Act of Parliament, and regulates the exercise of it. Can only repeat that the division of the two courts seems rather to have arisen

MEREWETHER, HENRY ALWORTH, D. C. L. (Further examined.)—In his evidence, yesterday, informed the Commissioners that the quorum necessary to form a Court of Common Council was 40; but did not state that, in an experience of 12 years, has never known a difficulty in forming a court, in consequence of there not being such a number present; the number is usually decreased before the end of the meeting. The same with the committees; the quorum is seven, and does not recollect a committee failing to sit in consequence of the non-attendance of the necessary seven. Delivers in the form of summons to the Court of Aldermen, also a summons of the Court of Common Council with a notice that a common council will be held for the purpose specified in the summons. Has referred to the charter which gives to the corporation the power of altering the customs. It is referred to in Mr. Norton's book, page 470; the date is 1341. Produces a copy of part of that charter, 4985.—Under this power many material alterations have been effected from time to time, 4986.—The most recent has been an act of the common council with reference to the jurors. The juries heretofore in London used to be marked on the back of the presentment at the wardmote, and out of these were selected, by the secondary, the jury to serve. The recent Act with respect to jurors had appointed a different mode of selecting them; it was done by the secondary from other sources. It was found they did not work well together; there were different classes in one list from those in the other. This was corrected by a bill brought into the common council, in which the system adopted in what is called Sir Robert Peel's Act was directed to the general system of the City, so as to have only one list, 4987.—The number of the common council was reduced by the City authorities themselves. Does not know of any act affecting the number or position of the common council, which is the creation of the corporation, and is regulated by its provisions, standing orders, or resolutions, 4988.—It would be impossible for the corporation to alter the term of tenure of office of the lord mayor with safety, inasmuch as the duration of the office is embodied in one of their earliest charters, 4989.—According to the general words of the charter, the corporation have the entire power of making all alterations within themselves they think necessary, except that they cannot interfere with any Act of Parliament, 4990.—If it were found necessary to have more aldermen, the corporation might effect it under that charter; but inasmuch as the existence of an alderman has reference to his ward, and in the ward there is a wardmote held, they could not, by any regulation of their own, give a jurisdiction to a new ward, which they themselves might create; the experiment was tried in the borough of Southwark, but failed altogether, 4991.—Thinks that they might sever the connexion of the City with Southwark without the assistance of Parliament, 4992.—Does not think it would be interfering with the courts of justice; they are authorized to hold a court leet and a court of record for Southwark. Believes it is universally allowed that the grantees of a charter may surrender, or cease to act upon, any part of a charter that is made for their good; but if they do, a partial surrender cannot be permitted,—it must be a surrender of the whole, or none at all. With respect to Southwark, if anything is done with it, it will be done with the consent of all parties through the medium of the Legislature, 4993.—The alteration of the rights of the freemen in 1835 was under the power of the before mentioned charter, 4994.—Sees no foundation whatever for the doubts expressed as to the legal effect of that alteration; the going through the companies must have been an arrangement of the corporation itself, and so, of course, they have the power to alter it. The freemen used to be admitted in that way, and not through the livery companies. Thinks it a fit opportunity to remove an erroneous impression with respect to Southwark, in connection with the statement made yesterday. The corporation have endeavoured to make the jurisdiction in Southwark effective, but have been prevented by circumstances. It was stated that Southwark was the ward of Bridge Without. This is an error; there was an attempt to give it that character, which failed. The first charter alluded to was in the reign of Edward III., granting the City power over the borough of Southwark as a remedy for the felons and fugitives who escaped from the City and went there. The charter was found ineffective, and in the reign of Edward IV. a subsequent charter was granted, giving them larger jurisdiction, but again being ineffectual. In the reign of Edward VI. a very full and comprehensive charter was granted, giving them, for a valuable consideration, a considerable portion of property, and the most complete jurisdiction that a charter could give. Upon that the corporation attempted to carry it out in the manner they thought it ought to be, and they elected an alderman for what is here called Bridge Without. They attempted to elect common councilmen, but it all turned out eventually abortive. The ground upon which the name of Bridge Without was given was, that there was a sort of tête de pont on the other side of the other, and just the area surrounding that, might in analogy to the other wards, be called Bridge Without. It was without the line of the walls and boundaries of the City. Thinks no reliance can be placed on the statement made, on the authority of a book of Mr. Delaune's, that the common councilmen were elected, and their names given there. A list of the aldermen is given, and a list of the common councilmen in the wards, but at the end of it the name of Sir John Ayliffe is given as aldermen of the ward of Bridge Without; but there is no mention of the common councilmen, and the names contained in Delaune are those of the common councilmen for Bridge ward. Reads extract from repertory, giving account of the election of Sir John Ayliffe, in the fourth year of Edward VI. Thinks it clear, from the before-mentioned extract, that they could not have appointed a wardmote, nor has any wardmote ever been held for that ward, 4996.—Should say that all those 120 charters are now in force; they have been seized by the Crown at various times; they were seized by the celebrated quo warrantoin the reign of Charles II., butwere restored by Act of Parliament in the beginning of the reign of William III., 4998, 4999.—Does not knowan instance in which the charters were only to be in force during the reign of the kings by whom they were issued. There are some which are not properly municipal charters. The second charter they have is a grant to a private individual, 5000.—Believes that the whole number of 120 are in force, 5001.—The City possesses considerable property in Southwark, 5002.—Does not think the acquisition of that by the City was connected with Southwark purposes. There was a beneficial grant to the corporation for a money consideration, 5003.—Gives the origin of their acquisition of that property from the Inspeximus, 5004.—No doubt the citizens of London applied to the Crown, and paid the money consideration, in order to have the grant of Edward VI. carried out more effectually, 5005.—The gift of the property was coincident with the grant of the larger jurisdiction; they are both in the same charter, 5006.—In the event of the severance of Southwark from London, the citizens of Southwark would have no claim to this property for their benefit as a corporation, 5007,—Thinks no distinction can be drawn between this property and that which the City possesses in other places. The first charter granted to the City of London is that of William the Conqueror, which will be found accurately translated in Mr. Newton's book; the words are somewhat peculiar, and require a little explanation. Reads the charter. Shows that the pre-existing rights of the City of London before the reign of William are recognised by him as having existed in the reign of King Edward, 5008.—This charter creates no corporation; it merely declares that all citizens of London shall be of free condition, 5009.—The king promises them protection. It is the earliest recognition in the charters of the rights of the citizens of London. No words of incorporation are in any charter relating to any borough before the reign of Henry VI., when a charter was first granted to Kingston-upon-Hull, the record of which is in the Tower. The next charter is one of Henry I., drawn up in the following form:—"Henry, by the Grace of God,"—and so on, "Know ye that I have granted to my citizens of London to hold Middlesex to farm for three hundred pounds." The king, of course, had all the counties as well as boroughs in his hands, at least his officers accounted to him for the property. A portion of the profit would go through the hands of the sheriff, a portion through the escheater, and a portion through the hands of the coroner. All these would belong to the king; but it was the custom by many of them to grant to parties those districts, and all the profits resulting from them, the grantee paying to the Crown a sum in consequence. That sum has been paid to the corporation ever since the reign of Henry I., and is paid at the present day; it is accounted for by the sheriff to the Crown. Proceeds to read and explain extracts from the charters of Henry II. and Richard I., 5010, 5011.—The charter in the eighth of Richard I. proves that weirs had been erected in the Thames by the king's officer, 5012.—The charter gives them the power of removing the weirs, they having been erected by the keeper of the Tower, as the king's officer, by usurpation, 5013–5015.—Proves that it was by usurpation, because it says, "No keeper of the said Tower at any time hereafter shall enact anything of any one," in respect of those weirs, 5016.—Thinks this is a direction, that if the weirs shall be removed the king's officer shall not interfere, he having made previous exactions from the parties in respect of them, 5017.—There is nothing beyond the charter to show that the right previously was not in the Crown, 5018.—Does not think it was a voluntary abandonment of the rights of the Crown. In all the succeeding charters there are declarations that the customs of the City of London are to be upheld and maintained. There is another charter relating to the weirs, and as the citizens of London are conservators of the river Thames, they could remove the weirs as a nuisance with reference to the navigation, 5019, 5020.—Thinks it was a direction to them to disencumber their property of the weirs which existed, 5021.—The grant of the conservancy was prior to the statute of Richard I., 5022.—The charters generally run in the form of—"We grant for us, our heirs and successors," 5023.—It is not an early charter which contains the grant of the conservancy, 5024.—There is nothing to show that the City were conservators at the time of Richard I., 5025.—The persons who vote in common hall are freemen, with the superadded qualification of being liverymen. The liverymen are those who have permission to wear the livery. There are a variety of sumptuary laws, prohibiting people from giving liveries to their servants, but there is an exemption of all corporations and guilds, under which they had the power of appointing liverymen. Many companies have had the power for a long time under their charter; others have had it granted by the Court of Aldermen. Has a list of those granted by the Court of Aldermen, and with whom they interfere. Has a list of admissions of companies to liveries, and the increases which have been made in them by the orders of the Court of Aldermen, from 1725 to 1820. Enumerates the companies, 5026.—There are some companies in which the corporation interfere in the formation of a livery. Gives conditions on which the felt makers received permission to have a livery. The others are in substance the same, 5027.—In order to vote in common hall, it is necessary for a man to be a member of a livery company and a freeman of the City, 5028.—In the ward elections it is sufficient that a person should be a freeman and a resident in the ward. As far as the franchise is concerned, freedom alone is necessary, 5029.—There never was a time when the whole constituent body of the City were members of the livery companies, which are in fact private companies existing under their own charters, and for their own particular purposes, having nothing, in point of fact, to do with the municipal government. 5030.—Sees no evil or difficulty which could occur if there were but one single franchise for the municipal purposes of the City of London. The corporation have been anxious to effect that object. The bill brought in in 1849 was with that view. Such alterations were made in the House of Lords as prevented it from having the effect intended. When it came to be carried out, it was found that the voters were lessened by it instead of increased, 5031.—There are certain officers elected in common hall, others by the Court of Common Council, and others by the Court of Aldermen, 5032.—Knows no ground upon which the distinction is made. The election in common hall of the mayor, the chamberlain, the sheriffs, the bridgemasters, the auditors, and the ale conners, are all directed by a particular charter. The election of the recorder is with the aldermen. Supposes it is because the aldermen originally exercised all the powers of the corporation, particularly those connected with the administration of the law. The other officers are elected by the common councilmen, as representatives of the citizens, 5033.—The duration of the poll for seven days is done under the authority of the Act of the 11th of George I., which was passed for the express purpose of shortening the elections. The clause says that the election shall not last more than seven days, and it has been construed to mean it must last seven days. That was in consequence of a decision in a committee with respect to the election at Rochester. A similar case occurred at Bristol. Supposes the secondaries of the City of London thought it was dangerous to adopt any mode of giving notice after the decision in those two cases, so they let it go on for seven days, 5035.—The corporation and the secondaries could close the poll without a bill passed by the common council, whenever there was a reasonable ground for assuming that the other votes were not forthcoming, taking care to give reasonable notice of the day and hour, 5036, 5037.—An act of the common council would be an additional justification, 5038.—Thinks it desirable that those polls should not last the time they do at present. The corporation intends shortening them, 5039.—Corrupt practices have prevailed to a considerable extent at some of the City elections, owing to a prevalent opinion that the same laws do not apply to them as to the Parliamentary elections. Thinks receiving a bribe with reference to an election for any public purpose must be within the reach of the common law, 5040.—Does not recollect any one being convicted at common law for such an offence, 5041.—Is not aware of any case of corrupt practice ever having been brought before any court of justice. There have recently been cases of personation brought before the courts. The person acquiesced in the judgment, and upon their expressing their contrition they were let off, 5042.—It would not be an expensive process to bring actions for corrupt practices against many individuals in reference to City elections, because nearly all the witnesses would be in the City. Does not think the expense would stand in the way, because the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council have ordered proceedings to be taken by their solicitors against parties so offending, 5043.—There have been instances of personation and bribery. A reward was offered to any one who would come forward and state cases of bribery. Both courts in the City did the best in their power to direct that the matter should be inquired into. The difficulty of proving the cases has been the ground of abstinence from prosecutions, and not from any reluctance to apply funds in that manner, 5044.—Assures the Commissioners that the strongest possible declarations and denunciations have been uttered by both courts against these proceedings, they feeling themselves injuriously affected by them, 5045.—A protracted poll increases the expense but checks bribery, 5047. —No doubt a portion of the electors who are disposed to receive bribes hang back to the last, and then attempt to sell their votes at a high price, 5048. —If there was one list for municipal purposes, and that list were carefully revised, it would diminish the personation, 5049.—By vigilance and perseverance, and its being distinctly understood that persons committing the offence would be punished, the evil would be mitigated, 5050.—Under an Act of Parliament referred to, there is a provision for making a municipal list. Reads provision of 12 & 13 Victoria, Bribery and personation are very rare at the wardmote elections. Thinks that would be the case if the qualification were the same for voting at common hall. The greatest difficulty at common hall is, the liverymen are not known to the corporate officers, 5051.—There are no lists of the liverymen with the corporation. Thinks there are lists in all well-regulated companies, 5052.—There is no authentic list to which the poll-clerk can refer to see whether a man is intitled to vote, 5053.—Has no doubt that the circumstance of electors living at a distance has a tendency to increase the expense and the possibility of personation, 5054.—For a great length of time committees of different descriptions had been appointed in the corporation of London with respect to the promotion of the bill in 1851; but before this bill was presented to Parliament, there was another committee appointed. Eventually they agreed in the adoption of a certain number of propositions which are embodied in this bill. Thinks it was with the assistance of a committee of aldermen. The bill was laid before the common council, and presented to Parliament with the sanction of the common council, 5056–5058.—No doubt, when the bill was brought into Parliament it was the decision of the majority of the body, 5059.—

States the leading provisions of the bill. The preamble recites the 11th of George I., which is the stumbling-block which has always stood in the way. It recites that other Act of Parliament, the 12th & 13th Victoria. States preamble. The first provision is for the repeal of the 11th of George I. The second is as to the right of voting at elections. States preamble, 5060.—If that Act had passed, there would have been but one constituent body for all civic purposes, 5061.—Thinks that electoral franchise is not the same as the one adopted by Parliament for the boroughs of England; generally it is rather more extensive, 5062.—It would include more people. It fixes a limit of 10*l.* An occupation of 10*l.* in the City of London is, in fact, no restraint whatever; the commonest room in a house would let for 10*l.* a year, 5063, 5064.—It requires that the constituency shall be rated to the police rate. It was found practically that 10*l.* was the lowest sum that would ever be rated to the police rate. The object is to give some ready test whether a man was a proper person to be admitted, 5065.—Except for that purpose the mention of 10*l.* would be mere surplusage; it is surplusage in effect, 5066.—The clause introduced into this bill was preferred to the clause in the general Municipal Reform Act, because it extended the franchise more widely, 5067.—It was considered by a committee, after due deliberation, that the clause in the general Act hardly applied to the description of persons which they were desirous to include in the franchise, namely, those who hold a single room for the purpose of an office or a counting-house; and this clause is rather drawn with reference to that state of things in the City of London, 5068.—Residence is not at all mentioned in any of those enactments with reference to the distance at which voters may reside, 5069.—The principle upon which the bill is constructed is, that voters shall be at liberty to reside where they will. As nearly everybody in the City of London reside in the suburbs, this clause was drawn with reference to that particular distinction. The object was to increase the constituency, 5070.—Does not think it has been ascertained what the number of the constituency would have been if the bill had passed. The list of voters and householders which he gave in yesterday was made under the Act of Parliament 12th & 13th Victoria, 5071.—The other provisions in the bill may be regarded as subsidiary enactments, 5072.—The cause of its being lost was the active opposition of several of the livery companies. Was present all the time, and thought the preamble was proved beyond all possible controversy, but to the astonishment of everybody it was declared not proved. The result was that the bill was referred to a select committee at the House of Commons, and that committee found that the preamble was not proved. That was in the session of 1852, 5073–5075.—The corporation were no doubt extremely sorry that this bill did not pass. The constituency was so gradually being reduced that they felt they were bound to take some steps to increase it. The course which had been adopted before had been that of obliging people to take up their freedom, and they therefore fell back upon the transactions which had been taken with respect to that measure. Two from each ward were selected; and the selection was made with extreme caution, in order to avoid all poor persons to whom the payment of the small sum now necessary for obtaining freedom might be inconvenient, 5077.—The effect of the bill would have been to deprive the livery companies of their monopoly of the elections at common hall, 5078, 5079.—Supposing a liveryman resided away from the City, and had no occupation within the City, he would under the new franchise have lost his vote; but thinks that would not signify, as it would be exceedingly difficult for a non-resident liveryman to support his right to vote at all, 5080, 5081.—There were only a few persons proceeded against, for the purpose of obliging them to take up their freedom. A witness spoke of the proceedings against them, but it was in fact nothing but a summons from the chamberlain for them to come forward and show why they did not take up their freedom, 5082.—There were a great many notices of this kind issued; hints they were intended to be, but not threats. It must always be remembered that persons who are not freemen are, to a certain extent, carrying on their trade to the disparagement of those who are, 5083–5085. —Cannot say how many notices were issued. The whole case was put in a course of inquiry, in what may be called an amicable suit with Mr. Sturt. The Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council had previously directed the chamberlain to abstain from summoning them; but when the bill was lost the ordinary course of proceeding was adopted, 5086.—These notices were issued without any distinction being made between rich and poor; but when the committee met together, they had to select some persons to be proceeded against. A common councilman of each ward, who knew them, was placed on the committee, and those whom he stated to be poor were passed over, 5087.—The duty of judging whether a man can afford to pay or not, was necessarily cast upon the committee, but it was never done in a single instance in which it was not charitably and beneficially intended, 5088.—The object of proceeding against persons to compel them to take up their freedom was not with a view to raise money but to increase the constituency, 5089.—That would not effect the object that the Act was intended to effect, because it would not bring into the constituency a vast number of persons who merely occupied shops, but were not resident, 5090.—Being a freeman, the probability is that he would be resident, 5091.—If the bill had passed into a law, it would have done away with the necessity of any man taking up his freedom for the purpose of the franchise, and that was the intention, 5092.—That bill would have disfranchised a considerable number of liverymen, who are not occupiers under the description of that bill, 5095.—It would have had a double operation upon the livery with respect to the franchise; it would have admitted freemen, not liverymen, to vote at common hall elections, and it would have disfranchised liverymen who were not occupiers, 5096.—Believes the Act of 12th and 13th Victoria makes the parliamentary registration necessary; this bill did not do so, 5097.—At present the liverymen vote for Members of Parliament, under certain circumstances, 5098.—It would be a different class of persons, in some few instances, who would vote on the parliamentary register, from those who would vote on the municipal register, 5099.—The disfranchisement of the liverymen for municipal purposes would not at all affect the parliamentary register, 5101.—The two are quite distinct, except that the Act of 12th and 13th Victoria made the parliamentary qualification a portion of the municipal qualification. It was necessary that the occupiers specified should be also upon the parliamentary register. That was introduced, and was thought a great disparagement of the Act, 5102.—Thinks there is no instance in which the parliamentary qualification depends upon the municipal qualification. The parliamentary register does operate upon the municipal register, 5103.—No alteration of the municipal franchise would affect the parliamentary franchise, 5104.—If this bill had been passed instead of the previous Act, the necessity of being upon the parliamentary register would have been put an end to, 5105.—It would affect the relation of the parliamentary register to the municipal franchise, but not the converse, 5106.—It would have conferred the franchise upon persons who were occupiers in London, but not freemen, 5107.—There is another clause in the bill which would have exempted persons, who were carrying on business in London, but were not freemen, from being liable to be sued under the byelaws for so doing. One of the objects of the bill was to put an end to those byelaws. States preamble, 5108.—The bill would have destroyed the necessity of parties becoming freemen altogether. Since this has occured, a vexatious proceeding upon another portion of those byelaws, which required that persons should not employ servants who were not freemen, has taken place. The Court of Common Council immediately interposed, and referred it to a committee. That committee met and reported, and the byelaws, as far as that part of it is concerned, will be put an end to by an act of the common council, the bill having been ordered to be prepared, 5109.—Is referring to the case in which some complaint was made to the Commissioners by the butchers. The cause which led to that complaint will be put an end to by the passing of this bill, 5111.—When that bill is passed, it will be competent to the butchers, or any other tradesmen, to employ under them any one they think fit, even if he is not a freeman, 5112.—Cannot say whether then there will remain any power in any company to restrict a tradesman living in the City of London from employing any person he may think fit. It depends upon the charters of different companies, and byelaws applicable to them. The corporation have done all they can to remove any cause of complaint, 5113.—The rights of the City with respect to metage and porterage will be found properly described in the charter of James I., and it is subsequently repeated in the charter of Charles, and after that it was confirmed by Parliament. Calls attention to the Coal Act, as the right was stated most distinctly in that Act. There is this clause: It should be distinctly understood that the duty which is paid on coals was heretofore a fee, paid to the corporation of London in consequence of their having the right of measuring all articles within this port, 5114.—It was a sum originally paid for the measuring of coals, and was in the nature of a commutation under this Act. The Act provides that there shall be a new market, and it puts an end to the old market. Quotes Act, 5115, 5116.—The effect of that Act is to impose a duty upon coals and culm, for the purpose of establishing that market. That market has been established, and the City, upon a recent occasion, abandoned their claim to that penny. The expenses of the market had not been quite paid off, but they were in such a situation that the corporation felt themselves justified in abandoning that penny. The government thought it was expedient to continue the duty, and they now receive it for the purpose of applying it to public improvements. Reads 60th clause, 5117.—It appears to be quite clear that King James recognised the existence of the right of measuring those different articles as a prescriptive right, and that this Act of Parliament confirms both, 5118.—To a certain extent, the dues charged for metage are reasonable. The matter is now under the consideration of the corn trade, on the one hand, and the corporation on the other, whether some arrangement may not be made which would have the effect at least of making them more conveniently collected and more simply imposed than they are at present, 5119.—It is not quite a true view to suppose that the metage dues are charged as a tax upon all goods that come within the port of London, whether they are measured or not. This matter is under the consideration of the corporation, and the corn trade, and all other persons interested, have been or will be consulted upon the subject, 5120.—The amount of the dues has been fixed by usage, 5121.—In some degree it has been regulated by acts of the common council. The dues have varied upon different articles. There are as many as fifteen different modes of charge, which have arisen from the new cargoes which have been brought in, and the new arrangement of the dues. The object at present is to bring it to one plain charge to be made upon all articles, and to have it paid by the seller; in truth, the object is to put it upon such a footing as that it will be agreeable to the trade, and moderately remunerative to the corporation, 5122.—Has no doubt that the grant was made to the City for convenience to the public, by providing a class of meters whose honesty and accuracy could be relied on, but that a reasonable remuneration was given to the City for their trouble in executing the duty, 5123, 5124.—Reconciles with that view the claim which the City make to compel persons to submit to the measurement; because such a measurement was essential to the interests of the Crown; in the first instance, there being certain duties to be paid; and next, because in all those matters general rules are laid down which do not except particular cases, 5125.—States that the question as to when goods are imported from another part of the kingdom, and are not subject therefore to duty, and the owner is aware of the quantity of those goods from his own measurement, and does not wish that they should be re-measured, is a case to which the general rule ought to apply, is a question of law which is now pending, 5126.—That question has been raised by the City itself. The City has demanded the toll under such circumstances. Believes that mode of carrying on trade is, comparatively speaking, of a modern date; almost all corn and grain, and articles which came into the port, were those which did either, with respect to the duty payable to the Crown, or with respect to the interest of buyer and seller, require to be measured; of late years persons have made their own arrangements for the facility of their own trade. They have, for instance, either raised their own corn in the country, or bought it in the country, or partly manufactured it into malt, instead of leaving it in its natural state, and they have brought it up to London for their own consumption. It is a case of that kind which has led to the question between the City and Messrs. Combe and Co., 5127.—That case has led to very long and expensive litigation, 5128.—If the practical utility of numbers of those exclusive trade privileges were considered upon the mere question of expediency, a vast number of rights would be put in peril, 5129.—If the law decides that the corporation of London do not possess those exclusive trade privileges there is an end of the question. If, on the other hand, a remonstrance is made to them, such as is made at present by the trade upon this subject, feels confident the corporation will entertain the consideration, and will do willingly of themselves that which equity and justice may require, 5130.—Holding the office he does, and representing to a certain degree the rights of the City, he cannot admit that there is any right whatsoever to take away this privilege from the corporation without making ample compensation, 5131.—He can see no distinction between the pecuniary right of a corporation to emoluments derived from the exercise of a function of this description, which was given to that corporation for the benefit of trade and their right to any estate which they might possess, 5132.—Cannot consider these privileges in the nature of public trusts, 5133.—States the extent of the right of metage according to the construction which has been put upon the grant of James, 5134–5136.—Believes that the practice in the City goes to the full extent, this matter having been inquired into by the fruit meters, and the persons engaged in that trade and in the corn trade. They are desirous there should be sworn meters. At the railroads out of the City of London, where the jurisdiction does not extend, they have voluntarily sent themselves, and desired that the City meters should go and measure the corn. The same observation is applied also to the porterage, 5137.—If it were optional to the public to employ meters without its being compulsory upon them, the probability is that you would hardly be able to keep up such a staff of persons as would have the power to execute it. It should be at all events compulsory upon all foreign corn imported into this country; but as in the case of Combe and Co., where they desire their corn to be carried to their own granaries, it should be optional, 5138.—There is a negociation now going on between the corporation and the trade, upon this subject, 5139.—Applications having been made to the common council upon the subject, the matter was referred to a committee, who took evidence on 34 days; 67 witnesses from all branches of the trade were examined. In the meantime there were two meetings of the corn trade. They met and came to certain resolutions, which were communicated to that committee. Mr. Hales was in a great degree the organ of the trade; the lord mayor being the governor of the fellowship porters, and one of the deputies of the common council being the deputy governor. They met at the Mansion House. The resolutions which were made by that committee were read to the corn trade. They sanctioned many of the resolutions and added others of their own. Thinks it will result in an agreement that a bill should be brought into Parliament, with the consent of all parties, and which therefore will be an unopposed bill, 5140.—It is proposed that the charge for metage should be one and simple; that there should be no expense in collection, but that it should be paid by one person, namely, by the seller; and that, as far as the granaries go, the metage should be optional, 5141.—It is held out by some persons that if these alterations were made the increase of the metage would be very great, 5142.—The duty of metage is one which affects the health most considerably. The meters are subject to particular disorders, especially asthma, which render them in a short time unfit for work. Metage requires a good deal of personal exertion, and is a work of considerable difficulty, therefore a superannuation fund is essentially necessary, that the public may be supplied with efficient meters. They have established a fund of that kind themselves, and put into it occasionally certain sums of money; the result of all this is, that their remuneration at present is hardly sufficient for their support. Witness thinks some increase of their pay would be necessary. Does not think that even when it is put under this new arrangement there will be any surplus fund which would be more than sufficient to pay the meters' establishment, and give to the corporation a portion of that remuneration to which they conceive themselves strictly entitled, 5143.—The lord mayor, the chairman of the general purposes committee, and the gentlemen of that committee have taken an active part in this negociation, 5144.—Mr. Perkins is the chairman of the general purposes committee. Mr. Alderman Muggeridge has taken an active part in this matter, as well as Mr. Rathbone, who is in the trade. Mr. Muggeridge gave in to the committee a statement of the alterations he would suggest, 5145.—The right of porterage is a prescriptive right; it is traced back as far as their documents will go. The notion has arisen that it was particularly sanctioned at some late period. That is not so; it was pre-existing, and those are only new regulations made with respect to it, 5146.—Believes it has been made the subject of acts of the common council, which from time to time have passed, and which have made minute regulations on the subject, 5147.—Unless it is mentioned in some of the charters it is a prescription proved by usage, 5148.—The prescriptive right would be defined in all its parts by the usage upon it, 5149.—Upon the river their duties extend beyond the City proper, and that is one of the difficulties they have to contend with; because as they are obliged to be ready at all times,—the meters to do the meterage, and the porters to give their assistance,—they are sometimes called to a great distance from the City, 5150.—The right of porterage is held to be coextensive with the right of meterage, 5151.—The metage appears to be defined by the grant of James I., 5152.—There is no mention of porterage in that grant, 5153.—The ground upon which the right of porterage has been held to be coextensive with the right of metage, and to reach from Yantlett Creek to Staines, is because it has been so exercised within those limits, and because it is found in the entries of the corporation to go as far back as the entries themselves, 5154.—Witness here states the peculiarity in the port of London with respect to the position of the porters, 5155.—If you leave it to the option of the captain to employ other persons, then arises the difficulty that you will not have this body of men ready to discharge the duty, 5157.—It is supposed that the establishment of porters at present is rather expensive. At present there is a great evil existing, which is contrary to the regulations that have been made for the discharge of the duty by the corporation, that there are a great number of persons who do not live in London, and never discharge any part of the duty. The consequence is that there is an application made by the trade that a larger number of porters should be provided, 5158.—There are members of the fellowship who vote upon particular occasions and represent themselves as porters, but do not contribute to the available labour of the port, 5159.—Knows nothing of Liverpool. The result of witness's inquiries is, that there is no analogy which can be adopted usefully between the other ports of England and the ports of London, 5160.—Refers to page 525 in Mr. Norton's book, in which there is an allusion to a charter of the 16th of Charles I., 5161, 5162.—There are two or three classes of porters. The clause in the charter refers to the tackle or ticket porters. It is necessary that the Commissioners should understand the manner in which the metage is performed. Witness here enters into particulars concerning the manner in which the metage is performed. It would therefore appear that there is a natural sort of affinity and union of the two bodies that is not to be wondered at; that there is a provision that no meter shall employ any but a fellowship porter, 5163.—The fellowship porters are a distinct body. They are incorporated, and have a certain number of rulers and assistants and officers for the discharge of their duties, and the collection of their funds, 5164.—Does not consider the porterage as a City right. When they have any difficulty they come to the common council to legislate for them, and they have sometimes done so. The alderman for the ward of Billingsgate is virtute officii governor of that society, and the deputy of the ward the deputy-governor, 5165.—Imagines that if the privilege of the fellowship porters were abolished there would be a very precarious supply of persons to discharge the duty in the river, and those persons would not be under oath. Every porter is amenable to the Court of Rulers for his conduct. Complaints may be made against them. One of the rulers sits every day to receive the complaints. These restraints operate upon the men, 1566.—The City does not derive any revenue from the fellowship porters, 5167.—There are two bills pending; the porters applied to the corporation, and the corporation agreed to make them parties to one of the bills with reference to porterage; and the other is a bill in equity, solely with reference to metage, 5168.

—The charges of the fellowship porters have been reduced lately by their own body, 5169.—They complain bitterly, and describe themselves as persons in a starving condition. Believes this to be very much the case, 5170.—There is a fund belonging to the fellowship porters, created amongst themselves by voluntary subscription. It is with a view to superannuation. Believes there is a considerable amount in their hands. There is some dissatisfaction among them as to the administration of it. They form a sort of benefit society, 5172–5174.—The rules now followed by the corporation with respect to preventing persons exercising a retail trade in the City who are not freemen are bye laws; one passed in the reign of James I., and the other in the reign of Queen Anne, 5175.—They are to this effect, that no person shall carry on trade within the City unless he is free, 5176.—It means trade generally. The distinction between wholesale and retail trade was with reference to merchandise. Formerly a merchant who came in was obliged to sell all his cargo without breaking bulk; such a person was not bound to become free, nor was he allowed to become free; he was not allowed to reside more than forty days in the City, and was obliged to be at a hostel, express provisions being made against his selling any of his articles in the inns, 5178.—Does not think that a merchant carrying on a wholesale trade in the City would come within the byelaw. The laws prohibiting his residence are absolute; but, according to the general law of the City, he would be compelled to be enrolled as a freeman, 5179.—The present practice is, that a great number of the bankers in Lombard Street and those places, and a number of professional men in Doctors' Commons, are not proceeded against, 5180.—The City do not enforce their byelaw against them, inasmuch as their proceedings would seem to come still less than wholesale dealers within the byelaw. The corporation have never tried to carry it out against them, not because they are powerful and rich. Is confident that if the other circumstances made it necessary for the corporation to proceed against any gentleman, they would as soon proceed against the first merchant in the City as against the humblest individual, 5181, 5182.—The feeling has been, that their time, engaged as they are in such extensive concerns, is too valuable for them to give up their services to the public, 5183.—They are afraid, by becoming freemen they may be made officers of the corporation, as, for instance, sheriffs. Witness thought it an extraordinary thing that persons of large property, making large fortunes in the City, should live there, make those fortunes there, go to Temple Bar, shake the dust off their feet, and have no more to do with the City. Witness called upon several of the bankers, put the case before them, and the invariable answer he received was, "You know how badly the corporation have behaved, by making gentlemen sheriffs in order to get their fines out of them." Told them it would never be attempted again; it was the intention of the corporation that the byelaws of the corporation should be enforced. At that time a committee was appointed to inquire into those byelaws. The bankers said, "They would be pleased to take up their freedom." Witness felt that he had no right to go any further to any gentleman, and point out to them that the corporation were intending to enforce them, and there the matter dropped, 5184.—The son of an alien (British born) can become a freeman of the City, with assent of the common council, 5185.—There are aliens all over London carrying on their trade. Aliens are allowed to exercise a retail trade in the City, 5186, 5187.—The City derives a considerable revenue from their markets, 5188.—The revenue derived from Billingsgate is from small tolls paid upon all articles bought and sold in the market, like tolls elsewhere, all over the kingdom, 5189.—There has been an Act of Parliament connected with Billingsgate market lately. All the markets are under the supervision of the comptroller, who can give the Commissioners authentic information upon the subject. Great additions have been made to that market, and the accommodation to the public wonderfully increased; that has been done by the application of the City cash, to be repaid by the tolls, without interest, 5191–5193.—Believes it is a free and open market. There is no provision that it should be, in the sense of its being exempt from the ordinary market tolls, 5194, 5195.—The jurisdiction of the City over sworn brokers has been another of the immemorial enjoyments of the City. It is chiefly the admission of the brokers, and the superintendence over them after they are admitted, which forms the connexion of the City of London with them, 5196.—The fee was fixed by an Act passed about the middle of the last century, 5198.—Having taken a bond of them, and sureties for their good behaviour, the Court of Aldermen are open to petitions from any person who is injured by the proceedings of a broker. States the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen when a petition of that kind is presented to them, 5200.—Such cases are not of frequent occurrence; since witness has been in office there have been 20 or 30 instances, 5201.—One or two a year; but for the last few years they have been more numerous, in consequence of the court taking considerable pains upon the subject of brokers. The times of speculation produced a class of persons whom it was necessary to keep in order. The court, and officers connected with brokers, have taken great pains to prevent misconduct, 5202.—The jurisdiction which the Court of Aldermen exercise over brokers is very beneficial, and it is of great importance that there should be in the Court of Aldermen gentlemen connected with the business of brokers in London. Has seen practical benefits result from it, 5203.—The court has the power of admission and rejection; they can strike a pension off the roll of brokers. They keep a roll of brokers, which is stuck up on the outside of Guildhall, so that if any person not admitted as a broker acts as such, anybody may ascertain whether he is a broker or not, 5204, 5205.—In case of a complaint against a sworn broker, it is referred to the solicitor to put the bond in force against him and his sureties, 5206.—Great pains is taken that the sureties should be responsible persons. The bond is ordinarily effective. The common crier is specially entrusted with the duty of making inquiries into the sufficiency of the sureties, 5207.—Any person who is a freeman, and can satisfy the court of his respectability, is admitted. Gives the form of admission. The expense of admission is about 18*l.*, including the freedom; he then pays a rent of 5*l.* a year, 5209, 5210.—The amount of the bond of the broker himself is 1,000*l.*, the sureties 250*l.* each, and a further bond in the sum of 50*l.* to ensure the annual payment; believes it is the same in all cases, 5211.—Thinks the supervision effective to a considerable extent. The court have from time to time considered the subject very much, and the present lord mayor is determined that the matter shall be further inquired into; alterations will, no doubt, be made. The bonds of both the principal and the sureties may be made more stringent or more explanatory than they are, 5212.—Thinks it would be desirable to perpetuate the jurisdiction. Thinks that some payment is necessary for the purpose of ensuring the respectability of the party applying, 5213.—The corporation have expressed their willingness to give up the tolls which are taken upon carts upon their entrance into the City. Those tolls have been mortgaged heretofore for public improvements; one was connected with the continuation of Farringdon Street. That money is either paid off, or it very soon will be; before any inquiry of this kind was suggested, it was the wish and intention of the corporation to get rid of it. The freemen of the places in which the toll is demanded are generally exempted from it; and that is the case in London. Strangers coming in are subject to it, 5215.—The average amount of the toll is about 5,000*l.* a year, 5216.—The case of London is different from other towns, where the jurisdiction embraces the whole town. A man coming from Hackney to Covent Garden cannot come through the City without paying. It is the consideration of these circumstances which has induced the corporation to think that they ought to give it up, 5217, 5218.—The case of Cambridge underwent a long investigation, 5219.—The ordinary case of tolls taken by boroughs is, that they are taken upon vehicles entering the town, 5220.—The City being only a small portion of the metropolis, the tolls are taken at the limits of the City, London Wall, Aldersgate Street, and other places of the same description. Farringdon-market used to be held in the middle of the public street; it was removed from thence, leaving the wide street unoccupied, and money was raised under the City seal, and charged upon the street tolls, 5221.—The connexion between the Watermen's Company and the corporation is this: The master and warden are sworn before the Court of Aldermen, and the Court have the approval of the byelaws under which they act. Hands in a return with respect to the accounts of the sheriff, 5222.

MEREWETHER, HENRY ALSWORTH, D.C.L. (Resumed Examination.)—On a former day spoke of the number of the charters, now delivers in an accurate list of the whole of them, 5223.—All the charters are not in the custody of the City; some are in the Tower, but this list is a complete one. Reads an account of the sums which were paid for each of the charters. Upon the subject of sewers, lays before the Commissioners a plan of the sewers of London, showing that there is no person in London who may not know where he can get immediate access to a drain, 5224, 5225.—This plan was made in 1841. The sewers are from time to time lengthened, and in 1847 a fresh plan was completed. Produces the report of Mr. Walker, Mr. W. Cubitt, and Mr. Brunel, on the subject of sewers. Reads a passage from a report by the engineer of the Commissioners, page 17. In the year 1844 a very elaborate inquiry was made into the entries in the corporation books with reference to freedom. Draws the attention of the Commissioners to page 74 of this document, where a minute account is given of the fees which were then payable, contrasted with the reduced fees which are now payable. At the close of this report there are suggestions for proceedings, which led to some of the proceedings which were enumerated the other day, 5226.—The report to which witness has alluded is that of a committee to the common council. Holds in his hand a report which was drawn up in the year 1842, made by Mr. Walker, the engineer employed by the Government in different works, by Captain Bullock, he also having been lately employed by the admiralty and the officers of the corporation, the water bailiff, the engineer of the navigation committee, and other subordinate officers. This report goes at great length into the question of the management of the stream of the river, and to describe it generally. It is quite obvious that all the projecting banks, or wharves, or irregular projections of any kind on the side of the river must have a strong tendency to interfere with the operation of the stream. The scour is materially interfered with by those projections, and the force of the stream is lessened. It would be impossible, from the greatness of the expense, to carry out a plan of the uniform embankment of the sides of the river. To do the whole at one time would be absolutely impracticable; but to bring it about by degrees, by getting a certain frontage wherever any alteration was wanted to be made, and by maintaining that frontage inexorable from time to time, thereby gradually increasing the bank of the river, which would be properly embanked, would be a feasible plan, and Mr. Walker recommended it should be done, 5227.—Mr. Walker's plan went up to the first lock upon the Thames, at Teddington, and from thence down below Gravesend. The line laid down by Mr. Walker in these plans is denoted by a blue line, 5228.—Mr. Walker speaks of the expense of embanking the river as so large that it is quite impossible to be contemplated. He did not go very accurately into the details of the estimate, because the engineer arrived at the conclusion that it could not be done as one act, but might be done by degrees, by persevering in the line. That line the navigation committee have endeavoured to enforce, never allowing, where they could avoid it, anything either to be within or without the line laid down by Mr. Walker. In carrying out that plan the committee were too glad to adopt any opportunity which occurred of having as long a space of embankment made by any person as they could, and therefore they have granted to Mr. Parke to make a considerable embankment just above Battersea. They have granted to Mr. Cubitt, down by the Isle of Dogs, a license to make an embankment for nearly a mile. All those embankments are required to be made either upon piles or of solid materials, so that there shall be no washing away of the banks. The corporation made a grant to the Atlas Insurance Company for an embankment. Those grants having been made, then began the proceedings against the corporation. The disposition to put the matter into a course of legal investigation arose, to a certain degree, out of a Bill which was pending in Parliament for a pier at Greenwich. The Hospital was much interested in that pier, and it has been the practice of the navigation committee not to take any payment with respect to any Government or any public works. The Greenwich Pier Bill was brought in in the year 1837. A clause was introduced by the Crown, reciting the right to the soil of the river. That clause was objected to, and eventually struck out; at last the bill was agreed on. There was a letter from Mr. Pemberton to Mr. Tyrrell, and the answer of Mr. E. Tyrrell to it as to the alterations. Eventually it became a matter of arrangement, but this, coupled with the grants alluded to, seems to have made an impression upon the Government, and they consequently filed an information in the Court of Chancery for the purpose of having the matter decided. Mr. Pemberton's evidence certainly had a tendency to cast censure upon the conduct of the corporation in the case. The corporation feel most strongly that they have grounds of complaint as to the manner in which that suit was commenced. Of course there would be a disinclination to go much into that matter, it being before the court to be decided. The course which was adopted was one of entire novelty; it was novel in some respects from necessity, because the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer having been superseded, the proceedings, instead of being in the Exchequer, were transferred into the Court of Chancery. It was contended by the corporation that this proceeding was very unusual, inasmuch as it tried to cast upon them the vindication of their title, instead of the question being raised as to the title of the Crown. Nevertheless, the information began with the positive allegation of the general title of the Crown to all the sea shores. Reads extract from the information. This is a strong and startling proposition, which involves and claims the right to actual property, at the lowest computation in about 700,000 acres of land. It was measured as well as it could be from the ordnance maps, taking care always to make the calculation rather under than over the mark, 5230.—Thinks it would be difficult to set up the right of prescription; no doubt a grant might be set up, 5231.—If the assertion in the information of the general right of the Crown be correct, then of course it would be upon the corporation, who claim the right of the soil between high and low watermark in the Thames, to show by what title they have it. Presumes that was the object. The information sets out with the assumption that the title was in the Crown. If that is conceded, of course anybody who claims the above must show it to be in him, 5232, 5233.—The corporation contest that maxim of law, that the soil between high and low watermark is in the Crown. In the abundant stores of historical and legal information which there are in this country, there is no trace whatever in any of the early records of a right so extensive, and so pervading the whole kingdom, as this which is here claimed, 5234.—The City maintain that this proposition cannot be supported by the Crown, if it seeks to take the river out of the possession of the City, which they clearly have, by acts of possession, exercised for years upon it. They say it must be done in the ordinary course, by a process of intrusion. The Crown would then have to establish its right, instead of beginning with an assumption of the title of the Crown, and calling upon the City to show that it is out of the Crown, 5235.—Possession has been exercised by the City over and over again. Acts of ownership and of interference with the soil have been done. It is impossible for anything to be more distinct than the claim of jurisdiction, which would give them jurisdiction as conservators, and any act done interfering with the soil. Acts interfering with the soil must be attributed to the ownership of the soil; an act of conservancy would be attributable to the jurisdiction which is given. Looks upon that as a mere abstract proposition, which cannot at all be tenable when the facts as to the ownership be looked into, 5236.—The City place and regulate the steps for the use of the river in all parts of it. They had an altercation with the Crown in the reign of Henry VIII., when a grant was made of a particular spot by the Crown. It was resisted by the City, and abandoned by the Crown. They established the waterworks at London Bridge for the supply of London with water, 5237.—The machinery was placed upon the soil, 5238.—There was no Act of Parliament authorizing them to make the waterworks; but a grant was made by the City to a particular individual that he should erect his machinery there, and he did it. As far as witness can judge, there are most distinct acts of ownership to be shown. Looking to the record of Doomsday Book, which is a record giving all the property in the country in minute detail, beginning always with property which belongs to the King, there is no trace throughout Doomsday Book of any terra regis of this kind on the sea shore; but on the contrary there is an instance of a mill at Dover on the seashore which belongs to the Bishop of Bayeux, 5239.—Thinks it would be specifically mentioned in Doomsday Book, if the Crown was the owner of the soil of the Thames between high and low-water mark. There are properties of the kind mentioned in Doomsday Book, Refers to one particularly, the salt pans all round the kingdom, 5240.—The City has no charter or grant affecting the origin of the right to the soil of the river, 5241.—Could suggest what the City consider to be the origin of their right, but would rather not, because he would be affecting those rights pendente lite, 5242.—Imagines it can only be a matter of legislation, subject to the ordinary rules of compensation, to those who are in possession, 5243.—That previous condition always being performed by compensation, thinks it would be wrong to contend that a public river of such extreme importance as the Thames could not be the subject of legislative enactment, because it has been so, and may be so again; but that is altogether distinct from the question of property in the soil and bed of it, 5244.—Considers that in legislation Parliament would proceed upon the ordinary ground of giving compensation to any persons who may be affected by the proceedings in question, but of course the right to that compensation should be tried by the ordinary courts, 5245.—Thinks an inquiry by the Commissioners as to the mode of supporting the title in those ordinary courts might prejudice the case of the corporation, 5246.—This is not the first time the question has been raised in reference to the right of property to particular spots in the river, but it is the first time this general allegation has been introduced. Believes the claim to the soil between high and low watermark to be new, 5247.—There is no doubt there are cases in which the soil between high and low water may belong to a particular individual, independently of such a general claim as this on the part of the Crown, 5249.—Supposing the spot in question was between high and low watermark, if the suit were decided in favour of the Crown, is quite prepared to contend that it was a wrong decision. Tracing through the statutes, through the cases, and through the year books, and the immense mass of information which is to be obtained upon that description of rights, there is no mention whatever of a general right of this description, 5251.—The soil and the bed of the Thames the City claim to hold by prescription, indicated by successive acts of ownership from a very early period, 5252.—Attention has been called to complaints of the conduct of the City in the character of conservators of the river, with regard to obstructions, made by Mr. Matthews. The Master of the Rolls directed that the navigation committee of London and the corporation should do no act at all interfering with the river, without sending notice of it to the Woods and Forests. That notice has ever since been sent. Many hundred embankments and accommodations have been granted upon the river, and no complaint whatever has been made to the Master of the Rolls with respect to any one of those grants, 5253.—Is perfectly acquainted with the case of Mr. Matthews. If parties have a complaint to make which they can substantiate, they would go to the jury of the conservancy and they would present it to the Court. Does not believe in this case there was any presentment of the kind. There was a complaint to the committee, but after due inquiry they thought they could not with propriety interfere, 5254.—Is confident that the statement of Mr. Matthews is not correct. He says in this particular case the City do not deny the obstruction is improper and ought to be removed, but they will not remove it. With respect to the revenue, which it is said the corporation receives, they derive no benefit from it; it is applied for the benefit of the river, 5255, 5256.—Whether the corporation receive any revenue in respect of the ownership which they claim in the soil of the river would involve a question whether the acts are attributable to the ownership or the conservancy. They do not receive any revenue from the relation which they sustain to the river, 5257, 5258.—In case it was thought fit to deprive them of that relation, any question of compensation that could arise would be in reference to the soil; they keep a separate account of the funds which they receive, and apply them to the improvement of the river, 5259.

—With respect to the right of the soil, there are some rents which they receive, in fact; however, they are all carried to an account for the benefit of the river; the amount is very small, 5260.—Thinks 1,000*l.* a year was the statement of it, 5261.—It is a question of jurisdiction, not of property, 5262.—The complaint which has been made against the City in this respect is, that they are inert, and do not really exercise their jurisdiction to the extent which would be desirable for the public interests. Does not believe they are at all liable to that charge, 5266.—Assures the Commision that the corporation do act with vigour, and wherever they think they are justified in doing it they do it, and abide all the consequence, 5264.—Should say that the bulk of members of the navigation committee have a certain degree of knowledge of matters concerning which they have to determine, connected with the state of the river or harbour, and some of them most intimately acquainted with it, 5266.—Believes the harbour master is universally acknowledged to be a very competent person. Mr. Saunders is the water bailiff; Mr. Leach is the engineer, a most skilful person, who receives constantly the approbation of the committee, 5268.—Thinks those visits of inspection which the committee occasionally make to places upon the river is more than the performance of a mere nominal duty; that the investigations so made are practically useful, 5269.—States the kind of points investigated, 5270.—Has no doubt the object of the corporation in going on such visits is that they should not be altogether under the control of their officers. Throughout the corporation there is a strong, not misplaced, but reasonable jealousy of all their officers, and they choose to judge for themselves, 5271.—Believes that the powers of conservancy are exercised by the corporation in an efficient manner, and in a manner to give satisfaction to the public, 5272.—It was not thought to be expedient, till the corporation was relieved from imputation, to make any suggestions for the future; but if there are any suggestions made, expects it will be from the corporation generally as a body, either from the committee which at present represents the corporation, or from the common council themselves, 5273, 5274.—The Admiralty has no claim whatever with regard to the river, which comes into collision with the claim of the City. The question was settled years ago, 5275.—The only claim which the Crown has in reference to the river is represented by the Woods and Forests, 5276.—With respect to ballast, there is a sort of jurisdiction claimed by the Admiralty. That more particularly refers to the Trinity House, 5277.—The Admiralty is the general conservator of tidal harbours in this country as far as jurisdiction goes, 5278.—The Admiralty does not claim any jurisdiction on the Thames in that respect; there the conservancy of the City would override the Admiralty authority, 5279.—At present the Admiralty are calling for some returns with respect to the river, 5280.—The conservancy of the river is beyond all dispute in the corporation. In the reign of James I. there was a question pending, and the attorney-general for the Crown admitted that the corporation of London were the conservators of the river by prescription, 5281.—The property in the bed and soil of the River Thames is claimed by the Crown by virtue of the general proposition that the Crown is entitled to the soil in all ports and harbours between high and low watermark, 5282.—The City have nothing whatever to do with Westminster Bridge. They have to do with Blackfriars; in fact they built it, 5283.—London Bridge was built out of the revenues of the Bridge House estates and some other properties, in one way or other, by money raised by the City, as well for the purpose of building the bridge as making the approaches to it, 5284.—One abutment of Southwark Bridge is in the City Proper, the other is in Southwark. That bridge was built by a private company, 5285.—When the scheme for the establishment of a police was adopted, it became a question whether the police established by Sir R. Peel should extend over the whole of London or not. The citizens of London thought themselves justified in requiring a separate police; they made a strenuous opposition to being included in the general measure, and succeeded in obtaining an Act of Parliament to give them a separate police. Nothing can work better than the police does within the City of London; it is well carried out with respect to economy. Believes the rate is the same, 7*d.* in the pound, in both cases. It is an out-and-out 7*d.* in the City, but believes it is clogged with some other matters in the metropolis, 5286.—Believes in the county at large the Government pay a portion of the expense. It was stipulated in the City of London that the City should pay a considerable portion, and they do so, very much to the relief of the inhabitants, 5287.—The proportion which is paid out of the corporation funds in the City is the same as that which the Government subsidy bears to the money levied by rate in the rest of the metropolis, 5288.—The City obtains no portion of he Government grant. There are so many individuals in the City who do not contribute to the corporate funds, that the corporate funds are charged in a larger proportion for some of the items than any county fund would be. For instance, for prisons and the administration of justice the money all comes out of the corporate funds, and not out of the pockets of the general inhabitants. Till a county rate becomes necessary, the persons who reside in the City and make their fortunes there, have all the advantage of a lower charge upon them than those in the country at large, 5289.—Estimating the expenses of a police upon the footing of a charge upon property, the City is as cheaply watched as the rest of the metropolis, and with greater probability of a reduction than in any other case, 5290.—In point of area it would be different, because the proportion of valuable property upon any given spot in the City is so much larger than it is likely to be out of London, that they have, in point of fact, a larger number of policemen to take care of those properties than they have in the country, 5291.—It has been stated that the banks of the river between high and low watermark are not watched by either the City police, the Thames police, or the metropolitan police, and becomes in consequence the resort of thieves and vagabonds. Witness does not think the complaint can have assumed any very tangible shape, 5292.—When the land is covered with water it is under one jurisdiction, when it is uncovered it is under another, 5293.—The last witness was speaking of a particular case near Blackfriars. Thinks the omission to watch it really turned upon other circumstances. Believes it was private ground, and the police did not think themselves justified in entering it. In point of fact, the City watch the shore between high and low watermark so far as it is accessible, 5294.—As far back as history goes, the care and custody of the police of the City has always been in the hands of the citizens, either through the medium of the train bands, through the watch and ward, or otherwise, 5295.—In the rest of the metropolis it had usually been in the hands of the parishes, but when the general system was established for the rest of the metropolis under the control of the commissioners appointed by the Crown, the City thought they could do it better themselves, 5296, 5297.—Experience has confirmed that anticipation. There is a police committee under the presidency of one of the most practical men in the corporation, Mr. Alderman Lawrence. Nothing could be carried on more satisfactorily. There has been in one or two wards a little dispute about the rates; it has been referred to the surveyors, and in every instance settled to the satisfaction of all parties, 5298.—The Temple pays its police rate in the aggregate sum; it is not taken upon each set of chambers, 5299.—Before the City Police Act was passed the City was watched by the ward watchmen; there was a particular rate in each ward for the purpose, 5300.—There was both a day and night watch, 5301.—The Temple watched for themselves; they were not, practically speaking, included in any ward, 5302.—By the City Police Act the rate is made upon all the houses in the City, and among them upon all the chambers in the Temple, 5303, 5304.—They now pay a large sum. They choose to preserve their watchmen. The City police are ready to go into the Temple, but they do not, 5305.—Does not know what the police of the Temple cost. There are many parishes in London which still keep up their own watchmen, 5306.—States that they do not derive any benefit from the police rate, but they might if they pleased. It is by a special clause in the Act that the Temple is included within the Police Act, 5307.—St. Bartholomew's closes its gates, and so keeps the police out, 5308.—Thinks in that case it would be just, in estimating the cost of the City police, to add the expense of the Temple police to the charge, 5309.—Thinks the Temple tried to insert a clause exempting them from the charge of the City police, but were unsuccessful, 5310.—The remembrancer had the conduct of the Bill, 5311.—There was the same ground for having a separate commission for sewers as for a separate police; they thought they could do the business better for themselves. Their sewers' rate is low, and a further reduction is thought of. They believe their sewerage almost as perfect as possible; they are trying to bring it to perfection at as small a rate as possible, 5312.—The sewers are managed by a commission appointed yearly under seal of the common council, the Act requiring that a certain class of the corporation should be commissioners, the deputies of the different wards, for instance, 5313, 5314.—The police is managed by a committee sanctioned by an Act of Parliament, 5315.—The police and sewers are so governed that the accounts are kept distinct from those of the corporation, 5316.—The breaking up the business of the City into various departments has grown up as usage and the result of experience, and is of opinion that it is desirable that it should continue so, 5317, 5318.—Thinks it will be shown that the burden of tax is lower in the City than in other parts of the metropolis, 5319.—When an occasion arises in which the City think they ought to institute a prosecution it is done by the Court of Aldermen; it is very rarely, 5320, 5321.—The cases are, when the injured parties are so poor, or where the enormity of the offence is such that they think it ought to be done, or where it is a particular case of fraud that they think likely to spread and become general; it is always watched with great jealousy; they are disinclined to appear where they could not be perfectly justified, 5322.—They have powers with regard to some of the municipalities in the north of Ireland, 5323.—The connexion between the corporation of London and the Irish Society is not very intimate, but some of the members of the corporation form the governor and assistants of the Irish Society, 5324.—Does not think any jurisdiction is exercised over the municipalities of Londonderry and some other towns. There was a petition from some parties in Londonderry to the Court of Common Council, 5325.—The petition referred to seemed to imply a doubt whether the City of London had not jurisdiction with respect to it. In this instance the jurisdiction was not exercised. Does not recollect whether it was because they had not the power, or because they did not think the occasion justified the interpretation, 5327.—It was a very long petition. Thinks there was a particular party at Londonderry who wanted their interposition for some purpose of their own, 5328.—Has never directed his attention to the powers and privileges of the corporation with reference to those other corporations in Ireland, 5329.—Will lay before the Commission a complete statement of the charters, and of what has been done in respect to the Irish Society. Has a book containing Lord Lyndhurst's judgment upon the case which was before the House of Lords, and the accounts delivered by the Irish Society to the corporation, 5330.—The nature of Sir Thomas Gresham's will is to give the property mentioned between the corporation and the Mercers' Company; they both appoint committees, who act sometimes together and sometimes separately; they each have their particular departments. Under their care the Royal Exchange was rebuilt after the fire of London, and again after its destruction by fire in 1835. The City's moiety of the last rebuilding to the 31st December, 1846, was 84,267*l.* 3*s.* There has been an elaborate report with respect to the building of that establishment; the corporation have also published several reports. There are a certain number of professors appointed under this will, who give their lectures at Gresham College. The lectures used to be given at the old Exchange, but it was thought better to keep the college detached from the place of business. It was therefore rebuilt at the corner of Basinghall-street. This was done during the years 1842-3-4, at a cost to the City for their moiety of 6,955*l.* 15*s.*, 5331.—There are four professors elected by the Gresham committee of the corporation, and three elected by the Mercers' Company, 5332.—The lectures, with one or two exceptions, are not well attended, 5333.—They are gratuitous, and chiefly given in the morning, which the professors think is the cause of their being so badly attended, people being otherwise engaged, 5334, 5335.—The City spent more money in building the Exchange and making the approaches to it than they have received from the Gresham estate, so there is a considerable debt; but the fund has been well managed, and the City has not hesitated to advance money, 5336, 5337.—States that there is great difference of opinion as to whether legal and valid customs of the City can be repealed by the general words of an Act of Parliament. That has been and is still a point of dispute, 5338.—The opinion of the Queen's Bench when the matter was brought before them was, that the general words of an Act of Parliament could defeat the customs of the City, 5339.—Believes the point has never been decided by the highest courts, 5340.—Thinks that the view of the Courts on the matter would very much depend on the wording of the particular Act, and on the nature of the particular custom, 5341, 5342.—That each case would be open to argument as it arose, 5343.—Has never been able to satisfy himself whether the companies may be said to be a part or an adjunct of the corporation. With very few exceptions they act almost wholly independently of the corporation, 5344.—The companies, with the exception of the Goldsmiths', Stationers', Apothecaries', and Vintners' have no connection with the trades whose names they bear, though witness thinks it would be an easy and desirable thing for them to interfere with their trades, 5345.—If all the companies were dissolved, the elections under 11th George I. could not take place, 5346.—Supposing the livery were removed, the operations of the Act of the 11th of George I. would be limited; but witness thinks there might be a common hall, consisting of freemen, 5348, 5349.—They would not have the power of election, that right being regulated by that statute of George I., 5350.—In point of practice now, only liverymen attend the common hall both for elections and other purposes, but that was not the original constitution of London, 5351, 5352.—Knows of nothing but that Act of Parliament to exclude a man who is not a liveryman, but a freeman of the City and of a company from attending a common hall called by the lord mayor, were he to insist on doing so, 5353.—It is a fact, that taking the practice and the byelaws which had been made before the 11th George I. and that Act of Parliament together, there could be no elections in common hall if there were no companies, 5354.—Thinks it an anomaly that only that class of freemen should be allowed to act who are selected by other people not connected with the corporation, 5355.—That very circumstance brings those companies into connection with the corporation, as far as those elections go, 5356.—With respect to the 40 feet way, upon which evidence was taken at some length. After the fire of London there was a clause introduced into an Act of Parliament which required that a passage of 40 feet should be continued from the Temple to London Bridge. There was a complaint made against the corporation that they had not maintained that 40 feet way. Some persons in the City were very desirous that that way should be kept open, which alarmed Mr. Calvert, whose extensive brewery is upon the line, and he applied to Parliament for a Bill to repeal that clause in the Act. The City of London, though not called on to keep this 40 feet way clear, thought it was not quite justifiable to repeal that clause in the Act of Charles II., and accordingly they opposed as strongly as they could the Bill of Mr. Calvert. Reads statement which the remembrancer made to the court on 22d February, 1821. The City opposed the Bill with their utmost strength, but were not successful, therefore no blame can be attached to the corporation for submitting to that which the Legislature thought proper to enact. There is a meeting, attended by the clerk of the magistrates, every Saturday, for the purpose of taking cab cases, omnibus cases, and cases more or less connected with the police, and the weights and measures, 5357-8.—Generally only one magistrate attends, but if the case requires two, two attend. The number of police cases heard by the City magistrates sitting at the Guildhall on Saturday of each week has been 2,553 per annum on the average of the last five years, or 49 cases at each sitting, 5359.—They are all advised by the same legal officer, 5360.

MEREWETHER, HENRY ALWORTH, D. C. L. (Examination resumed)—Produces the letter which Mr. Recorder read in his statement the other day, from the banker, Mr. Williams. In 1801 Mr. Williams retired. In 1805 Sir William Curtis, Sir Richard Carr Glynn, Sir Charles Price, and Sir John Perring, continued in the Court of Aldermen, as appears by the repertory of that date. Was interrogated upon the subject of Sir Thomas Gresham's will (lays the will before the Commissioners), 6727.—The land which was the site of Sir Thomas Gresham's house was sold a good many years ago to the Government; it was then converted into the excise office,

6728.—The same land was again sold by the Government the other day, 6729, 6730.—The purchase was originally made under an Act of Parliament, and it remained vested in trustees for some time, till they were removed to the Royal Exchange, 6731.—A person from the town clerk's office is expected to attend all the meetings of the joint committee at the Mercers' hall, and is also called upon to keep a copy of the minutes in the office, 6732.—Does not know that there is any clause in the bill to the effect, that if the intentions of the testator are not strictly carried out, the property is to be forfeited by the corporation. Believes there is a general residuary clause, 6733.—The manner in which the Gresham Estate has always been superintended by the City, and their desire to augment rather than to lessen the funds would be a guarantee that at that time the best sum that could be obtained for it was obtained, particularly as they were dealing with the Government, 6734, 6735.—The increase of value of property within the City of London, from the circumstance of their building houses higher than they used to do, and their being used as warehouses, and particularly from so many streets being widened, would produce a very large difference, 6736.—In 1767 it appears to have been worth only 500*l.* a year, whereas in 1852 it was also worth a sum of 108,000*l.* Thinks the value of land in the City would have increased to that extent, 6737.—It is the same ground, but the circumstances are not altogether the same. It is said that the City sold this property, and made an improvident bargain; so bad a bargain, that in 1852 it being sold again by the Government, it is to be assumed that the corporation have mismanaged this estate. The conclusion, that the value of the property has increased to that extent, is a more reasonable supposition than that the other facts should have existed, 6739.—Calls attention to a report which was made in 1838 with respect to the lectures. The lectures were taken under the consideration of the committee for the management of the trust. A portion of the lectures being selected by the Mercers' Company and the other portion by the City, there was some little difficulty about moving the place where the lectures were to be given. A case was submitted for the opinion of Sir William Follett and Mr. Griffith Richards, and under their sanction they were removed, and are now given in the college, Basinghall Street. Witness reads the rules with respect to the lectures. The lectures are not largely attended, except those on music and astronomy; the lecturers are persons of known character and reputation. Lays before the Commissioners a statement of the City's moiety of the expense of building Gresham college, and the purchase of the freehold, 6740.—The lectures are given first in Latin, and then in English, 6741.—The Latin lecture is not given unless there are five persons present, which is very rarely the case. In answer to a former question states, that a part of the city of Westminster, viz., the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand, has been added to the City of London under the operation of the Post Office Act, 6742.—This Act was passed in 1815, upon which a sum of 240,000*l.* was advanced from the revenue of the Post Office, to be paid into the chamber of London, and the lord mayor, aldermen, and the commons in common council assembled were to have the administration of that fund, and the following clause makes them liable for any misapplication of it. The chamberlain was directed to keep accounts of the disbursements, and those accounts were to be laid before Parliament, 6743.—Does not think any portion of the county of Middlesex laying outside the boundary of the City has been annexed to it; if so, only a small portion near Portsoken. Refers to a subject on which he was examined before with respect to metage. Refers to a report to the House of Lords by certain commissioners sent to Ireland for the purpose of enquiring into the fairs and markets of Ireland, recommending that meters should be established in Dublin. Applications for similar constitutions are likewise made by Liverpool and Bristol. The letter of the secretary for Ireland is dated September 27th, 1852, 6744, 6745.—It is recommended that the meters should be appointed by the owners of the markets, 6746.—As far as Dublin is concerned the corporation are the owners of the market, but an immense number of markets are named all over Ireland, 6747.—They seem to contemplate the appointment of meters for dealings in the market, 6748.—It has been suggested that the amount of dues and metage paid in the outports was much less than in the Thames. Upon a reference to an elaborate report obtained by the General Purposes Committee it will be found that no direct comparison can be made. In the port of London the crews do not assist in the metage or delivery of goods, and believes it will be found that the dues in London are as low, if not lower, than in any of the outports. Captain Williams complains of a clause in the Act of Parliament which gives to the Court of Aldermen the power of dealing with the City prisons, instead of the magistrates in sessions, though he states that nothing can be more vigilant or effective than their supervision of them. Most of the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen are in public; but they have the power of deliberating in private when they think proper, to which Captain Williams objects, as it enables them to make grants of larger superannuations and payments to the officers of Newgate than he appears to think necessary. The expense of the management of prisons and the criminal jurisdiction is paid out of the corporate funds, and not levied upon persons living in the City, 6749.—The police fund is an entirely new fund, created under a new Act of Parliament, 6750.—Does not think the funds of the corporation of London were ever thought to be applicable to the police. The persons who live within the City, and carry on their business there, are exempted to a very great extent, by the application of the corporate funds, from payments to which persons living in other cities are subject, 6751.—The corporation does supply one-fourth of the amount required for the maintenance of the police. The prisons are under the direction of the corporation, 6752.—The sheriffs are bound with the custody of the prisoners committed to their charge, and as ancillary to that power the corporation look after the prisons within their jurisdiction, 6753.—The superintendent of police is appointed by the corporation under the Act of Parliament, 6754.—The collection of the rate and the expenditure of the money is under a committee of the common council, 6755.—Originally the citizens of London were compelled to do watch and ward, which amounted to the police of that day. Subsequently a police has been established, and a rate levied, which falls upon the inhabitants generally, who would otherwise have been obliged to perform those duties, 6756.—The corporation has only a limited control over the police. When the question of police was considered all over the country it became a question whether there should be a separate police for the City, or whether it should be included in the general metropolitan police, and it was decided by the legislature that it should be separate. Refers at length to Captain Williams' evidence with respect to the prisons, 6757.—The chamberlain's jurisdiction with respect to apprentices acts most beneficially. The chamberlain is always there to hear complaints; he decides them upon principles of equity, and it is only in the ultimate result that he commits to prison. In the Prison Act there is a clause which directs that any gaol built for any county, city, or town, out of the boundaries thereof, shall be deemed to be part and portion of the county, city, or town, to which it belongs. Produces a return of the salaries and incomes of the different officers of the corporation, 6758.—This return includes the emoluments of all kinds, and the sources from which they are derived, 6759.—Some of the offices continue to be saleable in this manner:—They were originally sold, with a power of alienation, while the holders were alive; with that exception there are none, and the corporation have not only ceased to sell any offices, but they are doing all in their power to bring up into their own hands those offices which heretofore were saleable, 6760.—The clerk of arraigns is appointed by the court itself, 6763.—Lays before the commissioners a list of the present office-holders under the corporation, who purchased their offices, with the sums which they gave for them. Likewise produces a list of the different committees, and describes the number of attendances in the course of the year, and the business done there, showing how, by the division of labour, different subjects are sent to different committees. The following is a summary of sums given by the corporation of London to public improvements or charitable purposes:—For improvements for 25 years, commencing in 1827, 560,064*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*; donations for charitable purposes for the same time, 65,023*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*; expended for public purposes for the like period, 25,869*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*; new prison at Holloway, 91,547*l.* 10*s.*; total, 742,505*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* The corporation have taken great care of education in the City; the City of London school has been of late years founded upon the munificence of a former town clerk, and also other funds which have been collected together, 6764, 6765.—Some of the schools are endowed under bequests, and others are supported out of the funds of the City of London, 6766.—The corporation act as self-created trustees, as far as their own funds go, and strictly trustees as far as the separate bequests go, 6767.—The schools in the City are Christ's Hospital, St. Paul's school, Merchant Tailors' school, and the school before named, 6768.—The connexion between the City and Christ's Hospital is very considerable. In the reign of Edward VI. funds were provided by the Crown, for the purpose of establishing Christ's Hospital, which were committed to the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London. At subsequent periods large sums have been subscribed by private individuals, and they form another body in the hospital. From time to time that body has gained more influence, and at last quarrels and disputes arose. An Act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of settling those disputes, and what is the construction of that Act is a question which for some time was agitated. All the aldermen are governors, also a limited number of common councilmen appointed by that Act, and they ought to meet and concur in matters connected with the hospital, 6769.—All persons paying a certain amount are governors, 6770.—Is not prepared to say that practically the superintendence of the hospital is in the hands of the corporation; Alderman Thompson is president. The lord mayor for the time being is usually appointed president, whenever a vacancy occurs, in that as in the other hospitals, 6771.—Those who become governors by subscribing towards the funds do not take an active part in the direction of its concerns. There is a body called the almoners, who have a considerable influence over the affairs of the institution, 6772.—The London almshouses were originally built for a particular purpose; that purpose ceased, and the subscribers withdrew their money to the extent of 843*l.* 15*s.*; but there are outstanding accounts for building, repairing, &c., amounting to 4,367*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* It has been represented that there was a society for the municipal reform of the corporation. Only 1,200 have entered this society out of 125,000 returned by the Commissioners of Police as the population of the City, 6773.—The number of householders in the City in 1844 was 13,958. Thinks it right to state the fact that since these examinations have been going on, stating all the complaints that can be made against the City, and of the misconduct of the corporation, the annual ward-mote elections have taken place. There have been some changes by death or resignation, but there were not above two changes in the election of those common councilmen who formed the corporation last year. In those two cases it was a mere question as to the one individual being more active than the other. Of the 57 banking establishments in the metropolis, 44 are within the City, and 13 west of Temple Bar, 6774.—Is told there is a branch of the London and Westminster Bank east of the City, in Whitechapel, 6775.

MEREWETHER, HENRY ALWORTH, D.C.L., (Examination resumed)—Gives in a return of the thirty offices of the corporation which have been sold. One of the three fruit meters died in 1846, when they did not again sell the office, but placed a person in it who discharged its duties in a manner highly satisfactory to those connected with that trade, 7569.—These offices have been purchased by their present possessors, or their predecessors, who had the right of alienation. All the oyster meters and Mr. Ashley, one of the attorneys of the Mayor's Court, still possess this power, but an arrangement is about to be made with Mr. Ashley for his right of alienation, with a view of re-adjusting the Mayor's Court, 7570.—The same subject with regard to the oyster meters is now under the consideration of a committee of the common council, who have for many years been anxious to put an end to this system of sale and alienation, 7571.—Gives in the returns of Mr. Alderman Challis and Mr. Sheriff Croll, which were not ready when the other returns were delivered; also that of the conveyancing clerk to the comptroller. With respect to the offices in the corporation, they have been in the habit, whenever a vacancy occurs, of inquiring into the nature of the office, the amount of salary, and all the circumstances connected with it. Gives statement of all those inquired into since 1829, many of them more than once, as fresh vacancies have occurred, making altogether 87 reports, 7572.—There is a large public library containing about 20,000 volumes belonging to the City in the Guildhall, free to the citizens generally, at least with the form only of applying for an order from any member of the common council. The present librarian is perfectly competent to his office, and gives every facility to persons going there, 7573–7578.—Wishes to prove to the Commissioners that the statement in Mr. Bennoch's evidence is totally unfounded, "That in consequence of the negligence of the corporation and the Mercers Company, and through collusion with the Government, which in 1768 purchased the land and property of Gresham College for an annual rental of 500*l.*, the citizens or merchants of London have had alienated from them an amount of money equal to 108,000*l.*, for which this very plot of ground has been sold this year, which should have been appropriated to the purposes for which it was left by Sir Thomas Gresham," 7578.—The 500*l.* a year is paid by the Government to the Mercers Company and to the corporation, in equal moieties, and is charged upon the inland revenue of the country, therefore the 108,000*l.* is irrespective of the 500*l.* a year, 7579.—Believes the 108,000*l.* fairly represents the increased value of the property since the date of the former bargain, from the progress of time, the buildings put upon the property, and some addition which has been made to the area, 7880–7883.—It was no doubt valuable property 70 years ago, but at that very time a considerable quantity of land in Broad Street was let on building lease at 2*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.* a foot frontage, 7584.—There is a small piece of property now vacant in Threadneedle Street, for which 30,000*l.* is demanded. A small house there was let 16 years ago at a rack rent of 110*l.* a year. It has been pulled down, the lessee having been compensated, and he has to rebuild and pay a ground rent of 268*l.* a year, with a few additional feet of frontage; so that an additional value, to the extent mentioned, may be clearly made out, and is informed that the bargain recently made is worse than that made in 1768, 7585.—There has been no calculation made as to what gross sum of money, instead of an annuity, the ground in question would have fetched in 1768, beyond that just stated, that land in the neighbourhood was at that time let at 2*s.* a foot frontage, 7586.—Gives in a statement of facts connected with the transaction respecting the college, extracted from the "Minutes of the Joint Committee of Gresham Affairs, City and Mercers Company," both bodies being trustees under Sir Thomas Gresham's will, and the Journals of both Houses of Parliament. Wishes to draw the attention of the Commissioners to the statute setting aside the "Judgment given in the Court of King's Bench in the 35th year of the reign of Charles II., upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, that the liberty, privilege, and franchise of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, being a body politic and corporate, should be seized into the King's hands as forfeited. And for as much as the said judgment is illegal, and for that the restoring of the said mayor, commonalty and citizens, to their ancient liberties, of which they had been deprived, tends very much to the peace and good settlement of this kingdom," it goes on to declare them a body politic and corporate, and they ought to "peaceably have and enjoy all their rights, gifts, charters, grants, liberties, privileges, franchises, customs, usages, constitutions, prescriptions, markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, estates, and hereditaments whatsoever, which they lawfully had, or had lawful right, title, or interest of, in or to, at the time of giving the said judgment." Therefore setting aside the judgment upon the quo warranto, it goes on with clauses which confirm everything belonging to the corporation of London, which restore all their officers, give validity to all that had been done by them, and entirely sweep out all trace of the former proceeding, 7588.

MILLS, JOHN REMINGTON, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence)—Has been a freeman and a liveryman since 1822. Has resided for the last five years at Englefield Green in Surrey, 984, 985.—Lived a few months in the City, and carried on business in Milk Street, Cheapside, for 21 years, as silk manufacturer, 986, 987.—Wishes to call attention to the manner in which the corporation of London abuses the privileges of electing the sheriffs of London and Middlesex by the livery, 988.—States opinion, that by the practice of the Privy Council in the case of sheriffs no gentleman, even if he is qualified by property, is required to serve the office of sheriff in a county in which he is not resident, 989.—Proceeds to state how in June 1848 he (witness), and also Mr. C. P. Bousfield, citizen and weaver, were elected sheriffs, (the aldermen having been first chosen, and excused, on account of their recent election to the office of aldermen,) without any previous information, and much against their wishes. By an act of common council the aldermen are required to be put up first, 990.—Mr. C. P. Bousfield and self paid the fine. The act of the common council, 1748, says, "That every alderman of the City who shall not have actually served the same office," that is, the office of sheriff, "shall, according to his seniority in the said Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and before any commoner of this City, be publicly put in nomination for the said office." That shows that the intention was that the aldermen should be first put in nomination, 991.—Nomination certainly is one thing, and election another. It does not require that the livery should elect an alderman; but it says that an alderman shall always be put up first, evidently with the intention that he shall serve if elected. This being the case, it was not competent to those aldermen to refuse to to serve, 992.—The aldermen ought not to have applied to be excused, because they were elected aldermen under this act of the common council in force placing them in that position, and requiring them to be nominated first to the livery; but wishes particularly to call attention to this, that after Mr. Bousfield and witness had refused to give bond to serve the office, the parties who actually served were Alderman Finnis (who was on the list before witness, and ought to have been elected instead of him) and Mr. Goodhart, so that if Alderman Finnis had been elected at first witness would have escaped the fine. The report in the "Times" newspaper showed that there must have been some contrivance used to induce the livery to pass by that gentleman and elect witness, 993.—States opinion, that if there were no fines laid upon those who refused to serve the office of sheriff competent persons would readily be found, 994.—Thinks there are other motives besides the fear of the fine which induce competent persons to serve the office of sheriff, for the introduction to civic offices in London is in many instances by means of the shrievalty, 995.—Believes that the cause which induces persons to pay the fine rather than serve the office of sheriff is the disturbance to their domestic comfort, and the nuisances connected with it, 996.—But the great reason is to get rid of all connexion with the City, and not because of the expense attendant upon the office, 997.—Cannot say whether the fine paid for non-service of the office is less than the ordinary expense of the office, 998.—Never made any inquiry as to what the probable expense would be, 999.—There has been a practice of making appointments of sheriffs, not with the bonâ fide intention of their serving, but for the purpose of inducing the persons so elected to pay the fine. A return which the House of Commons ordered, proves that distinctly, 1,000.—It has not recently been the practice, which has diminished in the 20 years previous to 1848, but has been revived again to some extent lately, 1001, 1002.—There has been no opportunity of late years of putting forward persons to serve, because those who were willing to serve have made every effort to induce a sufficient number of the livery to vote in their favour, 1003.—Thinks that before the persons who were willing to serve were nominated half a dozen others might have been nominated who were not willing to serve, in order to induce them to pay the fines; but the persons who wanted to be sheriffs employed corrupt means to secure the election. Witness here describes the means, 1004.—If there was an intention on the part of the City now to use the election of sheriffs for extortionate purposes it might be done, as they have always two or three aldermen in reserve, whom they can require to serve when they find it difficult to fill up the office from the list of persons nominated; 1005.—The practice of having mala fide elections of sheriffs, for the purpose of extorting fines, was disused up to 1848; but since then Mr. Peto, the Member for Norwich, was nominated, and actually elected, without his concurrence, and other gentlemen also, 1006.—He pleaded the privilege of Parliament, and they were obliged to forego the fine, 1007.—The date of that election was 1849 or 1850.—Witness here describes the way in which undersheriffs play into their own hands, and also states that parties serving the shrievalty, after persons have paid the fine, receive 100*l.* out of that fine; so Alderman Finnis received 100*l.* out of witness's fine to pay his own expenses, 1008.—That 100*l.* does not appear in the return, because he did not receive it till Michaelmas, 1849, and the return stops in 1848, 1009.—This return shows the gross sums paid, and the deductions also. The gross sum is 66,000*l.* in half a century, or 64,000*l.* in 30 years, to 1829 inclusive, 1010.—Parties who pay the fine immediately after they are nominated are charged only 400*l.*, but if they are elected it is 600*l.*, 1011.—Witness now only wishes to call the attention of the Commissioners to the fact, that in the return as made to the House of Commons they were required to insert the residences of the parties who were so nominated and elected, and that though the chamberlain's office did not contain the addresses of the parties, yet they must be in some one of the offices of the City, and of course in making the return they could have supplied that part of the order if they had chosen, 1012.—If a gentleman resident in Northumberland were elected, the town crier would go down and inform him of the fact, 1013.—Supposes the object for sending the town crier in person to deliver the notice is preparatory to an action against the parties if they refused to pay the fine, or in order to be able to prove personal service. Wishes also to call attention to the appropriation of the fines. Witness here enters into particulars, 1014, 1015.—Believes that a fund, such as is directed in ordinance of the common council, has been subsequently created, and that these funds were transferred to a separate account for the establishment of a proposed school for the maintenance of education of necessitous orphans of freemen of London, and that they have now established such school at Brixton, 1016.—Some of the fines have not been carried immediately to the funds. Gives an instance. Hopes that if the livery are to continue to exercise their franchise as to electing sheriffs there will be some appeal established, by which parties who have a right to relief may obtain it on appeal to one of the chiefs of the law courts, so that by an appeal to them the parties might have the same relief which they would have before the Privy Council. If a person is to lose his Parliamentary elective franchise by removing seven miles from the City of London, he ought to be exempted from the disagreeable duties in which he might otherwise be involved, and they ought to be restricted to persons who live within a certain distance of London, seven miles, for instance, 1019, 1020.—A liveryman who resides more than seven miles from the City of London has no voice in the affairs of the City; that is, in the Parliamentary elections. The only municipal elections are, the lord mayor and the sheriffs, and the chamberlain. All charges and obligations, whatever they are, should go hand in hand with the privileges, 1021–1024.—Prior to the Reform Act, it was necessary that a liveryman, in order to vote for members of Parliament for the City, should be resident within a certain distance of the City. The Reform Act operated to cut down the right of the liverymen in that respect, leaving the municipal elections and the burthen of the offices as they were before, 1025–1028.

MOORE, AMBROSE, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was a silk manufacturer resident in the City of London for about forty years. Retired from business about six years ago, but is still connected with the City. The workpeople lived in Spitalfields. The warehouse was within the City. Is a freeman of the City, and a liveryman, and is connected with one or two companies, 4296, 4297.—Thinks it would be wrong to abolish the corporation of London, or to unite it with the metropolitan districts. Whatever may be done witness sees no reason why the old City of London should be deprived of any of those privileges which are applicable to the present time, and are not injurious to the citizens, 4298.—Would be unwilling to see the City deprived of municipal institutions, 4299.—Is of opinion that to have one corporation or confederation of corporations in the metropolis would be inexpedient. This is the seat of Government. Thinks if the parliamentary boroughs had corporations, and they were to co-operate, it would be inconvenient to the Government itself. Does not know any advantage that the borough of Marylebone would have by being incorporated in the same way that municipal towns in the country are. Thinks it would be inconvenient that the Government police should be under the control of local corporations, 4300.—The corporations would be dissatisfied if they had not the same control over their local police that country corporations have, 4301.—As to the City of London, no doubt it has the control of its own police; and as it is an ancient corporation, which has enjoyed immunities for so many ages, it would be very unfair to deprive it of them, unless it has abused its power. Apprehends the police of the City is well managed, and there is no reason why it should not be continued. With respect to the City appointing its own magistrates, the appointment of magistrates by the people is an anomaly, but in the case of the City it is an ancient privilege which they have never abused. As a citizen of London, believes he speaks the general impression that justice has been well administered in the City. If the City of London has to elect its own magistrates, those magistrates should certainly be elected for life, 4302.—Thinks it very desirable that the aldermen should hold their offices for life, 4303.—If they are to be magistrates, they ought to be independent; but in all cases in the City of London would have the aldermen, whether they are magistrates or not, elected for life, 4304.—If the constituency were changed, and the wards were more equalized, witness would approve of the present ward elections for aldermen, 4305.—Cannot see any reason why the same constituency, which Parliament might think the proper constituency for the election of members of Parliament, should not elect municipal officers, 4306.—Thinks whatever is the Parliamentary franchise, for simplicity's sake, it would be better to have it in London, for both purposes, 4307.—Cannot see any advantage in the privileges which the City now exercises upon trade, such as metage, and other things of that kind. They are not adapted to the circumstances of the present time, 4308.—Would abolish the City tolls. Would abolish the freemen altogether, so far as any advantage of trade is concerned, 4309, 4310.—Was never a member of the corporation, 4311.—Would endeavour to make the wards more equal. In some instances would unite two small wards, and in others divide a large one, so as not to disturb the ward boundaries, 4312.—Would retain the present number of aldermen, 4313.—Sees no advantage in reducing the number of aldermen in London, as the business of London is much larger than in other places. Would still retain the Court of Aldermen as a separate court. There should be one alderman to each ward, and three, four, or five common councilmen, according to the size of the ward, the average being four. By thus reducing the present number a superior class of men would take office. The lord mayor should be chosen by the common hall from the aldermen who have served the office of sheriff, as, before taking the office of lord mayor, he should be well acquainted with the duties of the municipality, but would retain the right of the approval of the Crown to the selection. The sheriffs of Middlesex should not be chosen by the citizens of London; the right to appoint should be restored to the Crown; but the sheriffs of London should be chosen by the common hall, as at present. Does not see how you can be sure of persons to accept the office of sheriff, unless they are liable to a fine for refusal, 4314.—Believes that men have been chosen who it was known would not serve, for the sake of obtaining the fine. This is unfair, but a regulation might be made to keep up the fines for refusal, excluding the unfairness. The nomination should be the act of the Court of Aldermen, who, as men of independent character, would not make an improper nomination; but the electors in common hall should not be confined to choose from those so put in nomination. It should be in the power of other parties to propose fit persons for the office; and thence comes the opportunity of proposing persons unwilling to serve, for the sake of getting them fined; But if the corporation were well constituted, they would not take money from an unsuitable candidate, 4315, 4316.—There should be only one constituent body for municipal purposes in the City of London, the franchise being the same as in the election of members of Parliament. In the country the corporation elects its mayor and officers; but, in the City of

London, thinks some deference should be paid to custom, and that the lord mayor and sheriffs should be elected in common hall. Would suggest that the chamberlain and bridgemaster should be elected by the Court of Common Council, by which would be avoided the corruption that has hitherto been connected with the election of chamberlain, on account of the value of the office. Would abolish ale conners, flesh-lasters, and such officers as are not applicable to the present times. The aldermen should still form a separate court. They are, generally speaking, an independent and respectable body. Their last two appointments to the office of recorder have given great satisfaction. They should continue their right of election, but subject to the approval of the Crown. Approves of retaining the magistracy in the aldermen, but they should have the power, if the court should think fit, of appointing one or two of their own body, or persons professionally well qualified, to be police magistrates within the City, with the approval of the Secretary of State, 4317–4319.—The effect would be, that an alderman need not act as a magistrate in the City unless he so thought fit. He would be in the same position as a municipal magistrate in a borough, when there was a stipendiary magistrate appointed under the powers of the Municipal Corporation Act. This might induce some of the higher class of merchants to accept office, 4320–4323.—The aldermen attend the courts of justice according to rota, no doubt consulting the convenience of each other. Would retain the lord mayor and aldermen in the commission at the Old Bailey, that being an ancient honour to the City, and no injury to the public interest, 4324, 4325.—Believes they are qualified, in point of law, to take an active part in the proceedings, but they never do interfere, unless to give an opinion as to punishment when consulted by the recorder or common serjeant presiding. There are quarter sessions held, of which the aldermen are members, 4326.—They have the charge of the City prisons. Believes they have a great desire to do its duties well, and that they are fairly done. They would be useful in regulating the traffic in the street, had they sufficient power to do so. The ordinary London police have not sufficient power in respect to the traffic, 4327–4329.—If there is to be any authority exercising control over brokers, thinks it should be the Court of Aldermen. Does not imply that the regulations respecting brokers are as good as they might be, but there is an important safeguard to the citizens derived from the control exercised by the corporation, 4330, 4331.—In cases of fraudulent brokers, there is every disposition to prosecute, but has observed that those men generally abscond. The City take sureties, which are as available as in the case of a bank clerk. Has no doubt the corporation do enforce the provisions of the bond, so as to afford security to the public, 4332–4334.—There are many reasons why the more respectable and wealthy classes in the City of London will not become members of the corporation; but if the numbers were reduced, and the forms simplified, has no doubt that many would be willing to join it, 4335.—Would not abolish the lord mayor's show, but thinks that if men of intelligence took the office it would be conducted in better taste. Would continue the dinner; in fact, would have the day continued as a day of ceremony and rejoicing, but in moderation and good taste, 4336–4339.—If the present low class of men continue in office, it is necessary to have the system of dinners in common council to induce them to attend; but if the corporation were composed of the right sort of men the dinners would not be so numerous, they would do their business in the daytime. As to the conservancy of the river, thinks it might be transferred to the Crown, or a body of commissioners. The corporation are not qualified to exercise the functions, 4340–4343.—The City derives great benefit from its present municipal institutions, but they require great reform. Would improve but not revolutionize, 4344, 4345.—The principle of self-government is of value in the City, and would retain the municipal institutions, because the habits and feelings of the inhabitants are connected with them, but would not establish them in parts of the metropolis where they do not exist, 4346–4350.—Thinks it positively beneficial to the citizens of London to have justice administered by a magistrate chosen by themselves, 4351.—Would propose that the two police courts in the City should be filled by stipendiary magistrates, who might be members of the Court of Aldermen, 4352.—Cannot state all the advantages which the City derive from the municipal institutions, 4353.—Does not think it desirable that the City police should be distinct from the metropolitan police, but would not take their privileges away from the City, as they are consistent with the public good, 4354, 4355.—The privilege is not above fifteen years old, and is a substitute for the old constables, who were appointed by the wards, and partly under authority of the corporation, 4356–4360.—Some of the police officers were appointed by the corporation. Does not know what they were called. They have now two marshalmen, 4361.—Does not think it desirable that the City should have a separate commission of sewers, except for the reason already given, that it should be allowed to govern itself in matters in which it has been accustomed to do so, 4362.—Knows that abroad the lord mayor and the corporation are the presumed representatives of the whole metropolis, but they are not in England. They have nothing to do beyond the City boundaries, 4363–4366.—Does not think that the present corporation represents the general commercial interests of London, because the body is not composed of such men as it might be under the system proposed, 4367, 4368.—Would sever the connexion between Southwark and London, 4369.—Would propose that the sheriffs of London should cease to be sheriff of Middlesex. There are separate under-sheriffs for the county, 4370, 4371.—Is not in favour of the 4d. coal duty. Does not see why the City of London should have the administration of affairs beyond its own boundaries, nor why a large district should be taxed for local purposes, 4372, 4373.—Does not doubt that the corporation do their part of the business properly. In conclusion repeats, that if the number of the corporation were reduced, and the forms simplified, more respectable men would join it, 4374.

Morley, Samuel, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Carries on business in the City of London; resides out of town, 2136.—Is a wholesale warehouseman. Attends to support the opinion that extensive alterations in the corporation are demanded, 2137.—Believes that the present institutions in the City exclude a large class of men, whose co-operation would be very valuable, 2138.—Has never been connected with the corporation, has been many times invited to join the common council; but it would take up too much time, and the duties were distasteful, 2139, 2140.—Thinks that the habit of connecting dinners and other entertainments with the business duties of a common councilman deters many fit persons from taking the office. Believes that many merchants and large traders would be willing to unite with the corporation under an altered system, 2141–2143.—The union of the magisterial functions with those of the alderman prevents the class referred to from taking part in the corporation. The office of sheriff, in its present form, is also unpleasant to the same class; but they are liable to have it imposed upon them, by bringing the longshore men into common hall, 2144.—The office of sheriff is an expensive one. It is unreasonable to expect a man to pay 600*l.* or 800*l.* towards dinners at Guildhall and the Old Bailey. Should be paid from some other fund, 2145.—The lord mayor's show is looked at with repugnance by the citizens; is a great inconvenience to the tradesmen living in the line of procession, 2146, 2147.—On one occasion of election of sheriffs, the longshore men were bribed by both parties, 2148.—By reference to the chamberlain's account there are offices which are purchased, 2149.—In the late election of chamberlain bribery was resorted to. Was on the committee, 2150, 2151.—Would object to the aldermen being elected for life, and would unite that court with the Court of Common Council in one body, 2152, 2153.—Would wish to see the general provisions of the Municipal Reform Bill applied to the City of London 2154—The suggestions of Mr. Acland for an improved, system of municipal government have met with favour in the City, 2155.—Does not think it desirable to abolish municipal institutions in the City; but thinks the metropolitan boroughs might have such institutions accorded to them, 2156.—Would maintain the municipal institutions within the present limits of the City; but would provide for joint actions upon those subjects in which the whole metropolis has a common interest, 2157, 2158.—Thinks it would be quite in accordance with strict justice that these should be the means of imposing a tax upon the whole metropolis for purposes in which the whole town has a common interest; but at present there is no power of imposing such a tax except by special legislation, 2159, 2160.—Is of opinion that the constituency should merely be householders, and that the men who have paid money to become free should have it paid back to them, 2161.—Can give no opinion with regard to the wards, 2162.—Thinks that a chamber of commerce would be very desirable; but that it should not be established out of the funds of the city, 2163.—The corporation have large estates and property besides the rates they levy, 2164.—Thinks that if the higher class of tradesmen were to join, they could promote the objects of trade, without application to the funds of the corporation, and would be willing to bear a share in the expense of carrying on an efficient chamber of commerce. With regard to the corporate funds greater attention should be paid to the sanitary arrangements and to comforts in the dwellings of the poor, 2165.—Thinks a uniform rate upon householders a preferable mode of raising money to the present duty upon coals, which is a most objectionable tax, 2166, 2167.—As a merchant, has never been annoyed by any City tolls, which many complain of, 2168.—Thinks it most unjust that none but freemen are allowed to carry on retail trade in the City, 2169.—Would sweep away all trade privileges, 2170.—Has no intention to cast any reflection upon the members of the corporation, who are better than their system. Thinks of late years there has been greater care in appointing proper persons to office, 2171, 2173.

Mortimer, G. F. W., D.D. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is head master of the City of London school; has held that office for nearly fourteen years, 6776, 6777.—It is a large school, mainly intended for the citizens of London; that is to say, the Act of Parliament recognizes the right of all liverymen and freemen to send their children there, and gives permission likewise to the Court of Common Council, in Guildhall assembled, to make such alterations as are necessary from time to time, 6778.—Those who attend the schools are day scholars, but the masters who please may take boarders. Two of the masters do so; there may be twenty boarders, perhaps, 6779, 6780.—The school is available in the first instance to freemen and liverymen, and also allows other persons to send their children as vacancies occur, 6781.—The City schools closed the last half year with 568 boys; the present number is about 580, 6782.—The school is partly endowed and partly self-supporting. John Carpenter, a former town clerk of the City of London, left some closes of land for the support and education of four boys. These closes of land have been built over, and the income is now fixed under Act of Parliament at 900*l.* a year. The corporation have built a school and charged the permanent maintenance of the structure upon their own funds; besides that, each boy pays during the year 8*l.* 5*s.*, 6783. The 900*l.* a year is the only endowment, except for scholarships. There are a considerable number of scholarships. Four boys were to be educated under John Carpenter's bequest. That number has been increased to eight, 6784.—The school is capable of accommodating about 600 boys at the utmost. It is now nearly full, 6785, 6786.—Every class of persons connected with the City, from the highest to the lowest, make use of the school. The intention is that it should be purely a republic of letters, and that all who pay for their education shall be admitted, 6787.—There is no distinction made in the payments between the children of liverymen and others. The only privilege is, that the first vacancies are taken by liverymen, 6788.—States the general system of education, 6789, 6790.—When a youth has gone through this education he is fit to enter at the universities. The bulk of the boys go into business in the City, but some go to the universities, 6791, 6792.—Does not think any connection could be established between the City school and the Gresham college, 6793, 6794.—The school occupies the site of what was Honey Lane Market. There are now about seventeen scholarships, gifts of various freemen and liverymen of the City of London, 6795, 6796.—In the City they look on the school as their own. It is answering well, and they are doing all they can for it. Its management is vested in a ward committee, 6797.—Boys are admissible to this school without distinction of religious persuasion, 6798.—Under the Act of Parliament the authorized version of the Scriptures is to be read and taught every day. The school is opened and closed with a form of prayer, which is abridged from the liturgy of the Church of England. Has given the Act of Parliament a most liberal interpretation, with the entire sanction of the Court of Common Council. Irish Roman Catholics and Jewish lads are allowed to come in after prayers and leave before prayers. They attend during the reading of the Scriptures in the classes. Have great numbers of English and foreign Roman Catholics, but they never made any objection to attend during prayers. There are Dissenters of all denominations, as many as Church people, 6799, 6800.—Any master may take a boarder who pleases. The only other large school which is directly in connection with the corporation is one now being formed for the orphans of freemen and liverymen, which is something on the model of Christ's Hospital. At that school they are all to be boarded, 6801.—It is rather in the nature of a charity, it is exclusively for the orphans of liverymen and freemen, 6802, 6803.—Has nothing to do with it further than that he was one of the three referees to select the candidates, 6804.—The funds which arise from payments for taking out freedoms are applied to the maintenance of this school. Nothing can work better than the committee always has done, 6805.—After a certain time the boys separate, either to take rather more to the commercial or to go on with a strictly classical or mathematical education. In the Latin class book-keeping is much attended to; nearly all the boys learn German. If they pass into the Greek and strictly mathematical class, they go on with pure mathematics, 6806.—Nearly all, if they remain long enough, receive the classical education, 6807.—The 8*l.* 5*s.* a year which is required from a boy includes everything taught in the school except chemistry and drawing. These are self-supporting classes. The corporation has nothing to do with the government of Christ's Hospital. It is governed by a Court of Almoners, which is selected from the governors, and they are a self-elected body, filling their own vacancies. Believes the number of the court to be forty, 6808, 6809.—Now there are only two aldermen upon the Court of Almoners; they are taken from those governors who pay the most attention to Christ's Hospital, 6810.—The Court of Governors is a very fluctuating body. The Court of Almoners really govern Christ's Hospital, and fill up vacancies by their own vote. Delivers in a prospectus of the school which contains its rules and a statement of its scholarships and prizes, 6811.

MUNICIPALITIES:

Divisions of, Hankey, 1723, 1724.—It would be desirable that Marylebone, St. Pancras, and Paddington should form separate municipalities, D'Iffanger, 2289.

Municipal Act.—Having relieved the corporation of those important functions which ought to belong to the imperial authority only, submits that, for all the rest, the City of London should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Municipal Act, Elliot, 1090.—Is not prepared to extend the Municipal Act to Finsbury, Southwark, &c. till the practical result of an improved municipality has been seen in the City, ib. 1126.

Expenditure.—The expenditure for 1852 for municipal purposes amounted to a tax of 5*s.* in the pound, ib. 1095.—Of the money so expended, about 146,000*l.* was derived from the City rents, tolls, &c., and about 120,000*l.* was raised by rates, ib. 1096.

Government.—Gives outline of new scheme for the City, Acland, 585.—Statement of the best system for the City of London, Hankey, 1718.

Institutions.—Does not think it desirable to abolish all. Would certainly abolish the present corporation, Bateman, 2345.

Franchise.—Believes, previous to the 11th of George I. a register was always made up in the wardmote by the aldermen; it was a public register, and all men were commanded under a fine to attend the wardmote when held; they were required to come and take the franchise as citizens, and they become enrolled in the wardmote. Thinks, were that system to be carried out, nothing could be better, Lord Mayor, 7187.—Recommends the municipal franchise to be, the occupation of premises within the City of London for 12 months and a day, without any pecuniary qualification, and without the necessity of residence, ib. 7189, 7190.—Thinks they should be rated at some rate, ib. 7191.—Thinks if a person is to lose his parliamentry elective franchise, by removing seven miles from the City of London, he ought to be exempted from the disagreeable duties of such citizenship, Mills, 1020.

Reform Act.—Cannot say whether any difference has taken place in the magisterial functions since the passing of it, Hubbard, 649.—Thinks to apply this Act to the City of London would be absurd, but sees no objection to its being applied with certain alterations, Bennoch, 1181.

Reform Bill.—Would wish to see the general provisions of the Bill applied to the City of London. The suggestions of Mr. Acland for an improved system of municipal government have met with favour in the City, Morley, 2155.—Looks upon it as one of the most unconstitutional acts that ever was done in this country, Merewether, 4734.

Reform of the Corporation.—It has been represented that there was a society for the municipal reform of the corporation. Only 1,200 have entered this society out of 125,000 returned as the population of the City, ib. 6773.—The number of householders in 1844 was 13,958, ib. 6774.

NEWGATE:

The salaries at Newgate are enormously large. They amount to 3,953*l.* annually, besides fees and emoluments. They are fixed by the Court of Aldermen. The keeper has 700*l.* a year, with emoluments to the amount of 35*l.* 14*s.* The chaplain has 500*l.* with other emoluments, Williams, 2391, 2392.

(See also Prisons.)

NEWGATE CALENDAR:

The corporation pay about 900*l.* a year for the printing of the newgate calendar, containing a report of the proceedings of the sessions, Pearson, 8466.

NEWSPAPERS:

The press was never bribed. About 160*l.* or 180*l.* a year has been spent in buying and distributing newspapers. This appeared in the accounts, Wood, 7260-7262.—The consolidated committee have purchased newspapers 300 at a time continually, according to their own admission; they have in their financial report an entry of 1,000*l.* under this heading: "To Mr. Hallkeeper," (who is avowedly the person who has dealt with the transaction of the newspapers,) on account of disbursements of his office, consisting of expenses of assistants, watchmen, newspapers, &c., in the year 1852; and several smaller sums to the same individual, including 100*l.* under the head of advertising. There is the same entry from 1849 to 1852, Acland, 445.

NORRIS, JOHN THOMAS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a builder in the ward of Aldersgate; has been a member of the consolidated committee of the common council for 17 years, 4196–4200.—Was a member at the time an arrangement was made between the corporation and the press, 4201.—A feeling prevailed in the corporation that their reports were not given so much in extenso as they should be, and thinks that the common council agreed that the committee have authority to expend not exceeding 1,000*l.* a year in the promotion of more extensive reports of their proceedings, 4202.—This was in the year 1849, 4203.—Thinks the committee considered it an authority to expend the money in any way their direction suggested, 4204.—Is imperfectly informed as to how the money was spent, but thinks there was a sub-committee of three or five, of which he was not a member, who had the conduct of the matter, 4205.—There were two or three projects afloat for starting a paper devoted to the interests of the corporation, but the committee was too large (being composed of 45 or 46 members) to allow of any secret treating. It was imperfectly done for a short period in a paper called the Citizen, 4206.—Would have felt himself justified in voting away the money in any way he pleased in promoting reports in favour of the corporation, 4207.—Does not remember whether actually any of the money was spent in an attempt to get up a newspaper, or in supporting the newspaper mentioned. Mr. Scott, the then clerk of the chamberlain, could give information, 4208.—He was the officer of the sub-committee, 4209.—Witness is well acquainted with the committee system of the common council, 4210.—Generally the committeemen are well acquainted with the subject committed to them, 4211.—Has not given much attention to the finance of the corporation, 4212.—Thinks the division of wards, by which the common councillors are elected, neither fair nor reasonable. Statements as to wards, 4213.—Some charity property or local interest might render it desirable to retain the distinction of wards; but would divide the City into 12 electoral districts, and distribute the representation upon the basis of that which now exists in the ward of Farringdon Without. Thinks the present common council much too large, as it consists, with the aldermen, of 232 persons, 4214.—There should be about 100, 4215.—The common council has, under the charter of Richard II., the power of making byelaws for its own internal regulation, and of levying tolls upon the public. Recommends that the magisterial and municipal functions of the aldermen should be separate; they take very little interest in their municipal duties; they are justices appointed for life, and claim, as a separate court, the privilege of dealing with the funds, which they do to a large extent, 4216.—Some public convenience might arise were the magisterial functions of the aldermen to cease.—Thinks it quite essential that the persons who deal with the municipal funds should be responsible to those who pay the rates which they administer, 4217.—The power which the Court of Aldermen possess of voting sums out of the corporation purse should cease, 4218.—Is not prepared to abolish the Court of Aldermen altogether as a separate court, but would withdraw the condition of justice of the peace from every alderman who has not passed the chair, 4219.—Concedes it to the earnestness with which the aldermen claim the distinction of administering justice. Having already suggested that the City should be divided into twelve wards, thinks that half might be supposed to have passed the chair, and those who have not should be subject to periodical election. At present the liverymen return two persons to the Court of Aldermen, who select one of the two, which power should be in the hands of the electors, and not the aldermen, 4220.—Any alderman who has not passed the chair should not be elected for life, 4221.—But, once having passed the chair, he should be an alderman for life and a magistrate, 4222.—If the corporation of London exists at all, it should be sustained by a very extensive constituency; there is only about one in three of the persons who are rated in the City at exceeding 10*l.* who has the power of voting at municipal elections, 4223.—Thinks the municipal franchise which is adopted in other boroughs would work well in the City. Would like to see all the City elections handed over to a constituency appointed under an Act of Parliament, 4224.—Were ward and common hall elections, and nine tenths of the rights and privileges of the corporation done away with, it would be a great advantage. were all done away with but what would serve the public interest the corporation would be distinguished for its usefulness, 4225.—There would be great advantage from such a simplification; at present it is almost impossible for any trader to make himself acquainted with the rights of the corporation; and if any man of sound discretion falls into difficulty, he yields to the enormous power of the corporation rather than litigate any case in which the mulct is large to him and obnoxious to trade, 4226.—The patronage of the corporation, in regard to the more important offices, has been exercised with considerable prudence. Has been an advocate for paying the officers well; the corporation have invited men of the highest class by their large salaries, and have therefore had security for the efficient discharge of the duties entrusted to them, 4227.—The personal and official conduct of the higher officers has been distinguished by integrity and ability. There are several offices which might be united together, and so much expense might be saved, 4228.—

From the number of officers, the change in committees, and the committeemen knowing so little of their business, much time is lost, and many more clerks and officers employed than are wanted, 4229.—Witness is acquainted with the working of the committees of common council, 4230.—Thinks it would be desirable to discontinue the practice of remunerating committeemen by making them an allowance for dinners; but the custom of providing dinners increases the attendance at the committees, 4231–4233.—Witness took considerable part in the question of the removal of Smithfield market, 4234.—Is not aware of the secret proceedings of the corporation with regard to the removal of that market, being opposed to them; but is sure, that during the conflict with the Government, on that and on all occasions, there was a lavish expenditure. Is sure the corporation spent money in a secret way, on which Mr. Benjamin Scott can give information. There was a committee called the Central Market Association, who were mostly interested in the continuance of the market, who gave subscriptions to get popular men on their side, but witness is sure that all they subscribed would be spent in one day, while the conflict lasted some months, 4235.—Cannot say from which of the corporation's various sources of income the money was abstracted, 4236.—The society must have spent at least ten times its amount of subscriptions; but its most active men were constantly at Guildhall, in the presence of Mr. Scott, and the City solicitor, and witness believes they walked out with money once a week to a very large extent. Thinks the corporation paid all expenses of that sort in a very illegitimate way, 4237.—It is the usage of the town clerk to deny to one committee the privilege of looking into the doings of another committee. The doings in regard to the market would, consequently, be kept secret from witness, 4238.—It is the duty and privilege of every member of the common council to make himself acquainted with the expenditure of the City to a certain extent, 4239.—If witness suspected that a large sum had been spent in an irregular manner it would have been in his power to move for the items, but in this instance there would have been no chance of carrying it, 4240.—Such irregular expenses would have been accounted for under some general head of expenses of opposition to the bill, 4241.—This implies a vague and loose way of rendering accounts on the part of the City, 4242.—Witness has nothing else to mention but the extreme disproportion of the wards taking the rating only, 4243.—Thinks it would be objectionable that the lord mayor should be eligible from the whole body of citizens, as he would then have had no previous education for the presidency of the municipality, 4244.—The present system has the effect of excluding many who might, under the new system, come in and be elected, and do great service to the corporation, 4245.

Nuisances, Inspectors of:

There are six inspectors of nuisances under the Commission; they are inspectors of pavements they take charge of the scavenging and dusting, and have the general superintendence of the public ways, Haywood, 5962.

Officers of the City:

Should be elected by the common councilmen, subject to revision by Court of Lieutenancy and Lord Lieutenant, Wallis, 1470.

Officers of the Corporation:

Should say that the fees and emoluments to, amount fully to 120,000*l.*, Hickson, 2710.—The officers are much too numerous. Would consolidate many of the offices, abolish some, and so save about 14,000*l.* per annum, Lord Mayor, 7161.—Does not consider they are overpaid, Dakin, 7369.—In the election of City officers efficiency is looked to, not undue partiality, ib. 7372, 7373.

Officer of Health:

Acts under the Commission of Sewers. His duties. Details of the work from week to week, Simon, 7395–7405.—The salary was 500*l.* a year, but has been raised to 800*l.*, ib. 7393, 7394.

Offices of the Corporation:—

offices, but they are doing all in their power to bring up into their own hands those offices which heretofore were saleable, Merewether, 6760.—Return of the thirty offices of the corporation which have been sold, ib. 7569.—With respect to the offices in the corporation, they have been in the habit, whenever a vacancy occurs, of inquiring into the nature of the office, the amount of salary, and all the circumstances connected with it. Gives statement of all those inquired into since 1829, many of them more than once, as fresh vacancies have occurred, making altogether 87 reports, ib. 7572. —Mr. John Barnard brought in the celebrated Act of Common Council, which took from the lord mayor and sheriffs the sale of places, and obtained for the corporation the revenues derived from the metage of coal and corn, Pearson, 8476.—Refers to a paragraph in the report of the Commissioners of 1836, which coincides with his own opinion as to the feeling which influences the higher classes of merchants to avoid corporation offices, Blake, 7484.

Offor, George, jun., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a broker, partner in the firm of Offor and Gamman. 2869, 2870.—Calls attention to the fact that the body to which he belongs, the ship and insurance brokers of London, are taxed by the City to the extent of 5*l.* individually each member of a firm, for carrying on the business of ship and insurance brokers. The corporation require the insurance brokers to pay this tax, and it is not only unjust and anomalous in its workings, but it is also illegal, the question having been decided in a court of law that the corporation of the City have no claim upon the ship and insurance brokers. When about to succeed to a long established business, where the principal had been in the habit of paying this broker's rent, he attended at the town clerk's office to get the name struck off the list of sworn brokers, and said he was about to succeed him in business. They said, "Then before you can commence your business you must take up your freedom, and apply to the Court of Aldermen to be admitted as a sworn broker," 2871.—This took place in December, 1849, Was accordingly admitted; executed a bond; received a silver medal, and paid 6*l.* or 7*l.* in the shape of fees, and since that time has paid 5*l.* a year rent. In the Post Office Directory there are about 200 ship and insurance brokers, who call themselves brokers, and out of that number only 53 are sworn brokers. Thinks it extremely unjust that he and others should be called upon to pay a tax of 5*l.*, when the great majority of brokers are let off altogether, or equally unjust if the City have no power to enforce it. The City have no legal claim and they never attempt to enforce it where it is not willingly paid, 2872, 2873.—The reason witness has not refused to pay it is that he has given two securities to the City for the due payment of the 5*l.* a year, 2874, 2875.—Believes that the corporation has never taken any measure to compel the payment, but if you were to apply at the town clerk's office, and say, "Am I, as a ship and insurance broker, carrying on no other business liable to the 5*l.* tax?" they would answer distinctly "Yes, and you cannot carry on your business without, and if you will lodge an information against any one who is carrying on business not admitted and sworn we will commence proceedings." Witness immediately lodged an information against his partner, whom he said had not paid for the last two years, and never intended to pay, 2876.—Finds that several old brokers who were admitted many years ago have ceased to be sworn brokers. They carry on business, but no longer pay the broker's tax, 2877.—The only thing the City require before you become a sworn broker is a certificate, signed by six or seven householders of the City, that you are a fit and proper person, 2878.—Does not think that the certificate affords any security for the fitness and respectability of the person sworn. 2879.—The public do not give the least preference to sworn brokers over others, 2880.—Ascertained at the town clerk's office, that though admitted as a ship and insurance broker, you have full power to act as a stock and sharebroker, or having been admitted as a stock and sharebroker you may act as a ship broker, 2881.

Old Bailey:

Practicably, the trials in the City are always there. Knows of no other criminal court, Acland, 484, 485.—Money taken for admission to the gallery, sanctioned by the corporation, ib. 492–500.—Statement as to Payne, Mr. George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is police receiver, 6659.—Explains the duties of the office, 6660.—Is appointed by the Police Committee; the salary is 350*l.* a year, 6662.—Has held the office of police receiver since the year 1841, 6663.—The assessment upon which the rate is founded is made in each ward by the alderman, deputies, and common councilmen of the ward, 6664.—The different assessments are put together, so as to constitute one assessment; it is not made up quite to the full value of the rental, 6666. —The assessment in the City is as high in relation to the annual value as the assessment in the rest of the metropolis. It is continually changing from year to year, and generally on the increase, 6669.—Reads a statement made by Mr. Elliott at question 1087, 6670. —If men are employed at a distance or on another service, the ratepayers must pay for duties which are not done within their district, 6671.—With regard to the collections, is prepared to show that the Police Committee have the whole matter completely under their control. Has annually to make a report to the Police Committee of the state of these things. Witness delivers in last report, 6673.

Payne, William, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is coroner for the City and Borough of Southwark. Was appointed by the Court of Common Council, 6812 6813. —The appointment is for life, though it is called annual. Some time since the corporation made an order that all officers should be elected annually, 6814, 6815. —It is really a freehold office. The Court of Queen's Bench have so decided, and that a man cannot be displaced without a sufficient cause, 6817, 6818.—The duties are to hold inquests in cases of violent death. Holds inquests in Southwark, as well as in London. There is no other coroner in Southwark, 6819–6821.—Witness's fees and the expenses of the office are paid out of the corporation funds, 6822.—Believes the fund is called the City's cash, 6823.—The emoluments of the office amount to about 500*l.*; it does not vary much, 6824. —It depends upon the number of inquests, 6825.

Payne, William, Esq. (Second Examination.)—Mr. Pulling in his evidence states that the lord mayor is the coroner, and the gentleman who performs the duties is only his deputy, and is appointed by the Court of Aldermen. This is a mistake, because the charter of Edward IV., which gives the office to the City, says the mayor, commonalty and citizens, may appoint whom they will to the office, and the statute regarding elections in London confirms the appointment in the Court of Common Council. Some questions having been put to witness regarding the tenure of his appointment, begs to state that the corporation have admitted the principle that judicial officers shall not be annually appointed, therefore, as the coroner is a magistrate by virtue of his office, and also a judge of a Court of Record, presumes that a coroner is not an annual officer and cannot be displaced without sufficient cause. Mr. Justice Patteson and Mr. Justice Coleridge express the same opinion in the case the Queen against Grimshaw, reported in the 11th Jurist, 16th Law Journal, and 10th Queen's Bench Reports. The report of that case in the year 1847 is quite decisive upon the subject, 7563.—Mr. Acland states, "The constables have to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* for being sworn in at the Courts Leet, but have no duties to perform." When appointed high steward of Southwark suspended the election of constables, ale-tasters, and flesh-tasters, consequently there is no fee for swearing them in, 7564.—The alteration took place about three years ago, 7565.—These officers had no remuneration, 7566.—Perhaps centuries ago, when the market there required to be supervised, they might go round and see that the food sold was proper. But recently they had no duties and no emoluments, 7567, 7568.

PEARSON, CHARLES, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been solicitor to the City of London for 15 years, 5516, 5517.—The salary is 2,000*l.* a year, subject to the charges of the office, clerks, &c., deducting about 700*l.* a year; but there are certain emoluments which make up a net income of 1,700*l.* or 1,750*l.* a year, 5518-5520.—These emoluments depend upon the amount of business, 5521, 5522.—Every description of emolument received does not exceed 1,750*l.* a year, 5523, 5524.—Is not permitted to have any private business as a solicitor. Is solicitor to the Irish Society and an attorney in the Mayor's Court; but every description of emolument is included in the sum named, 5525.—If acting as an ordinary solicitor his emoluments would certainly be from 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* a year. His bills for business under the trustees' estates are taxed by the Law Bills Committee. There is much greater severity applied in taxation by the Law Bills Committee than by the ordinary taxing officers. Gives an instance of this, 5526.—The functions and duties of the solicitor to the City of London are to advise the corporation and all its committees and commissions upon any question of law, to conduct all their suits and prosecutions, and generally to advise upon all matters when especially called on so to do; to attend committees whenever called on, and to give his best advice upon all matters upon which his opinion may be asked, 5527.—When conducting a suit on behalf of the City, receives deductions from the Court of Common Council through the committee, and is in constant communication upon all matters connected with the suit, 5528.—One committee is composed of professional men, which is the Law Bills Committee. There is scarcely a committee of the corporation which has not one solicitor or more upon it, 5529.—There is no one legal officer who takes the general control of the legal business. Before the passing of the Central Criminal Court Act, the recorder and the common sergeant appeared in court as counsel for the City; latterly they have been so entirely withdrawn from general practice that they have declined to take briefs. The late recorder thought it was not for the advantage of the City that he should take a leading part in the conduct of its suits, 5530.—Thinks the judicial and other duties of the recorder would now render it impossible for him to exercise a general control of that description, 5531.—At present the discretion whether a suit should be instituted practically rests with counsel. Is instructed to lay a case before counsel of the most eminent rank, and it is upon their advice, with the concurrence frequently of the recorder, that suits are instituted or defended, 5534.—The opinion of the attorney or solicitor-general would be given upon the probability of the result; the responsibility rests with the corporation, 5535.—The town clerk, who is a very experienced barrister, is called on by the committee to express an opinion as to the advisability of instituting a suit, 5536, 5537.—He is not a member of the committee, 5538.—Witness considers himself responsible for the business rather than the town clerk, 5539.—Thinks the policy of instituting a proceeding belongs to the committee, 5540.—The judgment of the committee is generally very good, and that the advice of their officers is generally cautious, sound, and prudent, 5541.—The case which is submitted to counsel is prepared by the witness and read to the committee, 5542.—Has no doubt counsel would be a good deal guided by the nature of the case submitted to them, 5543.—When a member of the corporation in 1833, witness brought in a bill, and passed an act through the Court to gradually reduce and ultimately abolish, if it was thought necessary, the fellowship of porters. There were then 3,500 porters admitted, and Messrs. Combe and Co. and some other persons had begun to refuse to allow them to work. This Act has been in operation ever since, and has left only something like 600 or 700, who would have to be compensated if an end were put to it. In October, 1835, the fellowship applied to the corporation to permit them to use their name to institute proceedings against Messrs. Combe for refusing to allow them to land their corn. Messrs. Combe filed a cross bill for a discovery; the answer of the corporation was put in on the 18th of June, 1839. Messrs. Combe and Co. amended their bill, not having put their questions sufficiently strongly, or perhaps getting information from the answer which induced them to put others. The corporation answered that amended bill in February, 1840. There was a motion made before Lord Abinger to compel the corporation to produce their title. Lord Abinger refused the discovery sought in this case, but ordered certain documents to be produced. The other party applied to Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce on the 19th of January, 1842, who settled the issues for the trial at law, and ordered it to be tried at the Winchester assizes, 5544.—That case might have been decided in the spring of 1842 if Messrs. Combe and Company had chosen to go to trial upon the issues framed between the parties by the direction of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce; but in the meantime, the corporation in 1839 had filed a bill in the Exchequer against Messrs. Combe and Co., in respect of metage. It was the opinion of counsel, in the porterage case, that the corporation ought not to appear merely as plaintiffs in that suit, but should have a sister suit for metage. Various proceedings took place between that period and 1842, when on the 9th of June Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce pronounced a decision different to that of Lord Abinger, 5545.—In those various proceedings three successive bills of discovery were filed against the City, and three answers put in, 5546.—Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce having pronounced this judgment, an appeal to the lord chancellor was lodged; it was heard before the lord chancellor on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 30th of January, 1843.—The lord chancellor took three years to consider his judgment from the 30th of January, 1843, to January, 1846. He then pronounced a judgment so exceedingly short that it contained no reason and no statement of opinion beyond affirming the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, 5547.—Sir Richard Bethell, who advised upon the occasion, recommended an appeal. Reads his reasons from the case in the House of Lords. The appeal was recommended to the City by Mr. Bethell, upon the same grounds as those stated to the House of Lords, 5548–5551.—The bill of discovery in the metage suit was filed in March, 1840; the answer was put in on the 29th of January, 1841; exceptions were taken to the answer of the corporation on the 24th of March; the bill of discovery was amended on the 17th of April; the further answer of the corporation was on the 17th of November; the exceptions to the answer of the corporation on the 29th of November; and the further answer on the 23d of February; the necessity for those further answers arose once from the amendment of the bill, and twice from exceptions. The party excepting meant to allege that the information furnished did not technically cover the statement in the bill. It was an objection to the answer in the nature of a demurrer at common law, whereas the amendment of the bill proceeds upon the supposition that the answer was sufficient as the bill originally stood, but that something had suggested itself to those who framed the bill, which was not included in the original bill, 5552–5556.—Thinks Messrs. Combe and Co. are saving 700*l.* or 800*l.* a year, which they would have to pay if a decision were given against them. If the corporation got a decision they would obtain a privilege which they have no disposition to use, for during this time they have been in negociation with the corn trade to put an end to all such claims. Thinks that if any one would enter a stet processus they would be satisfied on both sides. Pendente lite those claims are not enforced against Messrs. Combe and Co., 5557, 5558.—If the action is not insisted on, the claim remains in abeyance, 5559.—Upon an appeal to the House of Lords does not consider it the duty of either appellants or respondents to press forward the cause, but either can do so, 5560–5562.—Supposed the appeal had dropped; but when a late lord chancellor was appointed, in consequence of some discussion in regard to arrears, the archives of the House of Lords were swept. This case was found among others; it was put in the paper two years ago, and counsel had to be retained to argue it; but it

slipped out of the paper in some way, 5563–5565.—There is a negociation now pending, and has been for the last 18 months, with the members of the corn trade for putting the metage question on a more satisfactory footing, part of the arrangement being that in cases like that of Messrs. Combe it should be left voluntary, and not be compulsory, 5566.—The proposed arrangements with the heads of the trade is that in regard to foreign corn it shall be compulsory; in regard to other portions of trade, for instance manufactured articles, it shall be voluntary, 5567, 5568.—The porterage case stands over on the application of Messrs. Combe and Co. till the other suit is decided, 5569, 5570.—There is a struggle between the Crown and the corporation to determine whether the soil and bed of the river is part of the hereditary revenue of the Crown, to be applied for the purposes of the Crown, or whether it is the property of the corporation, to be applied for the purposes of the river. Statement as to the manner in which the transaction arose, 5571, 5572.—The City alleged their title to the soil and bed of the river to be something quite independent of their title as conservators, 5573.—Believes the two things are frequently separate in other rivers, 5574.—Thinks it is of importance for public purposes that the two rights should be exercised by the same party, because there are some acts of conservancy that cannot be efficiently carried out where the soil is in the hands of other persons, 5575.—The City claims the ownership of the soil by prescription, confirmed by charter, 5576.—Believes that there are other instances of tidal harbours and navigable rivers where the ownership of the soil is not in the hands of the Crown. Serjeant Merewether denies that the Crown by prerogative right is entitled to the soil and bed of navigable rivers. Is conducting this case according to the received doctrines of Westminster Hall, one of which doctrines would be, that even if it were true that the Crown by prerogative right was entitled to the soil and bed of all navigable rivers, still it may have been taken out of the Crown before the time of legal memory, by some sufficient legal act, and if it can be shown that the corporation have it by prescription that would be a title, notwithstanding the rule of law might be correctly stated in the bill, 5577.—This right would be established by the ordinary mode by which prescription is proved, 5578.—It was alleged as a hardship that the Crown assumed, as the foundation of its proceedings, that the property belonged to it, and then tell the corporation to say by what means they say it belongs to them, 5579.—If the Crown had, by writ of intrusion, or by any other course, come in by the strength of its own title, it would have been a question for the court whether such a legal presumption could be fairly made, 5580.—The writ of intrusion would necessarily proceed upon the supposition that the corporation were in actual possession of the soil, 5581.—Gathers from the proceedings which have taken place that the Crown say:—You are in possession, but you are in possession because you have obtained that possession in your character of trustee or conservator for the Crown, and these are acts which are equivocal, and might be assigned either to the ownership of the soil, and to your position as conservators. The Crown say, those acts are done under the power of conservancy; the corporation say that they are evidence of their ownership, and that those are questions which ought to be tried in the ordinary course, 5582.—In what he (witness) has stated with respect to the hardship has only been echoing the expressions which some of the greatest men have applied to this suit, 5583.—The oldest charters recognizing the right of the City to the ownership of the soil are the charter of Henry III., which says that the corporation shall have all rights by land and water, and the charter of Henry VI., which recognizes the right of the corporation to all common soils in the City of London, and the water of the Thames within the franchises of the City. The franchise of the City, as can be shown by contemporaneous history and by documents, extended from Staines to Yantlet, and was represented in the immemorial rights of conservancy. Holds that their conservancy is of two characters; they have the prescriptive conservancy from Staines to Yantlet, and they have a conservancy by charter, and commission from the Crown; that is the conservancy of certain statutes within the River Thames, 5584, 5585.—The second kind of conservancy does not go to the extent of the ownership of the soil. Contends that the ownership of the soil is a prescriptive right, 5586.—Thinks the moral and perhaps the legal duty is to apply all the funds derived from the soil and bed of the river to the purposes of the conservancy. The doctrine upon which the corporation have proceeded is, that they are bound to apply every shilling obtained in the one capacity to the public purposes of the other, 5587.—Besides the prescriptive right of conservancy enjoyed by the City, there are certain conservancy rights and duties imposed upon the City by statute. Refers to fisheries and removing weirs in ancient times. They being at one time probably the only obstructions, those words were used, constituting the lord mayor of London conservator of those statutes for the river Thames, and appointing certain magistrates conservators of the Ouse and other rivers, 5588.—These statutes probably imposed an obligation to remove those obstructions, 5589.—In all the charters and passages referred to there is no clear and unambiguous reference to the ownership of the soil, or there would not have been this suit, 5590.—The fact of its being a prescriptive right implies that you have no other definite legal origin. If you had a charter or Act of Parliament you would not fall back upon prescription, 5591.—According to the view of the City the ownership of the soil of the Thames is a prescriptive right, proved by successive acts of ownership of dealing with the bed of the Thames, as an owner would deal with it. Those charters construed with contemporaneous history show that the Crown recognized the right of the corporation at that time. The same is the case with all prescriptions; the fact of a prescription presumes either a lost charter or a lost Act of Parliament, or some other legal origin, of a right that we are not able to produce, 5592.—The prescription would be bad if, upon the face of it, it appeared incapable of being referred to some such legal origin, 5593.—Thinks the interest of the City and the interests of the metropolis are identical, 5594.—There is no object so important for the benefit of the whole population as that the streets should be improved, and the City be improved by that means, 5595.—The 4*d.* duty on coals is levied on the whole metropolis, and a considerable district round, but is claimed by the City as a possession in perpetuity, to be expended at their sole discretion, 5596.—The interests of those who pay the tax, and the constituents of the City are inseparable, 5597, 5598.—There is a growing feeling that all the public revenues, such as the 4*d.* duty should be strictly applied to public objects of all kinds, 5599.—The corporation being composed of individuals there are all descriptions of opinions, but thinks they are fast arriving at that period in which the majority will be of opinion that the produce of public tolls and dues should be strictly dedicated to public purposes, in which the metropolis generally will have an interest. With respect to the City it is nearly 200 years since the mass of it was erected; the streets are narrow, and it is extremely desirable to have convenient main arteries of approach to the Royal Exchange, and so on. Two millions of money are required to carry out the improvements which the corporation have under their contemplation, 5,600.—In former times it was the City for the citizens; the feeling is now growing up that the City is for the world, 5601.—Believes that Cannon Street is an evidence of this, 5602.—Thinks the corporation in deciding with regard to the opposition to be offered to a private bill in Parliament would consider their first duty to be to their constituents, but does not think they would permit that feeling to operate to an extent to prejudice other interests, 5603.—With regard to the freedoms and position of St. Thomas's Hospital, confirms the accuracy of the statement contained in the written document read by the recorder. Was a member of the corporation, and took part in all those proceedings for diminishing the charge upon freedoms, and removing the obstacles to inhabitants obtaining them. The charge of 25*l.* which was put on in 1729, was put on for the purpose of enabling them to pay the debts of the corporation. At that time the corporation was in a most embarrassed state. In 1830 or 1832 a proposal was made for reducing the charge, to encourage the extension of the constituency. The difficulty experienced arose from the fact that those who had purchased their freedom, and paid for their admission to the livery, thought they had acquired a sort of vested interest in an exclusive right. The proposal of the corporation, therefore, was to repay to those who had been admitted within two years a portion of the sum which they had paid. It has been assumed that the actions which have been brought against persons for not being free were brought

for the purpose of putting money into the coffers of the corporation. Has no hesitation in saying the only purpose was to endeavour to increase the constituency of the corporation, and that it was no part of the object of the corporation to increase their revenue. Various actions were brought—one against Mr. Sturt. That was brought for the purpose of trying the question in the least expensive and the least inconvenient form. Mr. Sturt was a personal friend of witness's. Attended a meeting of the opponents to the City, at Mr. Sturt's house; he was in the chair, and the subject therefore was very fully discussed in the most amicable form, 5604.—Does not think that Mr. Sturt was at that time a partner in the same concern as Messrs. Ward and Co. There was the firm of Sturt and Sharp, and of Ward and Britton, but thinks one of the partners in Sturt's house has since died, and one of the partner's in Ward's house, and Mr. Sturt is now a partner in both, 5605.—Read at the time the evidence given by Mr. Henry Grey, 5608.—About one hundred years ago, in making arrangements with the sheriffs, the estreats were set over to the sheriffs as a part of their income. The sum mentioned by Mr. Grey would go for that purpose. Thinks it may have amounted in the last 20 years to an average of 60*l.* a year, or something of that kind. The whole receipts for the last ten years certainly have not amounted to 100*l.* a year, 5609.—No account has ever been rendered of those receipts; the sheriffs do not render any account of their receipts, 5610.—Was under sheriff at the time of the former enquiry into the City of London. Received the amount of those estreats by arrangement with the sheriff, who was a very liberal man, 5611, 5612.—Has no doubt that it was the case that this poor man made an application to have his money, and was refused, 5614.—Does not think that it is a matter of course that the Treasury hand over estreats under such circumstances, 5615.—This is a not convenient way of remunerating the sheriffs, 5616.—This man took upon himself the office of public prosecutor, it being, however, a private wrong of his own, 5618.—Thinks the corporation supported him. Believes that a committee of the corporation have already sat upon the question of the sheriff's allowances, and that it is in contemplation to make the sheriffs an adequate remuneration by a money payment, 5619.—Supposing the sheriffs were remunerated by a sum of money, engaged on the part of the City to be paid them instead of having fees, estreated recognizances would go to the City, 5622.—Under such circumstances any person situated as Mr. Grey was, would have to petition the City, 5623.—It would be a matter of grace if they gave the money. The money does not, as a matter of necessity, go to the sheriffs; the corporation, though they allow them to receive it, retain in their hands the power of diverting it. When it is a small sum, 50*l.* or 100*l.*, they do not exercise the right, but in Moseley Wolfe's case 10,000*l.* was the amount of the fine, and in that case the corporation paid the solicitors something like 1,500*l.* to one, 700*l.* or 800*l.* to another, and they gave the sheriffs only 1,000*l.* out of that money, 5624.—Billingsgate market is by statute free, except certain tolls, which are imposed in accordance with the schedule; but though a free market, a person is not exempt from the payment of stallage, 5626.—The demand upon the factors in Billingsgate market rests upon prescription, 5627.—Thinks the declaration of its being a free market is not at variance with that prescription. Though the corporation have laid out 30,000*l.* upon the erection of that market does not feel that they could increase the price of the stallage to indemnify themselves for that outlay, 5628.—With reference to the recent proceedings for enforcing freedoms, stated that there was one person against whose property execution was issued, and the amount levied. In that case there was not only that one execution issued, but there were five others. There were six executions issued, with instructions to the officers to say to each person—This is a proceeding to enforce your taking up your freedom; if you choose to take up your freedom, the fine will be remitted and the costs also. He did state it to every one, and out of the six, five did take up their freedom, and had the fine remitted and the costs. The same statement was made to the sixth; he did not choose to comply with it; his goods were taken and were sold, the fine was levied and costs to the amount of 2*l.* He some time afterwards was summoned again to take up his freedom, and came before the chamberlain, and was then told that if he chose to take up his freedom, the money would be paid back to him. If any misconduct was practised by the officer upon executing the process he was amenable to the Lord Mayor's Court, out of which that process issued. Told the person a few days ago that he might take his money back again whenever he thought proper to obey the law, or if he chose to wait till the question was settled he could do so, 5629.—That sum having been once levied against a man for retailing without being free of the City, if he goes on to retail after that he is liable to a fresh proceeding. With respect to St. Thomas's Hospital, under the Act of Parliament 27 George 3 cap. 77, the corporation about 25 years ago passed an order requiring the governors of each hospital, when they sent up their leases to receive the seal of the corporation, to have those leases certified by two governors, being aldermen. For 20 or 25 years, or probably more, the hospitals complied with that requirement, and sent up their leases in this form. Some time ago, from some circumstances of a little unfriendly character with some of the hospitals, there was a departure from that practice, and St. Thomas's Hospital sent up a deed to be executed, with the intimation that it was not their intention any longer to comply with that requirement. The corporation referred it to the Law Bills' Committee. They had a case prepared, and submitted it to counsel. Counsel were divided in opinion; one gentleman was very strongly of opinion that it was necessary, under the wording of the clause, that two aldermen at least should sign and certify. The others were of opinion that upon the whole the balance of evidence was the other way, looking at it as a contemporaneous interpretation of the expression used in the Act. However they were all of opinion that it was a subject of some consequence, and that the corporation as trustees ought to receive the judgment of the court upon that question, 5630.—It is upon the 3d section of the Act that the question turned. Reads the section. It was thought that the Act would receive its interpretation from what could be shown to have been the practice anterior to this time. Mr. Wainwright, the most respectable solicitor on the other side, concurred with witness in agreeing to that document. They mutually submitted all documents to the inspection of each other. They went through them all, made a schedule of them, certified them, agreed them, and put them upon their affidavits, so that the facts were admitted, and then they took the opinion of the Court upon them, 5631.—They agreed to raise the question upon the return, so as not to multiply the proceedings, 5632.—The issues were not tried by a jury, 5633.—They stated a case, and took a verdict by counsel, 5634.—The case was argued, and judgment given against them, 5635.—The question is settled and determined. The corporation considered themselves as trustees for posterity, and that they ought not to relinquish an apparent right, of which they were in the exercise, unless a court of competent jurisdiction should say that the law was against them. That was the opinion of counsel, and he (witness) acted upon it, 5636.—Considerable expense was incurred, and the question now arises concerning the payment of those expenses. When the Court had pronounced its judgment, Sir Frederick Thesiger was asked about the costs by his client. He said, "Do not ask for costs." About a year after, an intimation was given that costs were asked for. Wrote a very civil letter to the solicitor on the other side, telling him how much the corporation had congratulated themselves on the friendly feeling evinced by not asking for costs; however he repeats that he must have the costs, and he (witness) has no doubt that at the next meeting of the committee the costs will be paid, 5637.—Has no doubt a charge was made to the factors in Billingsgate market before 1821, but supposing that to be the boundary period, the profits did not come to the corporation. The lord mayor and sheriffs and aldermen of one hundred years ago had sold the profits of Billingsgate market to what were called the yeomen of the waterside. The corporation bought them up, and paid them annuities or specific sums, and received the amount which they had received in the shape of stallage, 5638, 5639.—Believes those parties at that time charged and received payments analogous to the charge now made upon the factors for stallage, 5640.—Thinks that information is before the public in some general statement, 5641.—The opinion has prevailed that it was not a fixed prescriptive sum for stallage, but that it should be reasonable; the mode of interpreting the word "reasonable" being that it should have some reference to the outlay. Witness's opinion is not in conformity with that, 5643.

—Does not think an uniform sum has been charged for stallage; the committee having to deal with it have considered that that reasonable charge has had some relation to the sum expended in giving accommodation. Has been consulted upon that question since they laid out 30,000*l.* Felt it right, in the discharge of his professional duties, to say that unless counsel, should be of opinion that the amount of stallage should be increased in proportion to the increased convenience given to the parties, there was a difficulty in doing so. Has no doubt the amount has been raised on former occasions when money has been laid out. A case was prepared to be submitted to counsel. Without the countenance of his superior law officers, or some able counsel did not feel himself at liberty to sanction such a mode of dealing with it, 5644.—The office of city solicitor is so ancient that he does not practise by certificate. Practises by warrant. Ranks with the solicitor for the Treasury and the solicitors for public departments. Is recognised in the Acts of Parliament of the present day, such as the Stamp Acts. Voluntarily pays the certificate duty, but is not bound to do so, 5645.—Does not think it was ever a part of the town clerk's office, 5646.—When the committee dealt with the office of solicitor, as they do with all offices when they become vacant, the contemplated arrangement with witness would have given him upwards of 2,000*l.* a year; but the change of circumstances has added 30 per cent. to his duties, and taken very nearly 30 per cent. from his income, 5647.—Thinks there would be serious objection to doing away with fees, and paying whatever emolument it should be thought right to attach to the office by salary; it would be making the corporation participators in an attorney's gains, because the emoluments partly depend upon bills of costs, not to the corporation, but to other parties. Thinks there would be a legal objection to such an arrangement, 5648.—Witness's predecessor, who was paid by emoluments, without a salary, had a much larger income than witness ever had. Has reason to believe that his profits approached to 3,000*l.* a year, 5649.—If that should turn out to be so now, and the salary were fixed at 2,000*l.*, the other 1,000*l.* being paid over to the corporation, they would be participators in an attorney's profits, 5650.—It is contrary to the policy of the law that any person should share in the profits of a solicitor. If the solicitor of the Treasury is paid by salary, does not know what he does with those profits. In the case of the corporation of London, when they succeed in a suit, and their antagonist has to pay costs, the City solicitor receives them; and the adjustment of his salaried income is made proportionate to what they believe to be the average amount of such payments. If it were a fixed salary, thinks he could not pay those costs into the chamber, and therefore there would be a loss to the City, 5652.—Does not think there would be any objection to all the business of the solicitor, which is virtually done for the corporation, including the business done for those funds which are now kept as distinct trust funds, being done in respect of his salary, provided the fund for whose benefit those professional services were rendered should be charged a proportional part of the amount of the salary, 5653.—If an action is brought for the City Commission of Sewers, or for the commissioner of police, the expenses of that action would be charged for separately by the solicitor, 5654.—If all those cases were included, it would only be necessary to provide for the case of costs being received from opposite parties, and for such cases as that of the Irish Society, 5656.—With respect to City prosecutions, receives instructions from the lord mayor and aldermen to prosecute in various cases. States the general class of cases. It has to be applied by the individual judgment of different aldermen, who differ from each other as to the extent to which it should be carried, 5657.—In some degree performs the duties of a public prosecutor in such cases. In individual cases there is not an uniform rule observed by the aldermen; some of the aldermen have objected to such a mode of proceeding. There are valid arguments on both sides; has no hesitation in saying that a great amount of benefit has accrued to the public from it, though in theory perhaps it may be objectionable, 5658.—Is perfectly confident that good has been the result of following that course. It is an imperfect approach towards the appointment of a public prosecutor, 5659.—The statement made by Mr. Pulling, that the aldermen direct that actions brought against individual aldermen should be defended by the city solicitor, is correct; but Mr. Pulling might have added, that if it is liable to abuse, it has been so little abused, if at all, that the case which he pointedly referred to is the only case that has occurred in witness's experience, 5660.—This was an action by a person of the name of Bessell, against Aldermen Wilson, for committing a man to prison who had been brought before him. The alderman, as Lord Campbell said mistook the law, as any one else might have done. Does not recollect precisely the pinching point of the case, but knows the courts differed upon the very same Act within a very short time afterwards, 5661.—A very respectable police magistrate, now no more, who had to suffer very severely in the case of an action against him for excess of authority, as it was supposed to be, told witness that there were a lamentable number of cases in which they felt they could not act with vigour for want of some means of sustaining them, 5662.—If there were some officer of the City of legal weight and reputation responsible for proceedings of this kind, there would probably not be an indisposition to give a proper and due support to the City authorities when the occasion required it, 5663.—The case is reported to witness by the individual alderman. If it does not require immediate action he reports it to the next Court of Aldermen; if it does, takes such steps as may be required, reporting them to the next court, 5664.—Would consider himself authorised in taking the first steps upon the direction of a single alderman. 5665.—Has no hesitation in saying that this power has never been exercised capriciously or oppressively or without due judgment and discretion. Still, if it is improper and liable to abuse, it would be right to guard against it, 5666, 5667.—Dissents from nothing in the statement of Mr. Pulling that "The Court of Aldermen are the executive who exercise paternal care over the morals of the citizens of London; and, therefore when any great crime has been committed, and the parties are too poor to prosecute, the Court of Aldermen are the most efficient body to direct proceedings to be taken," 5668.—The Court of Aldermen have never interfered in political cases since witness has held his office. Has never known any body of men act with more impartiality in the administration of justice than the aldermen, 5669.—About 50 or 60 prosecutions, such as have been described, are conducted at the expense of the corporation in the course of the year. One of them being a case of conspiracy is a very difficult case to carry on, 5670, 5671.—The rule which the corporation adopt is that which the Government usually follows in instituting proceedings, that they only interfere in cases where they think private individuals will not be able to carry on the prosecution with efficiency; or to defend the police when they think they are improperly attached, or prosecute them when they think the public service requires it. They do not assume to be public prosecutors, 5672, 5673.

PEARSON, CHARLES, Esq. (Second Examination.)—With respect to the propriety of referring it to some legal officer to exercise supervision or control over legal proceedings before they are instituted, expressed himself yesterday according to first impressions. Wishes to change the opinion, and to say that such an alteration would be beneficial, and also to change the expression used when he said he thought that the recorder could not properly be such an officer, seeing that his engagements at the Central Criminal Court took him away from the focus of every-day business. Sees no objection to such functions being vested in the recorder or the town clerk, with such a town clerk as they now have. However honest the City solicitor may he in his recommendations, still, inasmuch as his income partially depends upon business, it would be impossible for him to stand before the world free from the suspicions which ordinarily fall upon men who are doing acts in which their own interests are largely involved. On the other hand has had painfully to feel the evil in an opposite direction. Has often felt that he has given feeble advice for fear of subjecting himself to such an imputation. In order to remedy the evil as much as possible, has generally in the cases which (witness) has read to the committee, cast upon the counsel the duty of expressing their opinion, not upon the question as a mere dry question of law, but as one in which they are bound to consider the position of the corporation consulting them. Within the last fortnight had occasion to consult Sir Richard Bethell and several other eminent counsel upon a point in which questions of law and equity and conveyancing were combined. That was as to the Irish

Society. Felt it right to charge counsel to give advice to the Irish Society, such as could be maintained, having regard to their moral position in the eyes of the world. Therefore the moral control which the question assumed, was in that case exercised by the counsel concerned. Is bound to say that in several cases with which he has been intrusted, it would have been a great relief if there had been some such controlling officer. If Mr. Serjeant Merewether, as town clerk, or the recorder gave a fiat for any proceeding, should be at once disembarrassed of all obligations beyond those of an attorney carrying out a case to the utmost of his ability. There are now sometimes conflicting duties which very painfully operate upon the mind, and considers that part of his salary is earned by the weight of those responsibilities, and without reference to what is the proper remuneration of the City solicitor. Thinks a deduction might very fairly be made from his salary to remunerate any officer who was charged with the deep responsibility which would belong to such a functionary, 5676.—It might be easier for the recorder, or the town clerk, or any officer who had charge of such a function to take a moral view of the case, than for the counsel who might be consulted upon it. Wrote these words at the end of the case which was read to the court of the Irish Society, and requested the governors and deputy governor, and Mr. Sheriff Wire, who is a solicitor, to attend at the consultation. "The society consider that they are placed in a different situation from other holders of property in Ireland; they have a fiduciary character; they are trustees for the public, and they have no right to compromise interests which the public have in the administration of the funds of the society. There are several public improvements in the district where the estates are situated, which the society are anxious to aid or affect, had they sufficient funds for the purpose. The society on the other hand desire to avoid litigation, unless there is a fair and reasonable ground for believing, that they have a right either to the fine or the additional rent in the case put." In the opinion of counsel, after dealing with the question as a matter of law, they say—"we think that, considering the position of the society, they are not at liberty to forbear asserting their right to this compensation;" and in case the decision which was then pending in the courts of Ireland, should be against the society, they advise an appeal to the House of Lords. This is similar to the advice which the agent had received in Ireland from the law officers of the Crown there; but, still feeling the difficulty in which he was placed, his advice was feeble. Should, probably, but for that feeling, at once under such advice have told the society—"It is a matter of law; I advise you to proceed." With respect to the metage case, calls attention to an examined copy of the judgment by the confession of the attorney-general in the reign of James the First. In the reign of James the First the Crown instituted proceedings against the corporation, challenging them to show by what title they claimed to be conservators of the river Thames, and by what title they claimed the metage and measuring of all measurable goods. The corporation set up that they had that title by prescription, and that there was an Act of Parliament in the reign of Richard II. that confirmed their title to all their rights and privileges which they then possessed. The judgment, after setting forth the pleas, proceeds thus: "It is considered by the same barons, that the aforesaid mayor, &c., and their successors may have, receive, enjoy, and use all and all manner, offices, privileges, liberties, franchises, wages, rewards, and fees aforesaid, and other the premises in their plea aforesaid, above claimed from time to time, by virtue of the aforesaid Act of Parliament; and the same mayor and commonalty and citizens aforesaid, as to the premises may so from hence quit without delay; saving always the King's right if otherwise, &c." Begs leave to refer to the case of the oyster meters. The office of the oyster meters is a purchased office of the grantee and purchaser of the office of yeoman of the waterside, sold a century ago, the oyster meters having purchased with their places the right of alienation. Two of the oyster meters, in the course of years, have died without alienating, and they have died since the time when the corporation refused to sell any office. The corporation, therefore, appointed two oyster meters, and they acted in concert with their colleagues. But the attention of the court was called by a petition to an abuse practised in Billingsgate Market, the abuse being that the holdsmen or persons engaged in the actual delivery of the oysters in heaping them up in the bushel and delivering them on deck, were in the habit of receiving gratuities from the purchaser, in a tone and manner which rendered it necessary that they should be paid. The corporation found that they were receiving from their two nominees the dry produce of the place, it being decided according to a judgment in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Layburn v. Crisp, that the fee for metage included the cost of the labour, and that the meters were bound to find labourers out of that sum. The corporation, as soon as it came to their knowledge, insisted that the legal practice, as established by that case, should be carried out, but they found that the first thing to do was to clear themselves before they proceeded to correct others; therefore, they said, we will not permit our two meters to take this money, and to hand us over only the legal fee; but we will appoint two men, who are actual holdsmen, and they shall receive the whole of the amount and take no fees from the public. A bill has been filed against those two men by the other eighteen, the oyster meters setting up a quasi corporation, entitled to a partnership division of the receipts of them all, saying to those men,—If you have been choosing to pay the holdsmen to assist you, and to work yourselves, you are fools for your pains; you shall receive only your proportionate share of the whole amount of the receipts, and you shall bring the whole amount of your receipts into the partnership division. Vice Chancellor Turner heard the case, and decided that the doctrine in Layburn v. Crisp must be maintained, and that the oyster meters ought to pay their holdsmen out of the money received. But, strange to say, the public will pay the holdsmen, and a conflict has taken place at Billingsgate, in which the corporation meters have been actually defeated, and they are compelled to receive this money; it is now before Lord Chancellor Wood, who feels that it is impossible to restrain people from paying a gratuity, if it is a gratuity, and the effect of it will be that it will lapse into its ancient state and condition; had hoped that the matter might have been arranged, and that the corporation would have been enabled upon fair terms to have bought up the places which their ancestors had sold, so as to effect a total change, 5677.—The proprietors of the oysters themselves attend, and although they petitioned the corporation to put an end to this practice, thinks that from some cause they really did not desire to break down the system. There is no effort to support the corporation in what they have done, 5678.—There are eighteen day oyster meters, and three night meters, 5680.—They affirm that they are independent, from something that dropped from Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and also from Vice Chancellor Page Wood; it would rather seem as if their impression was, that the corporation might by its power to change its customs, deal with the whole matter; but while this quasi fellowship remained, it could not deal with it in detail. They seem to imply that they did not know that the corporation might not make some superior regulations to over-ride the regulations of this partnership, 5681.—The holdsmen are nominated by the owners of the oysters and appointed by the meters. Believes a strong feeling prevails among the corporation, that those parties would be harshly dealt with if they were compelled to pay the holdsmen out of their legal fees. They having bought the office at some time, however irregularly, in all probability if they were to come to the court, the court would deal fairly with the whole transaction, 5682.—Is quite satisfied that if Mr. Gibbs had been asked if the meters who attend him cheat the sellers, being bribed by the purchasers to give over measure, he would have said, No. It was at the instance of Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Alston that the City meters were appointed, who were to refuse to receive those gratuities. It is extraordinary that the oyster sellers, if that is so, did not concur with the corporation in putting a stop to the practice. It is clear, if they concurred, they might do it. The enormous sums of money which are paid to buy those offices are quite inconsistent with the income which is attributed to them, 5683.—Thinks the compensation requisite to abolish the offices of those 21 persons would be considerable. They think there has been a strong moral feeling acting for some time upon the corporation, and that those places sooner or later will be bought up. They would not command the prices they do, unless they received more fees than they acknowledged, or unless they expected they would be bought up.

Knows some of them personally, and believes them to be very respectable men. Does not charge them, therefore, with receiving more fees. Is only putting the fact, that the price they pay for their place is very much above what anybody would seem to imagine was the fair purchase money for such a situation, 5684. —With respect to the City solicitor being paid by salary instead of by fees, stated yesterday that there were cases under which the attorney-general did receive costs. The rule laid down by Lord Cottenham, in regard to the costs of the attorney general was this: he said the attorney-general receives no costs because he pays no costs; parties to a private suit receive costs because they pay costs, but there are occasions when parties to a private suit do not pay costs, and in corresponding cases the attorney-general is entitled to receive them, because he stands upon the same footing with Her Majesty's subjects generally. In the case of over-ruling the exceptions to the answer of the City, inasmuch as the judgment below was confirmed, of course under no circumstances could costs have been claimed. The costs were given to the attorney-general, to the amount of 22*l.* If a gentleman was paid by salary instead of being paid by fees, supposing such costs to be received by him, his principal would participate in those emoluments. With respect to the case of Bessell v. Wilson, to which witness referred yesterday, when the court quashed the conviction, there was an intimation from the court that there should be no action brought, and the rule was drawn up in that form; but the parties would not accept the rule in that form. They said, "No; the court has no power to deprive us of our common law right of action; it has quashed the conviction and it may have intimated an opinion upon the subject, but we claim our right." Accordingly they brought the action, and 100*l.* damages was recovered for some fifteen hours detention. It was a strong verdict. There was no charge of misconduct against the police, but it was said that the station-house was damp. Was not in a condition at the trial to prove anything respecting it, and had to pay for the consequences of it; paid 100*l.* Probably, if there had been some comptroller over the institution or defence of actions, witness might have been sanctioned in compromising it. Is in a difficulty at this moment and wishes for some controlling power to resort to, 5685.—The comptroller is an attorney, 5686. —Witness conducts all litigated questions, both in law and equity, 5687, 5688.—The comptroller in his professional department merely manages the conveyancing business. He has an official department in which he acts as clerk to the City Lands committee, and as clerk to the Markets committee; he is comptroller of the chamber, and makes out the charge upon the chamber. Witness filled that office pro tempore during the last vacancy, 5689.—The comptroller prepares the leases, 5690.—If an action were brought upon a lease, witness would bring it, 5691.—Where any question arises upon the draft of a deed, witness is usually consulted, and if a matter that may lead to litigation, is consulted in every stage of it, 5692.—If the opinion of counsel is taken upon mere questions of title and conveyancing, it is taken by the comptroller; if it is taken upon questions of construction, it would be taken by witness preparatory to or tending to litigation either way, 5693. —The comptroller checks the receipt of money payable into the chamber, 5694.—He makes out an account of what ought to be received from the deeds of the corporation; he also makes out what is reported to be received from the markets and the Coal Exchange, and so on. Those separate officers make a return to him as well as a return to the chamberlain. In the case of the markets, he examines the accounts and puts his initials to the amount. The chamberlain recognises his initial as a voucher for him to receive a certain sum of money. Those vouchers go afterwards to a committee of the common council, of which the comptroller is the clerk, and they audit those accounts; but during the interval when it is paid into the chamber, he enters it in his own book, and it becomes a charge upon the chamberlain. At the end of the year, when the charge is made up, the total of those items is introduced as his charge upon the chamberlain, 5695.—No doubt the difference between the comptroller's account and the chamberlain's account which appears, is the amount of arrears. They check their accounts with each other at the end of the year, and there is no doubt that in the charge and discharge that is the amount, 5696.—With regard to the markets, the whole of the account is paid into the chamber. There are certain weekly payments, and so on, which are subjects of deduction; but since witness was comptroller, there has been a constant tendency in that office, and all other offices, to bring into charge the whole amount. Dr. Bowring proposed in Parliament that the government accounts should be kept in that way, and there was a resolution of the House of Commons which would have led to the government bringing everything into charge, and then discharging itself by paying it. 5690.

PEARSON, CHARLES, Esq. (Third Examination.)—In No. 6711 the question asked Mr. Gentry is: "What did the chamberlain say or do upon that statement." He said, "Two months, Mr. Gentry." The chamberlain was the late Anthony Brown, a most amiable man. Has been present on a great many occasions, and certainly a great kindness has always been manifest on each of those occasions, 6932.—Doubts whether Mr. Gentry can have made such a statement to him as he describes. Thinks the chamberlain would have felt it his duty to make a special representation. He did so often when the party pleaded poverty. The representation by the recorder was, that no unnecessary harshness had been used; but if there had been any, it would fall upon the officer. If any harshness had been used, it would fall on witness as solicitor. First sent a letter accompanying the chamberlain's summons to Mr. Gentry to take up his freedom. It was not in his usual course of duty. Heard nothing from him, placed writ of execution in the hands of the officer, and told him to say to each person, "This proceeding is taken out to increase the constituency, and not for the purpose of recovering the penalties; and if it is your pleasure to take up your freedom Mr. Pearson will relinquish his costs, and I have no doubt the committee will also relinquish the fine; but I have authority to state from the solicitor that the man will immediately be withdrawn from possession if it is your pleasure to apply to the committee." The parties applied in five out of the six cases; witness relinquished his costs, and the fines were remitted on their taking up their freedom. Mr. Gentry dared them to pursue the proceeding. The officer executed his warrant and levied the amount. Mr. Gentry was summoned again some time afterwards; he complained of the manner in which the execution had been levied and his goods taken. The officer states that the process was executed in due form of law. Has gone out of his way and sacrificed professional emoluments to avoid the imputation of hardships, 6933.—Did not learn whether Mr. Gentry received the first letter, 6934.—Has no doubt it was sent by post; he did not complain of any want of previous application, 6935.—The second summons was not proceeded with; regrets that the law allows so large an amount of expenses in such a case, 6936.—Mr. Gentry says they took a large quantity of goods and gave him no account, and then gave him back his sofa. Thinks Mr. Gore should be examined, because he is a very respectable officer, 6937.

PEARSON, CHARLES, Esq. (Fourth Examination.)—States that, as City solicitor, he has not got up any case for the corporation, because it was thought more respectful and more correct to allow the witnesses to come spontaneously, which they have done; but if there is any officer or member of the corporation whom the Commissioners would desire to have examined, he will at once present himself. The committee have given witness authority to appear as a former member of the Court of Common Council, for the purpose of making a statement of facts within his knowledge, or circumstances with which he has become acquainted in examining the books of the corporation. In order to compress them into as short a space as possible, has put certain statements into writing; any documents required to sustain any fact shall be furnished from the books now, or extracts shall be made at any future time. The first paragraph refers to the receipts and revenues of the corporation. The average of the last seven years has been 190,000*l.* a year, of which 44,000*l.* has been produced by City rents, 5,000*l.* a year by the Finsbury rents, and 14,000*l.* by the conduit mead, and other outlying property. The fixed charges referred to in that paragraph, taking the same average as the receipts, amounts to 138,000*l.* a year. In Mr. Pulling's evidence, he conceives that a considerable portion of the revenue of the corporation is derived from the embankment of the Thames in Thames Street, after the fire of London, contrary to the duties of the trust; and he applies his statement to certain large warehouses. States upon oath that this is entirely a misapprehension. There is no such rent from land so embanked from the Thames. They have two very large properties there. One is a leviathan warehouse, Crawshays', and the other is the great mill at Puddle Dock, built upon the site of an ancient lay-stall. The ground was purchased by the corporation for 2,700*l.* in the early part of 1700. The other was belonging to the corporation for centuries before. It is found in the earliest of the books anterior to the fire of London. There are to each of those properties small easements in the shape of piles drawn for mooring craft. They yield a rent of 5*l.* a year, which has been carried for many years to the navigation account. The same witness suggests that a portion of the revenue of the corporation is derived from buildings in Smithfield; but has examined some old maps, and finds it a complete misapprehension; that Smithfield has not been circumscribed in its area by the corporation since the fire of London; and by one map, as late as 1560, finds that the area of Smithfield was less then than it is now. The corporation have within the last half century purchased property to the extent of 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.*, which they have pulled down to enlarge the area of Smithfield. There is no foundation for Mr. Pulling's supposition. The City state that the rental fund of the navigation does not exceed 1,100*l.*; that is true, and the amount is about 800*l.* now. In consequence of the litigation with the Crown, some persons refuse to pay. Has not thought it right to incur the responsibility of bringing a number of actions for small rents while the greater question is at issue. Under one of the charters the whole commonalty are entitled to admit persons to the freedom of the City without the introduction of livery companies. Non-freemen introduced by the companies may be admitted at the hustings court, or by the chamberlain upon redemption, but without the certificate of character, by belonging to a company, they can only be admitted by the whole commonalty. The common council being held to represent it, have claimed and exercised the power of admission. Combe's case is now for argument in the House of Lords, 8460, 8461.—There was a general indisposition to move it; but it is now to be discussed as a pure matter of antiquarian learning, for the orders of the Court of Chancery are so changed that the result can have no effect on any future case. The representation made by the corporation in their statement is, that the report referred to by several of the witnesses, that the cost of the mayoralty was 25,000*l.* a year, was examined by the common council and disallowed. In the minutes of the court, dated 23rd March 1836, every item constituting the 25,000*l.* is analysed, and the amount disproved, to the satisfaction of the Court of Common Council, and they passed resolutions reducing all those charges capable of reduction, and giving their reasons for it. The first charge 5,322*l.* is thus dealt with by the court. It proposes that the sum of 2,125*l.* be substituted, it, the former, being the estimated annual value of the Mansion House, calculated according to the assessment to the ward and parochial taxes, as settled upon an appeal. Then it goes on to doubt whether it ought all to be charged to the mayoralty, because sometimes part of the Mansion House is used for other purposes. The next item is 3,763*l.* a year, for what are called the officers of the household, gentlemen who are annuitants, and persons holding places created a century ago, and sold by the lord mayors of that day. In the year 1819 the common council bought up their places, giving them fixed annuities for life, and certain payments in money, in commutation of the emoluments which they had purchased of the lord mayors 100 or 150 years ago. The corporation obtained by that arrangement a considerable revenue, the collection of the fish market, which falls into the revenue of the corporation, and is accounted for by them. These sums of money thus charged to the debit of the mayoralty can have no place there, unless the interest of the money paid for these places a century ago were put on the credit side of the account, or the revenue derived from having bought up those places, in which case there would be a considerable sum to the credit of the mayoralty. In two sums alone 7,000*l.* is taken off from the charge of the mayoralty. Agrees with the statement of the other witnesses with regard to the cost of the mayoralty. Moved for a committee to inquire into the subject in 1830. The committee had the accounts before them of eight gentlemen who had served as lord mayors, and from these accounts has no doubt that the receipts of the lord mayor do not in any year exceed 9,000*l.* Has no hesitation in saying, that the statement contained in the tenth paragraph is correct as to the charges of the committees. With regard to the eleventh paragraph, it is true that there are several officers who have been common councilmen, but not so many as witness stated; three of the gentlemen he supposes to have been were not. About ten per cent. of the officers have been common councilmen. It would be difficult to find any one of respectability in the City who was not related to a common councilman. Is surprised that that gentleman should have made those statements. He has been long employed by witness, 8462.—Refers to Mr. Acland. He was called "Pearson's Ferret," and a very good ferret he is. His instincts are so strong that he finds a scent where there has been no vermin for centuries, and fixes on circumstances of bygone years, and attempts to fasten them upon the present corporation. He was in witness's office, and had the run of Guildhall, and had there been anything wrong he would have found it out. Witness was pleased when he heard of his employment in a confidential part of the corporation business. Should not have hesitated to recommend him, believing him to be honest, and that nothing dishonest was intended to be done by the corporation, 8463.—Is speaking with reference to the opposition to the Smithfield bill, and also as to the "Citizen" paper, 8464.—Mr. Acland had a vast deal to do with the "Citizen" paper. Thinks he purchased that valuable property for the sum of one shilling. The corporation thought it necessary to communicate to the public intelligence connected with its own affairs. Witness was consulted with the other officers. Recommended them to make some arrangement with a man of competency to have a part of the "Citizen" paper allocated to City business, in which all the reports and business might be connected by a leader indicating the object and intentions of these proceedings. In London there is no local press, 8465.—Has always thought that the influence of public opinion was of the greatest use in regulating the affairs of the corporation, and thought this would be a good means of exposing its proceedings to the public gaze. States that they pay about 900*l.* a year for the printing of the "Newgate Calendar," containing a report of the proceedings of the sessions, 8466.—The plan of business was, that the City should look to the paper for a report of all its proceedings, but should have nothing to do with the editorial part of it, 8467.—Like the official portion of the "Moniteur" in France, 8468.—Thinks it might have been conducted in that way without the least chance of the corporation being involved, either in its literary or pecuniary responsibilities, 8469.—Mr. Mills, in his evidence, states that Alderman Finnis shirked the office of sheriff, and got Mr. Mills elected instead, and obtained 100*l.* out of his 600*l.*, taking a part of his fine. It is the very reverse of this, for by getting him elected, Alderman Finnis, instead of getting the 100*l.*, lost it. Does not impute any improper intention to Mr. Mills, but it is a hard conclusion for one gentleman to draw of another when the facts do not sustain it. With regard to Mr. Sheriff Croll, a witness stated that he offered ten shillings a ticket, implying that he had corruptly got himself elected; can personally contradict that statement. Mr. Croll was at Edinburgh. Witness, at the request of the lord mayor, in rotation requested Mr. Croll to stand, and he said he would, if he thought it would be acceptable to the aldermen, and if the liverymen would present him with a requisition, but that he was going to receive some honours at Perth. Witness said that if he would be in Edinburgh on the morning of the election, he would telegraph to him whether the aldermen and a considerable number of the liverymen would desire it. Telegraphed down to him with the requisition, and a statement of who had signed it. He replied, that if he was elected he would serve. He served at the request of the aldermen, and without the slightest wish of being guilty of any irregular practice to obtain the office. Witness was twice under-sheriff, to Mr. Raphael and to Mr. David Salomons. Was one of the parties who (in 1819) took steps to prevent gentlemen being fastened on as sheriffs for the purpose of fining them. Thinks as much as 10,000*l.* had been exacted from gentlemen in two or three years before that time Moved in common council that the fines should go for charitable purposes, to take away the disposition to fine persons who did not desire to serve. Having done that, was anxious not to be without sheriffs, and has frequently interfered to induce gentlemen to serve the office. When Catholic emancipation passed, was anxious that the corporation should carry out the principle, by the admission of a Roman Catholic gentleman qualified for the office. Mr. Raphael applied to know how to use his fortune in advancing these liberal sentiments. Recommended him to become sheriff. States upon oath that nothing took place as to who was to be his under-sheriff. After his election he invited witness to accept the office without any previous arrangement, and in the handsomest manner conferred all the advantages of the office without any bargain whatever. Assisted the friends of Mr. David Salomons when they were desirous to promote a gentleman of the Jewish persuasion for the same reason, without having had the slightest conversation on the subject of the under shrievalty. When he was elected he conferred the office on witness, and knowing the emoluments to be falling off, he made him a present of 500 guineas besides. Expected to be under-sheriff when Mr. Raphael was made sheriff. The livery perfectly understood that that would be the result. States that it must not be supposed that the accounts of the corporation appear in no other form than in the blue books shown to the Commissioners. On the completion of any of their undertakings they publish a much larger book, containing the minutest detail of every part of the expenditure, which is submitted to all those having any interest in controlling the expenses of the corporation in public improvements. Will send one of the books to the Commissioners, which will be found most creditable to the corporation, 8470.—Has no doubt that the accounts might be kept with greater plainness and clearness. Gives extract from report of a select committee of the House of Commons which shows that they are satisfied with them, 8471.—The fund alluded to is the improvement fund. When they have been intrusted with any work, and have applied to Parliament for assistance, Parliament has referred them to a committee, and this is the report of one of the committees on the examination of their account; these observations only apply to extraordinary accounts, and not to the general corporation accounts. Refers to a charge in the 12th marked paragraph in the City's statement. Gives reply of the corporation at page 81, denying that there is any foundation for the assertion, "That the corporation is inferior to the corporations of former times." While the City's statement was being prepared, desired to have the charges copied verbatim, but from a better feeling the sense was given instead. In return, two of the witnesses have complained that their statements have been unfairly dealt with. To avoid the imputation of garbling the evidence, will, with the permission of the Commission, lay a series of facts before them, which will prove every one of the important charges to be without foundation. States that these offensive statements have already been before the world through the medium of the press. Has them in the form of an appendix to an official report. Is of opinion that no corporation, however pure, can continue to be of any use if it permits such charges to remain as uncontradicted evidence in a parliamentary document under the seal of a royal commission like the present. The first witness, an electing agent, acting at the bidding of unnamed individuals, ought not to be nicely scrutinized. But the fourth, and eighteenth, and twentieth witnesses are directors of the Bank of England, and the second and tenth are wholesale dealers. The Commissioners intimated that it was unnecessary to read quotations, but that references might be given. Hands in reference to and substance of statements referred to. Has the original books from the corporation archives in court, and will turn to them, and vouch the time, the person, and the place to which every statement made is capable of being referred to. Will prove that the aldermen and common councilmen have never been more wealthy, intelligent, and respectable than they are at the present time, and have never manifested more zeal, fidelity, and ability in the discharge of their important functions. Takes the year 1663, because the City's account of receipt and expenditure commences with that year. In the reign of Charles I. the lord mayor and aldermen had the uncontrolled government of the City of London. The civic court was composed of the mercantile aristocracy of the City. They had vast sums at their command, and they made loans to one another on their own security. They sold, for their own benefit, places and appointments remunerated by fees. Of the metage dues (amounting to many thousands a year) which was proved to be received by the officers who purchased their offices of the lord mayor and aldermen, no part appears in the books of the accounts. From the intercepting of this and other important portions of the corporation revenues, the finances were in a desperate plight, and the corporation gratified their courtly extravagance on most humiliating terms. On one Lord Mayor's Day the conduits in the streets played wine, and the aldermen gave Prince Charles a present of 500*l.*, the Queen a gold basin and ewer worth 750*l.*, and the King a diamond, cost 4,000*l.*; they were obliged to pay for it 1,000*l.* down, and the rest by instalments of 1,000*l.* a year. In those days the City court was of a motley order. Merchants of the highest order held offices in the corporation, and employed both its influence and its cash in obtaining rank and titles for themselves. They rarely allowed the common council to meet. In 1633 not a single Court of Common Council was held; and in the preceding and succeeding years only one. At this time both the wealthy and needy were borrowers of the public money. By the accounts it appeared that fifteen living aldermen, and the executors of four who had died, owed the City upwards of 30,000*l.*, and upwards of 10,000*l.* were then due to the trust fund for arrears of interest. It is to the bad name and conduct of the aldermen, and the satire of the wits of those days, that their successors are indebted for much of the censure and sarcasm they have now to bear. Between the beginning of the seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth centuries the state of the corporation had been improved. During the Commonwealth the middle classes of the citizens had acquired some power, which they endeavoured to keep at the Restoration. In 1723 the common council sought to pass an Act of their own body to regulate all corporate elections, but it was opposed; and in 1724 fifteen of the aldermen, by collusion with the Government, obtained the Election Act (11 Geo. 1.), which took away the power of the citizens to amend the customs, and fastened upon them and their posterity the restrictive policy and complicated machinery of that detested measure. Gives list of offices sold at that time for the benefit of the lord mayor and aldermen and sheriffs, 8472, 8473.—One-third went to the corporation account; in the previous century the lord mayor and aldermen took the whole, 8474.—They took them for their private use. Some of the appointments were sold for life or for years, with power to put in a new life, on payment of a fine to the mayor or sheriffs for the time being. As these civic dignitaries held office only for a year, they were at the mercy of the appointees; and on the eve of the principals vacating their office, they were glad to get any sum, however small, rather than leave the appointments to their successors. Some years were, from sudden deaths or other circumstances, more fortunate than others. In 1726 the lord mayor received 6,800*l.* for his share alone. He had 2,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for the sword-bearer's office, 800*l.* for an attorney's seat at the Sheriffs' Court, and 1,780*l.* for one of the solicitorships at the Mayor's Court. The corporation during the past year have been obliged to buy this up, in order to enable them to throw open and reform the Mayor's Court; 4,000*l.* was given for it. Placemen, and pensioners, and tradesmen to the corporation, had seats in both courts, and they voted themselves contracts and paid their own bills. One of the aldermen held the humble appointment of city printer, with a salary of 4*l.* a year, and the titled lady of an eminent merchant who had been lord mayor enjoyed a lease of the laystalls or dung-heaps of the City. This period was certainly the most discreditable in the history of the corporation. 1,800*l.* was expended by the citizens and common council, in the opposition to the Election Act. Sir Robert Walpole's Government supported the aldermen; and to prevent the citizens meeting to petition against the bill, Guildhall yard was filled with troops. After the passing of the Act, the governing body exceeded their predecessors in the arbitrary exercise of their power; they took heavy fines for granting long leases at low rents, (5,000*l.* for one lease,) and increased the redemption fine to 25*l.* to meet the debts of the City. They levied fines to the amount of thousands of pounds on dissenters, whom they nominated for sheriffs, knowing they could not qualify for office by taking the sacramental test. Has a list of aldermen who were directors of the Bank of England. They have record at the bank of only two aldermen who were ever bank directors. One was Sir Brooke Watson, and the other Alderman Thompson, 8475.—At the time of the Election Act there were eleven. There is a strong contrast with the corporation of that time and the same bodies during the last twenty-five years; for while the conduct of its affairs has been in the middle classes, they have borrowed of the bank, at the lowest rate of interest, a million and a half of money, every payment both of principal and interest having been made with perfect punctuality. In 1724 Mr. John Barnard took the lead in opposing the election bill. He was of the middle ranks, a man of independent mind and means. Shortly afterwards he was made a member of Parliament for the City, and an alderman. He brought in the celebrated Act of Common Council which took from the lord mayor and sheriffs the sale of places, and obtained for the corporation the revenues derived from the metage of coal and corn. He received a public funeral, and a statue was erected to his memory in the Royal Exchange. Since his day leaders have not been wanting for the corporate reformers from amongst the middle classes. Thinks the witnesses No. 20 and No. 10 are mistaken in supposing that any material change took place in the character of the aldermen in the latter part of the past or the beginning of the present century. There were in the court, at the same time, merchants of the highest class, and men who clung to their gown in the hopes of obtaining some of the emolumentary appointments which were still in the gift of the corporation: one gentleman whose debts were compromised for 5*s.* in the pound; another was for years in the Rules of the Fleet, and four others became dependent on the corporation for bread. Refers to this period because the witnesses stated that the corporation about this time lost caste in the mercantile world, and has since been looked upon as "something loathsome." Wishes to avoid mentioning names, but will do so if required. Gives list of lucrative situations held by aldermen, under the corporation, at the same time. Is a genuine cockney, and began to interfere with corporate affairs as soon as he came of age. There is no corporator living who was in the court before 1816; since that date they can answer for themselves proudly. On the day witness joined the common council, there were two reports before it for consideration; one from a committee, bringing up bills for an entertainment given in honour of the foreign emperors and the Duke of Wellington; the amount was 25,000*l.*; at the same time there was under consideration a communication from the chamberlain to the effect that the income of the corporation was unable to meet the general expenditure, and at the same time the lord mayor communicated to the court that the baker had refused to trust the corporation for bread for the prison, unless he would give his personal security; the chamberlain had refused to give any undertaking, and the lord mayor called upon the court to provide the means. The report contained a statement that they were indebted to their officers for large sums of money; that they were in the hands of their officers; they owed them 25,000*l.*, and 75,000*l.* to the Bridge House Estate. The report was sent back to the committee for reconsideration. Eight men were put on the committee, who vowed not to eat or drink at the public expense till they had got the corporation out of debt. From that time the corporation has been pursuing a system of reform which has excluded the poor and led the rich to leave it, and has supplied the corporation with the middle class, 8476.—Thinks, that when there is not great power and patronage in the corporation, and it is not an avenue to court favour, great merchants find that they can distinction by easier means. One reform determined on was, to make a man pledge himself to resign his gown if he became unfortunate in business, 8477.—Reads question 146 and first witness's answer. Examines this statement in detail, to show how much is fact and how much is fallacy, 8478, 8479.—Thinks the higher class of merchants in the City of London are fully represented in the corporation, 8480.—Would desire in any local institution to combine all classes who would work, 8481.—Does not think it desirable that a man should be elected mayor who cannot devote much time to the affairs of the corporation; firstly, because it would bring in persons not qualified by previous municipal education, and secondly, because it would damp the energies of other men, 8482.—Thinks, if the right of voting were extended to all rate-payers in the City, you might leave the decision of lord mayor to them, 8483.—Thinks a good constituency would be able to judge of what was fairly due to the claims of service to the corporation, 8484.—Does not know of a single instance in which the consent of the corporation has been given under seal to any market within seven miles of the City; though there is no doubt of the legal privilege, which is only enforced for the sale of live cattle, 8486–8488.—There were clauses inserted in the Islington Market Bill to afford compensation to the City for damage to Smithfield Market, 8489.—Thinks, though the City have the power they would not oppose the establishment of a market for the sale of vegetables and poultry within seven miles of the City, 8490.—Hungerford Market was not opposed, nor was there any compensation stipulated; there was no opposition to the Paddington Market Bill, 8491,8492.—Has heard, that if some portion of Smithfield were not used as a market it would revert to the Crown, 8493–8496.

PEMBERTON, EDWARD LEIGH, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is solicitor to the Board of Land Revenue, 2926.—Was appointed about 1830. At that time it was the United Board of Woods, Forests, Land Revenue, Works, and Buildings, 2927.—In the course of that time disputes have taken place between that office and the corporation of London regarding the right to the soil or conservancy of the river Thames, 2928.—Gives a very long statement with opinions of a cause disputed between the Crown and the corporation as to their title to the soil of the river. On May 3d, 1851, a replication was filed, and the cause brought to issue and ripe for the examination of witnesses. Since then about 200 ancient records have been proved in evidence on behalf of the Crown, and from 50 to 100 remain to be procured from the various record offices, 2929–2935.—It is impossible to calculate when the cause will be decided. The corporation of London have not gone into any evidence yet, 2936.—The decision will be made by the Court of Chancery; expects that a decree will be at once made establishing the title of the Crown, but the court may direct an issue to be tried at law, 2937.—Has no reason to suppose there will be an appeal to the House of Lords, 2938.—The right is, in fact, in abeyance, but the corporation go on granting licences, with an arrangement that they should keep an account of all fines and rent received for embankments, and give the Commissioners fourteen days' notice of any embankment they intend to licence, in order that they may stop them if thought objectionable. The Crown is no party to the grant, and will not entitle the grantees to hold their embankment adversely to the Crown, if the title of the Crown be eventually established, 2939.—Does not recollect any recent case in which the Crown has exercised rights of ownership over the bed of the river except in the case of the Houses of Parliament. Notice was given that the Crown intended to embank, and it was done without any licence from the corporation. Admits that, as conservators, the corporation have a right to judge whether the proposed embankment will impede the navigation, and if so to stop it, 2940.—Permission was not asked by the Crown in a manner that implied the corporation had any right to the soil of the river, 2941.—Does not know that the Crown has ever been in conflict with the City with regard to the conservancy, except that there have been various schemes for the improvement of the river and alteration of the conservancy, but has not had time to make himself master of all the proceedings which have taken place, 2942.—The right of conservancy is not disputed by the Crown; if disputed at all, should imagine it would be by the Admiralty. His office is merely with respect to the soil. Refers the Commissioners to Lord Hale, "Treatise de Jure Maris," Part 1st., Chapter 5, in regard to the office of conservators, 2943.—The right of the City to the conservancy of the river has never been disputed in any litigation with the office of Woods, 2944.—Admits the City are conservators of the river, but they have exceeded their duties, and many acts which they rely on as evidence of their ownership of the soil of the river were exercised in the performance of their duties of conservancy, 2945.

PILLOW, Mr. THOMAS. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a lighterman; has an office at 73, Thames Street, chief place of business is Symon's Wharf, Tooley Street, 3007, 3008.—Wishes it to be understood that he was requested to attend, though not an unwilling witness, 3009.—The corporation of the City, and the company to which witness belongs, are distinct, 3010, 3011.—Is a member of the Watermen's Company; is one of the Court of Assistants, 3011, 3012.—Thinks it desirable that the Commissioners should not remain in error respecting the statement which the gentleman who was examined from Isleworth made. He thought he could not carry goods from the Medway. This is a mistake; he has as much right to carry goods from the Medway as he has from the north; that is to say, the vessel could be manned by others besides freemen of the Watermen's Company, 3013.—There would be no restrictions whatever, 3014.—The extent of the restrictions in the lighterman's business is this: The Act of Parliament confines the navigating of barges, and craft of that description, to freemen, and gives them the exclusive right to navigate and manage all craft upon the river Thames, extending from Yantlet Creek, Kent, to Windsor, Berks. There are practices which are injurious to the community at large, which arise out of that exclusive right. Is persuaded that, for want of power under the Act, in the management, they have great reason to be complained of by the public in general; but some of the witnesses who have appeared before the Commissioners have not been fully acquainted with the nature of the privileged, and have not stated it quite clearly, 3015.—The gentleman who gave evidence before stated that the privileges of the Watermen's Company would prevent him from navigating with his own servants a barge from the mouth of the Medway to his own wharf at Isleworth; but here he was mistaken, because he commences his voyage beyond the district of the Watermen's Company, 3016.—The mistake he made was as to the limits of company's jurisdiction, not as to the nature of the privlege itself, 3017.—He could have sent his own barge, with his own servants, from Isleworth to any distance beyond Yantlet Creek, 3018.—Both the point of departure and the point of arrival must be situated within the jurisdiction of the Watermen's Company, 3019.—Their privilege does not embrace loading or unloading, 3020.—Supposing his barge set off from Isleworth, and touched at some point of the river within the jurisdiction, and landed some of the cargo, and then went on lower down, out of the jurisdiction, if the goods were his own it would have been a legal operation; but he could not have legally carried for hire or gain other persons' goods. This privilege is enforced by the Watermen's Company; the Act of Parliament provides for it, 3021, 3022.—The nature of the occupation involves the necessity of that exclusive right, as no man can thoroughly understand the business unless he is early initiated into it by apprenticeship, for which the company provide, 3023.—Has himself been fined by the Company of Watermen for infringing their privileges, 3024.—The last case was when a strike took place with about 60 or 70 men. The strike principally originated from the fact that the company could not get their steamers discharged in the time they required, on account of the want of men and barges to perform that operation. Their work is often confined to about 24 hours; they unload from 300 to 500 tons of goods, and take in the same amount within that space of time. The men, therefore, are obliged to be in attendance both night and day, and they complain they are not properly paid for it. Witness, as employing those men, felt that he had cause to complain of their conduct towards him, 3025.—Thought they made unreasonable demands; resisted the claim; gave his foreman instructions that in this case the business must not stand still; that he must employ anybody that he could get. Mustered, with foremen and apprentices, and one or two freemen who did not strike, something like 12 persons, and was enabled by that means to carry on business during this strike of the men. Felt, as master, that he had not that authority which he ought to have over the men, and at that time thought that the thing would be to throw the privilege open, 3026.—Was fined for it, but the magistrate recommended him to apply to the Court of Aldermen, and he was persuaded they would be empowered to give relief. Had to pay the fine of 1*s.* because he could not set aside the Act of Parliament altogether, 3027, 3028.—Thinks that if the privilege were taken away, the remedy would be worse than the disease. Is an advocate for free trade principles. Thinks they will always operate best with the community at large, but in that case it would operate injuriously to all persons engaged in business on the river. On account of low wages, the temptation to employ incompetent men would be great, and persons would be put into barges to navigate them who would occasion collisions, loss of property, and perhaps loss of life too, 3029.—Supposing the trade were thrown open, witness does not think there would be men enough found competent to do the work, 3031, 3032.—The object of the present system is to restrict the number, 3033.—Suggests that any freeman should have as many apprentices as he likes, 3035.—There are some persons who do not have apprentices at all; they employ freemen; but the influx of business since the free trade principle has been fairly brought into action has made the number of competent persons insufficient for the demand, 3036, 3037.—Some means should be taken to ascertain the competence of the persons employed as watermen on the Thames. Unless lads are brought up to it from an early age, they do not attain that competency which it is necessary they should possess, 3038.—The business of watermen on the Thames may be learned by lads who have been previously connected with the water in three years; by others, in four or five, 3039.—The traffic on the river is very great and the navigation difficult. A lighterman is entrusted with a large amount of property, and much depends on the skill of the men employed, 3040.—If the trade were thrown open witness does not think the freemen would be losers, 3041.—The rate of payment would fall in consequence of the privilege being abolished. There are several matters which might be very much improved if they were referred to persons who were empowered to bring about a reformation. The Watermen's Company is not a constituent part of the corporation, simply incorporated by Act of Parliament. To be a member of the Watermen's Company does not give the freedom of the City of London, 3042, 3043.—They are not entitled to exercise any franchise in the City of London. Have no political standing in the City, 3044.—The number of freemen on the Watermen's books is 7,786. The number has lately increased, 3045, 3046.—The restriction on the number of apprentices should be removed. Thinks the Government should sanction that, because the transition is so easy from this service to the navy or mercantile shipping, 3047.—The Watermen's Company is bound to furnish men to the Royal Navy; they could draught 500 men from them in the event of hostilities breaking out, 3048.—Points out the clause in the Act of Parliament which relates to that subject, 3049.—The power has never been acted upon to the full extent, namely, their entire body, but they have draughted 300 at different times when required, 3050.—The last time was at the breaking out of the last war; all the men were subject to be impressed. Heard that about 4,000 served in the navy and river fencibles, 3051.—If a notice is sent to the company to supply so many men they are obliged to do so, 3052.—Hands in a statement of the number of freemen, and the number of craft employed by the members of the company, 3053.

POCOCK, Mr. THOMAS. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of a deputation from the borough of Southwark, 4153.—Has been resident within the borough for the last fifty years, and a liveryman of London for forty years; has been called upon many times to serve, and also seen many persons, who did not serve, fined; but this never exempted him from serving upon the sessions at Newington parish, which witness always thought a great hardship. It has always been the received feeling, and believed to be a fact, that the borough of Southwark is part and parcel of the City of London as much as Cheapside itself. The lord mayor and the corporation, together with the recorder, have always exercised jurisdiction over the borough, as belonging to the City. Complains that they have not been properly represented in the corporation of the City, and have not the right to send members there, which they think they ought to have. In the borough of Southwark there is an immense amount of property called the Bridge House Estate; forty years ago it brought in a mere nominal income to the City, but now it is covered by a most valuable property, bringing many thousands a year. Considers that in the borough of Southwark the property ought to be especially applied for the purposes of the bridges, and other improvements in the borough, 4154.—Thinks, as a Parliamentary borough, that part of the borough which is connected with the City, and that part which is not, ought all to be dealt with alike, 4155.—The alternative is, cementing the whole with the City of London, or separating the whole from it, 4156.—Believes the borough of Southwark now does not derive any benefit from the expenditure of the corporation of London. At least, the only benefit is the opening of the approaches to New London Bridge, 4156, 4157.—The present connexion of Southwark with the City is purely onerous, without any corresponding benefit, 4159.—Has always understood that the proceeds of the Bridge House estates is exclusively for the purpose of making or repairing bridges, or making approaches thereunto, and new streets, and so on, 4160.—The borough of Southwark ought to come in for a share of that money, 4161. —That part of the City property is managed by the Bridge House Committee, and two bridge masters, 4162. —Believes they are very good landlords; there is nothing in the way they manage their property prejudicial to the trade of the borough of Southwark, 4163, 4164.—The tenants of those houses pay the county and parish rates like other tenants, 4165.—Cannot state the exact amount derived from the City property situated within the borough of Southwark, but it must be many thousands a year, 4166.

Police:

In consequence of the double jurisdiction for the management of the police, there is a district running through the centre of London which both commissioners refuse to watch, Saward, 4408.—Thinks it desirable it should extend over the whole of the metropolis, Dillon, 721.—There is one police obtaining over nineteen twentieths of the metropolis, the total cost of which is 400,000*l.* a year. The City district has a police of its own, conducted at a cost of more than 40,000*l.* a year. The City police is as efficient as it can be cut off from the metropolitan; would incorporate the City police with the metroplitan, Elliot, 1087–1089.—The City and metropolitan police act most harmoniously together, and are always ready to assist one another. The Act of Parliament states that the metropolitan police have power to act in the City districts, and the City police in the metropolitan districts, Childs, 6964.—Thinks it would be inconvenient to refer from the City to the head office in Scotland Yard, if the two bodies were consolidated. Gives instances, ib. 6965.—The authorities in Scotland Yard must be communicated with before the detective force can be put into operation for the discovery of stolen property, ib. 6966.—The expenses of the eleven metropolitan offices are 44,000*l.* a year, Wood, 6326.—Commissioner of, duties connected with the office, Harvey, 6508.—The communications of the metropolitan police with the City police have always been most amicable. The whole of the Thames along the City as well as without the City is under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police; but if the two forces were made one force, the operation might yield some advantage, ib. 6525–6539.—Suggests that the city and metropolitan police should be amalgamated; would be less expensive, Wallis, 1468.—The City, having such enormous property to protect, requires a greater number of police than is necessary in other parts; fears that if put all under the metropolitan police there would only be the same number of men allowed for each square yard as in other directions; at present they have double the number, Cattley, 1313.—Thinks it would be better all under one head, but there are difficulties. Cannot say too much in favour of the metropolitan police, having had thirty of their men in the docks for fourteen years, Elliot, 1315.—What the metropolis wants, is a real independent detective force, efficient for its objects, in all places, Harvey, 6552.—The detective might be made much more effective. It is not so strong as it ought to be. Would have under the executive control two or three men at each of the outports and great towns, ib. 6630. —Is capable of being made more efficient, and it ought to be so, ib. 6548.—The surgeon of the city police has 500*l.* a year, Childs, 6951.—Statement of his duties, ib. 6952.—There are no other emoluments attached to that office, ib. 6952.—The City should retain the separate jurisdiction over the police now possessed by the corporation, Lord Mayor, 7201.—When the scheme for the establishment of a police was adopted, it became a question whether the police established by Sir R. Peel should extend over the whole of London or not. The citizens of London succeeded in obtaining an Act of Parliament to give them a separate police. Nothing can work better than the police does within the City of London, Merewether, 5286–5306.—It has been stated that the banks of the river between high and low watermark are not watched by either the City police, the Thames police, or the metropolitan police, and becomes in consequence the resort of thieves and vagabonds. When the land is covered with water it is under one jurisdiction, when it is uncovered it is under another, ib. 5292–5294.—The superintendent is appointed by the corporation under the Act of Parliament, ib. 6754.—The collection of the rate and the expenditure of the money is under a committee of the Common Council, ib. 6755.—The corporation has only a limited power over the police, ib. 6757.—The legislature decided that the City police should be separate, ib. 6757.—The police fund is an entirely new fund, created under a new Act of Parliament, ib. 6750.—The corporation supplies one fourth of the amount required for the maintenance of the police, ib. 6751.—The Temple, though included in the City Police Act by a special clause, choose to keep their own watchmen, ib. 5299–5311.—The police is managed by a committee, sanctioned by an Act of Parliament. The police and sewers are so governed that the accounts are kept distinct from those of the corporation, ib. 5315, 5316.—The sanitary police of the City is in a very satisfactory condition, Haywood, 5956 a.—The police have difficult duties to perform, and do their best under the circumstances, Christy, 2559.—Bears testimony to the excellent arrangement of the police, Whistler, 2630.—The City police cost 40,000*l.* per annum, and the Marylebone, 24,000*l.*, Hickson, 2720.—Would not restore the City corporation the right of excluding the City from the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police, ib. 2949.—It would be better if the police of the City were absorbed in the metropolitan police, Travers, 237.—Of the City of London, is well managed, but thinks that the metropolitan police should be homogeneous, and under one authority, Acland, 523.

Poll:

The duration of the poll for seven days is done under the authority of the Act of the 11th of George I., which was passed for the express purpose of shortening the elections, Merewether, 5035.—At common hall, kept open eight days, Wallis, 1436.

Polling Places:

Elections in common hall have only one, Wallis, 1437–1440.

Population of the City:

Increased within the last ten years from 125,000 to 130,000, Simon, 7408–7416.

Population of London:

The sleeping population is 126,000, but the day population is nearly three times that amount, Lord Mayor, 7194, 7195.

Port of London:

Is an intricate subject, because of the defects of the present municipal system. Statements as to metage duties, Acland, 527.

Porterage:

The claim to the superintendence of it was derived by implication from the general power of controlling the trade of the City, Pulling, 837.—And fellowship dues are a grievance, Powles, 1055.—Certain things cannot be done but by certain porters, who require more pay than others, ib. 1059.—Unless it is mentioned in some of the charters, it is a prescription proved by usage, Merewether, 5148–5174.

Porters:

The duties have diminished of late years in consequence of the ships going into the docks, Harris, 7987.

Potter, George William K., Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secondary of the Poultry compter. Since the death of his colleague in July last has performed the duties of the two offices. Was appointed in 1831, 6635.—States the duties connected with the office, 6636.—Superintends the election of sheriffs, 6637.—Explains the system by which the imposition of fines is regulated, 6638.—Witness collects the estreats, accounts to the City solicitor, and hands them over to him upon the account being settled. They are ultimately handed over to the sheriffs, but witness always looks upon it as a fund belonging to the corporation, 6639–6642.—Had not heard till lately that the sheriffs had any claim upon those funds. Believed that the money belonged to the corporation, but that it had been handed over to the sheriffs by the corporation, 6643.—In the case of Mr. Gray he was wrong in saying that he did what he did at witness's request; he rather recommended the course he should pursue, 6644.—The salary entirely depends upon the fees. Witness gave 5,000*l.* for the office, under an arrangement with the late secondary, who sold the office to the corporation for 8,000*l.* or 8,500*l.* The corporation found 3,000*l.*, and witness 5,000*l.*; but upon this arrangement, that should he be disturbed in his office, the 5,000*l.* was to be returned to him, 6645.—Has not the right of selling the office if he were to resign; the common council would fill up the vacancy, 6647.—The receipts of the office are about one-third what they were when the sheriff's fees were settled. At the time witness was appointed, was debarred from taking more than the legal fees, which were then very small. The income was made up for one or two years to 1,000*l.* by the corporation, 6648.—It was stipulated that he should not receive less than 1,000*l.* a year, 6649.—Does not receive any express authority from the sheriffs year by year. Holds the office by custom; is in effect executing that which is, properly speaking, the duty of the sheriffs. Is sworn in before the Court of Aldermen, 6650–6653.—Acts only in the City; there are separate under-sheriffs for the county; there are separate under-sheriffs in each district. The judges of the Sheriffs' Court are in strictness under-sheriffs of London, Witness performs the duties of under-sheriff, 6654–6658.

Powell, Mr. George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the appointment of surveyor of Waterloo Bridge since it was opened in 1817. Witnessed the laying the first stone, and the progress of the work till its completion, 7521, 7522.—Is perfectly acquainted with the state of the foundations of the bridge, 7523.—Mr. Leach stated that the fears entertained by the company, from the cutting off and removal of piles, formed the grounds of the opinion which he expressed to the Commission; on the contrary, witness states that the company have never objected to the removal of a pile, excepting as to the expense; and upon an application from Mr. Sanders, the water bailiff, an answer was immediately sent, stating "that the Waterloo Bridge Company have no objection to the Thames Navigation Committee cutting off the sheeting of the piles of the piers, or to the removal of any other piles that may be considered necessary." Messrs. Joliffe and Banks were employed by the Navigation Committee to remove those piles complained of, without any expense to the company, 7524.—The foundations of the bridge are sound, and have never shown the slightest appearance of defect or settlement. Mr. Leach has stated there were private parties taking ballast; on the contrary, the Thames Navigation Committee applied for permission to do so, but instead of carrying out the work as directed by witness, Sir John Rennie, and Mr. Plews, they set a powerful dredging steam engine to excavate; and upon this being pointed out by witness to the city authorities and contractors it was found by Mr. English that there were excavations, from twelve to eighteen feet deep, close to the piers. They filled up those excavations, and restored, the bed of the river to its present state, at their own or the City's expense, 7525.—The result of those operations has not affected the security of the bridge. Ventures the opinion that the Navigation Committee know nothing about the removal of shoals; they cut through the middle of a shoal, which of course fills up again from the operation of the currents, 7526.—Permission was given to them by the Bridge Company, to cut a channel of about four feet in an invert manner, but instead of that, there was no superintendence over the operation, and they continued working away as long as they could obtain ballast that was valuable for concrete and building purposes, 7527.—This was done by the Thames Navigation Committee, 7528.

Powles, John Distin, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is a general merchant in the City of London, chiefly engaged in the South American trade, 1029–1031.—Has been for 16 years secretary to the London Dock Company, 1032, 1033.—The chief point on which the corporation exercises an influence on the commercial interests of the City of London is in the case of the navigation of the river, which is entirely intrusted to them. The navigation committee is wholly unqualified for such a charge, though the business is well done by the harbour masters. Many years ago the corporation brought a bill into the Commons for improving the conservancy of the river. It was proposed to insert a clause in the bill that the Trinity House, and each of the great dock companies, should appoint a member of the navigation committee, upon which the corporation withdrew the bill. No emolument attaches to the performance of those duties, 1034.—Some patronage is attached to the offices, though not considerable, 1035, 1036.—Unless merchants can take upon themselves municipal offices they are wholly excluded. There is but one merchant in the corporation, 1037.—Believes that no aldermen are members of the committee. The body is so constituted as to exclude all mercantile men, 1038.—The mercantile interests of London, as distinguished from the retail trading interests, are not represented in the corporation, 1039.—Has not practically experienced any inconvenience from the inefficiency of the committee, as everything is in the hands of the harbour masters, of whom there are four, who are well qualified for their duties, and who are appointed by the navigation committee, 1043–1046.—Has heard no complaints of inefficient discharge of duty on the part of the committee, 1048.—Were the amendment proposed to be made in the Act of Parliament carried, it would meet the wants of the case, with the further amendment of reducing the committee to 18, 1052, 1053.—Has not observed any feeling of jealousy of the large mercantile interests of the City on the part of the corporation, 1054.—Attributes the withdrawal of the bill to the dislike of the corporation to giving up their privilege, and being obliged to elect any one but common councilmen. Porterage and fellowship dues are a grievance, 1055.—Certain things cannot be done but by certain porters, whom you are required to pay more than others, 1059.—It is not so at the London Docks, 1060.—There are importations of corn into the London Docks; the metage is done by the City. There is no grievance between the City and the Dock Company, 1062.—Recommends a chamber of commerce, composed of half a dozen common councilmen or aldermen, representing the City, and about 12 other persons, elected from the Bank, the East India Association, and other commercial bodies, where grievances might be represented by individuals, and measures taken to redress them, 1064.—Considers that the connecting of such a chamber of commerce with the corporation would be a mode of utilizing the large revenues of the City, 1065, 1066.—Would give no legal functions to the chamber, 1067.—But simply use it as a means of communication with the departments of the Government and other public bodies, 1067, 1068.—Believes the Bank and other public bodies would be willing to elect members, 1069.—The feeling prevails amongst merchants that they have not time to devote to the proper discharge of municipal affairs, 1072.

Pratt, Mr. Martin, (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company, 2452.—Has held that situation four years. Was assistant secretary for 7 or 8 years previously, 2453.—The navigation of the Thames is in a very imperfect state, owing to the impediments caused by the shoals between London Bridge and Erith, 2454.—Thinks proper care has not been taken to prevent it, 2455.—Has formed that opinion from having heard what has been said by engineers on the subject. Refers to the report of the commission which sat in 1846 on tidal harbours. Besides the detention caused by shoals, they do great damage to ships when they pass over them, 2456.—Does not believe the river to be getting worse. About seven years ago the City partially removed a shoal at Limehouse, but it still remains very bad, and there are others worse than that, 2457.—Has not represented the matter to the navigation committee, but knows that the subject has often been brought before them, 2458.—The present harbour master has done his duty very efficiently. Believes under his direction, the water has been deepened in the tiers where the steam vessels drawing a large draught of water lie, 2459.—Generally steamers are not of such heavy draught as sailing vessels, 2460.—Thinks that steam navigation has had nothing to do with bringing about the fact of the existence of shoals more than before, except that they proceed against the ebb tide, which sailing vessels do not. In coming up the river within two hours of low water they are impeded by shoals, 2461.—The regulations of the corporation and of the Admiralty clash with regard to the lights to be carried by steam vessels, 2462.—The Steamship Owners' Association of London pointed out the discrepancy to the corporation, but it had no result, 2464.—As all the vessels of the General Steam Navigation Company are sea-going vessels, they follow the Admiralty regulations, 2465.—The corporation take no notice of it, 2467.—Believes that legally both those authorities have the right to lay down regulations, 2469.—Steam vessels belonging to other companies follow the Admiralty regulations, 2470.—The river steamers comply with the corporation regulations. The 49th section of the Act which confirms the regulations of the Admiralty is to this effect: that nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice or derogate from the estates, rights, &c. of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, 2471.—The Trinity House makes no regulations on the subject of lights, 2472.—Great danger arises from different steamers carrying different lights. The regulations published in 1848 caused great inconvenience, 2473.—Does not think the corporation a fit body to exercise the conservancy of the river. Great inconvenience arises from the inefficiency of the navigation committee. With respect to the removal of shoals there should be a professional engineer attached to the committee, to point out how they should be removed, 2474.—The functions of conservators of the river would be better exercised by the Government, 2475.—There are City dues which interfere with the trade of the Steam Navigation Company. In regard to certain stations particularly. There are compulsory dues upon grain. Witness alludes to metage dues, fillage, and lastage. On some stations where they compete with railroads, were they to put themselves on an equality, by offering to pay the compulsory dues, they would forfeit one third of the freight, 2476.—The same grain brought from the same place by rail would be exempt from the dues, 2477.—Does not think that the conservancy of the river bears any resemblance to municipal duties. Does not think that there is any body of persons whose rights can be said to be directly affected by that jurisdiction, 2478.—The shipping interests are very largely interested, 2479, 2480.—Witness calls attention to the coal duties, and states, that by the Act of the 1st and 2nd of Victoria they had the power to claim a drawback of the whole dues levied on coals, when they are exported in quantities exceeding 20 tons, 2481.—By the 14th & 15th Victoria the drawback was reduced to 1*s.*, the duty being 1*s.* 1*d.*, 2482.—Believes the ground on which the alteration was made was with reference to the expense of the office, or the expense of the collection. States that they are at a great loss in consequence, 2484.—Believes the reduction was made to meet the imports by rail, 2485.—Calls attention to the watermen's company in connexion with the corporation, who have the exclusive working of all craft on the river; and as the business has so much increased, there are not barges or craft sufficient to discharge or load the vessels lying in the stream, 2486, 2487.—Is not thoroughly acquainted with the privileges of the company, but knows that no barge can be navigated on the river but by a freeman of the company; and what with the want of barges and lightermen, there is great difficulty in getting the cargoes unloaded in time to leave again at the appointed time. The only remedy witness can suggest, is to throw the trade open, 2488.—It would be a great saving of expense, as they could make more voyages with their vessels, if they could be loaded and discharged more quickly. A short time ago there was a strike of the journeymen lightermen, which nearly suspended the business of the river, 2489.—Believes the lightermen themselves would allow that the business is enough to overwhelm them, 2491.—Believes the entrance to the watermen's company is by servitude, 2492.—The numbers are limited, 2493.—Any complaints of the members, to be made to the court and wardens of the company, 2494.—Does not recollect having had to apply to them on any subject. The complaint is a general one, 2495.

PRISONS:

Newgate, the New Prison, City Bridewell, Debtors Prison in Whitecross Street, and the Borough Compter are under the control of the corporation, Williams, 2365.

Bridewell. The City Bridewell is situated in Bridge-street, Blackfriars, and is an appurtenance of the Bridewell Hospital. It is a most inconvenient, ill-arranged, and useless prison, ib. 2405.

Holloway. The House of Correction at Holloway is one of the best-regulated prisons in the country, and reflects great credit on the City magistrates. It was constructed two years ago, ib. 2416.

Borough Compter. No longer exists as a prison, ib. 2417.—The Debtors Prison for the City of London and the county of Middlesex was erected in 1812. Believes there is scarcely a prison in England in so bad a condition, from its injudicious construction, and inconvenient internal arrangements, ib. 2419.—Were the money which is left to freemen distributed among all the prisoners, including those of Middlesex, many objections would be done away, Merewether, 2434.

Giltspur-street Compter. Recommends its being applied to the purposes of a Police Court, ib. 2445.—The prison at Newgate not fit for carrying out the system required. The Holloway Prison is commodious for any purpose, Bunning, 6020.—To a certain extent prisons have always been under the direction of the corporation, Merewether, 6752.—Mentions, in explanation of Captain Williams' evidence, that in the Prison Act there is a clause which directs that any gaol built for any county, city, or town, out of the boundaries thereof, shall be deemed to be part and portion of the county, city, or town, to which it belongs, ib. 6758.—Recommends the consolidation of the criminal prisons connected with the City, Lord Mayor, 7161.—The charities connected with the prisons of London amount to upwards of 1,600*l.* a year. The application of these charities is open to serious objections, ib. 7172.

PRITCHARD, WILLIAM, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Appears before the Commission as high bailiff of Southwark, commissioned to present the resolutions of a public meeting called on the 25th of November last, 4133.—The requisition was signed by a great many respectable inhabitants, and requested witness to call an early meeting at the Town Hall. States object of the meeting. In pursuance of that resolution a meeting was called, and certain resolutions were come to, 4134.—Presided at that meeting, 4135.—The meeting was numerously attended, 4136.—There were between 200 and 300 people present. It is a small hall, and will not hold a great many, 4137.—It was a fair average meeting, but not crowded, 4138.—Reads the resolutions that were passed, 4139.—Is not aware of the exact dues levied by the corporation on the commerce of Southwark referred to in those resolutions, 4140.—States a few historical facts considered necessary for the elucidation of the resolutions referred to, 4141.—Is appointed by the Court of Common Council, 4142.—Is annually elected, 4143.—The high bailiff is continued every year, unless there is some objection to his conduct. Witness has been high bailiff since 1842, 4144.—Is not an inhabitant of Southwark. Is a citizen of London, and has been a member of the corporation for several years, 4145.—There are a few small fees belonging to the high bailiff of Southwark, but subject to certain payments, and there is a grant of 100*l.* a year from the corporation, 4146.—The average profit from the corporation is about 80*l.* a year; but as high bailiff of Southwark is also high bailiff of the Southwark County Court, before witness possessed it the fees amounted to 800*l.* a year, 4147. His average yearly emoluments are between 500*l.* and 600*l.* a year, 4148.—Is a proctor in Doctors' Commons, 4149.—They expressed a feeling at the meeting that they would not be satisfied with the incorporation of the five ancient parishes constituting the three manors; but the borough having extended so considerably, and now embracing Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Christchurch, they would now wish the whole of the eight parishes which form the parliamentary borough to be incorporated with London, 4150.—The feeling of the meeting was adverse to an incorporation confined to the five parishes, 4151.—It was adverse to separating the municipal jurisdiction which extends over the whole borough of Southwark. Thinks the Parliamentary borough must be dealt with as a whole, 4151*a.*—The people of Southwark would prefer being incorporated with the City, but would rather have a separate corporation than remain in their present state, 4151*b*.—Thinks, supposing the eight parishes were incorporated with the City of London, they would think they were entitled to an exemption from the burdens of the county of Surrey, in the same manner as Portsoken and Farringdon Without have been relieved from those of the county of Middlesex, 4152.

PRIVILEGES:

Thinks that the merchants of the City of London would buy up the privileges of coal, corn, and fruit meters at a fair estimate, 546.—The trade privileges are very numerous and various, 548.—Knows of none of public utility. Acland, 549.—Property of the City consists of about 6,000 houses and buildings, Bunning 6077.

PROSECUTIONS:

When an occasion arises which the City think they ought to institute a prosecution it is done by the Court of Aldermen; it is very rarely, Merewether, 5320–5322.

PROSECUTOR:

Proposes that there should be a public prosecutor appointed in every case in the metropolis, Pulling, 924.

PULLING, ALEXANDER, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is the author of a treatise on the laws and usages of the City of London. Was reluctant to attend and give evidence, because he felt that having been engaged in several City cases the imputation might be made of having disclosed matters which had come to his knowledge in a professional capacity, 741.—Has paid much attention for a great many years to the subject of the corporation, and since being called to the bar has been engaged in a great many cases relating to the City of London, 742.—Has directed attention more to the law and constitution of the corporation than to the moral or political view of the subject. In the course of professional experience has noticed defects in the working of the present system, 743.—Statement respecting the corporation of London with regard to its relation to the State, 744–760.—Statement in regard to the relation of the corporation of London to the trade of the metropolis, 761.—States that it is set forth in Waggoner's case, as regulated by the Charter of Richard II., "that no foreigner do sell or buy of any other foreigner any merchandise, within the liberties of the said City, upon pain of forfeiting the same." All dealings between persons who were not freemen were prohibited, 762.—All selling upon the part of a foreigner was absolutely prohibited, except in the public markets of the City of London, and within forty days of his coming within the City, and then he must depart, 763, 764.—At that time a foreigner could have sold his goods in the open markets without being a freeman, 765.—The whole of the City of London was a market overt; but the way in which foreigners were restricted was by internal regulations of the corporation, which fixed upon certain spots for the goods to be sold, and certain days for the markets to be held on. There were officers of the corporation continually on the watch to give them a hint to go when they had sold their goods, 766.—The laws and regulations of the City of London were less liberal towards foreigners than those of other mercantile towns. In the time of Henry IV. and Edward III. Acts of Parliament were passed giving merchants a right to come and go for the purpose of trading generally throughout the kingdom, there being special clauses introduced to save the customs of the City of London, 767.—It has not always been the disposition of the City of London to encourage the resort of foreign merchants, for Acts of Parliament prohibiting aliens from remaining a certain time were passed by the express prayer of the corporation, 768.—At present there is no cloth fair in London, 770.—Formerly a merchant who was not a citizen could have sold cloth at the cloth market without being a freeman, 771.—It is a question whether now a person not being a freeman could legally sell cloth in the City; but practically the corporation have ceased to enforce their rights against wholesale dealers. A retail dealer could not; so that a retail dealer in cloth would now be in a worse position than he would have been when the cloth fair was in existence, 772–774.—An alien cannot become a freeman, and therefore cannot as a matter of right set up as a retail shopkeeper in the City, 775, 776.—An alien could, if the law was enforced against him, be excluded from exercising any retail trade within the City, but could be admitted to the freedom by the express act of the common council. A great many aliens are shopkeepers in the City; supposes it is winked at, 777–780.—There are some retail shopkeepers who are protected by special Statutes. All those whose fathers have been in certain wars have the privilege of setting up retail shops in the City. These Acts passed at the conclusion of the peace, and referred at the time to the whole of the corporations of England which had exclusive trade privileges; but those privileges have in some cases been repealed by the Municipal Corporation Act, so that now they only exist in the corporation of London, 781, 782.—The City of London does not claim any privilege, except against retail dealers, brokers, and publicans, 783.—The trade privileges referred to existed in other corporations before the Municipal Reform Act, 785.—Those rights could only rest on immemorial custom or Act of Parliament. Were assumed to rest on immemorial custom, but were abolished by Statute, 786–788.—In a Bill which was brought before Parliament the session before last, the corporation of London proposed to abolish those customs, 789.—Believes that the customs of excluding all dealers, and of seizing foreign bought and foreign sold goods, exist in law at the present time, 790.—There are legal customs which the City may claim which they do not enforce. The corporation regulates brokers. The regulation of brokers is by virtue of an immemorial custom, which is recognised in some of the earliest charters and laws relating to the City of London. Mentions numerous statutes which relate to the regulation of brokers. All enforce the same law, originating in the custom that the City authorities should regulate all brokers between buyer and seller in the City of London. There was a case a few days ago, of a complaint made against a broker on the Stock Exchange, who had committed some frauds; the case came before the Court of Aldermen, with the lord mayor in the chair; there were twelve or fourteen aldermen present; the question was put to the vote, and the result was, after an adjourned meeting, that the Court of Aldermen would not interfere, 792–797.—It was a judicial question as to the construction of their own byelaws, and the Court of Aldermen refused to exercise the jurisdiction they had, 798, 799.—There was another remedy open to the parties; an action to try the question, 800.—The application was made under the byelaws of the Court of Aldermen. The selling broker on this occasion claimed a commission from the buyer as well as from the seller, 801.—The application came before the Court of Aldermen, as a tribunal exercising jurisdiction over brokers, in the nature of a complaint of the infringement of one of the byelaws, 802, 803.—It was rather an application for redress than an issue joined, 804.—In cases of that kind the Court of Aldermen is of little use, 805.—Has no reason to believe that they were interested in the question. With regard to the River Thames, the corporation are invested by very early statutes and charters with the conservancy and regulation of the Thames, 806.—The preservation of the fish, and the removal of the weirs which impeded the navigation up the river, appears to have been the original purpose of the conservancy of the Thames, 807.—A case is now pending in the Court of Chancery between the Attorney General and the Corporation of London. The question is, the right of the corporation to the conservancy of the Thames, 809, 810.—Statements as to the right of conservancy of the Thames, and the metage of coal, corn, &c., 811, 812.—The extent of those privileges is now in dispute. Particularly refers to the case of Combe versus the Corporation of London, in which there are points in dispute besides the extent of the jurisdiction. There is a bill of recovery, and a denial of the right altogether, 813–815.—The metage is compulsory; so that if a person landing coal or corn within the limits objects, the City insist upon measuring it, in order that they may get their fee, 816, 817.—This right has been constantly exercised since the Charter of James I., 818.—The claims are made within the port of London, the bounds of which are Yantlet Creek in the County of Kent and Staines in the County of Middlesex, including both banks of the river, 819–821.—Believes there are places in the county of Kent where it is enforced, 823.—The metage produces a large revenue, 824.—All the public submit, except such wealthy men as Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company, 825, 826.—The charges are much larger than they would be if the privilege did not exist, 827.—The meters form a fellowship which is not incorporated, 828.—It is a valuable office, 829.

—The men enter first as labourers, and rise from one step to another till they become sifters, a sifter being a very important officer deriving a very large revenue from his share of the metage, 830.—There is a double advantage derived from that privilege; one by the meters, and another by the City, 831.—The entrance fee of a labourer is not large, but they pay an annual sum out of their wages to the fellowship, not to the corporation, 832, 833.—The patronage with regard to the metage rests with the corn and finance committee of the corporation, which consists of common councilmen and aldermen. The meters and sifters are connected with the porterage, and they act in unison with them. The metage is connected with the porterage of corn. In order to its being measured, it is necessary to convey it. The consequence is, that as the corporation have made laws which profess to extend beyond the limits of the City, the fellowship porters, who are attached to the metage, claim to exercise their powers out of the limits of the City of London proper, but within the limits of the port of London, 836.—The claim to the superintendence of the porterage was derived by implication from the general power of controlling the trade of the City, 837.—The power over the metage is derived from the grant of the Crown, and extends much beyond the limits of the City, 838.—The power over the porterage is limited to the City, strictly so called, and is not co-extensive with the power of metage; but the corporation, by the bye-laws which were passed upwards of a hundred years ago, made the mistake of conferring upon the fellowship porters a monopoly of labour co-extensive with the metage, and further than they can legally extend it, and the fellowship porters insist upon their rights now, 839.—That claim is not abandoned by the corporation. Has been engaged in a dispute with them with regard to one of the dock companies on the Surrey side, 840.—The present state of the privileges of the City of London engenders a vast deal of litigation, 841.—It would be very important even for the interests of the corporation itself that the nature of its claims should be ascertained, 842.—To the community at large, the vexation and expense of the litigation referred to is very considerable, 843.—The means which the public have of obtaining information as to the grounds on which the City claims its privileges is to consult a lawyer, who would refer to the old books, the Commissioner's Report, or some other record of the law, 844.—The charters of the City of London are not accessible to the public. Applied to the present town clerk, for the inspection of the charters; but Mr. Sergeant Merewether stated that he was compelled to refuse, 845.—Has found great difficulty in obtaining access to the records of the corporation, popular copies of which have been already before the public, 846.—Thinks that an unusual cause for litigation exists here, because the public are unable to ascertain the nature of the very laws or legal regulations upon which the claim is based, 848.—Does not think it reasonable in a case like that of Messrs. Combe and Co., of a right which the City seek to enforce by expensive litigation, to withhold a knowledge of the charters upon which the claim is made, 849.—Before the Evidence Act, it was the usual practice, in litigation of that sort, to drive the defendant to a bill of discovery to obtain information, 850.—The City of London considers itself in the same position as the lord of a manor or proprietor of the toll of a bridge, and the officers are instructed not to expose the records to the public view. Practically, they treat them in the same way in which a private proprietor would treat the title deeds of his estate, 851, 852.—It is upon that ground that they are resisting that discovery. If it had not been Combe, Delafield, and Co., but some poor corn merchant, he would have been ruined before the first bill of discovery could have been brought to a close. The Licensing Act secures the privileges of the City. One of the privileges is, that members of the vintners' company are entitled to carry on the business of publicans. Believes that brothels and dancing houses have been occasionally kept by members of the vintners' company. The company exercises very little control over its members in regard to their trade, provided they pay the quarterage, 853, 854.—In process of time the persons who become members of companies have nothing to do with the trade the name of which the particular companies bear, 855.—Some of the companies enforce their rights, 856.—The Evidence Act gives a power to a Court of Common Law of granting an inspection of the Charters, 857.—The City of London claim the right that paramount effect should be given to its usages, unless specifically repealed in an Act of Parliament. The great evil which arises from those customs of the City being placed in the position in which they stand by so many confirmatory Acts of Parliament is, that there is always a doubt whether they continue to exist or not, and whether they shall avail against a public general Act of Parliament, 858, 859.—Possibly, if Messrs. Combe and Co. were to attempt to obtain an inspection of the charters of the City by means of an order of a judge at chambers they would be opposed on the ground that the City was not specifically named in the Evidence Act, therefore the Evidence Act might only give rise to further litigation, 863.—The companies do not, except in very few small instances, exercise any power over trade, but the corporation at large have a power over the companies, and might insist upon the companies being composed only of the members of the trade, 861.—Statement with regard to the regulation of the metropolis, and the power of the corporation beyond the limits of the City, 862, 863.—Statement with regard to the connexion of the City with Southwark, 864–866.—The best plan with regard to Southwark, as with regard to all the other metropolitan boroughs, would be to incorporate it separately, 867.—Does not apprehend any great difficulty in regard to property or otherwise in severing Southwark from the City of London, or any practical difficulties, if it were thought expedient upon public grounds, 868–870.—Thinks it probable that as the franchises of the City in Southwark are not remunerative to the corporation, there might have been no desire in former times on the part of the corporation to bring Southwark effectually within its limits. If Southwark had really formed one of the wards of the City, the four or five common councilmen who might have been returned for the ward of Bridge Without, where the inhabitants have no interest in the hereditary revenues of the City, would still have a voice in the common council, in voting away those revenues; the City would therefore have considerable interest in not allowing the inhabitants of Southwark to participate in the franchises, 871.—Two or three centuries ago, Southwark was a much poorer place than it is now, which was likely to be a stronger motive to prevent the City taking any effective means for incorporating Southwark within their boundary, than the legal difficulties, which could have been overcome by an Act of Parliament, 872-874.—At one time there were common councilmen and an alderman chosen by the inhabitants of the ward of Bridge Without, 875.—Statements respecting the constitution of the corporation. It has no governing charter, and no Act of Parliament which really defines what its constitution is. The early charters and some of the early statutes simply declare that the citizens of London as a body should have all their ancient customs; but there is nothing said as to whether they were a corporation, or in what way they formed a body politic, 876.—It differed materially in this respect from the corporations of other towns in the kingdom. Alludes to various charters from William the Conqueror downwards. The title of mayor was first used in the time of Henry III., 877.—The office is spoken of in the time of John; but it is possible that the title of mayor might have been merely descriptive of an officer who had existed for a long time before, 878.—There is no charter or Act of Parliament which expressly says there shall be a mayor, aldermen, and common council; but there are charters which have conferred upon the corporation powers which can only be exercised by them, 879, 880.—Thinks the title of alderman can be traced to the time of Henry II. A law which has been certified in the courts of Westminster is that before a person can become a citizen of London he must become free of one of the companies. The companies, therefore, legally form an integral part of the corporation of London. In 1835, there having been a great dispute between the guilds and the City, the common council came to a resolution that persons might be admitted to be free of the City without being free of one of the companies, 881.—This resolution is specifically mentioned in the first volume of Strange's Reports, 882.—It appears to have been an attempt to repeal a usage which had the strength of an Act of Parliament, 883.—If a company had sought to enforce its rights against the resolution, the resolution would certainly not have been strong enough to prevail against them, 884.—Statement respecting the claim of the corporation to a right of repealing by an act of common council the charters under which they derive their powers, 885.—The Court of

Common Council have very extensive powers; they made a change in the office of alderman before the City Elections' Act was passed, by regulating the right to vote at certain elections, 886.—Is not aware of any act of legislation or administration within the power of the corporation of London which could not be performed in common council, except the elections which take place in common hall, 887, 888.—Thinks that because a person belonging to a company becomes a freeman of the City of London the company itself is included in the corporation. Mentions Wannell's case, 889.—Is not prepared to discuss the question of the expediency of the step taken by the common council of admitting freemen not members of some company, but has no doubt as to the illegality of it. It was this question of illegality, as well as the question of expediency, that induced the companies, upon the occasion of the Bill being brought in, in the year before last, to oppose the corporation of London. The preamble was not proved, and the Bill was lost. The object of the Bill was to repeal an Act of 1849, which was also a private Act, and an Act of George I., called "The City Elections Act." The Act of George I. gave the livery companies the exclusive right of election at Guildhall in the choice of chamberlain, mayor, and sheriffs, and gave to freemen householders, paying certain rates, the choice in the wards of ward officers, aldermen and common councilmen, 890.—The corporation was in great confusion when that Act was introduced, and perhaps it got worse afterwards. There were inconveniences with regard to rates and so on until the Act of George I. and the Act of 1849 got over those objections, and gave to householders who were freemen the right to vote. Then the City Bill gave the liverymen a power of electing in conjunction with the householders, and to householders the monopoly of voting in ward elections, 891.—The Bill proposed to retain the votes of the livery for certain purposes. The Court of Aldermen claim a very extensive power over elections. There was a case of the Queen v. Johnston, which came before the Court of Queen's Bench, where this custom was set forth, that "when the inhabitants of any ward shall three times elect and return to the Court of Mayor and Aldermen the same person to be alderman who shall be by the said court, according to another custom, adjudged not to be a fit person, the mayor and aldermen may elect a fit person, being a freeman, out of the whole body of citizens, to be alderman of such ward." The case went afterwards to the House of Lords. This was held to be a valid custom. The case referred to is that of Mr. Scales, who was three times returned, and three times objected to by the Court of Aldermen, who then claimed their right to exercise the franchise themselves, 892.—No reasons were given; it was a veto by the court. That is a power on the part of the Court of Aldermen which appears to witness to be highly objectionable, 893.—Statement with regard to the order and government of the corporation, 894.—In electing a mayor, practically speaking, the Court of Aldermen present and the livery institute, but it is not strictly so, for the livery have vindicated their right to go out of the order of seniority, 895.—The custom has been than none but aldermen shall be elected; but doubts exist whether the livery might not choose a gentlemen not an aldermen. Thinks that they might choose a common councilman, or go beyond that and choose a citizen of London, 896–898.—A constant practice will amount to a legal and binding usage, 899.—The custom has been for the lord mayor to be an alderman. There has been no practice to the contrary, within the time of memory; and there are Acts of common councils which have settled that he must have been a sheriff, 900.—An Act of common council may be repealed, 901.—Thinks it would be expedient that any eminent merchant in London, though he had only taken up his freedom the day before, should be eligible to become lord mayor, which would have a tendency to diminish the consequence of the office of alderman, 902, 903.—Does not see that any great evil would arise from that. The lord mayor is a most essential officer, and could scarcely be dispensed with. The office of alderman is unpopular at the present time. Many of the powers which they exercise, and which are not essential to the wellbeing of the corporation, might be taken away, 901.—Practically no question can be brought before the common council without the assent of the aldermen, 905.—It has become the common practice, 906.—The Court of Aldermen read over the business which is to be transacted by the Court of Common Council the next day. It is their practice to sit with open doors, 907, 908.—Thinks the court sit about once a fortnight, or once in three weeks, 909.—The Court of Aldermen have the power to order prosecutions, independently of their right to be apprized of questions which come before the Court of Common Council. Thinks it an objectionable power, 910.—Cannot say whether they claim an unlimited power of granting pensions, 911.—There is a resolution of the Court of Common Council which declares that no sum exceeding a certain amount shall be voted without their consent, 912.—Within the limit so fixed, the Court of Aldermen can exercise discretion as to votes of money for prosecutions, 913.—A vote of money taken for promoting or opposing a private bill in Parliament would be made by the Court of Common Council. The remembrancer could only act by petition, and that would come before Parliament under the common seal. The common seal can only be affixed by a vote of the common council, 914, 915.—The inducement the Court of Aldermen have to interfere in respect to prosecutions is that the aldermen individually are magistrates of the City of London, and are therefore sometimes exposed to a number of actions, 916.—Has no doubt that they discharge the functions of a public prosecutor out of the City funds. The principle is bad, 917.—The influence of the committing magistrate weighs with his colleagues in directing prosecutions in some cases, 918.—Can give no notion what number of prosecutions have been directed by the Court of Aldermen of late years, 919.—Supposing the power of the Court of Aldermen to direct prosecutions were abolished, the cost would fall first upon the rates, and then upon the Home Office, 920.—They have no rate in the nature of a county rate in the City; but there are consolidated rates. The prosecutor would in fact be reimbursed under a different system, but not to the same extent, 921, 922.—They take the burden off the hands of the prosecutor, appointing both attorney and counsel, 923.—They do it in the same way that the Government would do it. Proposes that there should be a public prosecutor appointed in every case in the metropolis. The power of the sheriffs within the City is hardly more than ceremonial, 924.—States the power they have with respect to the jury panel. That it is all done by their officers. The jury are returned by the secondaries, who are paid officers of the City, 925.—Has heard, but cannot say whether the sheriffs' officers make a profit out of the fees received from persons attending trials at the Old Bailey. States the legislative powers of the Court of Common Council. The lord mayor has the power of dissolving the court by taking up the mace, 926.—The court is then indefinitely adjourned; the proceedings are at an end, and have to be commenced again, 927.—States the forms necessary for the meeting of the Court of Common Council. One of the attorneys of the Mayor's Court is the person who issues the precept, 928.—The days for the meeting of the courts are fixed in the month of December, and the common council meet upon those days as a matter of course, 929.—It would not be in the power of the lord mayor to prevent the Court of Common Council meeting at all. Apprehends that if he were to abuse his power in that way a mandamus from the Court of Queen's Bench would set him right. With respect to the power of voting away money, they have the management of all the funds of the corporation of London, the hereditary revenues, the tolls, and the city lands, 930.—The lord mayor takes the chair at all meetings of the common council, 931.—He acts as speaker of the assembly, puts questions to the vote, and decides points of order, 932, 933.—Is not aware of any control over the corporation which the Court of Common Council may not exercise, 934.—They have more extensive power over their funds than other corporations enjoy, 935, 936.—They have an unlimited power of charging their property. Is aware, by the Municipal Corporation Act that power is limited, and that the consent of the Treasury is required. They can alienate their property, 937–939.—Suppose there is a proposal made for some measure to be adopted by the corporation, and there is a question whether it is within the power of the common council. If it is a mere exercise of corporation powers, they would rest upon the customs of the City, which confer an unlimited power upon the common council, 940.—Any member of the common council has the right of bringing forward any motion he thinks fit, having given previous notice, without the consent, and without any limit from the

Court of Aldermen, 941–943.—They merely deliberate beforehand upon the business which is to be brought forward in the Court of Common Council, exercising no veto upon the questions, 944, 945.—The livery are the higher class of members of the companies, who have the power of meeting in the common hall, or the general assembly at the Guildhall, for the election of the lord mayor, sheriffs, and chamberlain. The livery is the name which was originally applied to the whole of the citizens of London. The expense of being called to be a liveryman, which in the higher companies is 1,000*l*.. and sometimes more, in the smaller companies is reduced to almost nothing, they being desirous of obtaining members for the sake of the small fees which are paid, 946, 947.—The masters and wardens, with a small body called the court, are the governing body of the companies. They are generally elected by the liveries. They freemen are entitled to participate in the charities, 948–950.—There are some companies without a livery; there are some which exist without a charter from the Crown, which have never been admitted to the freedom of the City, 951.—The Court, of Common Hall is now very numerously attended, being composed of persons who have been members of livery companies. They are not easily identified. They come in great crowds to the Guildhall, and they are not regulated by such efficient rules as are necessary to preserve order. Among the liverymen there are some who have been compelled to become free, in order to be fellowship porters or watermen, and having taken up their freedom think it just as well to take up their livery. It has been said upon elections for sheriffs they get a sum of money for voting, and also in the corrupt times now passed away, they had something for voting for members of Parliament. The corporation of London might have remedied those inconveniences, but they have not done so, 952.—The Court of Common [Council might have remedied those inconveniences as the legislature has done. The votes might be taken in a proper manner, 953.—Looking at the corporation of London as regards the rest of the metropolis, the City of London is very highly officered, 954.—The officers have been multiplied without necessity. The conflict of power between the different officers is a very serious matter. It is said that throughout the metropolis there are upwards of one hundred different boards for local purposes, 955.—Refers to none but paid officers. The corporation has almost for every purpose, and every department of municipal government, four or five classes of officers. In the legal department they have the recorder, and the common serjeant, who are considered to be the counsel of the corporation, 956.—The duties of the recorder of the City of London greatly exceed the duties of the recorder of any other corporation. There can be no practical resemblance between them, 957.—It is a peculiar privilege of the recorder of London to certify the customs of the City orally, and not in writing. Cannot see that any great advantage is derived from it, 958–960.—It appears to be derived from a time when writing was not generally adopted in our courts, 961.—Practically, now the recorder forms his opinion of the privileges of the City from books, and he then goes down to Westminster and delivers his opinion orally, 962.—He delivers the record in writing. Practically the effect is this: when an issue is raised upon a custom of London, the court in which the issue is raised leave it to the recorder to certify the custom; but when the recorder has delivered his certificate, if there should be a doubt upon the point, and the parties are not satisfied with it, the mode of trial is against the lord mayor and aldermen for a false return of the certiorari, and that must be tried by a jury, as in ordinary cases, 963.—Does not know that there has been any instance of it, but knows that it has been laid down in Westminster, and that is the only mode of trying it, 964.—The judicial duties of both the recorder and common serjeant are conferred by Act of Parliament. Witness here states the duties of the other judicial officers and of the town clerk, 965–969. —Witness here states the duties of the remembrancer, who is a solicitor, 970, 971.—Believes there is no corporation in England which has an officer like the remembrancer, to watch all the bills that come before Parliament, 972.—It would not be a legal act to apply the funds of a corporation, under the General Municipal Act, to the promotion or opposition of a private bill before Parliament, 973.—For instance, if a railway were contemplated near Liverpool or Norwich, should say it would not be in the power of the corporation of those towns to apply a portion of their funds to opposing the bill before Parliament, 974.—If it affected the corporation it would not be improper. Certainly in that case it would not be illegal, 975.—The corporation would have the power to oppose any bill which they might reasonably suppose to affect themselves or their property. Does not think that parliamentary expenses can be put upon a different footing to legal expenses in defending an action, and undoubtedly they would be at liberty to bring or defend an action, 977.—If there were a project for making a new railway ten or twenty miles from a town, which did not touch the property, but indirectly affected the interests of the town, it depends upon the question whether the rights of property of the corporation were involved or not whether it would be legal, out of the funds of the town, to oppose the bill, 978—Proceeds with statement in reference to the other officers of the corporation, 979.—Has seen great efficiency among the officers of the corporation, 980.—Any evils which now exist in the official establishment of the corporation have arisen from the want of system in legislating for altered circumstances, and not from any corruption on the part of the corporation, or any wish to multiply the number of officers, 982.—The whole system is too complicated, and so requires a great number of persons to conduct it, 983.

Pulling, Alexander, Esq. (Second Examination.) —Under the ancient custom of the City of London there are very peculiar jurisdictions, both civil and criminal. Statement as to those laws. It might be a question whether, if a freeman of London were to commit a felony at York, he might not have the right to be tried in London, because the citizens of London are not to plead "Without the walls of the City for any plea," 1849.—Probably if such a case were to occur, there would be an end put to the right, 1850.—Is not aware of any such a plea in a prosecution by the Crown. There are instances of such pleas in civil actions (here witness enters into a long statement relative to the peculiar laws of the City of London), 1851–1856. —Believes that practically very few cases are tried at the London sessions except assaults and petty cases of that sort; but civil business is transacted, 1857.—They are held eight times a year, 1858.—The lord mayor and aldermen are the justices; the recorder is also a justice, and acts as assessor of the court, 1859. —The common serjeant is not a judge in that court, 1860.—The Central Criminal Court Act took away the jurisdiction from the Middlesex and all the metropolitan sessions, except in some very petty cases; but this section was repealed two years ago, and the Middlesex sessions now try a very large number of cases. The business is still principally carried on at other courts, 1861.—The City of London being a county, has a separate coroner, who is also coroner of Southwark. The lord mayor is the coroner, and acts by the deputy coroner, 1862.—Who is appointed by the Court of Aldermen; he is the gentleman who is now steward of the Southwark court. There is also a custom upon this subject, which creates a sort of distinct court in the lord mayor personally, acting neither as justice nor judge, but as a sort of arbitrator of differences. Explains how, 1863.—The lord mayor practically exercises his power, 1864.—It appears to describe a court of arbitration. The civil courts having jurisdiction in the City are very numerous, namely, the Court of Hustings, the Mayor's Court, which is a court of law and a court of equity, the Court of the Sheriffs, the Courts of the Sheriffs' Compters, the Small Debts Court, and the Appeal Court, 1865.—The trials in the Lord Mayor's and Sheriffs' Courts are always by jury, as in other courts, except the Court of Equity in the Mayor's Court. The Court of Hustings is the highest court. States its peculiarities. The return of probates of wills in the hustings, made to the House of Commons July 31st 1843, contained a long list as far back as Henry III., and in the time of William and Mary, 1867.—There are no wills of later date than William and Mary. There is an enrolment of deeds as far back as Henry I., 1868.—The ancient enrolment of wills has been disused for a number of years, but the customs of London will prevail, usi vel abusi; therefore, they may be raked up by anyone who wishes to set up a fraudulent title. The next court is the Mayor's Court, which has a general unlimited jurisdiction in civil cases and in personal actions, but not in real actions; and also under the customs of London particular powers with respect to distribution. It has a peculiar mode of proceeding by concessit solvere, and also as to femmes covert. Then there is a peculiar custom in the distribution of intestates' estates, 1869.—The custom of London is expressly saved by the statute of distribution. This custom of distribution gives the wife a greater share than she would get elsewhere, and prevails wherever the party is a freeman of London. States a case, 1870.—The ground of the decision in this case was, that the custom applied to honorary freemen. There are two courts of the sheriffs' compter. The compter is a court to which a prison is attached, but a distinct court. Formerly there was a judge or under-sheriff attached to each court, but of late years the Court of Common Council have resolved not to appoint a judge to one, so that they call the judge who is appointed the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, in the singular number. There is no court called the Sheriffs' Court, 1871.—The two Sheriffs' Courts have a very extensive jurisdiction. Their peculiar process of attachment and arrest. The City courts have power to arrest debtors fugitive, and to arrest before a debt becomes due. Particular practitioners attached to the Lord Mayor's Court, 1872.—The custom of London not having been expressly repealed by the 6 & 7 Victoria, it was doubted whether it did not prevail against that Act, 1873.—In 1852 the aldermen (as judges of the court) resolved that the Mayor's Court should be thrown open to all attorneys and barristers, 1874–1876.—An action is still pending in the Queen's Bench, whether the attorneys of the Mayor's Court have not still a monopoly, 1875.—Offices of the attorneys and pleader were formerly sold. Corporation have commenced a system of election. The Small Debts Court emanates from the Sheriffs' Court. Account of the passing of the Small Debts Bill for the City of London, 1877.—No county court in London. The Small Debts Court is engrafted on the Sheriffs' Court, 1878.—The City of London is exempted from the general County Courts Act; has a Small Debts Court under a local act. There is the Court of Appeal in St. Martin's-le-Grand, not a permanent one, 1879.—There is the Mayor's Court as a court of equity, the general jurisdiction of which from some cause has not been resorted to, 1880.—It was the practice when limited to four pleaders to take in other gentlemen specially, the pleaders always having a brief in the case. Has practised there, 1881, 1882.—No prejudice has arisen from the judge of the Mayor's and Sheriffs' Court being appointed by the citizens, nor suspicion of partiality, 1883, 1884.—The practical jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court of Equity is confined to cases of apprenticeship, 1885.—In cases of action in one of the superior courts, and judgment by default, so that a writ of inquiry goes to the sheriffs, it is executed in the Secondaries Court, 1886.—The secondaries are appointed by the common council, are deputies of the sheriffs, and sit as judges. There is only one at present. Describes the arbitrary power of the lord mayor in the Court of Equity. Describes the Orphans' Court. There are twelve or thirteen City courts, and there is no reason now for continuing their peculiar jurisdictions, 1887, 1888.—The peculiar jurisdictions are privileges of the City. The right of holding courts is a franchise of the City, is a corporation right, 1889.—The corporation derive no benefit, if there is any advantage it accrues to the citizens at large. It would be an advantageous change to have one good court for trial by jury in the City of London out of the wreck of all the other courts. The Mayor's Court is a useful court, and if regulated by Act of Parliament, an appeal being given from it to the courts of Westminster, would be a desirable change, 1890–1892.—Thinks the custom of attachment gives a creditor an unfair advantage in the City of London. It would be advantageous to extend it all over the kingdom. It applies in Scotland often with advantage. Would do away with all customs of the City which conflict with the law of the land, 1893, 1894.—There are two opinions whether it be a good law or not, that a custom of the City can only be taken away by Act of Parliament. But that is the law, 1895, 1896.—It is generally agreed that a custom of the City of London, unless it be expressly recited and set forth in the Act and repealed, would hold good against general words in an Act of Parliament, 1897–1900.—When a plaintiff is sued for a debt of larger amount than the value of the property attached, the bail must be for the whole amount of the debt, which leads to much inconvenience, 1901, 1902.—If the defendant were only compelled to give bail to the amount of the goods attached, and the garnishee keep the goods till the ultimate decision, it would be an improvement, 1903, 1904.—Goods attached are liable to attachment. Gives a case, 1905.—Can appeal from the recorder to the Court of St. Martin's-le-Grand, 1906.—Thinks it would be an advantage to have cases of this kind removed by a certiorari. Would remove the attachment itself by an alteration of the law, so as to give the courts at Westminster control over the courts in London, 1907.—It would be right to consolidate the various courts, and have one civil court in the City for the recovery of debts, allowing persons to sue in the City, with the option of suing in the superior courts, 1908, 1909.—There are similar courts in other places. Names them, 1910.—It would be difficult to modify the custom of attachment by any Act of Parliament. To preserve the customs of London, an officer called a remembrancer attends at the House of Commons to watch every bill introduced into Parliament, and to see that no bill touches the rights and privileges of the City. He gets a clause inserted that this Act shall not be prejudicial to the rights and privileges of the City of London. In this way the City of London has been exempt from the same changes which the will of the Legislature has produced in the rest of the kingdom. Would make the general law prevail in the City as elsewhere, and all conflicting customs should be repealed. Believes there is great inconvenience arising from the conflict of jurisdictions in criminal cases. It would be a great advantage if the Central Criminal Court were made the only criminal court for the whole metropolis, 1911, 1912.—To provide a sufficient number of judges for the Central Criminal Court, assistant judges might be elected, and the minor cases taken in the weeks when the court was not sitting for the higher class cases. This would do away with any criminal court in the metropolitan district except the central, 1913, 1914.—Cases are now tried at Newington, and other places in Kent or Surrey within the district of the Central Criminal Court, 1915.—The alteration of the law has taken business from that court, and restored it to the Middlesex quarter sessions. That change is in the wrong direction, 1916, 1917.—The Central Criminal Court is held twelve times a year, the sessions lasting from two to ten days. Thinks that two judges sitting for a week longer than the usual sessions would be sufficient for the proposed alteration, 1920.—It is usual to have three judges of the courts at Westminster at the Central Criminal Court, but one would be quite sufficient, 1921–1922.—The Central Criminal Court Act only requires that the lord mayor and two aldermen should be present, 1923.—The real judge who is to try the case, the recorder or the common serjeant, or one of the judges of the, and, would alone be sufficient to constitute a court. In addition to this change, the services of the grand jury might be dispensed with, as they appear to impede the business considerably. It is never known what bills are likely to be found at a particular time, the list only being made out at uncertain hours of the day.—The consequence is, the cases are called on, and excuses made for the absence of witnesses, prosecutors, or the counsel, and many other inconveniences arise. If an efficient system of responsible police magistrates were adopted throughout the metropolitan district, the grand jury would be of no use. There ought to be within the City in every case a public prosecutor. There is, at this moment, a City solicitor, who occasionally acts as public prosecutor. The Court of Aldermen direct prosecutions, and have the power of using the City funds for that purpose, and it certainly is the case that they select the cases where the City solicitor is to interfere. They may be actuated by the best motives. In any change regulating the corporation of London, it ought to be compulsory upon them to appoint a public prosecutor, 1924, 1925.—The City, being a county, could make a county rate, to be applied to prosecutions, but they do not do so, 1926, 1927.—One of the enactments of the bill for abolishing the grand jury was, that every person should be put upon his trial upon the commitment of a police magistrate. The same regulations should be attended to in the City as in police courts in the rest of the metropolis; men should be appointed who devote their whole time to the business of magistrates, and not tradesmen and merchants who have their own affairs to attend to, 1928. Can scarcely judge whether the aldermen rely to any considerable extent upon the advice of their paid assessor, in administering justice, having been so little before the magistrates in police courts. Was engaged in one case, this year, where the alderman himself convicted, and afterwards sat as magistrate to enforce the conviction, 1929.—States case, 1930.—The Municipal Act gives a power to the corporation to apply to the Government, and the Crown appoints the stipendiary magistrates, the town council fixing the salary, 1931, 1932.—Cannot judge what the common council would do if they had such a power, 1933.—Thinks that an opposition would be made in the common council to the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate, by the majority of the members, they having no control over the appointment. Previous to the reign of George II. only aldermen who had passed the chair were magistrates. The lord mayor had power to appoint two magistrates for Middlesex, a power which has not been exercised, and was decided to be illegal by the Court of Queen's Bench some time ago. For the proper government of the metropolis, the 700 Acts of Parliament for the regulation of its local affairs should be consolidated, 1934.—More than half of these local Acts are in force in the City, 1935, 1936.—There must be 200 charters relating to the City of London, but it is difficult to say what are in force, 1937, 1938.—Has fifty charters in print relating to the City itself. There is no printed collection of charters. Cannot say how many are in force but not in print. There must be at least twenty more relating to the corporation alone, 1939–1941.—The corporation of late years has denied the public access to their charters, to prevent that discovery of their contents to which every resident in London is entitled. There are old byelaws of the City declaring that its laws and customs should be made known to the public, who were to be affected by them, but the officers are instructed to withhold the information, 1942.—The proper custodium of the charters is Mr. Serjeant Merewether, the town clerk, who refuses access to them, 1943.—One of the standing orders of the common council now is, that no officer shall show the records or charters of the corporation without leave of the court, 1944.—If the City claim under a charter an extensive public right, and seek to enforce it by litigation, they ought undoubtedly to put the defendant in full possession of the legal instrument under which the claim is made, 1945, 1946.—Can conceive a strong reason why the charters should not be made public, believing that the City has committed the forfeiture of many of its rights. States cases, 1947, 1948.—Looking to the public good, and the interests of the persons affected by the charters, there can be no reason why they should not be made public. Believes that if every large metropolitan borough was incorporated, and the Municipal Corporation Act applied generally to each district, great advantage would be obtained. The question of police magistracy requires to be settled. One uniform system of police should be established throughout the whole of the metropolis, and one common system of sewerage. Would reserve to the City all the rights it now legally possesses. Electing its own officers, the livery companies having those powers, require considerable reform. Those which have ceased to have any connexion with the trade they profess to represent should be altogether disconnected with the City, and exist as voluntary societies, or should restore the members of their particular trade to all the rights in the guild which they formerly possessed, 1949.—The livery of the trade companies being connected with the election of certain great officers in the City, the constitution of the companies becomes material to the question of corporation reform. There is no body of liverymen independent of the companies, 1950–1953.—The trade of London could not be conveniently represented in the corporation in any other way than through the companies, 1954.—Conceives that the livery are much more the representatives of the trade of London than the freemen householders. There are more of the City merchants among the livery than in the corporation at large, 1955.—Many members of the great commercial houses are not freemen at all, but some are free of the companies, and some also free of the City, though few reside there, or have interfered in any business of the corporation, 1956, 1957.—The companies have very little connexion with the trades whose name they bear, but thinks it desirable that connexion should be restored. Restoring the livery to something like its ancient position in the City would secure to the corporation a more permanent body than if the burgess list consisted only of persons who were rated for a year. The son of a banker of the last generation, who might have been free of one of the great companies, becomes free by patrimony, 1958–1960.—The waterman's company have no livery, but many of their members are free of the City, and take up their livery in some of the smaller companies, 1961.—They are not a good class of voters. Would allow no one to be on the livery unless elected by the general freemen, 1962, 1963.—There could be no objection to their electing into their own body if the electors were members of the trade. At present they are strangers, 1964.—At one time the courts of aldermen and common council possessed each a distinct power, which power, for all useful purposes, is gone, and would destroy it altogether, 1965, 1966.—The aldermen are members of the Court of Common Council, and meet in the Court of Aldermen separately, 1967.—They have the power of electing to certain offices, and have very considerable patronage over the hospitals, exercised by them as a court, 1968, 1969.—They always vote and decide by a majority, but the room is cleared of strangers before a decision is made, 1970.—The liverymen ought to elect the great officers of the corporation, and believes, at present, among the 9,000 liverymen are some of the best freemen of London, 1971, 1972.—Every man guilty of corruption could be easily disfranchised if efficient regulations were established in the City for that purpose, 1973.—As the case now stands, the recorder is appointed by the aldermen, the common serjeant by the Court of Common Council, and the sheriffs by the liverymen in common hall, 1974.—Would not have a judicial officer appointed by a general body like the livery, not the recorder, 1975.—Thinks it inconvenient to appoint the aldermen for life, 1976.—The regulation of the Municipal Corporations Act, by which one third of the town council go out each year, may be advantageous, but in the City of London would make the election for the town council annual, as it is at present. The election of all unpaid officers and all members of the corporation should be annual, 1977.—There is a doubt as to the legal period for which aldermen are elected. There is an Act of Parliament which declares the aldermen shall be elected annually, and there is an ordinance which appears upon the rolls of Parliament, in the reign of Richard II., which directs that the aldermen shall not be removed, but it is doubted whether this last is an Act of Parliament, 1978.—It is not printed, and there are many Acts of Parliament relating to London not in print, 1979.—In order to ascertain the law with respect to any custom of the City of London, it is necessary to go into a very laborious antiquarian research, both into printed and manuscript authorities, 1980, 1981.

QUARTER SESSIONS. (See Courts.)

RATES:

In the City they pay church rate, and all other parochial expenses independently of the municipal expenses, Elliot, 1101.

RECORDER:

Statement as to the office, Pulling, 956–965.—The salary attached is 3,000*l.* a year, and some trifling fees. Has made a return of those fees to the town clerk, which will be laid before the Commission.—The amount in 1852 was 150 guineas, in 1851 sixteen guineas, and in 1853 fifteen guineas. There are deductions to be made, namely, a clerk and chambers, which together cost at present about 85*l.* Wortley, 5488–5490.—Duties of the, ib. 5491–5496. 5500–5504.—Elected by Court of Aldermen, Lord Mayor, 7200.—Is appointed by Court of Aldermen, Acland, 469.—Proposes that in future he should be appointed by the Crown, ib. 473.

REFORM ACT. (See Act.)

REFORM:

Proposes to extend the provisions of the General Municipal Act to the City of London, placing all judicial functions in the hands of officers appointed by the Crown, and paid out of the City funds, and to incorporate the City police with the merropolitan, and to leave the board of sewers as it is at present, with exclusive City jurisdiction, Elliot, 1129, 1130.—Any gentleman trying to make any reform is told that the corporation is very comfortable as it is, Alcock, 1756.

REFORM—continued.

—Committees appointed in 1834 and 1836 to reform the corporation, Williams, 2830.—If the Municipal Corporation Act were applied to the City, it would be as good a municipal government as any in England, ib. 2835–2838.—One municipal body would work more advantageously for the community at large than the present system, Lord Mayor, 7159.—Would have one constitutional body. The whole body should have a voice in the election of lord mayor and sheriffs. Is in favour of a constituency founded upon the ancient existing privileges of the City of London, ib. 7159–7161.—Would have all places which are boroughs for Parliamentary purposes also boroughs for municipal purposes, ib. 7171.—Reforms are needed in the City; if the 11th of George I. and all subsequent Acts were repealed, all fines upon freedom, all City tolls abolished, great advantages would be the result, ib. 7178–7180. Any one who occupies a shop should be a voter for municipal purposes, wherever he may reside, ib. 7197. —A municipality is incomplete unless its corporation has entire jurisdiction over the lighting and supply of water to the district; and thinks that if powers were given to the corporation to buy up the interests of private companies, and deal with the subject as one of municipal government, great advantage would result, ib. 7201.—Thinks the different municipal districts might work upon one uniform principle, and have the entire management of their own affairs, ib. 7202.—There is a committee now sitting to consider certain improvements and alterations to be recommended to this Commission, composed of aldermen and common councilmen, Farebrother, 7224.—Reform was commenced in the corporation in 1817, Pearson, 8476, 8477.

REFORM, MUNICIPAL. (See Municipal.)

REMEMBRANCER:

States duties of, Pulling, 970, 971.—The emoluments attached to the office are derived from two sources; one is a certain annual payment of 1,000*l.* a year from the corporation, and 250*l.* a year for office expenses. Is also entitled to charge for parliamentary business done for funds, under Acts of Parliament, or otherwise not chargeable on the City cash; the amount of which, for the year 1852, gives the average of the previous five years about 700*l.* There would be a separate charge for business done for the police or sewers funds, Tyrrell, 5366, 5372.—Has no patronage, ib. 5373.—The duties of the office are comprised under two heads; one, the conduct of parliamentary business, and the other attending to all points of form and ceremony, ib. 5374–5387.

RENTAL OF THE CITY:

There has been considerable increase in the rental of the City, Scott, 4594.

RICHARDSON, PHILETUS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a solicitor; carries on his profession in the City of London. Has never been a member of the corporation, 2562–2565.—There was a newspaper called "The Citizen" established in the City about the latter part of 1848 or beginning of 1849, 2566.—Was subsequently professionally employed on the purchase of the copyright of that paper, for Mr. Benjamin Scott and Mr. Toulmin Smith, from a man named Peet, 2567–2569.—Does not know exactly with whom the idea of purchasing the copyright of that newspaper originated; but thinks, with Mr. Scott, they did not establish the paper, but became the purchasers of the copyright, 2570.—Thinks a portion of the funds necessary to carry on the paper were furnished by officers of the corporation, in the first place out of their individual funds; but whether they were recompensed for their outlay out of the corporate funds cannot say. Mr. Scott, as an active member of the corporation, was anxious that some efficient report should be made of their proceedings, 2572, 2573.—It was not intended to be wholly confined to the publication of reports. A representation was made to the lord mayor of the supposed want of a proper report of the proceedings of the corporation; it was ordered to be referred to the consolidated committee, who considered the subject; but does not know what decision they came to, but knows that the solicitor of the City, Mr. Charles Pearson, and Mr. Scott, waited on Mr. Toulmin Smith to obtain his services as editor, 2574, 2575.—Mr. Toulmin Smith superintended for a short time the management and publication of the paper, 2576.—Is not certain what officers of the corporation subscribed to the support of the paper; but believes the remembrancer, Mr. Tyrrell did, and Mr. Scott, 2578–2581.—The paper did appear; thinks there were ten numbers published, eight after the purchase, 2582.—There were leading articles in those numbers chiefly devoted to corporation matters, 2583, 2584.—Mr. Toulmin Smith's inducement to purchase, with Mr. Scott, the copyright of the paper was, that having given great attention to the subject of municipal corporations, and taken up various matters connected with the City, he was desirous of doing so in the most effectual way, and upon Mr. Scott's representation of the utility of the paper, was induced to become the purchaser, 2585–2587.—It was discontinued because Mr. T. Smith's views did not accord with those officers of the corporation who were interested in the establishment of it, 2588.—Would refer the question to Mr. Scott as to the sum given for the purchase of this newspaper, 2589.

RICHARDSON, PHILETUS, Esq. (Second Examination.)—In consequence of the evidence of Mr. Scott, arising upon question No. 3629, denying that he was joint proprietor with Mr. Toulmin Smith, of a paper called the "Citizen," begs to repeat his former statement, that he was employed by Mr. Scott to pay the purchase money for the copyright of that paper on behalf of himself and Mr. Smith, and is ready to put that statement in issue in any manner that may be suggested. Mr. Scott's answer to question 3638 is entirely without foundation. Never raised any claim whatever against the officers, or against the corporation. Did not receive from them 280*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* "without prejudice." It was a troublesome matter, there were several documents prepared, and there was an action at law against Mr. Peel, the original proprietor. Received from Mr. Scott two bills of costs amounting to 72*l.* Offered to Mr. Scott to forego any charges, in consequence of the failure of the project, and under the idea that Mr. Scott was a loser by it, 7703–7706.

RICHARDSON, Mr. WILLIAM BURBIDGE. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an attorney and solicitor, and chief clerk in the comptroller's office, 6674.—The salary of the comptroller is 1,500*l.* a year, partly received from fees, the balance being paid by the Court of Common Council, as arranged by the court in 1845, 6676.—In the year 1852, when the leases of the Conduit Mead Estate fell in, he then received, in addition to 1,500*l.*, 1,230*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.* This can only occur once in 14 years on the renewal of the leases mentioned, 6677–6679. States duties as comptroller, 6681.—He attends the City Lands Committee as secretary and conveyancing solicitor, and carries out all the business relating thereto, and likewise the Markets' Committee, 6682, 6683.—He attends to the receipts of the clerks and collectors, but does not exercise any control over the markets themselves. The committee have the control; the comptroller has only a general superintendence, to see that the collectors do their duty. 6685.—He completes the purchases for all the City improvements, after the committee have settled the claims, 6686.—He acts under the direction of the City Lands, the Markets', the City Improvements, and the Markets' Improvement Committees, and the other committees of the court in relation to the law conveyancing of those committees, embracing the preparation of every variety of deed and document, 6687.—He would not take any important step in either of those matters without the authority of one of those committees, 6688.—He is a ministerial officer, and does not exercise any great discretion of his own, except in the law conveyancing business; their he acts as a solicitor in the ordinary course of professional practice, 6689.—The City solicitor attends to all questions in litigation, both in common law and in equity. The comptroller does all the conveyancing part of the business. The Bridge House Estates have a separate comptroller, 6690, 6691.—The comptroller delivers to the court annually a statement of the amount which the chamberlain ought to receive during the year, of every rent and source of revenue of the corporation belonging to the City's cash, contained in four very large volumes, 6692.—Makes a further statement of the comptroller's duties, 6693.

ROBERTS, Mr. ROBERT. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Carries on business of a fish factor, at 118, Lower Thames Street, 4246, 4247.—The difference between a fish-factor and a fishmonger; one is retail, the other wholesale. The fishmonger buys of the fish-factor, 4248.—For each standing in the market before the year 1823 the rent was 30*s.* a year. A standing is a sort of form. Each dealer uses a standing, 4249–4253.—Since 1823 witness pays 9*s.* a week for a standing. Cannot tell what was the cause of the change. Rather thinks it was made by the corporation, perhaps to put extra gas in the market, 4254–4258.—Should say the rent is now a reasonable rent; has no complaint to make with regard to it, 4259, 4260.—Has not the least complaint to make with respect to the regulations of Billingsgate Market, so far as they are established by the corporation, 4261.—Thinks that is the general opinion of the dealers in the market, 4262.—There are officers of the market whose duties are to see that the market is kept in proper order, cleansed, and so on. They are there by way of protection to the factors. Rather thinks it is the principal officer who does this, the son of Mr. Goldham, 4263–4265.—Has had conversations with Mr. Goldham about the market, which has been newly constructed, and at the present period the forms are not properly arranged. Has asked concerning it, and is told they are to be properly and conveniently arranged, 4266, 4267.—So far as the conduct of the corporation and their officers is concerned, has nothing to complain of, 4268, 4269.

ROGERS, THOMAS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a solicitor in the City of London for nearly thirty years, 2632.—Has been connected with the corporation, having lived 19 years in the ward of Bishopsgate; in 1839 was returned to the common council, and served during that year, 2633.—Is not now in the common council, but a liveryman of the Spectacle Makers' Company, 2634.—Whilst a member of the common council took great part in the business of that body, 2635.—Thinks the practice of the common council is as nearly as possible that of the House of Commons. It is presided over by the lord mayor, the recorder takes votes when anything is to be regulated as to the number of the common council; then an act is passed. Shortly after witness left there was an act passed to reduce the number of the corporation from 243 to 206 or 203; does not remember which. The mode in which the act is passed is this: A member brings in a bill, it is read, a copy sent to each member, it is then considered in committee, and it is afterwards gone through clause by clause and passed, 2636.—Was a member of some of the committees of the common council while belonging to that body, 2637.—Has been on two committees, the coal, corn, and finance committee, and the comittee for general purposes; those committees are ward committees, they have the right of calling before them any officer in the corporation, 2638.—Has seen persons present at these committees, but generally strangers are excluded, 2639.—The proceedings of the Committees are not published, minutes are taken, 2640, 2641.—The minutes are laid before the court of common council. They are not printed, 2642, 2643.—There was one report printed. It was with respect to the coalwhippers, it was by special vote, 2644, 2645.—The functions of the committee for general purposes were, the furnishing of the Mansion House, furnishing Guildhall and upholstery generally, 2646.—The whole of the Mansion House is under the supervision of the committee for general purposes, 2647.—There is a coal, corn, and finance committee, 2648.—There are some special committees appointed, and persons acquainted with the subjects are placed on them, but as a general thing they do not look at any special fitness in the persons they appoint, 2649, 2650.—A person cannot be elected as chairman till he has served two years in the committees, 2651.—Reverting to the committee of general purposes, not a sixpence was allowed so far as money was concerned. Shows what was expended on dinners. The city lands committee were allowed 400*l.* The committee for general purposes were allowed 200*l.*, and the coal, corn, and finance committee were allowed 200*l.* for dinners, 2652, 2653.—The money was spent in this way, and in order to induce the members to attend punctually, the chairman waits five minutes and then his hammer falls, and all those who are then present in the monthly meetings have a right to dine together, all who come after are excluded from the dinner, 2654.—The dinner is once a month. Thinks the system of dinners a good one for this reason, that it brings various members of the committee to the consideration of questions brought before the committees who would otherwise not be brought there, and besides that, they are generally gentlemen who have to leave their house for the whole of the day, 2655–2658.—In addition to the members of the committee the chairman has the right of inviting two friends, generally from his ward. Aldermen who are upon the commission attend, and occasionally one of the officers of the corporation, 2659.—Has no doubt the attendance is fuller at the monthly meetings, after which these dinners take place, 2660, 2661.—The intermediate meetings are generally of the sub-committees, whose members are not so numerous as the committee generally, therefore it would not be fair to draw a comparison between the importance of the monthly and intermediate meetings. In the coal, corn, and finance committee was produced a Blue-book which would not have disgraced Parliament, in regard to the evidence taken before it, 2662–2664.—There were various meetings of the committees on the intermediate occasions, in the coalwhippers' business, which were as fully attended without the inducement of a dinner, as on the occasions when there were dinners, that committee being considered of some importance, 2665–2667.—Produces a statement of the trades of the members of the common council. Begs to say that the aldermen having the conduct of the various wards, show an admirable example as to charity. May say Alderman Copeland has given 10,000*l.* to his ward while he has been alderman, 2668.—Is speaking of his private charities, and has no reason to doubt the other aldermen do the same, though perhaps not to the same extent. Should be sorry to see them superseded as justices of the peace. As a class, thinks them the best magistrates in the country, no doubt from their previous education many of them in the court of common council, and many in the court of aldermen, and their sitting for three months in the course of the year, by the side of the judges, the best school for learning magisterial duties. Mentions Alderman Gibbs as a magistrate of great ability. Reads a charter which he thinks will prevent their being superseded. As justices of Oyer and Terminer, they sit along with the judges, and can give their advice, 2669, 2670.—Has seen them interrupt and ask questions, but very seldom. Never of a witness in court, 2671, 2672.—Has never seen them take any part in the trial of prisoners under the commission of Oyer and Terminer, further than by assisting the judge with advice and counsel as to various practical points which he may not understand, 2673–2677.—Should not suppose any person would make private suggestions against a prisoner, 2678.—They never deliver judgment, but they sit there as judges. Has frequently seen the judges in the Queen's Bench deliberate together, but only one gives judgment. In the same way the judges in these courts deliberate with the aldermen, 2679–2681.—Thinks it would be a difficult matter to deprive the City of any part of their Charter. It would be resisted as earnestly as was the bill to unite the City police to the Metropolitan police brought in by Lord Melbourne. The corporation objected, but seeing the Minister was determined, they fixed their town clerk in New Palace Yard, with a large body of assistants to communicate with every corporation in the United Kingdom, and through their influence the measure was given up, 2682–2686.—Supposes it was represented to them that an attempt was being made to take away part of their duty, the preservation of peace; no doubt the same representations would be made with respect to the attempt to take away the justice business, 2687.—Declines to say how the country corporations did influence the Government, but it is well known how those things are done in the country, 2688.—In dealing with the other corporations of England, by the Municipal Reform Act, Parliament thought itself justified in interfering with the judicial functions of their magistrates, 2689.—In point of principal, thinks the objection, which ought to deter the Legislature from dealing in like manner with the corporation of London, lies in the charter against it, 2690.—There were no charters in the case of the country corporations beyond the reign of Charles, 2691.—A charter under the reign of Edward should be more respected, because the practice under the charter has been longer, 2692.

ROSE, Mr. THOMAS PLANT. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was engaged in the contested election for the office of chamberlain as a confidential agent for Mr. Scott, in the contest between him and Sir John Key, 2904–2907.—There was considerable expenditure on both sides at that election, but not more than usual, 2908.—There is at the election of the office of chamberlain always considerable expense incurred in bringing voters from a distance to record their votes, 2909, 2910.—Sometimes they are paid for their votes, or when they come from a distance for loss of time; at times they are paid for refreshments, 2911.—The voters were paid for being brought from their work; has no knowledge of voters who did not come from a distance being paid to induce them to vote for a particular candidate, 2912, (2913).—The are a great many persons employed as messengers and colourmen, and so on, at elections of this kind and the payment is not more than is due to them for the amount of service which is exacted from them. The average pay is about 7*s.* 6*d.* or 10*s.* a day; some ten, or fifteen, or twenty of them were paid, 20*s.*, (2914–2916).—They were paid for the same thing, only they went about and collected the voters from different parts. They knew where the liverymen lived, (2917).—The total amount expended by Mr. Scott in the contest was about 3,500*l.*; the whole was spent in travelling expenses and the mere cost of agency in canvassing, (2918, 2919).—Does not believe that any payment was made to any one to induce them to give their votes. Heard of payments that were made, but never saw anything of it. There was very little treating going on, (2920–2922).—For Sir John Key's side, the money spent was 1,900*l.*; that was in one particular department; the whole cost of his election was more than 7,000*l.*, (2923, 2924).—Does not think there were more out-voters brought up for Sir John Key than for Mr. Scott, (2926).—Thinks that the great part of the sum expended by Sir John Key was in bringing voters from every part of the country, (2927).—But does not believe that the sum could have been spent bonâ fide for agency only, (2928).—Witness took an active part in the election all through; was conversant with the proceeding on the opposite side as well as his own, (2929, 2930).—Thinks that some portion of the sum of 7,000*l.* expended by Sir John Key was spent in corrupting voters, (2931).—Believes that Mr. Scott's election was lost and Sir John Key's gained by the money so expended, (2933).—Has been conversant with all the municipal elections for some years; in the case of sheriffs they are very different, (2935, 2936).—The sheriffs office is sometimes coveted; there are sometimes four or five in the field, (2937).—Does not believe corruption is ever resorted to in the elections for the office of sheriff. Never heard, on the other hand, of money being expended to induce voters to negative a person nominated as sheriff, (2938, 2939).—Has never had anything to do with any elections besides those of chamberlain and sheriff, (2940).

Roy, Mr. Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is desirous of making some statements to the Commissioners with regard to the system pursued in the City upon the Stock Exchange, 4421.—Once intended to enter the Stock Exchange, but found difficulty in doing so. The opprobrium was so great in attempting to act without being admitted by the Stock Exchange that he declined to do so, 4422.—Complains that the corporation neglect their privileges, and do not exercise their full rights, to the disadvantage of the public, 4423.—The Stock Exchange is entirely a private association. Witness conceives that there is no point on which they are incompatible with the City privileges, except with respect to passing names on contracts in the case of sworn brokers, 4424.—His complaint is against the control which the corporation exercise, 4425.—Thinks the corporation neglect their privileges. Thinks their privilege is, in the first place, a great source of safety to the public, and a more full exercise of it would be beneficial, 4426, 4427.—The corporation, having the privilege of electing sworn brokers for the City, ought also to have the right to enforce the entrance of their brokers into any market, 4428.—Thinks there should not be a private committee of stockbrokers, to exclude any stockbroker from the Stock Exchange after the City of London had given him a licence. The business of all the public bodies, the Bank of England, and the Government, and nearly every other body, is now done in close market; but a question may be raised, how far bargains, done within a market which cannot be entered by the public, are legal. Thinks the corporation should have directed their attention to this point, and, as a part of the exercise of their full privileges, should enforce a legal market, 4429.

Royal Exchange:

Is held under some kind of joint trusteeship between the corporation and one or more of the City companies, Dillon, 709.—The erection of that building was submitted to public competition, the cost to be incurred being set down in the specifications, and the amount of rental necessary to enable the Gresham trustees to carry out their trust. Mr. Tite's plan was adopted, Dakin, 7366–7367.

Rushton, Mr. William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Holds the office of paymaster and collector of metage, lastage, fillage, and porterage. It is all one office, and has always been called corn-shifter. Is sixty-eight years old, 7870–7873.—Was elected on the death of his father, twenty-seven years ago, by the Court of Common Council. His grandfather held the office. Has been under them in the office fifty-four years, 7874.—The duties are to collect the metage dues, and also pay the porters, 7875, 7876.—Collects the sum due to them from their employers, the sellers and buyers, who may live all over the kingdom, 7877.—The porters present a ticket stating how much work they have done, the name of the captain and ship on board of which they have done it. This is immediately paid on the faith of the man, who is a fellowship porter, and his authority constituted under acts of the common council. The average amount of these payments in the last 24 years is 229,000 per annum. 300 to 400 is a small day's payment, the average used to be 800 and often 1000 a day, 7878.—They are paid by the piece, 7879.—If a piece of work lasts several days, they are paid every day for so much as they have done that day on board that ship, 7880.—Has three offices for those payments: one in Horsleydown, one in Tower Street, and a private office in Trinity Square. It may appear wrong to pay those men at public houses, but takes an undertaking from them that they shall never ask a man to spend one farthing, 7881.—The way of collecting the money is thus: When a ship is cleared the account is made up by the principal meter, not the working meter, charging so much for the charges that apply to the corn factor, who pays when he is asked for it. Witness has to charge the buyer with his proportion, 7882.—Cannot say there are not losses, but upon a concern which averages 59,321*l.* 5*s.* a year, the bad debts are not above 120*l.* or 130*l.* a year, 7883.—The commission allowed has been grossly misrepresented. Is empowered by the Act of Common Council to take one penny in every shilling from the earnings of the labouring porters. That amounts to 8⅓ per cent. Is allowed by the Act of the Common Council to appropriate 4½ per cent., but putting in the corporation's portions of the money collected for them, and all other matters, has not received, on the average of twenty-four years, quite a clear three-fourths of a farthing in the shilling, 7884.—Has had nine clerks employed; but for the last five years has had but five; that is 1⅓ per cent. The corn-factors are applied to for the amount of those charges, and with few exceptions pay well. Gets payment from the buyers when they are met with; sometimes writes to them. Witness's penny postage account amounts to 8*l.* a year, 7885.—His grandfather and father held the office by lease, paying an annual rent to the Court of Rulers, for the profits of a penny in the shilling; but at the termination of the latter's lease in 1827, an Act of the Common Council was passed that the corn-shifter should be elected by the common council, and the Court of Rulers should find the money. Was provided with 7,000*l.* when established in the office, 7889.—That is not more than is necessary, may say it is less. The balance sheet will show that there is frequently 9,000*l.* or 11,000*l.* out, and has been obliged to find the surplus capital. Does not of course let more money be idle than there is occasion for, 7890.—That sum is not required at present to make the payments, 7892.—Some few years since was called upon by the fellowship to return 1,000*l.* Did so. And has since been called upon for more capital, but satisfied the court that that call ought rather to have been from witness. However, at the request of one of the rulers, obliged them with a cheque for 250*l.* to pay a bill for expenses in the suit of Combe and Delafield. Therefore has repaid 1,250*l.* out of the 7,000*l.* Did not approve that law suit, 7894.—Has given the court a bond upon property more than ample to secure them. Can be called upon at any time by the Court of Rulers or of Common Council to make restitution of anything they think ought not to be held. Has claims upon the court for payments made on their account, 7896.—Has very probably taken 87,000*l.* since 1827 in the shape of deductions from the labour of the men, 7897.—That includes the sum returned to the rulers for their superannuation fund. After taking 4½ per cent., the remainder is returned monthly to the rulers, whether the amount is collected or not. From that deducts counting-house expenses of all descriptions, and gets only the net balance, 7898.—The present state of the fellowship funds is lower than it was, or ought to be. Fancies they have about 3,500*l.* left, 7899.—The decrease in the annual payments to the fellowship from 1,694*l.* in 1841, to 770*l.* in 1851, alluded to by Mr. Lawrence, arises from the monopoly of labour by the dock companies, who will not admit the fellowship porters. They get the work done for 1*d.* per quarter, and charge from 2½*d.* to 3*d.*, 7900.—The fellowship porters are all respectable, decent working men, 7901.—They are regularly employed at certain times of the year, when large quantities arrive. At other times they work at their trades, but they are at the call of the corn trade at a moment's notice, and they are perfectly satisfied with them, 7903.—It is a a little better living than if they were not members. When a little advanced in life they can do this work, when perhaps they could not work at their own trade, 7905.—If the system did not exist, the trade would be at the caprice of the casual working men, and a small consumer would be at a disadvantage against a large one. Finds the majority of jobs are under 50 quarters, 7906.—If the fellowship ceased to exist the importers would always pay more for small jobs, and somewhat less for large ones, 7907, 7908.—The present porters derive benefit from this system, because they have an exclusive privilege of doing the work, 7909.—They do it cheaper than if the trade were open, and more to the satisfaction of those in the corn trade, who, with some few exceptions, wish the present system to continue. The act of measuring the corn is not one man's act alone. The porters dip the bushel into the bulk, and the meter follows with a scoop. The porters strike the bushel, turn it into the sack, tie it, hoist it out of the hold, and deliver it. Those are independent men, who cannot be bribed. When a meter is sent for, it is not known who will go, and it would be impossible to bribe eight men, 7910.—Thought the suit against Combe and Delafield too expensive an undertaking for the Fellowship Company, therefore advised its being dropped. Had also a notion that they did their business at Scotland Yard, which was a royal precinct, and that they would beat the company on that point, 7911.—Wishes to observe that the prices for the labour of the porters and meters is not invariable. They have been from time to time settled by the common council, who were often many of them their employers. They are paid the same rate per quarter throughout the whole port of London, whether the quantity be large or small. Calls attention to a report made by a committee of the House of Commons in 1834 on the subject of the sale of corn by weight, when the whole subject of the mode of measuring and delivering in the port of London was carefully examined, and the continuance of the system recommended, 7912.

SALARIES:

The subject has not been sufficiently brought forward, but when it has, it has generally been decided that the office in question should not be disturbed, Bennoch, 2088.

SANITARY INSPECTION:

—Very efficient in the City, Simon, 7406–7407.

SAUNDERS, THOMAS HARRY, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Carries on the business of a paper manufacturer at Dartford, 4191, 4192.—Complains that his is a district in which there are considerable manufactures; that necessarily much coal is used; that the price of that coal is greater than it would be in the north, in the neighbourhood of the coal fields; and that, in addition to that high price, there is the City tax upon the coal, and no benefit is derived from the expenditure of the proceeds of that tax, 4193–4195.

SAUNDERS, Mr. NATHANIEL. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the situation of water bailiff 30 years. Was appointed by the Court of Common Council, 6834–6836.—It is an annual appointment; but if the corporation are satisfied with the manner in which the duties are performed the officer is continued, 6837, 6838.—The salary is 500*l.* a year; there are no other emoluments. Expenses are paid, 6839, 6840.—Witness here states the duties attached to his office, 6841.—The duties are quite distinct from those of the harbour master, 6842.—Surveys the river from time to time, and if he observes any encroachment which has not been authorized by the corporation, it is his duty to report it, 6843, 6844.—The stream of the river is under the superintendence of the harbour master. Between high and low water-mark is under witness's jurisdiction. The clerk of the works has authority from London Bridge westwards. The harbour master only interferes with what is really the harbour, 6845–6847.—Is no engineer, but decides whether piers and so on which are applied for will be an obstruction to the navigation, 6848, 6849.—On very difficult matters might have to resort to the opinion of some person who has professional information, but it seldom occurs that witness cannot rely on his own judgment, whatever might be the value of it, 6850.—Sometime since there was a contemplated construction upon the banks of the river bridge, upon the premises of Messrs. Price; the question was not referred to witness as an officer of the committee, but he had to give his opinion; it is now before the Woods and Forests, 6851–6853.—It is necessary, under the proceedings in Chancery, for the Navigation Committee to give information to the Woods and Forests of all proposed grants, that they may, if they see fit, object, 6854.—Witness felt competent to give an opinion on that point, although it involved an engineering question. Has obtained considerable experience during 30 years service, 6855–6858.—The corporation consulted Mr. Leach; his opinion and witness's coincided. They did not object to the construction, 6861, 6862.—It has been suggested that there appears some omission in the evidence, and that the Commission might understand that there is no superintendence between London Bridge and Putney. This is not the case, as Mr. Leach and witness supervise th atpart of the river, 6863.

SAWARD, Mr. MICHAEL. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides in the City, 4407.—At No. 9, Chatham Place, 4409.—In consequence of the double jurisdiction for the management of the police, there is a district running through the centre of London which both commissioners refuse to watch, 4408.—Witness is secretary to a life office. States particulars as to the district left unwatched, the commissioners' reasons for so doing, and the numerous robberies committed in consequence, 4410, 4411.—Has, with his neighbours, presented a joint memorial both to the metropolitan and City commissioners, but received no satisfactory answer, 4412.—The City consider that the portion of land left dry by the receding of the tide is not to be watched by the land police, 4413.—Believes that upon the portion of shore which is within the district of the metropolitan police, the portion between high and low water is watched, 4415.—The Thames police is always kept afloat; they have nothing to do with the land, 4416.—Called Mr. Harvey's attention to the matter, but received no answer, 4417.—Thinks it would be desirable to place the whole of the police of the metropolis under one government. The metropolitan commissioners said that had the yard witness referred to in his statement been in their jurisdiction they would have watched it, 4419.—The gentleman who owns the yard is quite willing to give the police a key for the purpose of entering the yard, 4420.

SCHOOLS:

Some of the schools are endowed under bequest, and others are supported out of the funds of the City of London, Merewether, 6766.—The schools in the City are Christ's Hospital, St. Paul's School, Merchant Tailors' School, and the City of London School, ib. 6768.—The City School enables the citizens of London to give their children a first-rate education at a very low price, Elliot, 1102.—This school is in the hands of the corporation, ib. 1103.—Gives full particulars as to the school, Mortimer, 6776, 6778, 6791, 6801–6805, 6808. States the general system of education, ib. 6789, 6790.

Christ's Hospital. Statement as to the establishment and management of, Merewether, 6769–6772.—A school for the orphans of freemen and liverymen is now being formed; states particulars; and that, with the City of London School, are the only large schools directly in connexion with the corporation, Mortimer, 6801, 6805.—They have just built the Freeman's Orphan School, available for the orphans of freemen till the school is full. They are now about electing them. It is partly supported by the funds derived from the tax imposed upon the tradesmen of the City, and also the large fines wrung from those who do not find it convenient to be sheriffs, Elliot, 1104, 1105.

SCOTT, BENJAMIN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.) —Has been connected with the chamberlain's office for twenty years. Has been chief clerk for the last 12 years. In that situation has had good opportunities of becoming acquainted with the finances of the City, 4430, 4431.—Was a candidate for the office of chamberlain when there was a vacancy recently, 4432.—The duties of chief clerk are to attend committees of the corporation, and afford them information upon the state of their accounts, and generally to superintend the accounts in the chamber, 4433, 4434.—Is appointed by the chamberlain. Salary 850*l.* a year, 4435, 4436.—Since 1842 the corporation have had the right of approval of the appointment, 4437.—The 850*l.* a year is the entire emolument paid by the chamberlain out of the proceeds of the office. The clerks in the office receive from committees of the common council gratuities for any extra diligence shown, and upon the audit of their accounts, 4438, 4440.—The gratuities received by the chief clerk probably amount to 50*l.* a year, 4441, 4442.—Witness also holds an appointment under the corporation which is termed, "Clerk to prepare Accounts for the Auditors," for which he received 100*l.* a year, 4443.—This office is, in some respects, connected with the chamberlain's department, 4444.—It was considered the chamberlain's duty to keep all the books which a treasurer would of necessity keep, but it was not considered by the corporation a part of his duty to arrange their accounts in that particular fashion, therefore a party was appointed about the middle of the last century to arrange the accounts in that particular form in which they are submitted to the auditors, 4445, 4446.—The comptroller, who is an independent officer in the corporation, is the conveyancing officer and has the custody of all their leases, therefore he is possessed of information as to the revenue which ought to be charged against the corporation. It is his duty to furnish this charge annually to the chamberlain, and it is the duty of the clerk for preparing the accounts for the auditors to arrange the two accounts so as to form a check upon each other, 4447.—The corporation have taken great pains at various periods to arrange their accounts in a way most intelligible to themselves and those interested in them. A committee was appointed in 1839. It was appointed upon the motion of Mr. Anderton, and they sat from the middle of 1839 till 1841, before the matter was finally decided upon; on the 26th of September 1839, they presented their report to the Court of Common Council. (The report was delivered in.) The system recommended was abandoned, and the matter was referred back again to the committee; and on the 27th February 1840 they brought up a second report. (The same was delivered in.) The next report brought up, (report, 17th December 1840 put in,) recommended the continuance of the system of charge and discharge, which witness had always understood to have been recommended to the corporation by a committee of twelve merchants of the City of London, independent of the corporation, who were appointed to meet as a committee to advise as to the best system, 4448, 4449.—Believes that it was about the middle of the 18th century that the system was introduced. On the 28th of January 1841 the report of the 17th of December 1840 was agreed to by the Court of Common Council. Reads part of the evidence given by Mr. Acland, in which he states that there are discrepancies to the extent of 9,000*l.* between the comptroller's charge and the chamberlain's discharge. The comptroller's charge and the chamberlain's statement of cash received, being two different things, it is not likely it ever should agree. The comptroller's charge is a statement made out independently of the chamberlain, of the revenue which ought to be received in the chamber during the year, 4450.—The chamberlain's account is a statement of what he actually receives; the difference between the two accounts being the arrears at the commencement of the former year and the arrears at the close which are carried to the next year's account. (Produces the books.) The chamberlain has thought it right to place among the accounts returned a sheet showing the charge and discharge upon every head of account for the year 1852. The chamberlain's account is made out similar to the comptroller's charge. As to expenditure, the sum which the chamberlain admits to have received is disbursed, and vouchers in every case are produced to justify the disbursement, 4451.—The different courts and committees have different powers of drawing out of the funds. The usual mode is by the signature of seven members, 4452.—The Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council have both separately a power of drawing, but virtually the Court of Aldermen only draw under certain heads, 4453.—They possess and have exercised the power of drawing upon the City cash for pensions connected with their own court, 4454.—There is no limit, either by law or practice, to the amount to which pensions are granted, 4455.—The annual amount of money drawn by the Court of Aldermen appears in the printed accounts, 4456.—The accounts of the pensions are stated in full detail. Contradicts the statement made by some witnesses that the auditors do not perform the duty themselves. The audit is performed by the auditors themselves, and they have for every payment a legal order laid before them, 4457.—The auditors of the City and Bridge-house accounts are chosen by the livery in common hall, 4458.—The system of appointing auditors in common hall has not always worked well. There have very often been differences of opinion between the common hall and the corporation as to what amount of power each body possessed. States an instance, 4459.—The "Orphans' Fund" was audited in the audit office at Somerset House till about 1834. Is acquainted with the system pursued in that department, so far as that fund is concerned, 4460, 4461.—It is just possible, that if the officers of the chamber were not persons of the highest respectability, the livery occasionally do not send auditors who would be an efficient check, 4462.—Does not think there is anything the corporation would desire more than to have an efficient check upon all their accounts. They have taken the greatest pains themselves as auditors to investigate and test the accounts which come before them; and where the Acts of Parliament have left it optional with them either to have additional auditors or not, they have invariably availed themselves of the option, 4463.—The principal objection to the present system is that the auditors are appointed by a very numerous body. The office is so inconsiderable in point of value that it is not likely to be sought after, and therefore the power to return auditors is in the hands of persons who may not be interested in sending in all cases the best men, 4464.—In some respects professional accountants would form good auditors, but in some other respects they would not, 4465.—The effect of placing the audit in the hands of a public accountant, unless the office were made permanent, would be that the whole system of keeping the books would be thrown out of shape every two or three years, to meet the views of the parties elected. If the corporation were under such a board as the Commissioners for Auditing Public Accounts, it would remove from them a weight of suspicion, which now attaches to them most unjustly. With respect to the Orphans' Fund, all public bodies were perfectly satisfied with the accounts as rendered to that board, and that a fair and just audit was obtained by that method, 4466.—Thinks it would be satisfactory to the chamberlain that his accounts should be examined by auditors perfectly independent of the corporation, 4467.—With reference to the accounts, on many occasions they have been very highly spoken of by those who have taken great pains to look into them. Since witness has held the office of clerk for preparing the accounts for the auditors, some of the most respectable men in the City have been appointed auditors. During the last twelve years the auditor's reports have contained a statement that they were highly satisfied with the system, as well as with the mode, in which they were laid before them. In the year 1829, when the whole system was investigated at very great length by the Government, the Duke of Wellington expressed his high satisfaction at the mode in which they had been kept, and at the same time offered witness's father, who at that time held the position which witness lately occupied, any position in the Treasury he might wish to assume under the Government, being desirous that he should accept some appointment with reference to their accounts, 4468.—Has recently relinquished his situation connected with the corporation. Reads an extract from the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Orphans' Fund, on the 11th of June 1812, 4469.—Does not consider that the auditors were judges of the propriety of the expenditure, but of the accuracy of the account, 4470.—There is no specific sum of money placed at the disposal of the consolidated committee for any such purpose as has been mentioned. The circumstances are these: the corporation some years ago were dissatisfied with the reports of their proceedings, which appeared in the public papers. The subject was taken up by the consolidated committee, and there were several plans before them as to how some more ample and correct report of their proceedings might be obtained. There were three remedies suggested at the time; one of which was, that a weekly organ, containing a full report of the proceedings of the corporation, should be encouraged. It was in consequence of these matters being before the consolidated committee that the expenditure took place, which has been referred to by the witnesses. A paper of that class was published in the month of January 1849, called the "Citizen." The undertaking was commenced quite irrespective of the corporation or their officers, by a stranger by the name of Peet. Very shortly after its commencement some difficulties arose in the management of the paper, and Mr. Toulmin Smith became the sole proprietor. A sum of money was advanced by witness out of his own private funds. After some time the matter was brought under the consideration of the consolidated committee. It was suggested as a convenient organ for reporting their proceedings, 4471, 4472.—Witness advanced the money out of friendship to Mr. Smith, and from the interest he took in the object, 4473, 4474.—While the matter was in suspense, certain officers of the corporation advanced sums of money to keep the paper afloat, till a determination could be come to by the corporation, 4475.—At the same time the members of the consolidated committees did express what the officers considered to be a justification of their keeping the paper afloat till some determination should be come to on the subject. Believed that if the corporation approved of it they would have repaid the money advanced out of the funds of the corporation, 4476, 4477.—For four weeks the officers sustained the paper. A difference of opinion arose between some of them and Mr. Smith, and the paper was sold by him for a nominal consideration, pending those discussions. The corporation repaid the officers the amount which they had advanced. Mr. Smith raised a claim against the corporation for the amount he had advanced, but as he did not appear before the consolidated committee, to whom his petition was referred, the matter dropped. At the end of more than twelve months after the transaction had taken place, the consolidated committee volunteered to pay witness the amount which he had advanced, 4478.—The money was paid out of the corporation funds. The consolidated committee drew upon the Chamber for such sums as were necessary, 4479.—The total sum was 280*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*; 250*l.* was subsequently repaid to witness, 4480.—This transaction was considered a confidential matter by the committee. It appears upon the account as "Disbursements of the consolidated committee," 4481, 4482.—In the accounts of 1850 there is a payment of 250*l.* to witness, under the head of miscellaneous expenditure, 4483.—No such sum as 1,000*l.* has been set apart for reporting the proceedings of the corporation, as stated by some witnesses. The sum has been on the average 185*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* per annum, 4484.—This sum has been expended in circulating papers which contained the best reports of the proceedings of the corporation, 4485.—There is no fund which approximates to the Secret Service Fund which is voted annually by Parliament. There are matters which are occasionally considered confidential, and they are entrusted to a select committee, 4486, 4487.—It was considered at the time that matters connected with the establishment of a newspaper should be treated as confidential, 4488.—Is not aware of any case in which a confidential expenditure of this sort has taken place, 4489, 4490.—Parliamentary proceedings would be of that character. Opposition to bills has frequently involved a very considerable expense, 4491, 4492.—Is not aware of any expenditure incurred at any time in Parliamentary business which could not be fully stated and justified, 4493.—There has been no money expended of which an account has not been kept and given in the accounts, 4494, 4495.—Does not think it likely that such an expenditure should take place without his (witness's) knowledge, 4496.—There are many entries in the accounts, where the totals are stated, and no detail is rendered, 4497.—The details of an expenditure, with reference to Parliamentary proceedings, would not be published, because it is not considered desirable, in matters or that kind, to publish to the world the precise nature of the expenditure, 4498–4500.—It may have been so considered because it was thought probable that the opposition would be more effectual. Corrects a statement respecting a brother officer, which will be found at page 14 of the evidence. The questions are Nos. 114 and 115. The statement is with regard to proceedings against parties for taking up their freedom. With respect to the expenses of the mayoralty there is a statement at page 65, which witness wishes to explain. Under the head of "Charges connected with the Office of Lord Mayor," the lord mayor is debited with 7,151*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* as his emolument, derived from the metage on coals; the sum should be 500*l.* With respect to the statement of Mr. Williams as to the mayoralty expenses, which he puts down at 25,034*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, in answer to question 2800, he (witness) put in a report of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council of the 23d of March, 1836, where abatements were made to the amount of 10,782*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.*, 4501.—Several items were then adjourned for further consideration. The report was sent back to the committee to amend, but was not again brought up. Assuming that these were the only proper abatements, the expense would have stood at that time at 14,252*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* The real statement of the case appears to be that the mayor receives 8,319*l.* 18*s.* 2d. Besides that, the expense of the Mansion House was, in 1836, estimated at 2,125*l.* a year. The expenses have been considerably reduced since that period. With reference to the evidence of Mr. Williams, who put in the report of the Revenue Committee upon the subject of the salaries to the officers, the report was brought up to the common council on the 24th of February, 1836. There was a motion made to print the report, when an amendment was carried. Reads the amendment. In almost every instance the explanation he (witness) has given will account for the amount of difference between the chamberlain's books and the officers' returns. The borough compter belongs to the Bridge House trust, and has not been sold to this day. It was in contemplation to sell it, but there was some doubt as to whether the jurisdiction of the magistrates of Southwark was at an end, so that the compter might be sold. There is a statement made at page 204 of the evidence by Mr. Bennoch, that the corporation, though they have made a charge in their accounts for lodging-houses erected for the labouring poor, have not taken any steps whatever to provide those lodgings. In answer to that statement, wishes to state that the corporation obtained power, which they did not possess before, under the Clerkenwell Improvement Act, to purchase land, and to erect upon it convenient lodging-houses for the labouring classes. Immediately after the passing of that Act the improvement committee commenced negotiating for the purchase of ground; they had placed at their disposal the sum of 43,000*l.* stock for that purpose. They purchased ground at a cost of 19,480*l.* in the neighbourhood of Cow Cross. They proceeded to clear the ground, when they were served with notices by a projected railway company, which notices have been renewed from session to session. They could therefore proceed no further in the matter. They would have proceeded further, but the powers of the Act limited them to the neighbourhood of the street projected from the City to Clerkenwell. Hands in a statement of the amount paid to five committees between 1802 and 1808, from which it will appear that they have received 4,480*l.* 19*s.* on the average of those seven years. The corporation in 1836 printed a statement of the whole of the allowances to committees for the years 1833, 1834, and 1835. There were then 13 committees. The revenues had very considerably increased, and also the duties which were performed by those committees; but the average for those three years was only 4,466*l.* for those 13 committees. At that period the corporation drew upon certain Parliamentary trust funds for their committees' allowances. Since 1836 this practice has been discontinued, and the amount is paid out of the corporate funds. From the account for the year 1832 of allowances to committees, already before the Commission, it appears that a very considerable reduction has been made since 1836. What in 1836 was 4,462*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* is now reduced to about 2,750*l.*, 4502.—The principal duty of the chamberlain is to act as treasurer or banker to the corporation fund, and a great variety of public trust funds, 4503.—The present chamberlain has attended at the office every day and all day since his election, 4504.—It has generally been the habit for the chamberlain to perform his duties in person, and to give considerable time to those duties, 4505.—Conceives the duties of the chamberlain and chief clerk differ. The chamberlain is the responsible officer; he gives a large amount of security, and is responsible for the clerks being at the office, and performing their duties. He acts as a judge in the outer chamber in hearing complaints against apprentices. He admits to the freedom of the City, swearing in the party, and has the superintendence of the whole department, 4506.—The extent of the chamberlain's interference with the accounts is just what he thinks proper to make it. Sir James Shaw, who was a mercantile man, gave his constant attendance to the duties of the office. Mr. Anthony Brown, who was a solicitor, the same. The present chamberlain is also making himself acquainted with the details and history of the accounts, and the acts which regulate them, in order to be able to exercise an efficient control over the parties in his department, 4507.—The jurisdiction of the chamberlain over apprentices occupies much time. Scarcely a day passes without complaints from either masters or apprentices. He has authority to adjudicate between them, and power to commit them to Bridewell, and to effect a separation, 4508.—The chamberlain does not keep the accounts of all the funds of the corporation at his office, only those of which he is treasurer, 4509.—The Bridge House accounts are kept by the bridgemasters, two officers elected by common hall. They are the treasurers of the Bridge House estates; they receive the rents, and account for the expenditure. The Irish Society keep their own accounts, independently of the chamberlain, 4510.—The rents of the Irish Society are not the property of the corporation, 4511.—Does not recollect any other corporation funds, the accounts of which are not kept in the chamber, 4512.—Knows of no particular advantage in having a separate office for the Bridge House accounts, nor any difficulty in taking the Bridge House rents at the chamber, if Parliamentary powers were obtained for the purpose. It could not be done without, as all the leases make the rents payable to the bridgemasters, 4513, 4514.—There is no other office besides that of the bridgemasters, at which accounts of monies paid and received are kept, except at the chamber, 4515.—The comptroller is a conveyancing officer; he makes out leases, and keeps an account of monies due. Everything which is a matter of revenue belonging to the corporation he is bound to acquaint himself with, and charge against the chamberlain, 4516–4518.—The rule is, that the account sent in to the chamber shows the gross amount of revenue, and not the net, 4519.—There are many fees received by officers which do not belong to the corporation, and do not pass through the chamberlain's account, but they are mostly received as officers of the corporation, and the amount is regulated by the corporation, 4520–4523.—The fees are looked upon as the property of the officer, and not of the corporation. The fee is authorized by Act of Parliament, or by custom, or by a regulation of the corporation, and the officer accounts for it when asked to make a return of what he receives, 4524.—The chamberlain has no knowledge of the amount of fees, unless it comes into his department. There is no office in which that information exists, unless the officer gives it himself, 4525, 4526.—Should receive Mr. Williams's report of the amount of fees with much caution, as, when tested, it was found to be much exaggerated. Thinks that under the word "fees" many things must have been included which are not fees. In all the alterations which the corporation have made, they have endeavoured to get rid of fees, and to give their officers fixed salaries instead, 4527, 4528.—The Commission have called for the annual amount of fees not brought into the chamberlain's account, and believes it is now before the committee, 4529, 4530.—The individual officers know what their fees are. Witness has not the means of knowing the amount, but is clearly convinced it cannot even approximate to that stated by Mr. Williams, 4531.—It has been the universal rule of late years to diminish the number of fees, and increase the payment by salary, 4532.—Upon every office becoming vacant, it is the rule to refer the office to the officers' and clerks' committee, who sit specifically for that purpose, who call for an account of the emoluments, and a statement of the duties. They revise the office, and make alterations as they think fit, reporting to the Court of Common Council for their sanction, 4533.—It has been the rule, upon an office becoming vacant, to regulate that each officer shall be paid by salary, and not by fees. There may have been exceptions, but does not recollect any, 4534.—Where fees have been retained by order from the committee they have been paid into the chamber. Gives an instance, 4535.—

The chamberlain's individual emolument is 2,500*l.* a year. The clerks cost over 2,000*l.* a year, 4536.—He derives no profit from the balances. If he has injudiciously managed the banking business, or if the balances should be insufficient, the corporation do not guarantee him 2,500*l.* a year, 4537.—He has a discretion in law in disposing of the balances, with which the corporation cannot interfere. He is a public treasurer. He manages many trust funds which have not been placed in his hands by the corporation; in fact, the great bulk of the monies in his hands is not at the corporate disposal, except for purposes for which they can draw upon it, 4538.—With respect to the money belonging to the corporation, he is bound to lay the books containing his banking transactions monthly before the committee, called the coal, corn, and finance committee. If they see any reason to object to the class of securities he holds, he submits, under deed, to sell out those securities, and invest them in something that will be approved by the corporation, 4539, 4540.—Upon taking the office he enters into a deed between himself and the corporation, that he will limit himself as to his profits, and submit to restrictions which could not be imposed upon him legally by the corporation, and that he will not invest his money in a way which would be displeasing to them, or, in their opinion, hazardous, 4541, 4542.—The control of the committee is in this respect prospective; that if they objected to any class of securities, the officer must not again bring that class of securities before them for approval, 4543.—The system is very much improved from what it used to be. The present system was adopted upon witness's report, jointly with the City solicitor, twelve years ago. Both felt there were great risks. The money was in the hands of one person, who was then confined to his bed, and obliged to intrust the money to a person in his office (witness's). Felt that was too great a responsibility for one person; therefore it was arranged that the chamberlain and his two senior officers should sign cheques, so that they should be a mutual check upon each other. The securities were placed in a strong room, with three doors and three separate keys. Still, no doubt, the system is susceptible of amendment, and might be amended, should Parliamentary powers be obtained, 4544.—A fixed salary would be more satisfactory to the chamberlain, who is now doubtful whether he will make his emoluments; and it would conduce to the security of the public funds in his hands, 4545.—The whole of the chamberlain's fund is not derived from the profits of the balances. There are contributions paid by the City, and likewise some out of certain trust funds, for the management of their accounts, which amounts, as a simple banker, he would not be required to keep, 4546.—The profit upon balances has fluctuated in twelve years between 3,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* a year. When it was 6,000*l.*, it would more than defray the whole expenses of the establishment, 4547, 4548.—The balance is invested for the relief of the trust funds, and the committee have now come to the resolution that the amount is sufficient to authorize the chamberlain to take the whole charges off the trust funds, 4549.—These are invested in the names of the chamberlain, the chief clerk, and his cashier, who draw upon the account and hold the keys, 4550.—It is specially provided in the deed that the corporation, as trustees, ought not to benefit themselves from proceeds arising from their trust funds, 4551.—The coal and corn committee can direct the chamberlain to relieve the trust funds in his office, 4552.—There is no power of appropriating this money to erecting a public building. It is invested, and can only be applied to relieving the public funds in the chamber, 4553, 4554.—The corporation account forms one out of many which are kept in the chamber, and where money is directed to be paid by the collector to the chamberlain, he holds the money till a legal authority draws upon him; he is therefore a public banker, 4555.—The balance in the City's cash is generally very inconsiderable; during the present year it has frequently been overdrawn, 4556.—The London Bridge Approaches Fund has been one of the largest, but is not so at present, nor likely to be so in future, 4557.—It is in the chamberlain's office, and as soon as the quarterly accounts are passed and examined, the money is handed over to her Majesty's Board of Works; the 8*d.* coal duty, the 1*d.* duty, and other sources of revenue forming that fund. The chamberlain, in the meantime, as the money comes in from day to day, deals with that fund in the aggregate with other funds in the office, 4558.—It is not a corporation fund; it is a trust created by Act of Parliament, the proceeds to be applied exclusively to public works under the Board of Works. The corporation have no further control over it than to say to the officer, before he is elected, "Will you submit to restrictions, and not make an improper use of that fund which the law has placed for a time at your disposal," 4559.—The chamberlain makes a profit of it, and after paying himself carries the balance of the profit to that fund, which will be relieved this year of all charges formerly made against it, 4560.—The deed provides that the City shall get no profit out of it, 4561.—The corporation pay something like 1,200*l.* a year to the chamberlain's fund for his management of their accounts. He does not take the profit of any balance upon their funds. If they wish to invest that balance, they make a special order upon the chamberlain for that purpose, and they take the risk of the transaction, 4562, 4563.—The chamberlain consults with his chief clerk, from time to time, what future balance there will be available for a temporary investment, and then purchases Exchequer bills, India bonds, or City bonds, or any perfectly safe security, and sells them when the monies are wanted again. If there is likely to be 100,000*l.* or 150,000*l.* for two or three weeks in the chamber, he can invest it in any good securities, or place it out with joint stock bankers or bill brokers, upon the deposit of those securities. He does not deal in bills, 4564.—Any loss upon the transactions would fall upon the chamberlain and his sureties, 4565, 4566.—To a certain extent he carries on the business of a banker, but the corporation have limited the risks, and reduced, as far as they could, the emoluments of the office. They can proceed no further without Parliamentary aid, 4567.—Thinks the money could be invested in a more permanent manner, if the balance were recognized as City funds, and put under the control of a committee authorized to make use of the money, 4568.—A new chamberlain, upon finding himself called on to deal with a large sum of money, would, under the regulations of the deed, advise with the chief clerk, who is supposed to know most of the transactions, and what demands are likely to come upon the chamber, 4569, 4570.—It has been one branch of witness's duties to co-operate with the chamberlain in the banking business, having been bank manager, as well as City actuary, and accountant, so far as the accounts are kept in the chamber. The responsibility of those three departments has rested upon witness, 4571.—Has generally been consulted by the corporation when making any large investment involving the possibility of considerable loss or gain, 4572.—It has been the practice for the chief clerk to advise with the chamberlain, 4573.—The chamberlain has always been able to give very good advice upon those points, being himself the party responsible, 4574.—They occasionally consult a broker, but it is not often necessary. Confine themselves to transactions in India bonds, Exchequer bills, Canada guaranteed debentures, and City bonds, in which there is not much risk. Do not touch public funds at all, 4575.—They look more to the security than to the profits. They endeavour not to lock up more money than can be conveniently set aside. The matter has been managed with the greatest prudence in the office, 4576.—The securities which are deposited and bought are placed in a strong room under three keys. A sum of money is left in the hands of the cashier at the close of the day, which is not to exceed 1000*l.* at any time, to enable him to commence paying business in the morning, 4577.—It was considered in the year 1842 whether it might not be desirable to employ a banker, and inquiries were made at the Bank of England as to terms; but, as it is against their system to give any interest for balances, it would have been a great loss of income to the chamberlain and his establishment. The old plan was reformed rather than a new system instituted, 4578.—Does not think any attempt has been made to find a private bank which would allow interest for balances. Private bankers have often allowed them, as bill brokers would, the current interest of the day, depositing securities for the amount, 4579.—The Government employ the Bank of England, who hold the money and make their profit out of it. In the case of the corporation, it is an individual who holds the money, and he makes his profit out of it, 4580.—Is sure no private bank could keep the necessary accounts for the corporation, or any public bodies; an establishment would be required for keeping all the accounts, 4581.—The Government keeps its accounts in the Treasury and Exchequer. The system might be amended if there were power to do so, 4582.—A very large amount of revenue would be sacrificed if the corporation did not make use of the balance in some way, 4583.—No private bank would give the City so large a profit as they are able to make themselves, 4584.—The banking expenses are very trifling, 4585.—Great diversity of practice exists in different corporations as to the management of their money affairs; one difficulty is, that there is no model system approved by Government or Parliament. Some corporations have their money in the hands of a private banker in a provincial town, and they do not appear to render to the account any interest for the money laying in their hands. There must be more hazard in doing so than in placing the money in the hands of a chamberlain, invested in Government securities, and under the inspection of a committee, 4586.—Thinks that at Manchester there is a sum of 36,000*l.* lying to the account of the corporation at a private banker's. At Liverpool they appear to have a very large balance at a private banker's, besides an amount in the hands of the treasurer, 4587.—Is convinced that, by placing money in the hands of private bankers, more is lost than gained in point of security, 4588.—Is not aware of any other case than London in which the corporation keeps the whole of the money in their own custody. In some respects the office of chamberlain is very peculiar and anomalous. It has been an office of that kind for about seven centuries. It appears to have been the office into which the king's taxes were formerly paid, 4589, 4590.—Substantially, the system of the chamber of London has remained unaltered for something like five or six centuries. No material alteration was made in the conduct of the business till 1842, when the scheme before referred to was adopted, 4591–4593.—The figures mentioned in the paper which the recorder read to the Commissioners are correct. There has been considerable increase in the rental of the City, and in the proceeds of their tolls and dues, 4594.—In some cases the revenue has decreased. The amount derived from freedom has fallen off very much, the fine being reduced, and the numbers diminished. The coal dues and the proceeds of the markets have increased, 4595.—The coal duties are three in number; they are all received at one office, and paid every day into the chamber in three sums, which are carried to their respective accounts, 4597.—The whole of the sums are received together at the coal market by one officer, for the purpose of economy. He accounts to the chamberlain, who is bound to distribute it to the fund to which it belongs, 4598.—The gross receipts are paid into the chamber, 4599.—The salaries of the officers and the expenses are paid proportionably from the three funds, 4600.—The City keeps the produce of the 4*d.* duty, and pays the 9*d.* duty to those accounts, and ultimately to the Government, 4601.—The payment is made to the Government by an arrangement with the Board of Works, 4602.—In the payment made to Government any expenses and outgoings are deducted. In the case of the London Bridge Approaches Fund the chamberlain pays the interest upon the loans which they have raised, and any legal payment, and the balance is handed over to them, 4603.—These duties have not all the same duration. The 4*d.* duty is a perpetual duty, 4604.—That payment exists by prescription, confirmed by the charter of James I. and subsequent charters, and recognized by the Act of Parliament, the 1st & 2d of William IV., 4605.—The produce of the 4*d.* duty is mortgaged for a certain period for the making of the Cannon Street improvement. The corporation set aside 20,000*l.* out of it, which has been enough hitherto to pay the interest of those mortgages; and it is mortgaged for the repayment of the sums which are stated in the accounts, amounting to about 580,000*l.*, 4606.—Does not know of any other legal application of that fund. There are charges which the corporation have considered as attaching to it, 4608.—The annual produce of the 4*d.* duty is 60,000*l.*, after allowing drawbacks, 4609.—The annual interest of the debt chargeable on that fund is about 20,000*l.*, 4610.—There is no sinking fund, 4611.—40,000*l.* of the half million borrowed is due next month; but there is sufficient balance to pay that, and 10,000*l.* of the first loan of 50,000*l.* has been paid off; but beyond that no provision has been made to pay off the capital. It has been looked on, at any rate, for some years to come as a permanent mortgage, 4612.—If the whole of the duties were applied to the purpose there would be enough to provide for a small annual sinking fund; the corporation have hitherto only appropriated 20,000*l.* a year of it to that, the rest goes to the City cash, 4613.—There is a difference of opinion as to the duration of the 8*d.* duty. Thinks that four-tenths is continued in perpetuity after the year 1862, when the remainder expires, 4614, 4615—The balance against the fund at the close of 1852 was 961,927*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* due to the Board of Works, and 88,000*l.* due to the corporation, which is to be paid after the Board of Works' charges have been satisfied, 4616.—The Clerkenwell commissioners having failed in making improvements, the corporation undertook to finish them if they might raise 88,000*l.* upon the fund. 4617.—There is no need of a sinking fund for that charge, as the proceeds of the London Bridge approaches duties' fund are considered to be sufficient to pay off the whole of those charges by the time that the duties cease, 4618.—The 8*d.* coal duty is carried to a fund which possesses other revenues. The London Bridge Approaches duties fund consists of the coal duties, the wine duties, and a contribution from the City of 11,500*l.*, also fees on the admission of freemen and binding apprentices, and the rentals of waterworks. The revenue is about 140,000*l.* per annum, 4619.—All charges are made on this fund, and no separate charge is made on the 8*d.* coal duty, 4620. —The 8*d.* duty produced last year about 113,600*l.* net, 4623.—The 1*d.* duty produces about 13,000*l.* net, 4624.—The City have no interest in 9*d.* out of the 1*s.* 1*d.* paid for the coal duty beyond the charge o 88,000*l.*, which will come upon the London Bridge Approaches Fund, 4627.—The City was authorized by the Act to charge the improvement to that fund, it being beyond their limits, 4628.—The Clerkenwell commissioners were quite independent of the corporation, 4629.—The City state in their accounts that they consider the charges on the 4*d.* duty liable on their revenue, 4630.—There is a very full report made to the committee as to how much of the coal duty has been expended beyond the limits of the City, and a map has been prepared. Statement as to that report. The opinion of counsel on the question, whether the jurisdiction of the City over coals extends twenty miles from the post-office is, that the twenty miles is to be measured as the crow flies in a direct line, 4633. The contested election for the office of chamberlain between witness and Sir J. Key was in May, 1853, 4634.—The vacancy was created by the death of Mr. Anthony Brown, 4635.—On the death of the chamberlain the lord mayor is required by law, within a certain number of days, to call a common hall to elect a chamberlain, 4636.—At the election in 1853 there was no other candidate but Mr. Haines, and he retired after a short time, 4637.—The poll was kept open seven clear days, 4638.—The whole of his expenses amounted to 3,000*l.*, 4639, 4640.—States how that sum was disbursed, 4641.—One item was the expense of bringing non-residents to the poll, 4642,—This item amounted to about 100*l.*, 4643.—The expenses for committee rooms and refreshments were considerable, 4644. There were bills at many taverns for refreshments, 4645.—Witness cannot state the total amount spent on refreshments, as parties made claims upon him in round figures for their expenses, 4646.—Has no personal knowledge of any bribery; instructed his agents to keep as clear of it as they could, and believes they did keep as clear as agents could in a City election; but charges were made for loss of time, &c., which may have been a consideration for voting, 4648.—Elections in common hall are conducted in a manner very far from satisfactory, 4650.—Has no doubt that the whole of the poll might be taken in one day if properly regulated, 4651.—Believes the livery of London to be a highly respectable body; but thinks that they have not the election in their own hands, it being very much in the hands of a low set of liverymen, who are in the receipt of charity from their companies, and who, for a bribe in money or a day's employment, sell their votes; and of another class, who have no vote, but who personate liverymen, and throw the weight of their influence one side or the other, 4652, 4653.—Almost all elections by that body are swayed by that class of voters, more or less; and, in consequence, the more respectable part of the livery are deprived of their franchise, 4654.—The system might be reformed, but if not, it should be abolished, 4655.—The common council should elect the chamberlain, 4656.—The aldermen and common council would be quite as well able to judge of the qualification of their treasurer and accountant as a large body of voters, such as vote in common hall. They practically superintend his duties, and are well acquainted with them, 4657, 4658.—The livery do not interfere with the office, or with the funds of the corporation, beyond receiving the report annually from the auditors, which is handed also to the common council, 4659.

Scott, B., Esq. (Further Examination.)—Stated at his former examination, when asked whether there were any secret service fund in the City, that there was no such fund; but that money had been spent in a confidential manner with respect to bills in Parliament, but could not then state full particulars, he having been employed confidentially in the matter of opposing the Government bill for removing Smithfield market, and in the measures which were taken for promoting the City's bill for making a new central cattle market. The Markets Improvement Committee, to whom the matter was referred, employed witness to check the expenditure of the Parliamentary officer. As principal clerk to the chamberlain he had nothing to do with matters of this kind, 4660.—The expenditure amounted to 2,750*l.* It appears, in the accounts of 1850 and 1851, as paid to the remembrancer for the disbursements of the Markets Improvements Committee. Is now authorized to state that the 2,750*l.* was expended in canvassing agency, procuring petitions, printers' charges, and law stationers' charges. Mr. Acland, who was secretary at that time to the Central Market Association, was employed by the remembrancer on that occasion, 4661.—A large portion of the money was paid to him, but about 2,650*l.* was spent in promoting petitions, and in getting up a memorial from the electors, 7,000 in number, to the members for the City, and in ascertaining the validity of the signatures; the remaining 100*l.*, or rather less, was paid to some gentlemen at the bar, and others for literary services, 4662–4665.—Thinks it very likely that the articles found their way to the papers, though there was no arrangement made with the press or with those parties respecting it, 4666.—The counsel so retained were not employed before the Parliamentary committee. The regular payments before the committee were charged by the remembrancer in the usual accounts. The opponents employed an election agent, 4667.—By their opponents, witness means a society formed for the purpose of promoting the removal of Smithfield market, and they employed Mr. Brown, 4668.—There were subscription lists in the papers, 4669.—When the corporation thought they were about to be deprived of their tolls without compensation, they thought themselves justified in using every means to prevent it, 4671.—The blue book before the Commissioners is a mere abstract; the audit account is much larger; the auditors had each warrant, with the signatures of seven members of the Markets Improvements Committee before them, stating that they were disbursements of that committee in reference to those bills and were satisfied in passing the entries on such authority, 4672.—The auditors would only look that there was a competent order upon the chamber, and that the receipt of the remembrancer was upon the order, 4673.—As the law stands now, the auditor is required to see that there is a competent authority for drawing on the chamberlain, and that upon the face of the order it is for such a matter as that committee have power to draw, 4674.—It might be advisable that the auditor's power of pulling the separate accounts of that sort to pieces, and putting each item under its proper head, should be increased. They have no such power now, nor have they had in the City for centuries, 4675.—Thinks it desirable that the fullest information be afforded, upon the face of the accounts and the vouchers, to enable the auditor to arrange them under their proper heads, provided he be not made a comptroller of the expenditure of the larger body, the body elected by the citizens, 4676.—Thinks the present system open to abuse, but does not think the power has been abused, 4677, 4678.

Wire, 1938, 7939.—Is paid by salary, partly from fees, and has to account to the corporation for every shilling he receives, to see whether he has received to the amount guaranteed by them, which is 1,000*l.* a year. The fees and fines are therefore all accounted for, ib. 7958.

Secret Service Fund:

Statement respecting, Acland, 574-577.

Sessions:

The business of the quarter sessions held at Guildhall, together with the licensing, might be performed at one session, and the quarter sessions now held at Southwark ought to be abolished, Lord Mayor, 7169.—Gives particulars of the sessions, Adams, 7227, 7230.

Sewell, Mr. John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is clerk of the chamber, that is, the chamberlain's court; attends the business relating to freedoms; has the issuing of the summonses. The City solicitor has the instructions for the prosecutions, 6240–6243.—Witness has held three appointments since first connected with the corporation; was elected in 1809 as assistant to the clerk of the chamber, and in 1831 was elected assistant clerk of the chamber, and in 1842 became clerk of the chamber, 6244.—Was elected by the Court of Common Council. States his duties as clerk of the chamber, 6245.—Is paid by fees, which vary very much, on account of the continued discussion in regard to the freedom of London. States the terms of his election, 6246.—The value of the office is about 500*l.* a year, but witness has not received above 300*l.* or 400*l.* a year, 6248.—That has been from the diminution of the number of freedoms, 6249.—In the event of freedoms not being enforced, the receipts will be greatly diminished; they are so now. For the last seven years there have been about 679 freemen admitted each year; last year there were 883; that was consequent upon the large number of parties who were suddenly ordered to be summoned; thinks as many as 4,000. A bill was brought into Parliament two years ago, which was lost, and the corporation then determined to enforce the freedoms. The objection of most of the respectable parties who came forward was, that they said they should be most happy to take up their freedom if they would not be liable to serve as common councilmen, aldermen, or sheriffs, 6252.—The object of the City in instituting those proceedings was, to enlarge its constituency, not to obtain a revenue, 6253.—It is merely the liability to serve the office that prevents many persons from taking up their freedom, 6254.—A person can be elected a common councilman or alderman without his consent; but the liability to the shrievalty is the principal thing objected to, 6255.—In cases of apprenticeship, the chamberlain sits as a magistrate in his court; he hears the cases; a summons is then taken out by the master, or by the apprentice if he complains. The case is heard before the chamberlain, and after hearing the evidence, he adjudicates. If a boy requires a reprimand, which is very frequently the case, he very kindly reprimands him, and orders him home to his duty. The majority of the cases are complaints of masters against their apprentices; those of apprentices against their masters are not very rare, 6258–6260.—The Court of chamberlain is an intermediate Court, below the Mayor's Court. If a case cannot be settled in it, it is referred to the Mayor's Court, and there the action is brought on the covenant in the indenture, 6261.—A master is seldom found who does not obey the mandate of the chamberlain. Scarcely knows a case in which a boy has been obliged to bring an action under such circumstances, 6262.—The chamberlain and witness act as a sort of court of arbitration between masters and apprentices; it saves them from the necessity of going to law, 6264.—The chamberlain can only adjudicate with respect to apprentices bound to the freedom of the City, 6265.—The committals to bridewell are very rare indeed. There is a place in bridewell appointed for the apprentices; they are not allowed to mix with the criminal part of the prisoners. The commitments on the average of the last seven years have been about twenty in the course of the year. Females are never committed to bridewell. The bindings within the last seven years have been about 427 a year. Does not think they have diminished. States nature of the bond, 6270.

Sewerage:

Would not limit the powers of the municipal board in that or any other matters by any other rule than a general subordination of all local interests to public interests, and an accordance with the common laws of the land, Hickson, 2956.—Necessity of uniformity with regard to sewerage and police, Dillon, 657.—On the whole, the sewerage of the City of London has been well carried out. They have recently been able to reduce their rate to 2*d.* in the pound, and will shortly reduce it to 1*d.*, Haywood, 5983.—The sewerage of the City is now completed, so that there is not a court, street, or lane, which has not a proper drainage, and believes the rate for this year will not exceed a penny in the pound, Harrison, 7285.—Rates upon property in the City of London at the present time amount to 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound; that includes the consolidated rate, police rate, sewers rate, and City of London union, ib. 7285–7290.

Sewers:

Considering the small area of the City, it would be better to have all the sewers of the metropolis under one management, Bennoch, 2043.—Report of Mr. Walker, Mr. W. Cubitt, and Mr. Brunel on the subject, with a plan of the sewers of London, showing that there is no person in London who may not know where he can get immediate access to a drain, Merewether, 5224–5226.—The sewers are managed by a commission, appointed yearly under seal of the Common Council, the Act requiring that a certain class of the corporation should be commissioners—the deputies of the different wards, for instance, ib. 5312–5314. 5316.—The commission in the City is appointed by the Common Council under the Act of Parliament passed for the purpose, Daw, 5910.—Since the time of Charles II. the corporation have appointed the commission, ib. 5912.—The commission consists of the lord mayor, the recorder, and the common serjeant, ex officio, and all the aldermen and deputies, one commoner from each ward, except the ward of Farringdon Without, from which there are two commoners on each side of the ward, ib. 5914.—They effect improvement (which they have done within the last thirty years to the amount of nearly 100,000*l.*) under the Metropolitan Paving Act, ib. 5923.—States the duties of the commission as relates to the consolidated rate, ib. 5940–41.—Commission of, statement respecting, Haywood, 5950.—The commissioners of sewers are a distinct body in the City, subordinate to the metropolitan board of commissioners. Does not think it desirable to disturb them, Elliot, 1090.—Thinks the system adopted in the City is productive of the greatest practical good. Lives now in the neighbourhood of Brixton, and is painfully concious of the difference between the two. Made an application nine months ago to the General Board of Sewers, which is still unattended to. In the City, an application at Guildhall would have immediate attention, De Jersey, 7558.

Sheriffs:

Are elected at common Hall, Acland, 415.—On an average each sheriff exceeds his receipts by 2,000*l.*, ib. 417.—Each is expected to pay 700*l.* towards the dinners at Guildhall on the 9th of November, ib. 419.—A person elected sheriff who refuses to serve has to pay a fine of 400*l.*, but can generally by bribery to the amount of 100*l.* or 150*l.* prevent himself being elected, ib. 439.—The power of the sheriffs within the City is hardly more than ceremonial, Pulling, 924.—The corporation of London abuse the privilege of electing the sheriffs of London and Middlesex by the livery. States particulars, Mills, 989–993.—If there were no fines laid upon those who refused to serve the office of sheriff, competent persons would readily be found, ib. 994.—There has been a practice of making appointments of sheriffs for the purpose of inducing the persons so elected to pay the fine, ib. 1000.—Mr. Peto and other gentlemen have been nominated and elected without their concurrence since 1848, ib. 1006.—Enters into particulars as to the appropriation of the fines paid by those whose refuse to serve, ib. 1014–1016.—The office of sheriff has for some years fallen into disrepute from certain jobbing transactions by the under sheriffs, who have selected the sheriffs, and this year no one would serve, Wallis, 1349.—The cause of the difficulty in obtaining two persons to serve as sheriffs is the expense attendant on the office, and its being shorn of all its power, ib. 1350.—All the substantial duties of the office are performed by the under sheriff's deputy, who divides the fees with him, ib. 1354.—A sheriff could not pass through his year of office without expending 2,000*l.* or 2,500*l.*, ib. 1358. Aldermen must have served the shrievalty before being elected Lord Mayor. Election to the office expensive, ib. 1441.—The office fallen into dishonour, Jones, 1568.—Does not think the present mode of election in common hall seems to answer, Merewether, 4960.—Particulars concerning the duties of their office, ib. 4960–4977.—Statement of accounts, ib. 5222.—Contemplated arrangement to pay them instead of their having fees and fines, Pearson, 5609–5624.—Mr. Rose, who calls himself an agent, gets a portion of his living by managing the elections of sheriffs, Turnley, 7730–7736.—The abuses with regard to the system of fines arose thus: Before the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed, many merchants who were Dissenters submitted to the fines when they were elected, rather than violate their consciences, Wire, 7919-7928.—The present system of electing in common hall objectionable; it should be in common council, ib. 7929–7932.—The expenses of the office never less than 3,000*l.*, ib. 7933.—The privilege of choosing their own sheriffs was bought by the City of London, and has been exercised by the people for 700 years, ib. 7935-7937.—Was one of the parties who (in 1819) took steps to prevent gentlemen being fastened on as sheriffs for the purpose of fining them. Thinks as much as 10,000*l.* had been exacted from gentlemen in two or three years before that time, Pearson, 8470.—After Mr. Raphael's election as sheriff he invited witness to be under sheriff, but no arrangement was made beforehand, though witness expected to be under sheriff, ib. 8470.—Was under sheriff to Mr. Salomons, though no arrangement was made beforehand, ib. 8470.

SHERIFFS COURT. (See Courts.)

SHERIFFS FUND:

Is of a very considerable amount. The funded property now consists of 8,100*l.* in the 3 per cents., 2,000*l.* in the 3½ per cents., and 1,000*l.* in the reduced. The funds are applied very beneficially to prisoners who are tried there and who are acquitted, and lately a considerable portion of those funds has been applied to assist them in emigration, Williams, 2402.—Those funds have been created by bequests, by subscriptions, and from other sources. Each sheriff annually contributes, and there are a variety of other voluntary contributions, ib. 2403.

SHOALS:

There are several shoals in the river which impede the Navigation. The effectual removal of them would be a work of great expense, Leach, 6382.—A few of them should be deepened, but thinks it dangerous to meddle much with them, James, 6878.

SIMMONS, GEORGE:

States the case of, Matthews, 2509.

SIMON, JOHN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is officer of health to the City; was appointed in 1848, 7391, 7392.—The salary was 500*l.* a year; but a year ago was raised to 800*l.* There are no other emoluments, 7393, 7394.—Acts under the Commission of Sewers, and attends the meetings of its committees as often as may be necessary. His duties are to advise the commission on all sanitary proceedings. Hands in two reports presented during last year; one is the annual report of the year, the other suggesting principles for a cemetery, and the organization of the proposed system of extramural interment. The details of the work from week to week are of this kind:—The Commission of Sewers has 6 inspectors of nuisances, acting partly for sanitary purposes under witness's directions, and partly as inspectors of lamps and pavements under the direction of his colleague, the engineer to the commission, Mr. Haywood. Rather less than half their time is due to the former office, which witness is expected to turn to the most useful account. Having acquired a knowledge of the sanitary defects and requirements of several districts in the City, and also knowing what deaths of all kinds are occurring from week to week, prepares for the inspectors a list of places to be inspected by them. The information they are directed to seek refers to various details of sanitary condition, to questions of lodgement, ventilation, cleanliness, &c., and has constructed tables which enable them to record this information. This inquiry brings under witness's notice a large number of cases requiring immediate attention; in all cases where the powers of the commission can be exerted, at the next court recommending them to issue the requisite orders; and another part of witness's weekly routine is to receive from the inspectors an account of the progress made towards compliance with the orders issued. In each case a fixed time is allowed for fulfilment, and if not done it is again brought before the court, 7397.—Under the Sewers' Act the Commissioners are empowered to call upon the landlords of private houses to amend their property in all particulars adverted to, 7398.—It is a local Act, peculiar to the City, passed in 1848, at the same time as the Public Health Act, but the powers of the commission were much increased for sanitary purposes by a second Act in 1851, 7399–7402.—The poorer house property is frequently in the hands of wealthy people, who only know their property through their agents. Often, for years, the commission can get at no representive of the property but the agent or collector who receives the weekly rent, 7403.—Witness's weekly list of sanitary recommendations is always accompanied by a tabular statement of the past week's mortality, giving the causes of death and the ages. From these weekly tables constructs more comprehensive tables, which exist as an appendix to the annual report laid before the court, 7404.—Is not registrar of either of the unions, but the registrar-general kindly lends witness the detailed reports of the several local registrars, from which he is able to make the requisite corrections for the mortality of workhouses and hospitals, and to compile the result in a convenient form, 7405.—Considers the sanitary inspection of the City to be in a very efficient state, and believes the rest of the metropolis has no sanitary supervision, 7406, 7407.—The Commissioners spend their money very liberally for public purposes, but wishes there was more money to spend in pulling down houses and making open spaces, as there are some parts where the residences of the poor are so enclosed by taller houses as to be unfit for habitation. The population is also very dense, the most crowded part being the area of the East London Union, 7408, 7409.—The population of the entire City has increased 5,000 within the last 10 years; it is now 130,000, and at the previous census it was about 125,000. The increase has taken place almost exclusively in the East London Union, a part without the original City proper, including Cripplegate and Bishopsgate, 7410, 7411.—The increase of the population has taken place principally among the poorer classes, and perhaps to a greater extent than the census would suggest; it has been partially masked by the conversion of dwelling-houses into offices and warehouses, and the number of houses having been reduced the increased population must have increased the crowding of the poor houses, 7412, 7413.—Does not know that there is any accommodation provided for the poor people when they are turned out of their lodgings by the houses being taken down. There has been no extensive disturbance of the poorer dwellings lately in the City. In the construction of New Cannon Street some courts have been destroyed, but does not believe that has removed a large poor population. The City contemplated building lodging-houses for the labouring classes, and a sum of money was destined for that purpose, in connexion with the plan for reconstructing Smithfield as a central market, but nothing has been done. Has not been consulted about the plan, 7414–7416.

Southgate, F. T. Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has the evidence of Mr. Mathews before him. Was solicitor to the defendant in the case referred to. Sees that though Mr. Mathews's statements are not untrue, they are calculated to leave an incorrect inference in the minds of the commissioners, 7231, 7232.—Mr. Mathews was solicitor for the plaintiff, Mr. Simmons. States the case, which was a question as to a right of embankment of a certain part of the river at Gravesend. The plaintiff had to pay all his own costs of action and suit in chancery, though he obtained an injunction, and verdict of 1*s.* damages. Mr. Mathews endeavours to throw blame on the Navigation Committee for not having interfered. Makes this statement in order to show that the Navigation Committee only refused to interfere in the matter on the ground that this was a squabble between the parties whether this was a private right or not, 7233, 7234.—Mr. Mathews said the object of enclosing and embanking the part was to build upon it. It might be; but the defendant had received rent for it for above 17 or 18 years. The difficulty that arose was with the pleadings. He pleaded custom, but was negatived, 7235.

Southwark Bridge. (See Bridge.)

Southwark:

The municipality of Southwark comprises three manors and five parishes,—the Guildable Manor, the King's Manor, and the Great Liberty Manor, Acland, 25.—If the borough of Southwark were independent of the City of London they would apply for a separate charter, ib. 38.—Petitions were presented from the inhabitants of Southwark to the Common Council, in 1814 and 1836, for a complete assimilation, not for a severance, ib. 40.—The best plan with regard to it, as well as to all other metropolitan boroughs, would be to incorporate it separately, Pulling, 867.—Would relieve the borough from the trifling jurisdiction which the City now has over it, and provide for its wants in the same way as those of Marylebone, Elliot, 1124.—It is in the power of the borough to apply to be admitted within the Municipal Act, ib. 1127.—Does not think there has been any such move in any of those boroughs, except when they have been instigated to it by the corporation, ib. 1128.—Must either be incorporated with the City or be allowed to apply for a corporation for itself; thinks it would be better to sever all connexion between them, Wallis, 1490–1493.—The City does not interfere enough with the borough of Southwark. The City holds three Courts Leet for the manor. It is not the case that at these courts fees are payable by parties called upon to serve offices, Corner, 2186.—The general feeling is in favour of a complete incorporation with the City, ib. 2208.—Average yearly emoluments of the high bailiff, Pritchard, 4148.—At a meeting held at the town hall on 25th of November last, they expressed a feeling that they would not be satisfied with the incorporation of the five ancient parishes, but would wish the eight parishes to be incorporated with London, ib. 4150.—Is believed to be as much a part of the City as Cheapside itself, Pocock, 4154.—Connexion of, with the City is onerous without any corresponding benefit, except the approaches to New London Bridge, ib. 4157.—No dues levied in the borough of Southwark over and above those levied over the whole port of London, Sturmy, 4168.—Excluded by its connexion with the City from the operations of the Municipal Act, although not exempted from the burdens of the county of Surrey, ib. 4172.—They might sever the connexion of the City with Southwark without the assistance of Parliament, Merewether, 4992.—Believes many of the inhabitants of Southwark have a great wish to be incorporated with the City, and the corporation have been approached more than once by petition, praying that they might participate in the benefits of a municipal government; but after great inquiry the corporation have always come to the conclusion that they have no power, without a special Act of Parliament for the purpose, to embody Southwark with the City for municipal objects. Does not think there is any particular objection in the City of London to a connexion with Southwark; but does not see any great advantage that it would be either to the City themselves or to the inhabitants of Southwark, Lord Mayor, 7170.—Suspended the election of constables, ale-tasters, and flesh-tasters, Payne, 7565.

Stallage of Billingsgate:

Paid to the corporation to repay them for the annuities paid to the yeomen of the waterside, Pearson, 5638–5644.

Steele, Mr. Benjamin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is not at the present time connected with the City of London; but has been, having filled various offices in it, and is tolerably well acquainted with its general management, 2600, 2601.—Has been a collector for consolidated rate; his claims to the consideration of the Commission are founded upon the circumstances of his birth in the ward of Farringdon Without, educated in the ward of Farringdon Within and Cripplegate Without, and having for 50 out of the 60 years of his life slept in the City, and taken an active part in all its proceedings. As a further claim has been harassed and tormented by corporation spies, for carrying on a trade within two hundred yards of the place of his birth, and consequently compelled by the corporation to collect its taxes, and subsequently became a corporation spy. These are the complaints which witness has to make against the City of London, and wishes to propose certain matters as remedies, 2602.—States the general nature of the complaints alleged against the corporation. Proposes that as the trading companies of London have become wholesale shams, and are unserviceable for the purposes for which they were established, that the money and estates left to them in trust by the old citizens should be amalgamated, and the objects of the donors carried out in the spirit of the givers; but such money or estates as may have been acquired by the collection of rates, fines, or contributions, be devoted to the promotion of education, under the superintendence of the corporation; that as every poor man pays at the rate of one halfpenny per cwt. of coals, in the shape of a tax, it would be expedient to retain that duty for the purpose of applying its produce to giving lands and bounties to builders or societies, for erecting in every district wholesome habitations for residence, in which a suitable room may be let at 6*d.* a week, and that the summit or basement of the building contain rooms suitable for schools; and that the society or individuals who accept the bounty of the corporation shall give ample security that no person receive more than five per cent. for the capital invested, and when the time for which the land might be granted has expired, the renewal of the lease shall be continued as long as the buildings are devoted to the objects for which they were intended; that the ancient duty of the corporation to superintend gaols and prisons be left to the Executive Government; that duty to be exchanged for the superintendence of the sanitary condition of the public buildings, and all educational establishments; that the income of the corporation from estates, tolls, and fines, amounts to 200,000*l.*, but by an effectual reform 100,000*l.* may be annually devoted to public objects of utility; that to secure an effective body of local representatives they should be chosen from a large area, and it would therefore be expedient to extend the boundaries of the City of London five miles round the General Post-office; to divide that space into 25 wards and 100 precincts, each ward to return one alderman, and each precinct two representatives, so that an undivided jurisdiction may govern and regulate the interests of the whole community, 2603.

Stevens, Mr. James John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is connected with the borough of Southwark, as chairman of the board of the parish of St. George. In consequence of there not being a board to which they can apply for the redress of their grievances, the poor are in a very bad condition in respect to their health, 4173.—A board should be constituted that would embrace the several paving and lighting boards which are now distributed throughout the parishes of the borough of Southwark, having authority to execute public works, a joint action in regard to such matters as sewerage and paving, 4174–4176.—The paving in the borough of Southwark is now executed by five or six boards, 4177.—The ownership of property is very much divided in the borough of Southwark. The

STOCK EXCHANGE:

STOCKTON, Mr. SAMUEL. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Attends from the parish of St. Pancras to state, that the ratepayers feel the coal tax to be very oppressive, and that the poor pay more in proportion than the rich. It is also unjust in principle, for this parish have the termini of two great railways, which causes an immense traffic over their roads, and the corporation have never contributed anything towards the repairs during the thirty-three years witness has resided there, 2868.

SAINT PANCRAS:

Complains that it is taxed for City improvements by the tax upon coals, Cooper, 2850.—In 1851 applied to Parliament, at an expense of 3,800*l.*, for an Act for paving and lighting the whole parish; was rejected, ib. 2853.—Particulars, how peculiarly situated, ib. 2851.—Complains that all the coals brought by the Great Northern and North-western Railway Companies pass over their roads, and cause great additional expense, ib. 2856.—Should have a corporation of their own, ib. 2858.—The vestry have not sufficient powers for the management of their parish, ib. 2865-2867.—The vestry are desirous of having a corporation for the parish of St. Pancras, and states reasons, Billet, 4429.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL:

Action to prove they are obliged to have their leases certified by two governors, being aldermen, Pearson, 5630-5637.

STURMY, HERBERT, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—The allusion in the resolutions produced by the high bailiff of Southwark to the fares and dues levied on the commerce of Southwark is meant to apply to the fact, that ships laden with corn and potatoes coming to any wharf on the Surrey side cannot be unladen except on paying metage and porterage dues, 4167.—Is not aware of any dues in the borough of Southwark over and above those levied on the whole port of London, 4168.—The ward of Farringdon Without and the ward of Portsoken were in the county of Middlesex, but when they were annexed to the corporation, they were taken out of the county. 100 years ago the county of Surrey had not any jurisdiction in Southwark Proper, that is, the five parishes; but the jurisdiction was allowed to creep in, and was never resisted till it became absolute. The borough part of St. Saviour's is within the five parishes, but the clink part, which is the larger, is not within the jurisdiction of the City, and therefore is within the Parliamentary borough, in addition to the parishes of Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Christchurch. Will call the attention of the Commissioners to the little that has been done for Southwark in the way of improvement by the corporation. Out of the coal duties, to which Southwark must have contributed at least one third, only 4,000*l.* has been applied for the local improvements in Southwark, and that was as far back as 1778.—The City have applied to their own improvements immense sums out of the coal duties, to which the southern side of the river have been large contributors, and therefore they urge a right to have some provision made out of the Bridge House estates, for improvements in the borough of Southwark. A sum of 3,000,000*l.* has been expended by the City for their own purposes, whilst Southwark has received only an expenditure of 4,000*l.* beyond the necessary improvements of London bridge. Has endeavoured to effect local improvements, 4169.—The borough of Southwark suffers in its sewerage from the present state of its institutions. Have complained to Lord Palmerston of two or three large sewers debouching into the river; one close to St. Saviour's church, which is very injurious. The commissioners say they cannot remedy it, as the expense would be 100,000*l.* There was a heavy overflow of the tide into the parish about 10 or 12 years ago. The poor suffered severely in some cases. The water came up to the first-floor windows. The whole of the bank was raised, and there is not the same suffering now except in extraordinary high tides, 4170.—The bank was raised at the expense of persons who lived along it where it was private property, and at the expense of the commissioners where it was public property. If any one having premises abutting on the river in Southwark wishes to erect anything on his premises projecting into the river, he must apply to the corporation for their assent. In consequence of the connexion of Southwark with the corporation of London, it is excluded from the benefit of the Municipal Act, 4171.—The connexion with the City excludes Southwark from the operation of the Municipal Act, though it does not exempt it from the burdens of the county of Surrey, 4172.

TAYLOR, HENRY LOWMAN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chairman of the Markets Improvement Committee, to which is entrusted the erection of the new cattle market at Copenhagen Fields, 7805.—Has been connected with that committee since its appointment in 1849. Was the originator of a motion in the Court of Common Council to consider the subject of the City markets generally, 7806.—Is a wholesale warehouseman in the iron trade in the City, having a private residence a few miles from town, 7807, 7808.—Has been ten years an active member of the corporation. Originated a motion which was carried in the Court of Common Council, that a special committee should be appointed, "To inquire and report whether any addition of space or other increased accommodation is required in Smithfield, Newgate, and Leadenhall Markets; to give an estimate of the expense of such alterations or additions, and further to inquire whether it is necessary to apply to Parliament for the requisite powers to effect these objects." The Government were at that time preparing a bill for the removal of Smithfield Market, and the committee were censured for some steps taken in defence of that market, and for expenses necessarily incurred in conteracting the mistaken notions brought before the public by the "Times," 7809.—With the exception of the "Times," believes the whole of the daily press was in favour of the view taken by the corporation. Believes that the public opinion was in favour of the retention of Smithfield Market, upon the enlarged plan prepared, though not with its present admitted nuisances. The plan proposed was a great improvement upon the existing market, 7810.—Is anxious to convince the Commissioners that, as trustees for the citizens, whose market Smithfield is by charter, the committee only discharged their duty in endeavouring to do what they believed was for the benefit of the public at large, 7811.—Some expenses were incurred in opposing the Government Bill; some in ascertaining the public feeling, and counteracting the powerful articles which appeared in the leading journal. Mr. Acland was employed to ascertain the feeling of the constituency, and was remunerated for his services, 7812.—Seven thousand registered electors of the City of London signed a memorial to their representative, Lord John Russell, in favour of the corporation scheme, which will prove that the inhabitants of the City of London approved the alteration that the committee thought it necessary to make in that market, 7813.—The "Daily News," "Morning Herald," "Morning Advertiser," and "Morning Post," each contained articles advocating not the retention of Smithfield as it is, but the retention of a central cattle market, with the proposed improvements. Mr. Bennoch says, "Articles were sent to newspapers with a sum of money," and,

"that he should no doubt be able to prove" that the money was sent to induce the newspapers to insert the articles as paragraphs instead of advertisements. That appears a charge against the public press, and feels quite certain the respectable part of the press would have thought it a gross insult to have a bribe offered them for the purpose. Is prepared to state that such an idea never entered the mind of any member of the committee. And yet Mr. Bennoch says he appears before the Commission to speak to facts within his own knowledge. The same witness states in No. 1181 that the market will not be finished for less than 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* The estimate of the cost at present is something like 343,000*l.* In No. 1182, Mr. Bennoch says the corporation are not competent to grapple with any great question, the committee not able to manage the affairs entrusted to them. Produces the model of the market to show that they have endeavoured to grapple with the question in the most comprehensive form. The largest portion of land which could be obtained has been purchased, in compliance with the wish of Lord Palmerston, Mr. Walpole, and every other gentleman who had anything to do with this new metropolitan cattle market. There will be a space of 15 acres in the centre for bullocks and sheep, the area of the present Smithfield Market being only six and a quarter acres, including the roadways through it. There will be public and private slaughter houses and lairs, and such like accommodation, and in addition taverns and public houses are being erected; 78 acres is a large space, and it is thought better to adapt the land for every accommodation in connexion with the market. There is a space for a hide market, lest it should be found necessary to remove the hide market from Leadenhall. There is likewise a scheme for the purpose of bringing foreign cattle from Blackwall to the market, and connecting also the Great Northern Railway with it, 7814.—The City will derive about 14,000*l.* a year from their property in the new market, 7815.—Upon a capital expended of about 350,000*l.*, it will pay about four per cent. A scheme has been submitted to Mr. Cardwell and Viscount Canning to bring a railway to the Post Office, within the walls, which would be considered a great advantage by the Government. That railway would also connect the City and the Cattle Market, therefore there would be a means of communication from the Metropolitan Cattle Market to Smithfield, where it is proposed bye-and-bye to erect a dead meat market, Newgate Market being a very great nuisance, 7816.—The exact site is not decided, but Mr. Bunning suggests somewhere near Long Lane. It will occupy about three acres, 7818, 7819.—It is not considered that Farringdon Market in its present form can be made available for a dead meat market. It is on an acclivity, and the approaches are not good, with the exception of Farringdon Street, 7821–7828.—It is a most difficult thing to move a market. The removal of Old Fleet Market into new Farringdon Market was a complete failure. Smithfield is more central and more likely to succeed as a market. Another object in view is to remove Leadenhall Market to the same spot, which should be in connexion with the railways, and would be a great advantage to the public. Thinks Newgate Market a much greater nuisance than Smithfield, 7829, 7830.—Mr. Bennoch says, "I believe you will discover that in 1849 a large sum of money was expended in various ways, some in dinners to members of Parliament, to manifest their gratitude for the assistance the corporation had received in the House of Commons." The only dinner they were invited to was one which it is customary for the sheriffs to have at Bellamy's when they present a petition to the House of Commons, which in this case was against the Government Bill, the expense of which dinner was 14*l.* 17*s.* Not one sixpence was spent by the committee in tavern dinners till last year, when a sum of money was voted, the business of the committee in the construction of the market occupying them so many hours of the day at some distance from London. Believes that Mr. Bennoch's idea of the incompetency of the corporation arose from his project for the erection of a new bridge not meeting with the favour in the common council which he anticipated. Has been upon most of the committees. Is now upon the City Lands Committee, which has the control of the City's estates, reporting to the common council from time to time the important part of the business. Is also on the Officers' and Clerks' Committee, to whom is referred all matters connected with the officers when a vacancy takes place.

Is a member of the Orphan School Committee, that for erecting the Wellington monument, the Markets Improvement Committee, the Commission of Sewers, and one of the four members of the corporation on the Metropolitan Commission, 7831.—Finds the duties absorb a good deal of time, 7832.—Agrees with the suggestion that a smaller number of committees would be desirable, and if the members were retained more permanently they would become more masters of their business than under the present system, 7833.—Does not anticipate there would be danger of less publicity and popular opinion being brought to bear upon the subject, 7834.—The change of members gives the common council an insight into the general business of the corporation, but with fewer committees the business would be more condensed in those committees, 7835.—Has the greatest confidence in their judgment and discretion, 7836.—In dealing with public money and public affairs, thinks the larger body should have the controlling powers, the smaller not acting without reporting to the larger body, 7837.—On some occasions thinks the committees act too much as executive bodies, 7840.—Their power should be more limited than it is now, and they should report more frequently to the Court of Common Council before they carry anything into execution, 7842.—The Markets Improvement Committee, being composed of thirty-five or forty members, may have left in their hands a greater control than if their number were very much reduced, 7343.—Does not think the duties and responsibilities of the Court of Common Council, the committees, and the City officers acting under those committees, are properly defined. The institution is a very ancient one; much has been regulated by practice and custom, 7844.—Any confusion in those respects has a tendency to diminish the responsibility. Thinks the committee should be responsible, at the same time should look with confidence to the judgment of their officers. Have fortunately some very able officers, 7845, 7846.—The officers have the entire control of carrying out anything which it is referred to them to carry out, 7847.—Mr. Bunning is both architect and clerk of the works. Thinks no man could be found equal to him in the discharge of the multifarious duties connected with his office, 7848, 7849.—If the City were about to erect a great public building with which the corporation alone had to do, they would put it into his hands for the purpose of his producing plans, 7851.—Does not think the City bound to resort to him exclusively, but feels certain that nineteen-twentieths of the corporation have sufficient confidence in the ability of the present architect not to think of going elsewhere. It would not have been so with the late officer, who was not ostensibly the architect; he was clerk of the works and surveyor, 7844.—All the City markets are under the control of the Markets Committee, 7855.—Some of those markets may be considered metropolitan markets; such as Smithfield, Billingsgate, and Newgate Markets, 7856.—In managing the City markets the committee do not look to the limited interests of the City, but to the wants of the whole metropolis, 7858.—The great emporium of commerce is the City of London, and the great objection to parting with Smithfield Market arises from the desire to retain all the trade within the City. Seven or eight millions per annum change hands in Smithfield; to take that to any other locality, is, to a certain amount, an injury to the trade of the locality from which it is taken, 7859.—Does not think the interested persons occupying property in the immediate neighbourhood of Smithfield had any influence upon the decision of the Markets Improvement Committee, 7860.—There was a large majority in the common council in favour of the corporation scheme for enlarging the market, something like the proportion of 70 members to 7, which will show the strong feeling throughout the body to retain the market in the City, 7861.—Attends the Commission to defend the conduct of the corporation from many charges brought against it. Admits that so old an institution requires considerable revision and improvement. Is prepared to suggest at some future time what he considers would be improvements in the constitution of the corporation, it being understood in the consolidated committee that no new scheme should be propounded on the present occasion, 7862.

TEMPLE, Mr. JOSIAH. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is keeper of the Guildhall. States his duties connected with it. Was appointed to the office on 31st May, 1847. Before being appointed had held the situation of first assistant for 21 years. Is admitted by the Court of Aldermen, and sworn, 6694.—Is paid by salary and emoluments, amounting upon the average to 412*l.* per annum. Has an official residence, and an allowance of coals and wood, 6695.—Orders 300 copies of a newspaper after every Court of Common Council, containing the best account of the proceedings, and if any two or three papers had the same account, then by rotation. Delivers them to the Court of Common Council and the officers, amounting to 280. The balance goes to the town clerk's office, 6696.—The paper is selected by the newsman early in the morning, the one having the fullest account of the proceedings, 6698–6701.—Gives the Commissioners an account of the sum of 1,000*l.* which witness received in 1852, which appears in the City cash statement for that year, 6703.

THAMES, CONSERVANCY OF THE:

The courts are mere excuses for parties of pleasure, Acland, 503.—The corporation are invested by very early statutes and charters with the conservancy and regulation of the river, Pulling, 806.—The extent of that privilege is now in dispute, ib. 813.—Is in the hands of the navigation committee, would not disturb an organization which has existed so long, Elliot, 1123.—The duties of the conservancy of the Thames are efficiently performed by the harbour masters, Bennoch, 1210.—Complains that the City as conservators ought to remove obstructions and prevent encroachments, but in cases of any difficulty they do nothing, Mathews, 2518.—Does not think the corporation qualified to perform the duties of the conservancy, ib. 2531.—It is only with reference to the Port of London that the conservancy has anything of a municipal nature, ib. 2536.—There are many shoals which at times impede the navigation, and ought to have been removed long ago. Gave evidence once before a former committee upon the subject, when it was proved that the City had not the right to remove shoals, as they were claimed by the corporation of the Trinity Board; but, in justice to the City of London, remarks that he believes this generation has done more towards the improvement of the Thames than any other, Bullock, 2612.—Thinks there are no shoals which ought particularly to be complained of, Whistler, 2630.—Would place it in the hands of the Government, Williams, 2839.—Gives a very long statement, with opinions, of a cause disputed between the Crown and the corporation as to their title to the soil of the river, Pemberton, 2929.—The right of conservancy is not disputed by the Crown; if disputed at all, should imagine it would be by the Admiralty. His office is merely with respect to the soil. Refers the Commissioners to Lord Hale, "Treatise de Jure Maris," Part 1st., Chapter 5, in regard to the office of conservators, ib. 2943.—Would not restore this conservancy to the corporation of London, nor to any strictly municipal body. Would have it provisionally handed over to the Woods and Forests till a special department for rivers and watercourses is provided, Hickson, 2948.—Report which was drawn up in the year 1842 by Mr. Walker, by Captain Bullock, the water bailiff, the engineer of the navigation committee, and other subordinate officers, on the question of the management of the stream of the river, Merewether, 5227.—Mr. Walker's plan for the embankment of the Thames, ib. 5227–5230.—Suit with the Crown concerning the bed and soil, ib. 5230–5252. 5282.—The conservancy of the river is beyond all dispute in the corporation. In the reign of James I. there was a question pending, and the attorney-general for the Crown admitted that the corporation of London were the conservators of the river by prescription, ib. 5281.—Suit with the Crown concerning the right to the bed and soil of the river, Wortley, 5500–5515.—Dispute between the Crown and corporation as to the right to the soil of, Pearson, 5571–5592.—Does not think the present powers of the City sufficient for them to exercise the duties of the conservancy and the protection of the river efficiently, Leach, 6423.—Thinks it very essential that the control over the soil and bed of the river should be combined with the duties of conservancy, ib. 6406.—At present the Lord Mayor is conservator on behalf of the corporation; the conservancy, in fact, being managed by a committee of the common council. In consequence of the notification which has been mentioned, there was some hesitation on the part of the City whether to accept that term of the compromise or not. Produces the proceedings of the Court of Common Council upon it; reads report, Wortley, 6470.—It is quite a mistake to suppose that the corporation derive any benefit from the profits of the river. So far from that being so, the 1,100*l.* a year is a mere trifle compared with what is really required, and which in truth is paid out of the corporation funds. Of course if you take the conservancy out of the hands of the City, you must find funds somewhere else for its support, ib. 6475 Would consolidate the offices connected with the conservancy of the Thames, Lord Mayor, 7161.—Would give the corporation the power of nominating a board for the management of the conservancy, subject to the approval of the Trinity House, ib. 7177, 7178.—Observations with respect to the navigation and conservancy of the Thames, ib. 7177–7180.—Very large sums of money would have been expended in improvements of the river if the question relating to the bed and soil of the river had been settled. It is before the Consolidated Committee, Wood, 7266.—Must decidedly negative the opinion that the Committee are incompetent to perform their duties, Hall, 7339.—City pecuniarily benefited by a separate jurisdiction, Dakin, 7369.—States that it is entirely a misapprehension that a considerable portion of the revenue of the Corporation is derived from the embankment of the Thames in Thames Street. There is no such rent from land so embanked from the Thames, Pearson, 8459.

THAMES, CONSERVATORS:

The City are conservators, Williams, 2833.—The City, as conservators of the Thames and Medway, have not maintained properly the embankments in either river, Gooden, 1329.—The navigation of the Thames is in a very imperfect state, owing to the impediments caused by the shoals between London Bridge and Erith, Pratt, 2454.—There is nothing to show that the City were conservators at the time of Richard I., Merewether, 5025.—Remarks upon the complaints of the conduct of the City in the character of conservators of the river, with regard to obstructions made by Mr. Mathews, ib. 5253–5274.—Duties of the corporation as conservators of the Thames, Leach, 6401–6402.

THAMES, NAVIGATION COMMITTEE. (See Committee.)

THAMES, NAVIGATION OF THE:

The Act of Parliament confines the navigating of barges, and craft of that description, to freemen, and gives them the exclusive right to navigate and manage all craft upon the river Thames. There are practices which are injurious to the community at large, which arise out of that exclusive right, Pillow, 3015.—Describes the duties of the engineer, Leach, 6362.

THORPE, Mr. ALDERMAN:

On one occasion 3,000*l.* was put down as having been spent by the Irish Society in an election at Coleraine, when Mr. Alderman Thorpe was a candidate, Humphreys, 8431.—Inquired as to truth, and was told less than 1,000*l.* was taken from the funds of the society, and expended in Coleraine, ib. 8432.—That was about the year 1830, ib. 8433.—Alderman Thorpe was governor of the society at that time, ib. 8433.

TIDAL HARBOURS:

The Admiralty is the general conservator of tidal harbours in this country as far as jurisdiction goes, Merewether, 5278.

TITHES:

Under the 37th of Henry VIII., there was a tithe of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound upon the rental of the City parishes generally, Goodman, 6303.—In St. Helen's parish it may be said, double tithes are paid, Jones, 7803, 7804.

TOLLS:

There is a toll on the transit of commodities into the City, Elliot, 1106.—The corporation levy a toll upon coals to the distance of twenty miles round St. Paul's, ib. 1108.—The tolls of the City ought to be abolished, Bennoch, 1259.—The toll is disliked chiefly on account of the manner in which it is demanded, ib. 1263.—The City of London maintain the system of tolls, George, 2282.—Not adapted to the circumstances of the present time, Moore, 4308.—There has been an increase in the proceeds of the tolls and dues, Scott, 4594.—The corporation have expressed their willingness to give up the tolls which are taken upon carts upon their entrance into the City. Those tolls have been mortgaged heretofore for public improvements; one was connected with the continuation of Farringdon Street. That money is either paid off, or very soon will be. The freemen of the places in which the toll is demanded are generally exempted from it, and that is the case in London. Strangers coming in are subject to it. The average amount of the toll is about 5,000*l.* a year, Merewether, 5215–5221.—In an application to Parliament in 1855 it was part of their plan to give up the tolls upon carts now levied on their entrance into the City, Tyrrell, 5421.—These tolls are collected at the different locks, and at another place in the tideway also, Leach, 6377.—There is not a single barge passes subject to toll which does not undergo witness's own check; in most cases seven or eight times over, ib. 6377.

Toll, Street:

Objections to, by the parishes of St. Andrew Holborn and St. George the Martyr, with particulars, Hopwood, 4888–8894.

Town Clerk:

Statement of office of, Williams, 2809.—Statement as to his duties, Merewether, 4682.—He does not engage in any professional business, except that connected with the City, his whole time being taken up with his duties, ib. 4683, 4684.—Salary, ib. 4686, 4687. 4689.—Fees, 4687–4688.—Is nominally registrar of the mayor's court, ib. 4687.—The town clerk, who is a very experienced barrister, is called on by the committee to express an opinion as to the advisability of instituting a suit, Pearson, 5536, 5537.

Travers, John Ingram, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a wholesale grocer, 207.—Has lived in the City from his boyhood, 208.—Has never directed his attention to the municipal concerns of the City of London, 209.—Has never belonged to the corporation, nor taken any part in its affairs; is one of the court of the fishmongers' company, 210.—Agrees with most of his class that the corporation of the City of London is unsatisfactory in its management, in its system, and quite unfit for the requirements of the present day, 211.—Thinks it would be best to do away with the corporation and local government of the City altogether, 212.—Would have instead a chamber of commerce, which should give a voice to the commercial classes, and express opinions on purely commercial subjects only, 213, 214.—Would have no municipal body of any kind, 215.—Thinks that the higher class in the City would agree with him, but that the smaller shopkeepers are strongly in favour of the local government, 216.—Is of opinion that the inexpediency of municipal institutions applies to the whole of the United Kingdom. Doubts whether they are ever appealed to, as in case of public grievances an appeal is made at once to the Government through the House of Commons, 217.—Sees no hope of inducing the more highly educated classes engaged in commerce to undertake municipal or local government, 218.—Objects in some degree to the whole system of unpaid magistracy in England, 219.—Thinks that Mr. Thomas Baring, who is supposed to represent the commercial principles and character of the City of London, would feel insulted if offered an alderman's gown, 220.—Ascribes the feeling to the office having lost the character it once possessed. There is a feeling on the part of every educated man that the office is humbug, 221.—There may be some advantages connected with the office of alderman, but the higher class do not aspire to it, 222.—Thinks that nothing would induce the higher class of merchants in London to undertake an office at all like that of the present Lord Mayor, 223, 224.—At Liverpool merchants of the greatest eminence have accepted the office of mayor, as there the office gives great commercial and political weight. In London it gives none, 225.—Does not think that any merchant of high standing would accept the office, nor that it would be possible to give the office any commercial or political weight whilst hampered with any remnant of the present corporation, 226.—The office of mayor is not one of which a great merchant would under any circumstances be proud. The office of sheriff was lately hawked about the City, and it was a great favour to get any one to take it, 227.—Does not think that the feeling of distaste arises from the limited area of the City, 228.—Were the office invested with a Government character men of high standing would accept it, but it would soon of necessity become a Government situation, 229.—At Manchester the situation of chief magistrate is held by merchants of eminence. No comparison between Manchester and London, either in the character of merchants or offices, 230.—London might be included in the general management of the Government. The commissioners of police might include London without any great additional staff or expense, 231.—Is not prepared to abolish municipal institutions altogether, but would begin with London, 232.—Does not think that the reasons for doing so apply with equal force to other great towns, as the leading men of the manufacturing and out-port towns have more time on their hands than those of London, 233.—Were the corporation swept away, there would be no portion of the government of the City of London which might not be absorbed in the general government of the country in a week's time, 234.—The management of sewers is under a separate commission, but is a portion of the corporation, 235.—The organization of the police in the City of London is not equal to that of the metropolitan police, 236.—It would be better if the police of the City were absorbed in the metropolitan police, 237.—The objections urged against the corporation refer to the system more than the conduct of individuals. The management of the corporation has improved the last few years, 239, 240. —Does not consider the salaries of the paid officers of the City too high for men of talent, 241.—As the duties do not require men of much education, half the expenses might be saved, 242.—The office of chamberlain is next thing to a sinecure. The salary and emoluments are considerable, 243, 244.—Thinks that most of the offices under the corporation are the same, though some of the officers have considerable work, 245.—Complains that the management of the corporation with regard to tolls, &c. hinders commerce; for instance, in the case of green fruit, 247–249.—Sees no advantage in making a connexion between the freedom of the City and the trading companies, 251. —Considers it an act of oppression to require all retail traders in the City to be free of the companies, 252.—That regulation is only enforced now in the case of the small people, 253.—Practically speaking, many wholesale traders are not connected with the City in any way, 255.—Believes that attempts were made to enforce the regulation against wholesale traders, 256. —The privileges with respect to porters, brokers, &c., are a great nuisance and drawback to trade, 257.—Is willing to assist the objects and purposes of this Commission, and believes the same feeling is entertained generally throughout the upper classes, and the better classes of tradesmen in the City, 260.

Trophy Tax:

A sort of county rate, Anderton, 7701, 7702.

Trust Funds. (See Chamberlain.)

Turnley, Joseph, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been recently elected chairman of the Navigation Committee, having been on the committee three years, 7707–7709.—Has been connected with the common council six years, 7710.—Is a lighterman; premises on the Custom House Quay, 7711, 7712.—The chairman of the committee is not always a gentleman connected with the trade upon the river. The last chairman but one had been connected with the sea for the greater part of his life, 7713, 7714.—There are only two on the committee, or even in the common council, who are immediately connected with the water-side; but there are other persons very conversant with that business who have been on that committee for years, 7715.—If it were possible, thinks a larger infusion of practical knowledge into the Navigation Committee would be desirable; but it is not absolutely necessary that all should be connected with the waterside, 7716. —Mr. Powles suggests that members of the dock companies should be admitted. Thinks that would work badly, as they would be interested men, whereas the members are now perfectly independent, and there is no chance of jobbery, 7719.—An infusion of members appointed by Government was proposed. Does not think that would do. It was likewise suggested that the Trinity corporation should send five or six members. Does not think they would give their time as the common council do. Attended the committee 82 days, from eleven till after five o'clock, 7720.—The officers of the committee are very competent men. The harbour masters are all first-rate men, 7721.—Does not always fall in with the views of the officers, nor do the other members, though they may sometimes do so. They are all efficient men, 7722.—Supposing a person comes for a grant to drive piles or make a pier, a plan is asked for, and inspected. It is then referred to the sub-committee, who view the premises, and request all parties concerned, that is to say, the neighbours right and left, to put in any objection they may entertain, but as far as possible one line of embankment is kept, 7723.—The condition of the river below bridge is not satisfactory; there always have been shoals, and always will be, and they are probably increased from the increased size of the vessels navigating the river, 7724, 7725.—The want of adequate funds to devote to the clearing of the shoals, is no doubt a serious injury to the river, 7726, 7727.—The jurisdiction of the corporation over the river below bridge is not a source of profit to them; beyond the tidal way it is a great loss to the City, 7728, 7729.—Wishes to refer to the system of appointing sheriffs. There is a Mr. Rose, who calls himself an agent, (believes he is in some way connected with the coal trade,) who appears to conduct this election just as he pleases. If a person wishes to serve, Mr. Rose calls upon him, and tells him, for 50*l.* he will ensure his election. On the contrary, if the gentleman refuses to serve, Mr. Rose tells him he will do what he can, but it will cost him 40*l.* or 50*l.*, so that in both cases Mr. Rose makes money. Was elected sheriff in June last, in consequence of not paying Mr. Rose to be kept out. Put in a memorial to the Court of Aldermen, praying to be relieved both from serving the office or from paying the fine. They have not at present put it into the hands of their solicitor, but witness is determined not to pay. After the election Mr. Rose left the hall without paying the hundreds of unwashed fellows who had brought about the election, and they applied to witness, who of course declined to pay them, 7730–7733.—Does not believe this system of appointing sheriffs for the sake of their fines is countenanced by any persons of respectability connected with the corporation, 7734.—This man acts independently of the corporation; he gets a portion of his living by it. It is only the inferior agents who make a profit by it, 7735, 7736.

TYRRELL, EDWARD, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the office of City Remembrancer since 1832, 5361, 5362.—Held the office of Deputy Remembrancer from 1827, 5363.—Succeeded his father, who had held the office of Remembrancer from 1793, 5364, 5365.—The emoluments attached to the office are derived from two sources; one is a certain annual payment of 1,000*l.* a year from the corporation, and 250*l.* a year for office expenses. Is also entitled to charge for parliamentary business done for funds, under Acts of Parliament, or otherwise not chargeable on the City cash; the amount of which, for the year 1852, gives the average of the previous five years about 700*l.*, 5366.—There would be a separate charge for business done for the police or sewers funds, 5367.—Thinks it would be very desirable that the whole of the emoluments should consist of a salary, 5369, 5370.—Receives at present a certain sum in the form of a salary, and the amount of receipts upon parliamentary business varies from year to year, 5371.—The annual expenses of the office have exceeded the allowance of 250*l.* by about 300*l.* This should be deducted from the 1700*l.*, leaving a net income of 1400*l.*, 5372.—Has no patronage, 5373.—The principal duty of the office is that of parliamentary solicitor for the corporation in the two Houses of Parliament. Is responsible for everything that passes there which affects the corporation. Is also expected to attend on Courts of Common Council and all Courts of Aldermen. The presentation of addresses to the Crown, and the business of the corporation at the Government offices, are in this department, 5374, 5375.—Is a solicitor, 5376.—In his capacity as parliamentary solicitor has to watch from 400 to 500 bills every year, and there are few years in which the corporation have not at least one bill of their own in progress, 5377, 5378.—With respect to the vast majority of these bills, can see at once that it is impossible that they can affect the City, 5379.—Last year the number of bills, which had directly or indirectly some relation to the City was 50. This was a larger number than usual, 5380, 5381.—Some of the bills were public, some private. Reads extract from the report of the Royal Commissioners with respect to his duties. The duties of the office are comprised under two heads; one, the conduct of parliamentary business, and the other attending to all points of form and ceremony, 5383, 5384.—The Common Law Chancery and other legal matters are conducted by the solicitor, the conveying by the comptroller. When witness was appointed to the office a considerable reduction was made in the emoluments. In the year 1835 the House of Commons made an order that the clerks of the House should no longer be employed as parliamentary agents. Has acted as parliamentary agent himself since that time, and calculates that it has effected a saving to the corporation of from 300*l.* to 500*l.* a year, 5385.—If there were no officer holding the situation held by witness, the City would still be obliged to incur great expense in parliamentary business. The great majority of solicitors who are engaged in parliamentary proceedings employ a parliamentary agent, who makes a separate charge. Witness does the whole of the business, 5386.—With respect to watching bills in Parliament, the usual course is, at an early period of the session to report to the common council any bill which he (witness) thinks likely to affect their interest. They refer the bill to one of their committees, in whose department it may happen to be. If any proceedings take place on the bill, he puts himself into communication with the chairman, who either acts upon his own authority, or calls the committee together, who give instructions what to do. In case any proceedings arise of which he has not apprised the court, he then acts upon the orders of the lord mayor, 5387.—The course pursued on the bill with respect to Smithfield Market was, immediately he knew that such a bill was brought forward, he reported it to the Court of Common Council, who referred to the Market's Improvement Committee, 5388.—Had the management of expenditure incurred by the City in opposing the bill, so far as receiving the money and paying it to Mr. Scott, who paid it over to the parties, 5389, 5390.—The total amount of the outlay was 2750*l.*, 5392.—Believes that there were professional gentlemen employed who did not appear before the Committees of either House. Does not know by whom they were employed. It was represented that it would be desirable to have the aid of some literary gentleman, and witness gave his sanction to some small sums of money being applied for that purpose. It was only 100*l.*, 5393–5396.—The main part of the money went to the parties who got up petitions. Believes about 2,200*l.* was spent in this way, 5397.—Whenever any considerable amount was paid, the bill was brought to witness, who applied to the committee for the money required, 5398.—Did not select the agents, but gave his sanction to their being employed, 5399.—It was a most unusual occurence to devote a sum of money to an object of that kind. Thinks that upon two other occasions small sums had been expended; but it was an uncommon proceeding altogether, 5400, 5401.—In addition to the 2,750*l.* already named, there was a sum of 3169*l.* 11*s.* for counsel, witnesses, and other usual legal expenses, 5402.—Those two items constituted the whole expenditure, and are rather under the sum which was paid by Government for the same purpose, 5403.—Selected the counsel, 5404.—When he thinks counsel ought to be employed, he informs the committee and names the counsel, and if the Committee approve, engages them, 5405.—Every one of the accounts of the expenditure incurred by parliamentary business are laid fully before the court, but are not published. When the parliamentary matter is over, a detailed account is laid before the committee, and if the business charged for has been ordered by them, the bill is signed by the chairman. It is then laid before the Court of Common Council, and referred by them to the Law Bills Committee. This committee refers to one or two of their members, who are legal men. They go through it, and see the vouchers, and report again to the Law Bills Committee, and if they are satisfied with the report, a warrant is ordered and the bill is paid by the chamberlain, 5407, 5408.—It appears in the City accounts in a single item, as money paid to the city remembrancer for his account of disbursements, specifying the particular measure in respect of which the charges have been incurred, 5409, 5410.—Sees no objection to those accounts being laid before the corporation in extenso, 5411, 5412.—Was remembrancer when the recent Police Act was passed, 5413.—Believes that the description given by Mr. Rogers of the manner in which that operation was conducted is an overcharged description of what took place. There was a committee of the corporation to whom the bill was referred, and they engaged a room in Palace Yard. Believes there were communications made to some portions of the country. The whole of the charges for that part of the business were 306*l.*, 5414, 5415.—Does not think that any literary gentlemen were employed on that occasion. It was a very rare occurrence when they were employed, an occasion of the confiscation of the property of the corporation 5416.—Imagines that the corporation consider that their property in the markets, which was the property then in dispute, belongs to them, and is exercised by them for the benefit of the citizens at large, 5417.—They consider the tolls of the markets in the same light as the rents of lands, and as strictly falling within the designation of property, 5418, 5419.—They would consider any measure which took away the tolls of a market without compensation in the light of a confiscation, but do not apply that doctrine to the tolls upon carts now levied on their entrance into the City. In an application to Parliament in 1852 it was part of their plan to give up those tolls, 5420, 5421.—If this had not been a voluntary surrender, would certainly have applied the term property to this portion of their revenue, 5422, 5423.—With respect to the tonnage dues, which are established by virtue of an Act of Parliament, apprehends there would be no claim of property, 5424.—The 4*d.* coal duty is decidedly property. Parliament when it passed an Act abolishing the charge of 1*s.* on every chaldron of coals, payable to the Richmond Family, gave a fair compensation to the parties entitled to it, 5426, 5426.—Considers the right of the City to the coal duties precisely on the same footing as the grant to an individual out of a duty, 5427.—Considers the metage dues as property, 5428.—Does not know of any fund except the consolidated fund available for the purpose of compensation, 5430.—Does not think it would be any compensation if the corporation came upon the rate-payers of the City, 5431.—It would depend upon the terms of the grant as to whether any distinction could be drawn between the right to levy dues of this description conferred upon a public corporation for public purposes, and a similar right given to an individual for his private benefit, 5432.—Every right and every property enjoyed by a corporation belongs to them for the benefit of the parties by whom they were chosen, 5433, 5434.—When the 4*d.* duty was granted to the corporation they represented the same part of the metropolis which they do now, 5435.—There was not so large a portion outside the walls as there is now, 5436.—Believes that when the coal duty was first granted there was no idea that the buildings outside the walls would become so numerous as they are, but the coal duty has for some time been employed for the advantage not only of the City of London, properly so called, but of all that part of the metropolis which surrounds it, 5437, 5438.—The 4*d.* duty has always formed part of what the City calls its general funds, 5439.—This duty is contributed by the whole metropolis and the country around it, 5440.—The principle which has been followed in watching parliamentary business has been to insist upon the exemption of the City from the operation of any act which would control and interfere with the rights and privileges enjoyed by the corporation, 5441.—Thinks that the course taken by the corporation with regard to the Charity Trusts' Act was in no way injurious to the passing of the bill, but the contrary. The statement that witness, as the officer of the corporotion, applied for the insertion of any clause in the bill, is wholly unfounded. The clause complained of is in section 38, and was inserted in the bill without the smallest communication with or suggestion from the corporation. When the bill was brought in it was laid by witness before the common council, who referred it to the Parliamentary Committee, and they referred to the town clerk, witness, and Mr. Scott, to peruse the bill and report to them respecting it. Reads the Report. Several of the parties who had opposed the former bill applied to witness, as the officer of the corporation, but finding that the corporation did not oppose, they did not, 5442.—The bill now includes in its operations every one of the charities of the City of London, 5443.—The Lord Chancellor has not applied the same process to charities in the City, the incomes of which are under 30*l.*, as he has to charities outside. In charities outside the resort is to the judge of the County Court. The charities of the City, the incomes of which are under 30*l.*, go to the Court of Chancery in the usual way, 5444.—The City would have been perfectly satisfied with reference of those charities to the judge of the County Court of the City, 5445.—There never was an exemption clause for the City in this bill, 5446, 5447.—This distinction of jurisdiction was not put in at the instance of the City, nor does witness know that it was ascertained beforehand that such a clause would be acceptable to the City, 5448, 5449.—When a bill is introduced into Parliament on the behalf of the corporation it is part of the duty of the remembrancer to draw it up, 5450.—The effect of the Police Act, the 2nd and 3rd Victoria, cap. 94, local and personal section 59 was to make the Temple a part of the adjoining ward, and to bring it and other places within the Police Act, whereas before they were extra-parochial and watched themselves. The part of the clause referred to was inserted by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. Finding that the clause was put in, witness drew the attention of the late recorder, Mr. Law, to it, 5451, 5452.—There was no direct communication with them, 5453.—The word "employment" in the City County Court Act was introduced into the clause at a consultation between Mr. Russell Gurney and Mr. Ogle. The facts which were brought before them were, that there were a great many persons in the employment of the Bank of England, and other large public establishments, who did not carry on business in the city, and a legal decision of the courts had been given that a person so employed did not come within the meaning of a person carrying on business, 5454.—Has not heard that this has occasioned any inconvenience, 5455, 5456.—When instructed by the corporation to oppose any private bill, takes the ordinary course of opposing it before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and failing there, would then go before the House of Lords. The practice would differ in no respect from that of any public body opposing a private bill, 5457–5459.—With respect to opposing a public bill, the same course would be adopted by the corporation as by other parties, 5460.—The only advantage for opposing parliamentary bills which the practice of the house gives to the remembrancer is, that by virtue of his office he is entitled to a seat behind the sergeant-at-arms in the House. This is an ancient privilege, 5461, 5462.—The general principle which the City follow in deciding to oppose either private or public bills is, that if any bill proposed to take from them that which they possessed they would oppose it, 5463.—They would not oppose a bill which made any alteration in any custom of the City which was not in the nature of a possession, unless they thought the repeal of it would be injurious to the City, 5464, 5465.—Thinks they would oppose any bill making an alteration in the law of debt, or the remedies against debtors interfering with the custom of foreign attachments, 5466.—Very few cases have occurred in witness's time of their having procured the insertion of clauses excepting them from the operation of general Acts. The first instance was the Small Debts Act. In 1848 there was a general exception of the whole of the metropolis from the Health of Towns Act, 5467, 5468.—The ground for applying was, that the bill proposed to interfere with a vast number of sanitary arrangements which belonged to and were exercised by the Commissioners of Sewers. The next instance was the Metropolitan Sewers Act. This was opposed because it proposed to deprive the corporation of the management of their own sewers. The next was the Common Lodging House Act. An exception of the City was procured from that, because more stringent powers were contained in the City Sewers Act for that purpose. The next instance was the Smoke Prevention Act. A clause was inserted in the bill that the Act should not interfere with the powers in the Sewers Act, because that Act had much stronger powers for the same purpose, 5469, 5470.—There have been no clauses of exemption in private Acts, but there have been a good many clauses inserted, as far as the navigation of the Thames is concerned, and also that pipes shall be laid down in the City as the Commissioners of Sewers shall direct, 5471.—There have also been clauses inserted in Docks Acts and Railway Acts with regard to the privileges of the City, but those clauses have not gone beyond the preservation of the existing rights, 5472, 5473.—There has been no disposition on the part of the corporation to create a separate system of legislation in the City, or to exempt it from Acts of general operation, and is quite sure that in instructing him (witness) to oppose any public bills, they have not been influenced by any general view of that kind, 5474, 5475.—The average cost of the entertainment on lord mayor's day has been 2,200*l.*, including a sum of 200*l.* paid by the corporation: The sum of 2,000*l.* is defrayed in equal moieties by the lord mayor and the two sheriffs. The usual cost of the procession has been under 200*l.* Last year it cost 490*l.* The extra expense was paid between the lord mayor and Mr. Sheriff Wire, 5476–5479.—In former days the lord mayor's pageant was something in the style of the show last year, but it was carried still further. There were generally actors who had a part to perform. Some of the early pageants were written by Peele, Webster, and other early dramatists, 5480.—For some years the City had a regular poet laureate, but a person was usually engaged from year to year to compose those pageants who had no share in the establishment, 5481, 5482.—Begs to say that no such sums of money were spent in entertaining Members of Parliament on the occasion of the opposition to the Smithfield Market Removal Bill, as was stated in answer to questions 1221, 1222, 5483.—With respect to the conservancy, the corporation have been very anxious for the public interests to have the matter arranged with the Government. There are many improvements which they are anxious to carry out, but they feel that while the matter remains in its present uncertain state they cannot proceed to do so. Several improvements which are contemplated would relate to the bed and soil of the river as well as to the conservancy, 5484, 5485.

TYRRELL, EDWARD, Esq. (Second Examination.)—Reads the statement which on a former occasion he promised to prepare with respect to the coal duty, 7236.—There is an essential difference between the 4*d.* coal duty and the other duties. The 4*d.* duty is permanent, and claimed by the City as part of their own estate, subject to their own control. The rest of the duty on coal is temporary; will expire in 1862, and is affected by Act of Parliament to particular objects of public improvement, 7237.—The last portion of the 700,000*l.* which the City lost on the closing of the Exchequer by Charles II. was repaid in 1834.—It need not have remained so long, but there were parties who were disposed to allow their money to remain there as long as they could, 7238.—The City have not given large sums out of this 4*d.* duty to the improvement of the metropolis beyond the limits of the City; but out of their general funds, 7239.—For many years the 4*d.* duty formed part of the general property of the City; within the last few years, a certain part has been assigned for public improvement, 7240.—Does not think that the City consider the metropolis at large to have any legal claim upon the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty, but for some years past have voted out of it large sums for the improvements within the City, which other parts of the metropolis have the advantage of, 7241, 7242.—There is about 580,000*l.* of this 4*d.* duty mortgaged for New Cannon Street, besides other charges, 7243, 7244.—Supposes that if the coal duty were not sufficient, the other part of the City property would be liable as security for that mortgage, 7245.—Can hardly tell what the financial effect of allowing the 4*d.* and the rest of the coal duty to expire in 1862 would be, but it would leave very large sums of money to be paid by the corporation, which have been advanced on the credit of the 4*d.* duty, 7246.—By a calculation made last year by Mr. Scott it would take 16 years to pay off the amount of debts now charged upon the 4*d.* duty, 7247.—If the proceeds of the 4*d.* duty had been sufficient between this and the year 1862 to pay off the debts specially affected to it, the ratepayers could not have been called on for an equivalent payment, as the corporation have no power to call upon them to contribute sums for improvements, 7248.—Supposing a general power were given to levy an improvement rate, in lieu of the coal duty, of course the City would have the same power as the rest of the metropolis, but thinks there would be difficulty in getting parties to agree to such a rate, and the money would not be so immediately and readily applicable as a fund arising from a certain duty like the coal duty, 7249.—Within the last 6 or 7 years the Court of Common Council have resolved to apply 20,000*l.* a year out of the 4*d.* duty for improvements, 7250.—The corn duties, and other duties of that nature, are paid by the inhabitants of the metropolis generally, 7251, 7252.—Mr. Pemberton, in his evidence, No. 2992, on the Greenwich Pier Act, says a clause was inserted, "saving the rights of the Crown," instead of "any rights of the Crown," which merely implies a reservation in case there should be any, 7253.

UNDER SHERIFFS:

Are appointed by the Sheriffs annually. Their duties and emoluments, Anderton, 7589–7614.—Does not think the office susceptible of amendment, Wire, 7934–7946.—Emoluments about 1,000*l.* a year, ib. 7943.

UNIONS:

The City having three unions when one would suffice, has cost 300,000*l.* Under one union the poor would have been more efficiently relieved. The whole of the extra expense has been for establishment management. The poor have greatly suffered by the existing system, Hickson, 2768–2771.

WADDILOVE, ALFRED, Esq., D.C.L. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a doctor of civil law, practising at Doctors Commons. In practising in the Court of Admiralty, has had opportunities of seeing the injury which often results to owners of vessels and underwriters, from the want of education and general intelligence of captains and mates. Has turned his attention to the Gresham College, with the hope that the fund devoted to instruction by Sir Thomas Gresham might be rendered more applicable to the wants of the present day. Has looked into the will and endeavoured to obtain all the facts which bear upon the trust. Mr. Bennoch has given a summary of the will of Sir Thomas Gresham and the foundation of the college. Will therefore endeavour to show what has been the conduct of the trustees and professors since its foundation. Gives his account up to the year 1755. Thirteen years after, in 1768, the college was sold. Continues the history of the college to the present time. Ventures to suggest that under the late Charitable Trusts Act, the trustees, if anxious to make their lectures more in accordance with the wants of the present day, might apply to the commissioners for a scheme for the purpose of rendering the funds at their disposal more serviceable for public purposes, 7270–7272.

WALLIS, GEORGE APPLETON, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the sheriffs of the City of London, 1345.—Has been a citizen from the age of twenty-one, 1346.—Is not a member of the common council, 1347.—Is a freeman and liveryman, 1348.—The office of sheriff has for some years fallen into disrepute, from certain jobbing transactions by the under sheriffs, who have selected the sheriffs, and this year no one would serve; therefore, by desire of some of the leading gentlemen in London, took upon himself the duties of the office, rather than the Queen's authority in the City should be lost, 1349, 1350.—The cause of the difficulty in obtaining two persons to serve as sheriffs is the expense attendant on the office, and its being shorn of all its power. They are supposed to keep the keys of the City prisons, and to be responsible for all that takes place within them; but the visiting magistrates, the aldermen, claim the exclusive right of granting orders to visit the prisons, 1351.—Thinks the sheriff for the year ought to be an ex-officio member of the court of aldermen and court of common commen, 1352, 1353.—All the substantial duties of the office are performed by the under-sheriff's deputy, who divides the fees with him; so that the sheriff and under-sheriff have little to do but to attend the judges at the Old Bailey, attend the lord mayor upon state and other occasions, and, most unpleasant of all, be present at executions, 1354, 1355.—A sheriff could not pass through his year of office without expending 2,000*l.* or 2,500*l.* There are some trifling allowances made for his expenses by the City, 1356–1358.—Some persons elected to the office of sheriff prefer paying a fine to serving, and the fines have amounted to a large sum in the course of ten or twelve years, 1359.—As an election agent, has had little to do with the sheriffs, but has been frequently concerned for aldermen and other corporate officers. Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Wire knows more about the sheriffs than anyone else, 1360, 1361.—An alderman must have served the shrievalty before he can be elected lord mayor, but does not think that is an inducement to anyone to accept the office of sheriff. The latter being a Queen's officer, is far higher than the aldermen, or even the lord mayor, as now constituted, 1362–1364.—Is an election agent for civic offices, and has been engaged in most elections for the last twenty years, 1365–1369.—Believes the election of common councilmen, as far as the franchise goes, to be pure, but referring to the election of aldermen, lord mayor, chamberlain, and sheriffs, thinks as much as

10,000*l.* has been spent on both sides when the contest has been for an office of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a year, 1370–1374.—Corruption does not exist in all cases, but in many it does. Has been engaged for aldermen, and caused to be paid a certain amount for the purpose of obtaining their magisterial gown, 1376, 1377.—Some of the money is given to the voters, some is spent in giving dinners and suppers, and some for agency in canvassing. Has known the expenses of a candidate for an alderman's gown to be 1,500*l.*, 1378–1380.—The corrupt system of elections continues much the same since the contest of Sir Peter Laurie and Sir John Key. The system of bribery commenced at the time of the Reform Bill, and there has been more money spent in that way since that period than before it, 1381, 1382.—Attributes it to a new class of people being introduced at that time. A worthy alderman, since deceased, assumed a power of exercising a control over certain parties at the waterside, and those parties used to come in great numbers. Is not referring to the election of aldermen, but of other city officers, 1383–1386.—Has generally found it most difficult to obtain an alderman's gown in a ward where there is a low-rated class of occupants. In the out wards more expense is incurred than in the inner wards of London, the commercial wards, 1387.—In the commercial wards there are only a certain number of people, of the class of servants, who sleep there to take charge of the property; the merchants and traders leaving London to sleep in a purer atmosphere, 1288.—Class of voters in the inner ward, 1389.—There are no improprieties in the election of common councilmen. It is not much to fight for. There are no magisterial duties connected with the office. A seat in the common council for one year, and a chance of getting upon a committee, 1390.—Thinks the office of lord mayor the most valuable in the City, 1391.—It is more lucrative than the office of chamberlain, 1392.—£10,000 is allowed the lord mayor for the year, besides other things, 1393.—Can make money by his mayoralty; many have; but he generally spends more than he gets, 1394, 1395.—The office of chamberlain in point of form is an annual office, but not in practice, 1396, 1397.—Cannot say that there has ever been an instance of a chamberlain once elected being opposed, 1398.—Every case of election for the office of chamberlain in witness's time has been influenced by money, 1399.—The inducement to obtain the office of alderman is, that a man is elected a magistrate for life, and has unlimited power over the funds and affairs of the corporation of London, 1400.—He has patronage in all the hospitals in the City, 1401.—He has considerable power in providing for his relations by City appointments. The present way of electing aldermen and common councilmen is very imperfect; the wards are not proportioned; some are very large, some very small, 1402, 1403.—The franchise of the Municipal Corporation Act would be advantageously applied to the City of London, 1404.—Thinks the livery the most perfect franchise in London. A liveryman has to pass through a severe ordeal before he attains to that position; and before he can get upon the court, he has to show that he is a man of wealth and character, 1405.—Some companies compel parties to take up their livery, which is wrong; as if they compel a man who cannot afford it, they admit into their body one who will be open to temptation, 1406.—The livery of London should be taken as the basis of any future constituency, because it has been tested. Would amalgamate the livery of London and the occupiers of property within the City, take an electoral list of them, and then elect them to fill all offices, 1407.—Does not think you can fix the residence of a liveryman now, as they can reach the metropolis so quickly by rail, 1408.—Would only limit the residence of liverymen to England. Now, in whatever part of the world he resides, he may appear, 1409, 1410.—In cases of a contested election, if there is an important question at stake, and they think they ought to come and exercise their franchise upon it, they will do so, but are too respectable to require to be brought up, 1411.—Does not find that, in regard to the livery of London, the non-resident voters increase the expense of a contested election, 1412.—Has only had experience in the payment of expenses for a member of Parliament, and has not found the non-resident voters, who were principally freemen of boroughs in the country refuse to take the payment of their expenses, 1413, 1414.—Thinks that the case would be different with regard to liverymen, who are principally men of affluence, and it would be an insult to offer expenses to such parties as those, 1415.—Not necessary to diminish the number of wards if they are equalized, 1416.—The Court of Aldermen ought to be swept away, and a lord lieutenant of the City of London substituted, to be elected by the citizens generally, 1417.—The absurdities attached to the office of lord mayor are not consistent with the spirit of the times, and would prevent a first-class man from taking the office under that title, 1418.—Would like the title of lord lieutenant better, 1419, 1420.—Would call those citizens who are on the register or electoral list, and would take the livery as the basis, 1421.—A liveryman must be a member of a company, 1422, 1423.—Would extend the present franchise of the common hall, and add the municipal franchise, to form one register of the two bodies; and as a liveryman purchases his livery, would allow him the privileges for his life, 1424.—Thinks it desirable to perpetuate the connexion between the companies and the City; and would propose there should be a burgess roll, formed of occupiers fulfilling certain conditions, and the existing liverymen, and as the liverymen die off, the burgess roll should consist exclusively of occupiers, 1425–1427.—The elections in common hall are badly taken; the poll clerks sit at the desk, but have no official register or electoral list before them to detect which are liverymen, and many poll merely to get the fees allowed for the day, 1428.—Does not object to a man being paid for his loss of labour for the day, 1429.—There have been several expensive contests for the office of lord mayor. Knows of two in which the expenses of both candidates together amounted to about 15,000*l.*, 1430–1432.—It was spent in committees, to whom power was given to obtain voters, part in direct bribery, and part in treating, 1433–1435.—The poll can be kept open eight days at the common hall, 1436.—The poll ought to terminate in one day, as at parliamentary elections, when there are several polling places, while elections in common hall have only one, 1437–1440.—The election for the office of sheriff has been expensive; necessary expenses to support the dignity of the office, 1441.—Cannot say whether anyone would stand an expensive contest for the office, but believes the aldermen would go to any expense to thwart an unpopular candidate, 1442, 1443.—If there is a feeling against a candidate, another can come forward to keep him out, 1444.—Every election for the office of chamberlain has been expensive, 1445.—The office is by law an annual office, but in practice it has generally been for life, 1446, 1447.—The chamberlain signs documents, and adjudicates upon apprenticeships, but upon the chief clerk devolve the main duties, 1448, 1449.—Its few duties is the inducement to seek for the office. It is understood the senior alderman in rotation should obtain it, 1450.—The income is about 2,500*l.* a year, 1451.—Has been agent in the elections for chamberlain for twenty years, and the greatest sum expended in a contest for both candidates was 10,000*l.*, 1452, 1453.—Has very little knowledge respecting the funds of the corporation, and does not think he ought to be called on to impart it, 1454–1461.—Was informed that a sum of 1,900*l.* had once been subscribed by the aldermen at the Mansion House to secure a brother alderman's election, 1462.—Does not consider a subscription from the private funds of an alderman a payment from the corporate funds of the City, 1463.—This is one instance referred to "by having very little knowledge of the funds of the corporation," 1464, 1465.—Believes that the statement about taking money to admit the public to seats at the Old Bailey during criminal trials was perfectly true, and hopes with the assistance of the recorder it will be put a stop to, 1466, 1467.—Would suggest that whatever name the future chief magistrate should assume, he should have 20 deputy lieutenants to assist him. That the court of common council should be reduced in numbers, and should give to the City deputy lieutenants a statement of their accounts; that they should still perform the duties with respect to sewerage and lighting, but that the police should be amalgamated with the metropolitan police, which would be less expensive and more efficient, 1468.—No inconvenience results from the separate sewerage of the City of London, and if all power is taken from the common councilmen, it will be difficult to obtain men to go into court to do any duty at all. It is the trust reposed in them which induces them to take the office, and thus serve their fellow citizens, 1469.—Officers of the City should be elected by the common councilmen, subject to the revision of the court of lieutenancy and the lord lieutenant, 1470.—The chief magistrate of London should be the representative of the sovereign, 1471.—The lord lieutenant should be elected by the citizens of London for three years, and the deputy lieutenants by the Crown, 1472, 1473.—It is generally understood that the lord lieutenant of a county or of Ireland stands in the place of the Crown, and is appointed by the Crown, 1474, 1475.—The lord lieutenant of London being elected by the citizens would not create an inaccurate impression, but he might be called royal high commissioner, 1477.—As the chamberlain has the charge of the City cash, he should be appointed by the same franchise as that which elected the chief magistrate, 1478.—Generally speaking, it is better that the town council should elect the officers, subject to the veto of the lieutenants and chief magistrate, 1479.—If the office of aldermen be abolished, would propose that four stipendiary magistrates should be appointed, two for the Mansion House and two for Guildhall, appointed by the Crown, and paid out of the City funds, 1480–1482.—Would propose the regulation with regard to the City that existed under the Municipal Act, that the town council can petition the Crown to appoint stipendiary magistrates upon their finding the salary, 1483.—Has not paid much attention to the City accounts, but has been told by one that the income of the City of London is about 100,000*l.* a year, and by another 130,000*l.* Can only get a correct account from the Court of Aldermen, 1484, 1485.—It is not possible to understand from the accounts now published the total revenue and total expenditure of the City of London, 1486.—Has never been a merchant in London, and has no knowledge of the trading privileges of the City, 1487, 1488.—With regard to the connexion of Southwark with the City, it must either be incorporated with the City or allowed to apply for a corporation itself, 1490, 1491.—Cannot say which is the better plan, but should feel inclined not to extend the limits of the corporation, 1492.—It would be better to sever whatever connexion there may exist between London and Southwark; the rivalry between them would be productive of great advantage to the citizen, 1493.—Has no means of judging what is the opinion of the inhabitants of Southwark, 1494.

WARDS:
The division of the City in that form encourages party feeling and local prejudice, Acland, 519, 520.—Not necessary to diminish the number, if equalized, Wallis, 1416.—Too large, Hyde, 1503.—Their inequality one of the glaring defects of the corporation, ib. 1505.—Would reduce the twenty-six to twelve, combine the small, and divide Farringdon Without, ib. 1515, 1516.—Statement as to wards, Norris, 4213.—Queenhithe ward in 1851 had the smallest number of voters (73), and Farringdon Without the largest, Merewether, 4886–4888.—Would reduce the number of wards from twenty-five to eighteen, Lord Mayor, 7161.—Would alter the wards so that they should be more uniform in their extent and representation, depriving some of the small wards of their aldermen, and giving them to the larger wards, Jones, 7798.

WATER:
Sees no reason why the supply of water should be taken out of the funds of private individuals or companies, Dillon, 724, 725.—Water is supplied to the City by the New River Company. It is very good, but the supply in houses is shorter than it was, Whistler, 2631.

WATER BAILIFF:
Gives particulars as to the office and its duties, Saunders, 6836. 6849. 6863.

WATERLOO BRIDGE. (See Bridges.)

WATERLOW, Mr. SYDNEY HEDLEY. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a liveryman of the Stationers' Company, 2590.—The point to which witness wishes to call attention is the continuance of the election throughout each of the 26 wards of the City of a score, or thereabouts, of inquest men, to serve upon the inquests for the ensuing year. The reason he thinks this an annoyance, and needlessly so, is that the duties of the inquest have almost entirely passed into the hands of paid officers appointed by the corporation. Explains the mode of election, and then the duties, and the manner in which they have lapsed, 2591.—There is one duty which the inquest men still perform. The duty consists in walking round the City in silk gowns with furred edges, going into the shopkeepers' shops, and merchants' counting-houses, asking for contributions to charitable purposes. The inquest men are expected to do this, and if they do not they are looked down upon in their wards. This part of their duty they are not obliged to do. Large sums are collected by these means. In the ward of Broad-street more than 400*l.* a-year, for the last few years, has been collected, 2592.—These contributions collected by the inquest men, are applied in charitable purposes at the discretion of the inquest men. They are voluntary contributions, 2593, 2595.—One of the annoyances to the citizens which witness complains of is this, that the deputation present themselves at your door, and say, "I have come for a contribution to the inquest;" to get rid of them some parties give more, some less, 2596.—It is a great inconvenience that citizens should be elected upon inquests at all; the only thing that sustains it is, that they always elect about one-third who they think will not serve, but who they hope will be willing to pay the fine of 5 guineas for not serving. This fine was supposed to be compulsory, and has been paid by many gentlemen; but as foreman of the inquest this year, witness was anxious that all those who did not attend should be put on the same footing, and, having been told that those fines might be legally demanded, called upon the Court of Aldermen to enforce them against an absentee who refused to pay the five guineas; but found, on pressing the question, that the Court of Aldermen had no power to enforce this fine. All they could do was to compel the inquestman to take the oath of service, and then if he neglected his duties, they could bring an action against him for the damages which might be caused to the ward by his non-attendance; but, inasmuch as those duties have all lapsed, no damage would accrue. Thinks that if this were generally known the inquest might die a natural death, 2597.—There is decidedly no power of enforcing the fine of 5 guineas, 2598.—Sees no reason why those inquests should be maintained. If there is any charity to be dispensed throughout the wards, it would be much better done through a body of half a dozen persons, who may voluntarily associate themselves for that purpose, 2599.—Articles of the charge of the wardmote inquest; the oath of the foreman of the inquest; the oath of the rest of the inquest.

WHISTLER, Mr. FREDERICK. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a Portugal and Brazil merchant, and connected with the wine trade, 2628.—Lives in Sise-lane, Bucklersbury; has been in that neighbourhood forty-six years. Is a freeman and liveryman of the Merchant Tailors' Company. Has been twice asked to become a common councilman, but was prevented by the paramount duty of attending to his own business. Is of opinion that an alderman should be in independent circumstances, and have time at his command to devote to his duties, 2629.—Makes no objection to the orphan's dues, of about 2*s.* 4*d.* per pipe, which are received by the City. Sometimes feels vexed that 2*d.* should be charged on a trifling package of oranges or lemons, in however decayed a state it may be, perhaps when the thing is hardly worth the money. Waited upon the city solicitor some time ago to ask him if he had a tariff as a guide to what the meters should charge. Was referred by him to the meter, by whom he was received very courteously. He said there was an old Act of Parliament in the time of James I. Thinks it would be very unjust and very ungrateful towards the City to sweep away the corporation with its rights and immunities. The state of the City now is such that one can hardly move from one part to another; another bridge is wanted. Begs to bear testimony to the excellent arrangement of the police. With respect to the navigation, does not think there are any snoals in the river Thames which ought particularly to be complained of. There is one at Limehouse Reach, which is a part of the bank; it runs out, in fact; but the City, very wisely, instead of allowing all the colliers to remain in that neighbourhood, distributed them in twos and threes almost as far down as Gravesend; so that there is a free navigation. Knows that the General Steam Navigation Company runs its large ships, even at low water, at a considerable risk. The company cannot expect that low water they can bring up their heavy ships. With respect to lights, thinks it most commendable in the City of London to order a light to be placed on the bowsprit, 2630.—Is not a shipowner, but has had a good deal to do with ships. There is a complaint made that there are not sufficient watermen and craft for the loading and unloading of the goods, and conveying them. There are upwards of 6,000 licensed men, who are all lightermen and watermen, and able to steer a craft. Considers that if a man effects an insurance at Lloyd's, and then employs an unqualified man, and the craft is lost, the underwriter would not be liable for the insurance. It is absolutely necessary that a man should be educated, and serve his time, to know the various currents and turns of the Thames. Has heard many intelligent men say that it would be better to have a stipendiary magistrate; witness does not think so. Has never heard a complaint of the decisions of the magistrates of the City; has heard the first judges of the land admire and praise the manner in which they get through their business. Thinks, therefore, that an alderman who has gone through all the various paraphernalia of office, and arrived at that high position, is a very fit person to occupy it. An alderman is elected for life; if he falls into a dilapidated condition, he remains still a magistrate, and presiding over his fellow men, though he himself is perhaps under the lash of the law. Complaints have been made that there is not a higher class of persons in the council, and it is to be lamented; but, at the same time, thinks that, as by the effects of the Reform Bill, the freedom costs very little, the gentlemen who find so many faults ought to be willing to pay that small sum, and so have an opportunity of being in the council. They do not do so, and there is a want of a larger number of men, who are in a different position of life to bring in their experience. Can conceive no other way of accomplishing it than by throwing open the franchise, or, in other words, taking away the right of freedom, not making that the qualification; but saying that the man who is qualified to vote for a Member of Parliament shall be qualified to be admitted to the council. If that were done, it might be wise to have it stipulated that when a man is elected he must serve or be fined. Witness complains of the heavy rates, particularly the consolidated rate: it is excessive. Believes the corporation have an Act of Parliament which gives them great latitude, and very often in that consolidated rate the expense of sewers is included, notwithstanding the heavy sewer rate. Certainly greater control is required over the finance of the City; that could be accomplished by doing away with the freedom. They have not in the City of London water enough; it is very good; it is supplied by the New River Company. In days gone by the City, by an arrangement, had plugs opened in the streets, which were flushed as well as the sewers, but now that is never done. The supply of water is shorter in the houses than it was. Thinks it a disgrace to the City that they have not better markets. The rents, not only of the markets, but the houses round about no doubt bring in a large income; but witness thinks the City might get as large an amount of income if they were to rase the old markets to the ground, and build proper and suitable places. Has stated that he is a freeman of the Merchant Tailors' Company, though not in the court. Believes there are erroneous impressions prevailing with respect to the companies. The funds of those companies are most virtuously administered. With respect to the City funds has no doubt the corporation exercises its trusts rightly, but it requires to be spurred on from time to time, and does not see any other way of doing it than by bringing in a different class of men to those who at present occupy the position of members of the corporation, 2631.

WICKENDEN'S EVIDENCE. (See Gibbs.)

WILKINSON, MICHAEL EATON, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been clerk of the London Small Debts Court between three and four years, 6895, 6896.—Was a member of the Court of Common Council at one time; but was six years out of the court before becoming a candidate for his present office, 6897.—The salary is stated at 400*l.*, but it is subject to deductions which leave it 371*l.* or 372*l.*, 6898.—Has no other emoluments. Is obliged to be an attorney, but has given up practice, 6899.—The duties are to issue all summonses, warrants, &c., &c.; register all judgments of the court; to keep an account of all the court fees, submitting the accounts to the treasurer whenever required to do so; to send to the mayor, aldermen, and commoners, once a year or more, if required, an account of all sums paid to the treasurer of the court, and in March to make a correct list of all sums paid into court and remaining unclaimed for five years previously, 6900.—Is decidedly of opinion that the proceedings in that court are generally satisfactory to the suitors, and the business increases in consequence every year, 6903, 6904.—About one half of these cases are disposed of before they come to a hearing, the other half are tried, 6905.—In the year 1852 there were 9629 summonses issued, and there were only 15 juries; in 1853, 10,279 cases and 36 juries, which were very small proportions. Supposes the suitors are better satisfied with the decision by the judge who gives his reason for the judgment than by that of the jury, 6906.—Either party may ask for a jury, 6907.—It is quite accidental in what cases they ask for a jury, 6908.—All classes are suitors in the court, 6909.—The members of the corporation are very seldom parties to suits, 6910.—By the Act of Parliament the common council have the power to diminish the fees, and to re-impose them when they think proper. On the 28th July 1853 the fees were diminished (states particulars), which will be the means of reducing the receipts from the fees about 1,000*l.* a year, 6911.—Thinks the business is increasing in consequence. The expressions of satisfaction are very general, 6912.—There is an appeal in all causes between 20*l.* and 50*l.*, 6913.—There have been no appeals in the City Court, 6914.—The judge of the Sheriff's Court is the judge of the Small Debts Court, 6915.—It is a matter of arrangement on the part of the corporation what the judge of the Small Debts Court's salary shall be, 6916, 6917.—There is in section 15 a provision tha no clerk treasurer, bailiff, or other officer of the said court shall either by himself or his partners be directly engaged as an attorney or agent in any proceeding in the court, but there is no clause which prevents his practising generally in the other courts. Witness has given up his practice, feeling that the duties of his office are quite enough to occupy him, 6918.—The court is held in the Sheriff's Court, Basinghall Street. The building which was the old Court of Request (that court having been abolished,) has been altered and modified and made the Sheriff's Court, 6920.—Witness pays the fees which he receives into the Chamber every week, 6921.—Suppose the fees taken from the suitors exceed the expenses of the court, the corporation have the power to dispose of the difference, 6922, 6923.—They might make a profit of the court, but witness thinks they would reduce the fees, as they have done before, if there were an accumulation of more money than was necessary, 6924.—The court pays 280*l.* to the corporation for the use of the building out of the fee fund of the court, 6925, 6926.—The payment of the bailiffs is also left to the discretion of the corporation, 6927.—The chief bailiff has 200*l.* a year, two of the under bailiffs 100*l.*, two others 80*l.*, 6930.—Believes that is much less than the amount received by the bailiffs in the other County Courts. Hands in for the inspection of the Commissioners the legal and financial summary for the years 1852 and 1853, which shows the whole operation of the office, 6931.

WILLIAMS, Captain WILLIAM JOHN. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the prison inspectors, and has filled his situation about eighteen years, 2359, 2360.—Has had the home circuit for six years, 2361.—The City prisons come entirely under witness's jurisdiction. Has been in the habit of regularly inspecting them, 2362, 2364.—The prisons which are under the control of the Corporation of the City, are as follows, Newgate, the New Prison, the City Bridewell, the Debtors' Prison in Whitecross Street, and the Borough Compter, which is now disused, but which was lately occupied by women, 2365.—All the prisons except Holloway are situated within the limits of the City, 2366, 2367.—A very extraordinary power is given to the City of London under the 4 George IV. chapter 64, by which the Court of Aldermen are constituted a Court of Quarter Sessions at all times for prison purposes. Reads the clause of the statute, 2368.—This clause leads to differences of practice between the City and other parts of the country. It is a power which ought never to have been given to the City of London. The Court of Aldermen sometimes exercise their power of excluding strangers from their court, which is not the case in the Court of Quarter Sessions. Was present on one occasion when the subject under discussion was the erection of the New Prison at Holloway when the standing order was enforced for all strangers to withdraw. Consequently this may be done where money is voted away in superannuation to prison officers which the Court of Aldermen is in the habit of doing, 2369, 2370.—They do not always adhere to the provisions of the Act. Cannot state the particulars, but in the case of a pension to the governor of the late Giltspur Street compter has understood that the Act of Parliament has not been adhered to, 2371.—Cannot say whether the decision by which the grant was made was come to in one of the courts described with closed doors. Believes that it was a recommendation from the gaol committee, which is composed exclusively of the mayor and aldermen. The gaol committee reported to the Court of Aldermen as a sessions, who confirmed the report, and the sum of 500*l.* a year was granted, 2372, 2373.—Has seen no notice of the case referred to in the public papers. Believes there are no prisons in the country where the visitation is so well kept up as in the City. The management of the prisons generally reflects great credit on the authority, and the New Prison at Holloway is managed in a way which would almost make it a pattern prison for the entire country, 2375, 2376.—The superintendence is exercised by the Aldermen, the visiting justices; the duty is very well performed, and reflects great credit on the aldermen, 2377, 2378.—The visitation of the aldermen is exercised in rotation. With regard to Newgate prison its construction is such that it renders it impossible, even as a well-regulated prison to do anything with it. It was constructed shortly after the riots in the year 1780. It was then burnt; the present building has a most deterring exterior, and perhaps does more good by its out than its inside, 2379, 2380.—It now remains pretty much in the state in which it was originally built. Improvements have been effected, and everything which could be done by the magistrates has been done, 2381.—There is only one remedy for Newgate, namely, the entire abandonment of it, and the construction of a new prison. Thinks the present lord mayor is of the same opinion. The House of Correction at Holloway is most admirably situated, but is too large solely for the City of London. There are and have been ever since the prison was erected from 100 to 200 cells vacant. Thinks the removal of the Newgate prisoners to Holloway, and constituting it the gaol for the county and City, would be attended with amazing advantages. The City would have the opportunity of building more convenient courts on the site of Newgate, 2382.—The prisoners who are now confined in Newgate are Middlesex prisoners, who are committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, and others from the adjacent counties comprised in the Act of Parliament. In the intervals between the sessions of the Central Criminal Court there are scarcely any prisoners in Newgate, more especially since the jurisdiction of the assistant judge of Middlesex has been so largely extended, 2383.—The prisoners in Newgate are all untried, with the exception of the City of London convicts under sentence of transportation, 2384.—There are none but convicted prisoners at Holloway. At Newgate there may sometimes be prisoners sentenced to imprisonment without labour, and occasionally prisoners are there for non-payment of taxes and frauds upon the revenue, 2385.—The prison at Holloway has been open about a year and a half, 2386.—Is not aware from what funds the expenses of the construction have been defrayed, but it was built at the exclusive expense of the City, 2387–2388.—The plans were submitted to the Secretary of State, and approved of by him. It is a most convenient prison, and reflects great credit upon the City architect, Mr. Bunning, 2389.—No prisoners are confined in the prison at Holloway before trial, 2390.—Cannot account for there being so many unoccupied cells. It was built with 400 cells. One obvious reason is, that crime has in a certain measure decreased. The salaries at Newgate are enormously large. They amount to 3,953*l.* annually, besides fees and emoluments. They are fixed by the Court of Aldermen. The keeper has 700*l.* a year, with emoluments to the amount of 35*l.* 14*s.* The chaplain has 500*l.* with other emoluments, 2391, 2392.—Is well acquainted with the general scale of prison salaries in other parts of the country. Thinks that the salaries at Newgate are too large for the number of prisoners, and that the time has arrived when those salaries may be reduced by uniting the gaol with the House of Correction at Holloway, 2393, 2394.—Can hardly give an opinion as to whether the officers of the prison are too numerous, as the population is so fluctuating at Newgate, 2395.—Thinks that some of the salaries were too large, considering what the state of Newgate was when the prison establishment was formed. The City do not require the payment of any charge from Middlesex for prisoners committed to Newgate at the county gaol. They defray the expense of all the Middlesex prisoners committed at the Central Criminal Court, and the Middlesex debtors in Whitecross Street prison. The prisoners from other counties are charged for their maintenance at Newgate previously to trial, 2396.—If county executions take place in the City, it is always at Newgate, 2397.—The class of convicts received at Newgate are those sentenced to death, who have been tried and convicted at the adjoining sessions house in the Old Bailey, and Middlesex and London convicts under sentence of transportation, until removed by Government. The average annual expense of a prisoner at Newgate amounts to the large sum of 39*l.* 3*s.* 2¾*d.*, 2398.—Thinks the ordinary rate as regards untried prisoners in other prisons is not above 20*l.* The reason of that great difference is the large amount of salaries, and the small number of prisoners, 2399, 2400.—The condition of the prisoners in Newgate is not at all better than in the other prisons, 2401.—Is not able to state whether there are any funds added to the ordinary allowances for the maintenance of the prisoners from ancient charities or endowments, but has no doubt that there are bequests. There is a fund called the sheriffs' fund, of a very considerable amount. The funded property now consists of 8,100*l.* in the 3 per cents.; 2000*l.* in the 3¼ per cents.; and 1000*l.* in the reduced. The funds are applied very beneficially to prisoners who are tried there and who are acquitted, and lately a considerable portion of those funds has been applied to assist them in emigration, 2402.—Those funds have been created by bequests, by subscriptions, and from other sources. Each sheriff annually contributes, and there are a variety of other voluntary contributions, 2403.—This fund is of great utility and is exceedingly well and very liberally managed as regards the prisoners. There are also dinners given by the lord mayor and sheriffs on Christmas and New Year's Days to all the prisoners in the London prisons. Has recommended one of these dinners to be discontinued, as vagrants have been known to get themselves convicted for short terms that they might partake of them, 2404.—The City Bridewell is situated in Bridge-street, Blackfriars, and is an appurtenance of the Bridewell Hospital. It is a most inconvenient, ill-arranged, and useless prison, 2405.—The class of prisoners confined there is generally vagrants committed by the magistrates, and apprentices by the chamberlain, and by the comptroller of the City lands. Witness reads a copy of a conviction by the comptroller, 2406—Has always known that the chamberlain had a criminal jurisdiction over apprentices in the City, but was not aware till now that the comptroller had, 2407.—Has made some inquiry but could not ascertain under what legal authority he acts, 2408.—The average number of apprentices committed by the City authorities to this prison is ten a year. They would be much better committed to Holloway, 2409.—The other prisoners are vagrants, chiefly boys. Confinement in prison acts most mischievously on boys. In connexion with this prison is the House of Occupation, a most valuable institution. It is attached to Bethlehem Hospital, and close to it. Has always urged the abandonment of this Bridewell as a penal establishment. There is a disposition now on the part of the magistrates and governors of the City to allow the jurisdiction to fall into abeyance by not committing there, so that the House of Occupation may become of greater utility in reclaiming boys and girls, who in consequence of its close connexion with this prison invariably refuse to go there, supposing it is merely a step from one prison to another. The present cost of the prisoners at Bridewell, at an average of thirty prisoners, would amount to 50*l.* each, 2410.—Vagrants of both sexes were committed there, but lately the aldermen have ceased to commit women there, and they now send them to the House of Correction at Holloway, 2411.—Thinks with respect to Bridewell that if there is any legal authority by which the governors of Bridewell are obliged to maintain it as a prison, the sooner the Legislature give them the power, to discontinue it and divert the funds to the House of Correction the better, for it really is a most useless and absurd institution, as a penal one. The present treasurer, Mr. Johnson, has done everything in his power, as far as the buildings will admit, to make it a most useful institution, 2412.—The governors of Bridewell comprise a great number of influential persons; the lord mayor and aldermen are, by virtue of their office governors. Although it is very likely that this prison may fall into abeyance by the aldermen having ceased to commit there, the governors are by their charters obliged to maintain a prison, 2413.—Is not aware that there are separate estates or endowments for the maintenance of Bridewell, 2414.—The Giltspur Street Compter is abandoned, 2415.—It still exists as a public building, for the City have not disposed of it; not decided as to what uses they intend to apply it. The House of Correction at Holloway is the next. It is one of the best-regulated prisons in the country, and reflects great credit on the City magistrates. It was constructed two years ago. The next is the Borough Compter, which is no longer used as a prison, all convicted prisoners being sent to the House of Correction at Holloway, 2416, 2417.—The building still exists, 2418.—The Debtors' Prison for the City of London and the county of Middlesex was erected in 1812. Believes there is scarcely a prison in England in so bad a condition, from its injudicious construction, and inconvenient internal arrangements. Witness here quotes a report from the House of Commons on this prison before it was occupied. The committee was appointed to examine into the state of the King's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons, and into the arrangements made for the better management of the prisons of Newgate, Giltspur-street, and the Borough Compter, 2419.—No improvement has been made since the date of that report. Witness here enters into a long statement respecting this prison, 2420.—Believes that whenever there is a large amount to be disbursed in charity in a debtors' prison, low practitioners often get persons placed in prison for the mere sake of obtaining their costs from this source; the experience of the managers of the Thatched House charity is much to the same effect. Has no doubt, however, that the benefit far exceeds the abuse, 2421.—Believes it to be very well managed, a better officer or more discreet man than the present governor is not to be found. The magistrates have done all that could be required in the way of ventilation. They might indeed have altered the construction and interior arrangement, 2422.—Attributes the defects of the prison solely to its construction. An Act was passed, chapter 98 of the 55th of George III., which gave the magistrates the power to remedy all the defects of classification, and to place the prisoners together, under the circumstances of their being overcrowded, but this they have never done, 2423.—The Act requires that the charities should be strictly regulated by the bequests, and therefore the Middlesex prisoners could not enjoy anything that was left to freemen of the City of London, and the other divisions, 2424. Under the second Act those who had the superintendence might certainly have altered the classification of the prisoners, and abolished the absurd distinctions still maintained, 2425.—Has represented to them the propriety of doing that. Witness in his last report observed that he thought that it was desirable to apply to the Legislature for power, but afterwards found that this Act was in existence. Does not think the visiting magistrates were aware of it, 2426, 2427.—Does not think the keeper of a prison ought to be entrusted with the bequests made to inmates; that ought to be more looked into than it is; believes Mr. Burden to be a most conscientious man. The City have inquired into these charities, and many which were obsolete have been recovered; the inquiry is not yet complete, 2428.—Some higher authority than the keeper should deal with the bequests to debtors, 2429.—It would be very difficult for any person to enter into all those cases, and judicially deal with so large a sum of money, 2430.—The gaoler is under no responsibility for the appropriation of the money, it is a power without any check. There should be a controlling power over him, 2431.—Is not prepared to say that it would be better if no such charities existed, but thinks an excess in their number may tend to mischief, 2432.—Has known the greatest benefit arise from the reasonable application of them, 2433.—Were the money which is left to freemen distributed among all the prisoners, including those of Middlesex, many objections would be done away; that applying so much money to so few prisoners appears liable to abuse from the attorneys and creditors outside, 2434.—Thinks it would be wise if the Legislature were to apply the funds to destitute prisoners generally, whether from Middlesex or elsewhere, 2435.—Believes there are not similar bequests to other gaols in the City; does not know about Newgate, 2436.—There is scarcely a town where there are not small bequests of that sort, 2437.—Most of them are of very ancient date; many might be recovered by inquiry; one case of an unapplied bequest of 10*s.* 6*d.* at Christ's Hospital, has not been inquired for for 28 years, and the officers of the hospital hardly know what to do with it, 2438.—Thinks the giving part of these charities to the Middlesex prisoners would be an extension of the testators' intentions, 2439.—The money was left specifically to debtors in particular prisons. Many of these charities emanated from the companies of the City of London, and are mixed up with other bequests, sometimes to freemen and sometimes to others, 2440.—The Middlesex prisoners do not receive any, because the money was left to others by the bequests, 2441.—It ought to be known that the City have diverted considerable sums from the Orphans' Fund for the benefit of the county of Middlesex, and 5,500*l.* for a sessions house at Westminster, 2442.—It is the Orphans Fund to which the coal duty is applied, 2443.—The City obtained an Act of Parliament empowering them to make this diversion of the receipts, 2444.—The above were voluntary contributions. Mentions that the police courts of the magistrates in the City are very inconvenient for the transaction of public business. Recommends the application of Giltspur-street Compter to the purposes of a police court. Thinks the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate for the City would be of the greatest benefit, 2445.—One magistrate could do the business of the present two courts, 2446.—It would be advisable to substitute two paid magistrates for the present jurisdiction exercised by the aldermen, 2447.—The aldermen have other official duties to perform, 2448.—Has found the benefit of stipendiary magistrates, 2449.—If masters and apprentices whom the chamberlain has the power to commit to Bridewell, were committed anywhere else probably the chamberlain's jurisdiction would drop also, 2450, 2451.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM, Esq., M.P. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is a member of Parliament for Lambeth, 2773.—Was for a short time connected with the corporation when engaged in commercial affairs, 2774.—Resided partly in the City, 2775.—Was first connected with the corporation in 1830. The custom was for the common council to fix upon gentlemen to audit the City accounts, 2776.—The common hall of the livery elected the auditors, but gentlemen were selected by the corporation to fill that office, 2777.—They were quite independent of the corporation; it was considered a friendly affair, but there was nothing improper. In 1830 witness was elected auditor; in that year the chamberlain furnished bills of particulars of the different items of all accounts as far as he was able. But there were thousands of pounds for which there were no bills, but mere orders to pay the amount to the person to whom it was due, and an able report was made, compared with any which had been given for fifty years. £50 pounds a year was given to the auditors to be spent in dinners, which witness declined to accept, 2778.—He and his colleague received a vote of thanks for the manner in which they had performed their duties, but presumes the corporation did not like submitting bills of particulars, as the auditors stated numerous items which they thought extravagant, and in the year 1834 the chamberlain received orders not to produce bills to the auditors; who then refused to audit the accounts, and reported it to the common hall, 2779.—It was the auditors of 1834, appointed to audit the accounts of 1833, who were refused bills, 2780.—When the auditors presented their report to the common hall, and stated that they refused to examine accounts because they had been refused bills of particulars, the common hall appointed some of their own body to audit them, and resolved that the chamberlain be instructed to pay in future no money without having bills of particulars which are to be laid before the auditors. The resolution was then referred to the committee of the City lands, who resolved that the auditors had no power or authority to require bills of particulars, or to reject or allow any payment made under such competent authority as the chamberlain's, 2781.—Does not know whether since that time bills of particulars have been given to the auditors, as he has left the City 17 years, 2782.—Unless the auditors have bills of particulars, they have nothing to do but take the orders to pay money, tick them off, cast them up, and sign their name at the bottom, 2783.—The orders to pay are given by the common council, or court of aldermen, or whoever has incurred the expense, 2784.—Considers it the duty of auditors to judge of the propriety of the expenditure, and report to the common hall their opinion, 2785.—The auditors are no check to misappropriation in point of fact, as the accounts are given in gross. The chamberlains are always men of high character, 2786.—When the corporation commissioners came into the City in the year 1833, some of the leading City reformers, of whom witness was one, formed themselves into a committee to give them what information they were able. The commissioners made light of their evidence, and were entirely led by the City officers, who put the best face on everything. The principal officers are clever men, and when any inquiry takes place they show great ability in describing their affairs. A vacancy in the common council occurring, witness was elected for the purpose of looking into the accounts, as they refuse giving any account to any but members, but found that there were no accounts of the real amount exacted by the corporation from the public, and that the common council had no idea themselves of the extent of fees, &c., received by their officers; seeing this, witness moved for a committee of inquiry, and produces the report of that committee, 2787.—The committee consisted of 25, that being a member from each ward, 2788.—Believes the course usually adopted in selecting such a committee is that the person moving for a committee puts down a list of names; any member of the court can move an exchange to another name, and those named have the power of declining to serve, 2789.—On this occasion there was no unfairness in the selection of the committee; the majority of them, though not City reformers acted most conscientiously in the discharge of their duty. The general committee appointed a sub-committee of seven. They found such an immense number of officers, that to examine the whole of them would have occupied too much time. They therefore sent a letter to all the officers receiving money from the corporation requesting an account, after which they were arranged, and a report sent to the common council, and leave asked to have the report referred back to the committee, in order to give the information in detail and in form, to which the court agreed. Then, with the assistance of Mr. Scott and the town clerk's chief clerk, this report was formed; in which there are schedules: one of them gives an account of all the City officers, by whom appointed, the amount received from the corporation in cash, and also from fees and other emoluments, Then follows an account of the corporation revenue, and then of the expenditure; the first thing considered was the cost of the mayoralty, upon which a special report was made; the account reported for that year, and that was not an extraordinary year, was 25,034*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, each item of which was stated and accounted for in the most distinct manner under the hand-writing of the City officers. The report was signed by fifteen working members of the committee, 2790.—There are two things which the common council defend; the 4*d.* duty on coals, and the expense of the mayoralty; there was an increase in the salary of the lord mayor

in 1800 of 1,500*l.* a year, and another in 1811 of 1,500*l.* on the ground of the great depreciation of bank notes. The committee sent a request to the aldermen who had passed the chair for a return of the money they received. None answered but Sir Peter Laurie; he gave an account of his receipts to the amount of 7,900*l.* and odd. There are sometimes what are called godsends in the mayoralty, for instance, if a jew broker dies there is a great contest for the office as the number is limited. The common price is 1,500*l.*, and as the mayor has the appointment, that of course goes to him in addition to his allowance. The common council struck off some of the items of the mayoralty agreed to by the committee, and reduced the amount received by the lord mayor; saying that the committee had put down amounts which were not justifiable, but witness can prove the report to be true, 2791, 2792.—The common council expressed their opinion by a regular motion in court to consider the report, 2793.—The cost of the Mansion House was one of the items disputed. The committee argued that as the money laid out in building the Mansion House, and the value of the ground, would have amounted to many millions sterling, that they were only doing what was fair in taking a per-centage, they therefore followed the advice of the City surveyor, and took the amount of the buildings at 7 per cent., and the value of the ground at 4 per cent. This came to upwards of 7,000*l.* a year; they had no means of finding out how much was lost by Stocks Market, which was abolished to make room for the Mansion House. The common council resolved that they ought only to take the value of the Mansion House at that time; they also struck out certain officers of the mayor's household, calculating that those men paid at certain periods so much money for those offices, which with interest and compound interest to this time would amount to so much, therefore they had a right to strike that off, 2794.—Has no doubt that the sums invested in the purchase of those offices are spent as revenue. Proceeds to compare the accounts of the corporation of 1833 and 1852. The fees, &c. received by the various officers of the corporation which do not appear in the accounts in 1833 amounted to 74,440*l.*; the details are in the report to which he has referred. Considers the amount of the real estates, and of the taxes levied by the corporation in 1833 to have been 321,461*l.*; last year they amounted to 406,885*l.*; taking the amount of taxes levied in 1833 it will give 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* a head, besides the expense to the public in being only allowed to employ freemen for certain occupations. A gentleman told witness that he has to pay those men 6*l.* and 7*l.* a week for that which he could get done just as well for 25*s.* or 26*s.*; in fact, were the corporation to exercise their full power, no work could be done in the City but by freemen. The Government expenditure in the year 1833 was 1*l.* 17*s.* per head for the population of the United Kingdom including everything, 2795.—This shows nearly 50 per cent. more for the municipal government of this one-twentieth part of the metropolis as compared with the general Government of the United Kingdom; in addition to that there is the 1*d.* per ton duty on coals for the abolition of the sale of coals by measure, 8,498*l.* A part of this tax has since been paid to the Woods and Forests. The tolls payable on boats, &c. westward of London Bridge amounted to 15,813*l.* The tonnage duty on shipping coming to the port of London, or eastward of London Bridge, amounted to 7,000*l.*; and the fees received by the Court of Requests amounted to 1,657*l.*, that gives the amount of 354,429*l.* The navigation committee have the management of the Port of London. The corporation claim jurisdiction from Staines to Yantlet Creek, 2796, 2797.—Every vessel coming into the Port of London pays tonnage duty to the corporation, 2798.—Enters into particulars as to the trust and charitable funds of which the corporation have the management, and also of another fund arising from the 8*d.* per ton duty on coals; this last, with three other items out of the funds of the corporation, go to pay the principal and interest of the 1,000,000*l.* sterling borrowed of the Bank for making the approach to London Bridge, and 250,000*l.* for erecting Farringdon Market, upon which there has been a loss, 2799.—Considers it a public advantage to have Farringdon Street clear by the removal of Fleet Market, but thinks another market instead of it was not required. Attributes the failure of Farringdon Market to the fact that the principal customers of

Fleet Market were inhabitants of those very houses which were cleared away for the site of it. Fleet Market produced the last time witness saw the accounts 1,300*l.*, but does not know whether that was the profit or the whole revenue of the year, 2800.—All sorts of things were sold at Fleet Market, 2801.—Not one penny of the 74,000*l.* for fees appears in the City accounts, to the best of witness's belief, 2803.—States how the gross sum was ascertained, 2804.—The column "received from other sources" does not appear in the annual City account, 2805.—That column is filled up from statements made by the recorder and other officers who receive the fees, by letters which are appended to the report, in answer to a circular sent them, 2806–2808.—Statement as to the office of chamberlain and town clerk, 2809.—As to the expenses of establishments, and the emoluments of officers which are included in various heads of departments, 2810.—No similar report to this has ever been furnished before or since, 2811.—The last commissioners did not call for any such account, they were pretty well satisfied with the ancient records. Statement as to the cost of the management of the affairs of the corporation, 2812. There are 10 City tradesmen, and has heard the Irish Society has the patronage of eighteen Irish livings. The bills of the three lawyers amounted together in ten years to 162,620*l.*, averaging 16,262*l.* per annum. There are twenty-eight other lawyers, who in 1838 received among them 22,843*l.*, 2814.—Reads the names of the lawyers. Produces another document, comparing the salaries of the twelve Cabinet Ministers with twelve of the City officers. Compares the expenditure of the City of London with that of the most populous corporations in England. In Birmingham, with a population of 232,841, the salaries, pensions, and allowances to municipal officers amounted to 1,134*l.*; law expenses, 691*l.*, 2815.—Besides that, there are the coroner who has 1,400*l.*, and other officers who are not municipal officers at Birmingham, but who hold situations analogous to the situations which are held under the City of London. Again, the administration of justice is separate from the municipal officers in Birmingham, but is paid for in London by the corporation, 2816.—Proceeds to speak of Bristol, Hull, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Norwich, Sheffield, which are all the corporate towns whose population is more than that of London, the aggregate of whose population is 1,509,908; of the salaries, pensions, and allowances to their municipal officers, 31,517*l.*; and of their law expenses, 29,944*l.* Begs to call attention to the duty on coals, the 8*d.* duty last year amounted to 117,606*l.*; the 1*d.* duty to 14,467*l.*; and the 4*d.* duty to more than 60,000*l.*, making altogether a tax of 192,000*l.* upon coals alone levied upon the inhabitants of this metropolis and twenty miles round; up to this time the 8*d.* duty has been expended for public improvements within the City, except the balance of the 8*d.* duty, which has been turned over to the Woods and Forests, 2817.—This 8*d.* duty will expire in 1862, 2818.—This duty is pledged to public works, so that it must of course be continued to that time, or some other means must be found. Thinks it a great hardship to task the poorer classes upon coal, to such a large amount, for improvements in the City, 2819.—Thinks it most unjust that this twentieth of the metropolis should have the power of taxing the whole of the metropolis, for the purpose of making improvements within the City, to the amount of a million and a quarter, 2820, 2821.—Does not mean the Commission to understand that, in his opinion, the arrangement for the distribution of the future proceeds of this tax among the different portions of the metropolis at large is inequitable. For instance, in the return presented to Parliament in the last session of 200,000*l.*, for improvements at Waterloo Bridge, Holborn, and so on. The whole of the improvements out of the City under various Acts which witness mentions amount to 753,000*l.* The 8*d.* coal duty has not yet paid off the whole of the 1,000,000*l.* for the approaches to London Bridge, and the 250,000*l.* for Farringdon Market, which is all laid out in the City. There is an accumulation of interest upon those items, for making improvements out of the City, to the amount of 296,000*l.*, therefore the duty has not yet reached the amount necessary to pay off the 1,250,000*l.* The 4*d.* duty amounts to 60,000*l.* and upwards, and goes into the corporation funds. This 4*d.* duty is a very curious affair. In the reign of Charles II. the Court of Aldermen exercised a power, which is no doubt vested in them as much now as it was at that time, of being trustees to the property of the children of all citizens who died intestate. The City officers say they were plundered of that, but witness always understood that the Court of Aldermen lent the money, which amounted to 747,000*l.*, to Charles II. It was certainly never paid back. In the reign of William and Mary they got power to raise money to pay those poor orphans the amount of which they had been plundered. The Act of the 5th and 6th of William and Mary gave them 4*d.* per ton upon coals in perpetuity, and 6*d.* per ton for fifty years, to pay off those claims. That 6*d.* per ton was extended for 35 years more by the 21st of George II. It was again extended by the 7th of George III. for 46 years, but they found in the year 1766 that the produce of those duties was more than was required to discharge the money borrowed. They sought to apply portions of the money in completing the building of Blackfriars Bridge, and in making the approaches to it on the City side, and also in purchasing the tolls, on building Newgate, repairing the Royal Exchange, and other purposes. However, the whole of it was wound up in 1834. The parish of Lambeth, which contains a population of 140,000, who are the largest consumers of coals in the metropolis, have no share whatever in those duties. Thinks it is a cruel shame to impose 4*d.* duty upon them, or upon any other portion of the metropolis, in order that it may go into the coffers of the corporation, whose funds amounted last year to 406,000*l.* in taxes and revenue, 2823.—The 8*d.* duty will be a difficult question to deal with, on account of the outlay already expended in anticipation of it, but the 4*d.* duty is applied as positively a part of the corporation funds, 2824.—The 4*d.* duty is quite distinct from the 9*d.*; it goes into the funds of the corporation as much as the rents of their estates. In their accounts it is described as integrally a part of their revenue, and whatever is paid for public improvements is described to be out of the revenues of the City, and not out of this tax, 2825.—Thinks that if the 4*d.* tax was abolished the price of coal would be reduced more than that, 2827.—Has not heard that the 4*d.* duty has been specially mortgaged. There is 11,500*l.* mortgaged, to make the approaches to London Bridges They will very likely tell you it is from the coal duties, but it is from the revenues of the corporation, as described in their own account, 2828.—Reads description by Mr. Scott, clerk of the chamberlain, 2829.—Has turned his attention to the expediency of giving municipal privileges to other parts of the metropolis. States that the common council have been great reformers when threatened with any reform from another quarter. In 1834, after the Commission came into the City, a committee was appointed, of which witness was one. It agreed to most extensive reforms, but the court would not entertain the subject. In 1836 there was a committee of the whole court, to effect a reform in the corporation, and to consult with the Government as to a bill which was promised to be brought in by Lord John Russell. Had an interview with Lord John Russell, for the purpose of considering what reforms should be effected. Had an intimation from him that he did not mean to bring in a bill. There has been great dissatisfaction in the City with the corporation. Would constitute the metropolitan boroughs into corporations, if desired, out of which would appoint a central power for certain purposes, with great powers. Would make the lord mayor the head of this body, giving him a liberal allowance for maintaining hospitality, 2830.—Would rather, if lord mayor, keep up the hospitality out of his own pocket than tax the necessaries of the poor. The lord mayors of the olden times do not seem to have had near such a liberal allowance, 2831.—For no purpose but for taxation do the City represent the whole metropolis, 2832.—They are conservators of the Thames, and many of the City markets are metropolitan markets, but they get a large profit from them, 2833.—The feeling of the common council is to preserve things as they are, which is not in accordance with the general interests of the metropolis, 2835.—Considers nearly the whole of the City privileges disadvantageous to the metropolis at large, 2836.—Thinks it impossible to reform the present corporation of the City of London by any extension of the franchise to all householders, or by shortening the duration of the period for which the aldermen are elected. There is a good remedy in the Municipal Corporation Act, 2837.—If that Act were applied to the City there would be as good a municipal government as any town in England, 2838.—There is a large amount of trust

property in many of the old corporate towns. Had the honour to represent the city of Coventry for a great many years. They have in that city a great many charities. The old corporation had the management of them, but under the new Act the Lord Chancellor is empowered to appoint the trustees to those charities. Would take the conservancy of the Thames from the corporation, and place it in the hands of the Government, who ought to undertake the conservancy of such a river, 2839.

WILSON, Mr. EDWARD. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was a silk manufacturer in the City of London, and member of the common council for the ward of Cripplegate from 1832 to 1839, 4375.—Took a very active part in the business of the corporation, 4376.—Went into the common council as a strong reformer and free-trader. Was upon a committee moved for by Mr. Williams, the present member for Lambeth, to inquire into the salaries and emoluments of the lord mayor and corporate officers. Is anxious to correct a statement, bearing his signature, that the total expenses of the mayoralty amounted to 35,000*l.* That mistake in the report referred to, arose from reckoning the cost of the original building of the Mansion House, and the cost of the ground upon which it was built, with interest at seven per cent., and then debiting that as expenses of the mayoralty during the year of office, 4377, 4378.—The aldermen and common councilmen have to hear complaints of undue assessment in their wards, and to correct them for the purpose of rating the inhabitants, 4379.—They place on lists, as their standing warrants, parties who are liable to serve on juries. No publican is licensed unless approved by the common councillors of the ward. The deputy, being a commissioner of sewers, any nuisance or want of repair to the pavements is communicated to him, and he reports it to the commission, 4380.—The deputy is appointed by the aldermen from the common council, and continues for life, or till he ceases to be a member of that court. He receives no remuneration whatever, 4381.—Suggests important alterations in the constitution of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the City of London. Gives memorandum of the same, which should be carried into effect as soon as possible. With respect to questions connected with the Watermen's Company, the fellowship porters, and other bodies having certain exclusive privileges in the City, thinks that must be a separate subsequent inquiry, as it would be impossible for Parliament to deal with them without appointing committees, and hearing evidence on the subject, 4382, 4383.—Thinks it would be impossible to deal with them on general principles. The Watermen's Company would assert privileges and charters which would take a long time to inquire into. Believes it would be necessary to have some restriction upon the navigation of the river Thames; whether it should be dealt with by the navigation committee; whether the meterage of corn is an important thing, as between buyer and seller; whether the present fellowship porters are a restriction upon trade, should be looked at in a separate form, 4384, 4385.—If there were any matter of importance connected with the docks or banks of the river, refused by the navigation committee, and the parties felt themselves aggrieved, there might be some power to which they could appeal. If the authority consisted of some of the elder brethren of the Trinity, or some practical men appointed by the Crown, sees no objection to allow them a peremptory decision in case of appeal, 4386, 4387.—Believes that the public generally would have more confidence, and the facilities of trade would be much greater if the management were in the hands of the navigation committee as at present, an appeal being given as above mentioned, 4388.—Has no apprehension that it would produce delay and expense. The navigation committee may be called a popular body. Thinks the members with their officers possess the knowledge necessary for them to deal judiciously with questions of this description. Many of them bring some degree of knowledge to the subject, 4389–4391.—On any important question respecting the conservancy of the river the sub-committee go down to see the spot, and make their report to the grand committee. They have their officer to point out what would be detrimental and what useful, and the committee decides upon their report, 4392.—The harbour master is a very efficient officer. The gentlemen of this committee are all practical men of business, though not acquainted with matters connected with navigation; believes no one can point out an instance where they have come to a wrong conclusion, 4393–4396.—Believes an Act of Parliament has been passed by which, in case of bankruptcy, insolvency, or fraud, an alderman is obliged to vacate his office. Likewise in the Court of Common Council there is a byelaw in such cases to prevent members sitting upon committees. With respect to auditors not being members of the corporation, there is in the Gas Consumers' Company a case in point, which works very well. The corporation appoint two auditors to inspect the accounts, and they appoint a party to inspect the quality of the gas, 4397.—When applications are made for driving piles, building out, or anything of that sort, the payment of a small sum, merely nominal, is required for the purpose of ascertaining the freehold right, if it is necessary to remove those things. The money goes into the funds for the navigation, 4398.—The accounts are most strictly kept and the amount reported from time. Never saw a better statement of the affairs of a corporation than that which is annually laid before the corporation of the City of London. It is a great mistake to suppose the City funds are large; properly speaking, they are very small; should say not above 150,000*l.*, so much of which is apportioned to particular purposes as to leave but little to be dealt with by the City. They have undoubtedly large funds to deal with under the Bridge House estates, the navigation of the river, and various improvement trusts; but all obliged to be kept as strictly separate as one merchant's money from another's, 4399, 4400.—The present form of accounts is very satisfactory and clear. Thinks the corporation extremely good landlords. It is their desire to give every fair advantage to the then tenant when a lease runs out, and there is a clause which enables them to know into whose hands the leases go, 4401.—Believes the 4*d.* coal duty is considered part of the City estate, and the corporation calculate upon that to repay them for the large sums expended in pensions to their coalmeters, 4402.—Does not think that the money has yet been wholly recompensed, 4403.—Considers that for purposes of improvement on a large scale, nothing can be fairer than that the fund should be taken from the coal duties. Believes it to be the case in most cities. It would be unjust that the citizens of London should be compelled to rebuild London Bridge by an improvement rate, because that bridge is for the traffic of persons coming from a long distance from London, 4405, 4406.

WIRE, ALDERMAN:
Is the only alderman who is a practising attorney, Goodman, 7868, 7869.—Explanation of a statement that Mr. Alderman Wire sat on a case where his partner was solicitor, and the prosecutor his client, ib. 7864–7866.

WIRE, DAVID WILLIAMS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the sheriffs and an alderman, 7913, 7914.—Has been connected with the corporation twenty-three years, and has always taken an active part in its affairs. Is a solicitor. His office is in London. Does not reside there, 7915–7918.—Is acquainted with the manner of electing sheriffs. Was under-sheriff five or six times before he became an alderman, 7919.—Has paid great attention to the abuses with regard to the system of fines. Has always endeavoured to prevent any body being elected sheriff who was unwilling to serve, and in most cases with success, 7920, 7921.—The practice arose thus. Before the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed, many merchants were dissenters, and could not take corporate offices. They were elected, and rather than violate their consciences they submitted to the fines, 7922.—Believes at that particular time it was made a means of getting money, because it is stated the larger part of the expense of building the Mansion House was paid out of those fines. Since connected with the corporation does not think any one has been elected for the sake of the fine, 7923.—Thinks no considerable sum has been received from that source, certainly for thirty years, 7924, 7925.—The lord mayor has lately declined exercising his privilege of nominating to the office from the list of eligible parties, put up in the Guildhall, 7926.—Mr. Turnley has recently complained bitterly of having been elected, but he had been nominated a considerable time. Does not know what Mr. Rose stated to him, but his election was prior to witness's, 7927.—Unless means are taken by the friends of the candidate wishing to be elected, or by the parties not wishing to be elected, it is likely a man might be elected against his will, and consequently subjected to a fine. The common hall is thinly attended unless some question of interest is stirring. Thinks the system of electing sheriffs by common hall as at present conducted very objectionable, 7928, 7929.—The liverymen not having attended to their duty, if the constituency in the City be altered, that may induce the constituency to attend. Failing that, the election should be in common council, who would always avoid every possible abuse, 7930.—There was some difficulty in electing a second sheriff this year, as a person requires some preparation previously to taking the office, 7931, 7932.—The expenses of the office of sheriff are never less than 3000*l.* a year. Shall this year have to pay more, in consequence of his colleague in office declining to pay certain portions of the expenses which are usually borne in equal portions by the two sheriffs, 7933,—Does not think the office of under-sheriff susceptible of amendment. The sheriff nominates his own under-sheriff, 7934.—Thinks the connexion between the shrievalty of the City of London and the County of Middlesex a great advantage. In times of danger and excitement, and political movements, it has been manifest. The power and influence of the City have been brought to bear upon the county of Middlesex beneficially for both parties. The privilege of choosing their own sheriffs was bought by the City of London, and has been exercised by the people for 700 years, 7935–7937.—There are distinct under-sheriffs for the County and for the City. The under-shrievalty of the City is executed by the secondary, who is appointed by the corporation, therefore they would indemnify the sheriff against any loss from the neglect of his officer, though the sheriff is primarily responsible for the acts of his officers, 7938, 7939.—The same person acts virtually as under-sheriff for the County of Middlessex, without removal. Mr. Burchell is that by annual appointment. The under-sheriff might take the business into his own hands. When under-sheriff, thought of doing so. Is speaking of the County of Middlesex. Could not have done so in London, 7940, 7941.—In London the under-sheriffs jointly perform the duties, but in truth one has nothing to do but attend upon his sheriff. The rule is to swear only the senior under-sheriff, 7942.—When under-sheriff the emoluments were about 1,000*l.* a year, but the amount varies. Was out of pocket the first year, in consequence of the change of the law, which took away nearly all the fees, 7943.—Alludes to the abolition of the arrest for debt, 7944.—Was under-sheriff six years. Not consecutive years, 7945.—The sheriff appoints his own under-sheriff without reference to the previous tenure of office. Happened to be under-sheriff because his clients were serving the office, 7946.—Did not adjudicate in the case which has been referred to by Mr. Goodman. Only remanded the prisoner, who was committed by Alderman Wilson, 7947, 7948.—The proceeding was not conducted by his partner Mr. Child. Neither solicitor nor counsel were employed, because the man persisted in admitting his guilt, and there was an end of the matter, 7952.—Before hearing any evidence so as to justify a remand, sent all over the City to find another alderman, 7953.—Is perfectly acquainted with the case of Mr. Gray, 7954.—At his request supported his petition in the Court of Common Council, which resulted in a grant of 50*l.* beyond what other persons had subscribed for him. He made an application to the Home Office. Knows no instance of the Crown granting the estreats to parties who prosecute, 7955, 7956.—Has no recollection of any correspondence with him till after he had given evidence before the Commissioners; then received a letter to know what had become of the fines. Must explain that the fines are set over, and it is two or three years after you are out of office before you know anything about them. Received a portion of the fines of that year about a year ago, 7957.—Those estreats regular are first returned by the sheriff or his officers to the Court of Exchequer, who set over to the City what belong to the City and to the Crown what belong to the Crown; then they are recovered by a process from the Court of Exchequer, directed to the sheriff, but it is three or four years after you are out of office before that is done. The secondary is paid by salary, partly from fees, and has to account to the corporation for every shilling he receives, to see whether he has received to the amount guaranteed by them, which is 1,000*l.* a year. The fees and fines are therefore all accounted for, 7958.—Knows a case in which the corporation, having had a fine of 10,000*l.* set over to them, divided it among the sufferers from the delinquencies of the man who paid the fine, 7959.—Does not think the Crown would have given that estreat to Mr. Gray, if the Crown had known what was known to the committee. The City always deal most liberally with every person who has any connexion with them or any reasonable claim upon them. They gave the man 50*l.* which he said he was out of pocket, and thought the case would have ended there. A long time afterwards Mr. Gray applied for those recognizances. Believes the money had been set over by the Crown, and distributed to the parties entitled to it, 7960, 7961.—Has no knowledge on the subject, therefore cannot say whether Mr. Gray's statement is true, 7962.—Thinks the City acted with quite as much liberality as the Crown would have done under the circumstances, 7963.—Was not on the committee, but believes, from the habits of the committee, a full inquiry was held, 7964.—In the Court of Exchequer the fine would undoubtedly be set over to the City of London, 7965.—It would go into the secondary's hands, 7966.—He would account for it to the City solicitor, 7967.—What he receives for himself are the fees of office, not the fines; they are distributed to the parties entitled to them, 7968.—The City solicitor, having the fines in his hand, would pay them over to the sheriff; they do not get into the funds of the corporation, 7970, 7971.—It depends upon the understanding between them as to whether they go into the pocket of the sheriff or under-sheriff. It would have been money out of their pocket if those estreats had been given to Mr. Gray, 7969–7972.—Thinks the corporation would have paid the amount out of their own funds, if they had thought it a case which called for it, 7973.—Had witness paid the money to Mr. Gray, it would have been out of his own pocket, 7974.—In all places, unless by particular charter or grant, the estreats go over to the Crown. In Middlesex, those which arise in connexion with the City of Westminster, go to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, 7975.—Wishes to advert to the Manchester Railway, in connexion with which it was implied that witness carried his professional character into the Court of Common Council. It did so happen that, as the bill was on the eve of going to Parliament, he was asked in a great hurry, by the solicitor conducting the business, to take a portion of the line. After having been concerned in it never took any part in the common council on the subject, 7976.

WOOD, JOHN, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chairman of the consolidated committee of the Court of Common Council, and attends as such to state that they are most anxious to afford the Commissioners the fullest information they require. Reads the terms of the appointment of the consolidated committee, which consists of about 60 members, 7254.—It is a large number, and for ordinary committees would be too large, but by putting on this committee the chairman of every committee of the court, any matter which any particular committee had in charge might from time to time be considered in this committee, and also that through their chairman the various committees might be informed of the proceedings of this consolidated committee, without the formality of a meeting of the Court of Common Council. Within the last few days the consolidated committee has thought it necessary, with the sanction of their chairman, to call together all the committees of the court upon matters connected with this Commission, 7255.—The lord mayor has represented that this committee, by a deputation of its members, has taken upon itself not only to confer with the Government upon various matters but to agree in respect to them; this is not correct. The Government have always been told that it was not possible for the deputation to do more than treat upon certain subjects; but if the treaty arrived at such a stage as would enable the committee to recommend to the common council, then the committee would report, and the court would probably agree. Agrees with the lord mayor that it would be too great a power to commit to any members of the court the right of binding the court without express authority. There has been an understanding among the members of the corporation that they should give the Commissioners any information required, but reserve any opinion as to alterations in the constitution of the corporation till the whole facts have been laid before them. Has been a member of the corporation for about 16 years, and is satisfied that however unnecessary some alteration in the constitution of the court may be, the general management of the business cannot be better than it has been, 7256, 7257.—Allusion has been made to the consolidated committee having expended large sums of money secretly. Knows of nothing of the kind. Mr. Scott has stated what has been spent in the purchase of newspapers, also a sum of money for the establishment of a projected newspaper. This committee never gave any directions on the subject, 7258.—After the matter had quite ceased the committee sanctioned the repayment of the sums advanced, but they had nothing to do with the getting up of the paper, 7259.—Having heard a statement that 1,000*l.* a year was expended in bribing the press, felt greatly indignant, but felt that the matter would be set right, as nothing of the sort was ever contemplated. About 160*l.* or 180*l.* a year has been spent in purchasing and distributing newspapers, 7260.—Is not aware that there was anything like concealment. This sum appeared in the accounts, 7261, 7262.—With regard to the sum expended in opposing the bill for the removal of Smithfield Market, no payment could be made by the chamberlain without a warrant signed by 7 members of the committee, 7263.—Thinks there should be a statement in the accounts of the nature of the expenditure, but it would be impossible always to detail every particular sum. The matter of the expenditure would be on the warrant of the chamberlain and the report of the particular committee, 7264.—Is not a member of the Markets Improvement Committee. Has not looked into the particular question the commissioner refers to; but if the sum of 2,500*l.* was expended in opposing that particular bill, though a general statement of the object is sufficient for the general account, thinks there should be some means of arriving at the details. The consolidated committee wished to take means for the circulation of the reports of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council; it was referred to a sub-committee to carry out temporarily that resolution, at a cost not exceeding 20*l.* a week, and to devise means for a permanent arrangement, and to report the same to the consolited committee. The sub-committee consisted of witness as chairman, Messrs. Norris, Lowman, Taylor, Blake, Low, Richard Taylor, and Holt. One of the suggestions made was that short-hand writers should take notes of the proceedings of the corporation, and send transcripts of them to the various newspapers, but the expense was estimated at about 2,000*l.* a year, and that was abandoned. At length it was suggested that whenever anything took place in the court it should be furnished with 300 copies of the following day's paper. With respect to committees, wishes to refer to one. There are large sums of money to pay annually for law and conveyancing business, and about 10 years ago a committee was appointed, called the Law Bills Committee, consisting of the solicitors in the court, some few other members, and the chairmen of all the other committees. Thinks the corporation has every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which that committee has acted. Previously to the Law Bills Committee it was usual to refer any bill incurred by direction of any particular committee to some solicitor who was a member of it, or some solicitor in the court. But what one solicitor would allow another would disallow, and it was thought that by placing all the solicitors in the court upon this committee troubling them to examine the bills, that uniformity would be secured. They meet in committee. The chairman of the particular committee will state that the business was done; the vouchers will be produced; sometimes the members take the bills home, carefully examine them, and report to the committee. This has all the effect of a taxation by a taxing master, except that the bills would be more liberally dealt with by a taxing officer than they are by the members of the court, 7265.—Is quite sure the expenditure under the head of law proceedings is effectually controlled. The consolidated committee have no allowance, though the business has been very laborious to its members, but they have always thought it right to decline any. One of the important matters before them is the question relating to the bed and soil of the river. They are most anxious to have this question settled. Very large sums of money would have been expended in improvements of the river if this question had been settled, 7266.—No inconvenience has been found to arise from there not being any allowance to the consolidated committee, the matters referred to them have been known to be connected with the welfare of the corporation generally, and there has always been a very fair attendance of the members. The deputation, consisting of 7 or 8 members, have constantly attended to the business which has come before them, 7267.

WOOD, JOHN, Esq. (Second Examination.)—States that any other information, oral or documentary, which may be desired, will be immediately given; that a committee has been appointed to consider a communication from the Commissioners, inviting the corporation to make suggestions for improving its constitution, 8497.

WOOD, THOMAS, Esq. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief clerk of the justice room. Was formerly an alderman of the City of London, 6316, 6317.—The duties which he performs in the court to which he is attached are very similar to those duties described by Mr. Goodman, 6318.—The establishment of the court at Guildhall is, chief clerk, two assistant clerks, a receiver, a summoning officer, a gaoler, and a messenger, 6320.—The receiver receives all the fines that are paid into the office, 6321.—Witness examines witnesses. Very seldom advises the magistrates on questions of law; there is more said about it than is real, 6323, 6324.—Was a professional person before appointed. Has been upon the roll of attornies and solicitors from the year 1807, 6325.—The expenses are about 150*l.* less than at the Mansion House. Mentions, that because it has been reported that the expenses at Guildhall exceed the expense of the metropolitan police, whereas finds for the eleven metropolitan offices the charges are 44,000*l.* a year, 6326.—The court sits from 12 till the business is finished; every day's business brings with it its own duties. The magistrates sit according to rota, one alderman sitting every day a week at a time, 6327–6329.—The business of the court has decreased in one way, and increased in another. It has increased in consequence of the great number of Acts of Parliament enlarging the summary jurisdiction. It has decreased in certain descriptions of crime, but in others it has also increased. The summary business is greatly upon the increase, 6330.

WOODLEY, Mr. THOMAS. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a butcher in Aldgate High Street, City; himself established a long time, and his father previously, 2981–2983.—Has been very much annoyed by a class of journeymen freemen, who attempt to monopolise the whole of the slaughtering work; make their own claim for price, and do not allow you to make a free choice of servants. They demand 2*s.* 6*d.* for the slaughtering of a bullock, which is a great deal more than there is any occasion to pay, and they will work on no other terms. They apply for work as freemen, and if you refuse them, the mode is to proceed at the Lord Mayor's Court, and an action is brought against you for employing a non-freeman, 2984.—Believes there is a byelaw of the Court of Common Council, passed in the year 1712, which ordains that no freeman shall employ a non-freeman under a penalty of 5*l.*, 2985.—There is no particular fellowship of labourers employed in the butchers' trade; believes that every journeyman and every shopman in the City employed by a freeman (the action will not lie against a non-freeman) is liable to the same thing if it were enforced, 2986.—It is not as members of any particular fellowship, but as freemen of London, that they claim to be exclusively employed, 2987.—Compromised the first actions brought against him for not employing freemen, and took up freedom for the man. Was very shortly after served with another notice; took up freedom for a second, and then for a third. Immediately that freedom was taken up for the men, they considered it a matter of obligation if they stayed and served, and either required a great advance in their wages or left. It is a very obnoxious system, because nearly 7*l.* is a large amount for a journeyman butcher; and if he is induced to part with that amount for his freedom, he has very extravagant ideas as to the rights he obtains by it. It costs him 6*l.* or 7*l.* to take up his freedom, 2988, 2989.—Employs three journeymen in the slaughter-house and one in the shop. This system is unknown in every other neighbourhood. The claims have been resisted, but always unsuccessfully, 2990.—The action against witness was about three months ago; was served with a declaration on the 28th of October. Believes it is quite against the will of the present officers of the corporation that such things should be carried on; and when witness obtained an interview with Sir John Key on the subject, he strictly prohibited any further proceedings in the matter. This was about a month ago; the action was brought in his name, 2991–2993.—The circumstances which induced Sir John Key to alter the usual course of proceedings were that he considered it was merely a question of malice. The man left witness in an improper manner, and he thought it was one of his rights that he could sue for this penalty, 2994.—The claim is not enforced anywhere but in the Aldgate High Street, or Whitechapel Market as it is called, 2995–2997.—The distinction is made because several masters were punished years ago, and they submitted to it, 2998.—It is not enforced in Newgate Market, and a large portion of the meat supplied to Newgate Market is killed at Aldgate and at Smithfield, where there are several large slaughtering establishments, and no such law is recognised, 3000.—Those men only apply in the case of slaughtering; they charge 2*s.* 6*d.* a bullock, and can easily earn 10*s.* or 12*s.* a day, 3001.—There is no difference between employment in slaughtering and in any other branches of the butcher's trade. The law would equally apply to any journeyman, 3002.—The claim is not enforced in any other case. The men get a large increase of wages by paying 6*l.* or 7*l.* to take up their freedom, 3003.—Considers 2*s.* 6*d.* an unreasonable charge for the service in question; could get the business done at thirty per cent. less without the interference of those freemen, 3004.—Thinks the whole system of freemen journeymen should be abolished. It produces no advantage except to the man himself; all the advantage to the man is disadvantage to the employer, 3005, 3006.

WOODTHORPE, Mr. EDMUND. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is a district surveyor for the City, appointed by the Court of Aldermen, 6827.—He has to attend to all buildings which are erected within the northern division of the City; there are four district surveyors, but witness also holds a small division in the county of Middlesex, and therefore sees the practice both in the City and in the county. Has had great difficulty in dealing with parish bodies, in inducing them to condemn or rather assist him to condemn ruinous buildings, which he considers one of his most important duties, 6828.—Has not found that difficulty in the City, 6829.—When witness sees there a ruinous building that is dangerous to the public, examines it, and applies to the official referees, in conformity with the Act of Parliament, for their authority for a survey. When that is done, reports back again to the official referees, and they send their report in the City to the Court of Aldermen, and in the county to the overseers. Can give the Commissioners an instance in which nearly two years expired before the overseers would act, whereas the Court of Aldermen acted rigidly, in conformity with the time specified by the Act of Parliament in every instance, 6830.—The overseers are enabled to provide for it out of the poor rate, under clause 40 of the 7th and 8th Victoria, chapter 84, 6831.—It appears from that clause that the aldermen of the City and the overseers of the parishes have precisely the same powers; and whereas the Act is carried into effect in the City, in the parishes out of the City it is very imperfectly so, 6832, 6833.

WOODTHORPE, Mr. FREDERICK. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been one of the minuting clerks in the town clerk's office since 1838.—6135, 6136.—Has to attend the minute proceedings of the several committees, and keep that record under the direction of the town clerk, 6137.—Acts as secretary to the Thames Navigation and Port of London Committee, to the Consolidated Committee, to the Police Committee, to the General Purposes Committee, to the Markets Improvement Committee, and to others when required, 6139.—When witness cannot attend the duties are performed by one of the other minuting clerks, 6141.—One of the duties is to draw the report under the direction of the town clerk, and in this way become acquainted with the business transacted by the different committees, 6142, 6143.—The establishment of the town clerk's office consists of four minuting clerks, four copying clerks, and there is a clerk employed in sorting the papers and books and keeping them in order, and one messenger, 6144.—The allowance for the cost of the establishment is about 1,800*l.*, 6145.—The office is in Guildhall, 6146.—On the retirement of a clerk after some years service some consideration is generally looked for, and usually rendered, not on any definite scale; each case is considered on its own ground, 6147–6149.—Many members of the corporation have considered whether they should not establish some system of cauings their employers to insure their lives, 6150.—There is no deduction from the salary to create a fund for superannuation allowances, 6152.—Attends the Thames

Navigation and Port of London Committee, and they practically have a great deal of conservancy business before them, 6153.—The duties are somewhat divided, one portion is the Thames navigation, and the other is the port of London; but the committee and the corporation generally consider, that though there are separate Acts of Parliament for the two branches of the service, they are intimately connected, and that the port of London is not restricted merely to that portion upon which the tonnage dues can be at present expended, 6154.—Their regular meetings are once a month. At each meeting of the grand committee they appoint a sub-committee, and they meet about twice in the course of the month, 6155.—In 1852 there were upwards of 80 meetings, 6156. The business is to appoint their sub-committee, then receive applications from parties who are desirous of having accommodations in the river, making embankments or driving piles, the regulation of private moorings for a temporary purpose, steamboat piers, and the proceedings of the sub-committee during the previous month are read and considered by the grand committee, and either sanctioned or otherwise, 6158.—They also receive communications at every meeting from persons occupying warehouses, or engaged in trade on any part of the river, on various subjects. They receive reports from their officers, 6159.—The business is important, sometimes urgent, 6160, 6161.—The Navigation Committee do all in their power to keep the port of London in an efficient and commodious state. Their means are very limited, excepting for specific purposes, for which certain sums are devoted, such as the tonnage duty. The principal funds are the tonnage duty fund, the Thames navigation committee fund, and the rental fund, 6162–6164.—The purposes to which the tonnage duties are applicable are explained in the Acts of Parliament, 6165.—They are quite sufficient for the purposes, 6166.—The Thames navigation fund is applicable to the locks and towing paths on the upper parts of the river, but is very inadequate to the purpose, 6168.—There is no fund by which the shoals in the river can be removed, except when the corporation advance the money out of their own funds for that purpose. If the tonnage duty were rendered for the same purpose, it would materially assist in carrying on improvements in the river, 6170, 6171.—The shoals which impede the navigation at certain states of the tide are numerous; much increased in consequence of the extent to which the water now ebbs, compared to what it used to do before the removal of Old London Bridge, 6173, 6174.—The removal of Old London Bridge has affected the flow of the river both up and down, and that has increased the expense of maintaining the river, 6177, 6178.—The corporation take charge of what may be called the river traffic, with regard to the over-crowding of steam boats, and matters of that kind. The Court of Aldermen have power to pass byelaws for the regulation of that traffic; it is considered as a mere matter of police, 6179, 6180.—Some of the members of the Navigation Committee are persons who have peculiar acquaintance with navigation; they attend very regularly, 6182, 6183.—One gentleman, Mr. Phillips, has been a member for five years. He was an extensive lighterman on the Thames for nearly 40 years, 6184.—The case of Mr. Matthews' client has been before the Navigation Committee, 6183.—Witness gives a detail of the entire proceedings, with his own view of the case, 6190–6197.—The Consolidated Committee was appointed for the purpose of communicating with the Government, and of carrying on suits which had been instituted either by or against the corporation on several matters, and generally to consider the affairs of the corporation, and to interfere where it should be actually necessary. It is a sort of advising committee. It has considerable executive duties, with large discretionary powers conferred upon it, 6198–6200.—In most cases they would apply to the Court of Common Council for their authority, 6201.—An idea at one time prevailed as to the propriety of encouraging and promoting a newspaper for the purpose of advocating the interests of the corporation. The subject was never brought under the attention of the members of the Consolidated Committee as a committee. The only instance when the repayment of money advanced by individual members was authorized was a payment of the sum of 250*l.* to Mr. Scott, and 280*l.* to Mr. Remembrancer, 6203.—They consider they have authority without specifically reporting any particular case to the court. Their terms of reference were sufficiently wide to give them a discretionary power of expending money in that way, 6205, 6206.—The common practice is for the committees of the common council to make orders for payments for purposes within reference. Witness wishes to qualify his previous answer with respect to the Consolidated Committee drawing money. Believes, at the time those warrants were drawn, a report, which has been referred to before this Commission, with respect to publishing the proceedings of the Court of Common Council, had been confirmed by the Court, which decidedly gave them, beyond their general reference, those additional powers of drawing money, 6207.—Generally the expenditure of this committee comes under the cognizance of the Court, but it is audited by the committee itself whenever necessary, 6208.—The whole of the accounts come before the City auditors. In the case of trust funds they are very carefully audited, 6210.—In some cases, as in the case of the Thames Navigation Committee, the accounts are rendered only to the chamber. A return is made to Parliament of the expenditure of the tonnage duties fund, 6211.—The duties of the General Purposes Committee are principally to look after the mansion house; but during the last two years they have had a very important matter under their consideration—an inquiry into the charges made, and the privileges maintained by the porters and meters of London, 6212, 6213.—The object of the negotiation has been to bring about a sort of compromise between the City and the trade, 6216.—The footing of the compromise has been that the system of compulsory metage should be retained, and the trade have suggested certain conditions by which the working of it would be alleviated. The system of metage and porterage is highly spoken of, though the charges are considered too high, 6217.—Is not aware of any other place in England where there is a compulsory system of metage, 6221.—The business of the common council is so multifarious that a subdivision into committees is considered highly desirable, 6224–6226.—The Police Committee have no superintendence over the actual executive force. They superintend the supply of clothing and the various articles of store, and they have the supervision of the station-houses, 6227.—The corporation consider that these things should be taken out of the hands of the police, and managed by a committee of the common council, 6228–6230.—The committee consider that the duties of the principal officer of any police establishment should be confined to the executive management of the force. They consider that it is managed with more economy and efficiency by a committee than it would be by the superintendent himself, they being subject to a very strong popular control through the Court of Common Council, who are annually elected, 6233.—The committee have the arrangement of the rating, not the actual rating of the inhabitants; that is done in each ward; but they supervise all the rate books, and where objection arises they make alterations if necessary. They supervise the assessment, also the expenditure of money, and regulate all the collections, 6234, 6235.—At the commencement of every year, the duties are divided so as to render to each member of the common council as much duty as can conveniently attach to one person, 6236.—Is not positively acquainted with the mode in which the different wards arrange for members being placed upon committee; that is regulated by the members themselves. The returns are sent to the town clerk; they are arranged in a tabulated form at a previous meeting, and the common council actually appoint. They generally accept the recommendation of the wards, but in some instances they make alterations, 6238.

Wortley, The Right Hon. James Archibald Stuart, M.P. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has held the office of recorder of the City of London since the autumn of 1850, 5486, 5487.—The salary attached is 3,000*l.* a year, and some trifling fees. Has made a return of those fees to the town clerk, which will be laid before the Commission, 5488, 5489.—The amount in 1852 was 150 guineas, in 1851 sixteen guineas, and in 1853 fifteen guineas. There are deductions to be made, namely, a clerk and chambers, which together cost at present about 85*l.*, 5490.—Practically, he is debarred from practising in Westminster Hall, by the nature of his duties and the constant employment at the office. At the time of his appointment had been retained in more than one peerage case in the House of Lords, and has continued to attend the House of Lords in those cases; but, with these exceptions and arbitrations, has not practised in Westminster Hall, 5491.—Will furnish the Commissioners with two reports which will state exactly what his duties are. May say generally, that he is the chief legal adviser of the corporation. Attends upon all state occasions. Reads addresses to the Crown. Sits at the right hand of the lord mayor in the Court of Aldermen and in the Court of Common Council. Puts the question for him, and assists and advises him in deciding matters of order. Executes the formal part of the speaker's duty, but has no decision in his hands. Advises the lord mayor, who is the responsible officer, and who decides questions of order. Is one of the Commissioners under the Central Criminal Court Act, and is considered the chief judge connected with that court except Her Majesty's judges. Is expected at the commencement of every session to charge the grand jury, and has to attend as assessor to the magistrate both in London and Southwark; the latter however is a mere matter of form, 5491 a, 5492.—Further particulars as to his various duties, 5493.—Has no control over the management of the legal business of the City, 5494.—Does not consider it part of his duty to communicate or direct the solicitor in his management of law proceedings connected with the City, unless a resolution of the Court of Aldermen or the Court of Common Council is passed that the matter be referred to the solicitor and to the recorder, 5495, 5496.—Has never known the aldermen sitting at the Central Criminal Court interfere with the judges in the question of what the sentence to be passed should be. Has himself frequently derived great comfort and assistance in consulting the aldermen who were sitting as to extent of punishment to be inflicted. It is a gross misrepresentation if it has been stated that they improperly interfere, 5497.—It is the usual course in the Court of Queen's Bench, when an argument takes place upon a civil matter, and the judges decide it at once, for the decision to be given by all the judges, one after another. If time is taken to consider, one generally delivers the judgment, 5498.—In criminal cases the sentence is passed by one judge, the senior puisne, after consultation with his colleagues, 5499.—One of the duties of the recorder is to certify the customs of the City by word of mouth, 5500.—Explains how that rule operates and gives instances, 5501–5504.—Sees no objection to giving the fullest liberty to the public to have access for ordinary purposes to the records of the corporation, but cannot go so far as to say that he can see no objection to admitting the public to the charters and title deeds of the corporation upon a subject which is in actual litigation at the time in the courts. This is a question which deserves great attention. Believes there was a case of some great town in which the corporation became involved in a suit in Chancery, and produced voluntarily their title deeds and lost their property; and Lord Eldon rebuked them strongly for having taken that course (see 8 Vesey, jun. 141; Cock v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Chatham). 5505.—Has no doubt that the corporation is in a higher position, than the trustees of a charity, inasmuch as it is a body established for the benefit of the whole community, whereas the trustees of a charity are for a specific purpose. Cannot otherwise distinguish its position with regard to litigation with other parties. Believes that in the very cases in which complaints have been made, every fair statement has been offered as to what the nature of the title of the corporation is upon which they rely. All that has been refused has been the actual production of the documents, till the time comes when they must be produced in court for the purpose of the decision there, 5506.—Has no personal knowledge of the case of Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company beyond this, that for the last two or three years, while it has been in the House of Lords, it has been hung up there by the acquiescence of both parties, neither being anxious to bring it to a conclusion, and in the hope that some arrangement would be made which would get rid of all difficulties of this kind. Speaking generally, should say that it was the duty of every public body holding its position for the benefit of the public to give such information, as, consistently with the sound advice given them by those under whose direction the suit is conducted, they could give to the opposite party of the nature of the title upon which they make their claim. Admits that it is a question which may be put more ways than one, and on which he does not feel capable of forming a definite opinion,

5507.—Does not believe that substantial information of the title which is insisted on has ever been withheld from any litigant, 5508.—With respect to the suit with the Crown concerning the right to the soil and bed of the river, it was felt by the City to be a harsh proceeding on the part of the Crown; but notwithstanding that, the City were anxious to avoid being involved in almost the most expensive form of litigation the Crown could have selected, therefore they have been anxious to come to some arrangements which would be for the public benefit, as well as for the preservation of their own just rights. It is true the course adopted by the Crown was one which by strict law they were at liberty to adopt, namely, passing by the Courts of Law to file an information in the nature of a discovery in the Court of Chancery, calling upon the corporation to disclose their title, but it was by far the most expensive and most cumbrous mode of proceeding which could have been adopted. It was always felt that a proceeding by writ of intrusion was the course which the Crown ought to have pursued. In consequence of that it was that the corporation were advised by a very high authority to resist this claim by every means in their power as against the Crown; but at the same time they of their own accord, and with the advice of their officers of the day, made every effort to come to an amicable arrangement with the Crown. Before coming into office there were negotiations upon this subject with the Crown, the results of which were embodied in a bill which was brought into Parliament and passed its second reading; an amendment was carried in committee, but the bill was not proceeded with. It was among other things recited in the preamble that the Crown, on the one side, and the corporation on the other, were willing to forego their claims to the soil and bed of the river, and transfer them to a board of conservancy, which was at that time projected, 5510.—If the bill had passed, the conservancy would have been vested in a mixed body, consisting of the lord mayor for the time being, three aldermen of the City of London, six members of the common council, and the remaining five conservators were to be elected by the mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, 5511, 5512.—The bill was withdrawn by the City when there was forced upon them an admixture from other portions of the metropolis in this board, 5513.—Shortly after coming into office, in 1850, witness became aware of the nature of the suit, and it immediately occurred to him that it was a matter which ought again to be made the subject of negotiation with the Government; he, therefore, with the sanction of the committee to whom these matters were referred, opened a negotiation with the Government of Lord John Russell. Communicated with Lord John Russell in the first place; asked for and obtained a meeting with him, Lord Seymour, and Sir Francis Baring, the First Lord of the Admiralty. Eventually they referred the matter to Lord Seymour to negotiate with witness upon the subject. In the course of correspondence with Lord Seymour witness drew up a sort of minute of what the propositions on the part of the corporation were, and Lord Seymour, in the shape of an answer to that letter, stated his view of what the points of agreement should be. They substantially coincided, and eventually it was agreed that upon those terms a document should be framed which would embody the settlement of that question. The corporation proposed to take under the Crown a charter, with a grant of the bed and soil of the river, on certain terms, the acceptance of that grant of course having the effect of precluding them from ever again disputing the right of the Crown to the bed and soil of the river. Further provisions were proposed that the whole of the revenue derived from the bed and soil of the river should be applied to the improvement of the river itself or expended upon the banks of the river in public improvements, 5514.—This arrangement did not include any proposition on the part of the Government that they should have any share in the managing body that was to control the river; on the contrary, it provides, in compensation, for their allowing the Crown to assume the right to the bed and soil, an admission which they consented to make by taking a charter that the conservancy of the Thames should be left in the hands of the lord mayor, in the form in which it now is, leaving it of course to Parliament if they choose to interfere at any future time to make a new arrangement. Eventually upon those principles an arrangement was come to without prejudice to either party, if not carried into effect between Lord Seymour and witness. Lord Seymour consulted the solicitor-general, Sir William Page Wood, who advised him throughout in that transaction. A charter was prepared on the part of the City, and submitted to Sir William Page Wood, who made several suggested alterations, and the only matter left to be decided was the mode in which the charter should be framed, and the manner in which the suit should be put an end to in the Court of Chancery. Unfortunately at this time the Government broke up. Application was made to Lord Derby's Government, and the matter was referred to Lord John Manners who was in the Office of Works. He was willing that this matter should be carried to a conclusion when this Government broke up, the present Government coming into office in the beginning of 1853. Their time was so fully occupied that it was in vain that endeavours were made to get their attention to the subject. It was not left to Sir William Molesworth, be as Lord John Manners had decided to let the thing go on, and sent it to the Board of Land Revenue for it to be submitted to the law officers. Sir Frederick Thesiger refused to take any responsibility about it unless it was laid officially before him; in that way it got back into the hands of the Commissioners of Land Revenue. It was then referred to the Treasury. Witness reads the correspondence which has taken place quite recently with Mr. James Wilson, Secretary to the Treasury. States that the corporation are as ready now as ever to negotiate the arrangement of that suit, on liberal principles, beneficial to the public as well as just to themselves, 5515.

WORTLEY, the Right Honourable JAMES STUART, Esq. (Second Examination.)—During the three years he held office various instances have come before him, in which the prosecutions have been by order of the aldermen, and they have been of the character which has been described by the solicitor. In no one instance during that time has there been any case prosecuted by order of the Court of Aldermen which has had a political character of any description. In every case it has been greatly for the benefit of the public that the prosecution had been taken up by the magistrates. With regard to the general exercise of their duties as magistrates, as the judge in the Central Criminal Court can form an opinion from the depositions which come before him, is disposed to say that the committals by the City magistrates would bear the most advantageous comparison with those of any other class of magistrates who commit to the Central Criminal Court, 5674.—Has an opportunity of seeing the committals and depositions taken by the magistrates of all classes, and repeats that the depositions from the City magistrates will bear advantageous comparison with those of any class of magistrates who commit to that court, 5675.

WORTLEY, the Right Hon. JAMES STUART, M.P. (Third Examination.)—When asked upon a former occasion as to the propriety of a public body like the corporation of London producing their documents and their titles, except upon compulsion, referred to a circumstance which he believed to have occurred, and which he had a strong impression was somewhere recorded, viz., that in an instance of that kind, where without compulsion the corporation of a large town had produced their documents, it had led to the taking of a technical objection to their title, which resulted in the forfeiture of their property, to the amount of 7,000*l.* a year, which they had enjoyed for centuries, and when this was mentioned before Lord Eldon, he had rebuked them for taking that course. The corporation alluded to was Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 6468.—That property was in the nature of tolls. With reference to the negotiation in 1847, as to the suit about the bed and soil of the river, produced upon the last occasion a bill which he stated to be the final terms of the compromise between the Government and the corporation of the City. Finds he was mistaken in the copy of the bill. Had the bill as it came from the first recommitment, and not from the second. In the second bill an alteration was made, and it was provided, after naming the lord mayor and three other aldermen, and some of the common council members of the board of conservancy, that the remaining 5 out of the 15 should be elected by the corporation, but subject to the approval of the Crown, the avowed object of that being to give the Crown power to object to those persons being other than persons independent of the corporation; therefore it gave the Crown a direct power of nominating in fact, though by the circuitous mode of a veto, five of the members of the board of conservancy. Gives second clause, 6469.—At present every member of the conservancy committee is a member of the common council. At present the lord mayor is conservator on behalf of the corporation, the conservancy in fact being managed by a committee of the common council. In consequence of the notification which has been mentioned, there was some hesitation on the part of the City whether to accept that term of the compromise or not. Produces the proceedings of the Court of Common Council upon it; reads report, 6470.—That gave virtually and really the appointment of those persons to the Crown. At that time the City were, to the extent named, willing to acquiesce in it. Has no authority to intimate that they would consent to it now, 6471.—On being referred to the evidence of Mr. Powles on the subject, in page 111 of the evidence, witness takes for granted that Mr. Powles was speaking, as witness was on the last occasion, from memory merely, and certainly he is mistaken. The fact was the City eventually consented to the only modification of the board which was proposed. It was not in the House, but in committee; some members of the committee contended for putting the chairman of the dock companies, or persons connected with the shipping interests ex officio upon that board; others, of whom witness was one, objected to that, and preferred that the Crown should have the power of nominating those persons, and on this ground, viz., that if they were put on the board it would only be substituting a class of interested persons; that they would come to protect particular interests, such as the interests of the dock, an establishment of which they were officers or members; and in fact they would come to serve their private and commercial interests, rather than promote public good, 6472.—The effect of the arrangement made with the Government, so far as was completed, was this, that the whole of the funds at present under control of the Navigation Committee should continue to be applied to the conservancy, and that in addition to those funds there should be whatever profit might be made from the right which the Government are now contesting with the City in the soil of the river, 6473.—The whole of the proceeds of the river amounting at present to only 1,100*l.* a year was to be paid into a fund for the specific purpose of being applied either to the conservancy of the river, or being handed over to the Government to improve the banks and approaches to the river, 6474.—It is manifest that with the fund so constituted the sum is wholly inadequate for the proper maintenance of the conservancy of the river. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the corporation derive any benefit from the profits of the river. So far from that being so, the 1,100*l.* a year is a mere trifle compared with what is really required, and which in truth is paid out of the corporation funds. Of course if you take the conservancy out of the hands of the City, you must find funds somewhere else for its support, 6475.—Is not aware whether any estimate has ever been made of the annual sum likely to be required for the proper maintenance of the conservancy, but in the year 1846 there was a report published of the works which Captain Bullock and Mr. Walker recommended, amounting to 60,000*l.*, 6476.—At that time, if the suit had not been commenced, a very large sum of money would have been laid out; the consequence of the suit has been that nothing has been done for the last ten years, 6477.—There is no doubt that the present state of litigation between the Crown and the City is very detrimental to the proper maintenance of the river, 6478.—Witness states facts connected with the City courts, the Central Criminal Court, and to the jurisdiction and proceedings in that court. It is not a corporation court. At the time the Central Criminal Court was established the jurisdiction of the courts of quarter sessions within the metropolitan districts was confined to simple felonies. The consequence was that all burglaries, housebreakings, and compound felonies were tried at the Central Criminal Court. The remedy applied was two years ago by an Act passed, restoring to the quarter sessions their jurisdiction in those confirmed felonies, and leaving to the Central Criminal Court only those more serious cases which are now tried there. Thinks, if it could be managed, it would be very desirable to concentrate the whole of the criminal jurisdiction of this metropolis in one court, that court sitting almost permanently, 6479.—Would confine the business to the Central Criminal Court, increasing the staff, and appointing assistant judges to that court, 6480.—Supposing the lord mayor and aldermen of the City of London were to be excused altogether from attendance at the Central Criminal Courts the same objection would apply, and the same circumstances would occu- about counsel not being able to attend if the law continued with respect to the quarter sessions as it now is. There is one other suggestion which is worth consideration, that is whether it is worth while to keep up the quarter sessions of the City of London, at which, by the charter, it is necessary to have a quorum of four magistrates. Sits there as assessor to the lord mayor, and there must be three aldermen present besides the recorder. Very trivial cases are tried. A great many gentlemen are called together as jurymen and grand jurymen for very little purpose, and sees no reason why that jurisdiction should not be transferred to the Central Criminal Court. With respect to the Lord Mayor's Court thinks if they were assisted by the authority of Parliament in making a few alterations that court is capable of being made of great value to the inhabitants of the metropolis; it has all the power of the superior courts, with some exceptions, 6481.—The Lord Mayor's Court consists of the recorder trying with a jury. The court being a customary court, of course, though it has power like other courts to alter its practice, it cannot alter the customary proceedings, therefore the corporation itself, unless it were under the charter of Edward III., which gives the power of altering something in the corporation provided the alteration be for the benefit of the public, have no power of altering the proceedings in that court. Originally, and by custom, there were four common pleaders, but by a late arrangement with the only two remaining common pleaders, in which they behaved with great liberality, all difficulty upon the subject of their exclusive privileges has ceased, and the court is now open to all counsel. One great difficulty in the Lord Mayor's Court has been from the customary existence of an exclusive practice in four attorneys, whose interests are vested, and valuable interests, and, therefore, of course, must be fairly considered. Witness here enters into particulars about the attorneys. It has been a great object with the corporation, and since he has had the honour of holding office he has endeavoured to press it on, to come to some arrangement with those gentlemen for throwing the practice open to the general profession. In the meantime an Act of Parliament had passed, admitting all attorneys to practice in the inferior courts. In a case which was argued in the Queen's Bench, of which one of the commissioners is cognizant, it was decided that that Act applied to the Mayor's Court. Whether it was an inferior court or not, speaking generally, it was held to be an inferior court within the meaning of that Act, 6482.—The court is actually thrown open to all attorneys, and in the next month the year will have expired, when the committee is pledged to come to a consideration of the question of compensation. Unhappily there has been a misunderstanding between the attorneys and the committee, and the attorneys were induced to take a step which he thinks has been very unfortunate, both for themselves and for every one else. Mr. Remmell has brought an action against one of the attorneys admitted under the authority of the judgment of the Queen's Bench, for a disturbance in his office. There have been 131 attorneys admitted, and had it not been for that action has reason to know that a great many more would have been placed upon the roll formed for the conduct of the court. The consequence of all this has been very injurious. Respecting the power of the corporation to admit all attorneys, provided they compensate those who have existing rights, there might be doubts, but there would be no one interested in disputing that power. The only question before the Court of Queen's Bench is, whether the Act of Parliament, which enables all attorneys to practice in every inferior court, applies to the Mayor's Court of London. If it does, not only the Court of Aldermen have the power, but they are bound by general law to admit those persons. Acting upon that, foreign attorneys have been admitted; the result of the change has been that business has greatly increased, 6484.—The jurisdiction is confined to causes of action arising within the City; that in some cases is inconvenient, 6485.—The principal peculiar custom of the court is that of foreign attachment; it is a custom peculiar to the City of London, and one or two other cities,

Believes, from experience, that it is a very valuable custom, 6486.—It would be a very valuable custom to extend to all commercial communities, 6487.—Knows of no injurious effects it could produce in country districts, 6488.—Cannot see why it should be a good custom in Lombard Street and not in the Strand; that is the mode in which it should be dealt with, 6489.—There is nothing at present which remarkably distinguishes the City of London from other parts of the metropolis, with this exception, that within the City there are more bankers. One principal use of the custom has been to attach balances in the banker's hands. When a debtor leaves the country, then, if he has a balance in his banker's hand, and his creditor finds that out, the creditor waylays the banker as he comes into the City; he serves an attachment upon him, and gets his debt paid, though the debtor may be in the East Indies or America. There are certain objections to this custom, which witness thinks deserve great consideration. At present they are liable to a certiorari from the superior courts at any moment. That is the case both with actions, suits in equity, and attachments. Some limit upon that right would be very desirable. There is a difficulty about the attachment of goods. States difficulty, 6490.—Goods may be released by putting in bail, that is, the attachment may be dissolved by the defendant putting in bail, because the whole proceeding purports to be for the purpose of compelling appearance. The fiction is, that the defendant being summoned, and not answering after four proclamations, the attachment issues, 6491.—At present bail is put in to double the value in goods as well as in money. The plaintiff swears to his debt or to the value of the goods, and till lately, the defendant could only come in to defend the action, in the first instance, upon putting in bail for double the sworn value, either of the debt or of the goods. This was much complained of. The new rule established is this: "An attachment may be dissolved by bail, or by payment of money into court with the defendant's consent, when the sum in the garnisher's hands is larger than the debt sworn to by the plaintiff, by paying the amount of the plaintiff's debt so sworn to, or when the money in the garnisher's hands is less than the amount sworn to as the plaintiff's debt, then such sum as the court may direct." Of course the court would not direct any larger sum to be paid in than that which appeared to be in the garnisher's hands, 6492.—Has considered the question, whether it is consistent with the custom, and hopes it is so. By this rule they may either give bail as they used to do, or pay into court either the whole amount claimed, if there is sufficient in the garnisher's hands, or such amount as the court may authorize, if the amount in the garnisher's hands is less than that which is sworn to by the plaintiff, 6493.—If the attachment merely stood as a security, the defendant putting in common bail, that would put the plaintiff in peril of the possible insolvency of the garnisher, whereas if the plaintiff were obliged to put in bail, or the garnishee were obliged to bring into court the amount of the property attached, there would be greater security to the plaintiff, 6494.—The introduction of a greater number of attorneys to practice in the Lord Mayor's Court, who probably may not be acquainted with proceedings under foreign attachments and the custom of the City, and who are not under the control of the corporation, as the four attorneys in some measure were, may lead to collusions and frauds and difficulties, unless some greater authority is given by Parliament to prevent it. Another point upon this subject, which is of very great importance, if foreign attachment is to be retained. At present, by the custom, there are no costs in foreign attachment. Another imperfection in the proceedings of the court, both in actions and in attachment, is that there is no appeal, 6495.—Would have a motion for a right for moving for a new trial in all cases, but not before the recorder alone, either in the superior courts of Westminster, or in the cases adverted to, before the recorder, the common serjeant, or the judge of the sheriff's court. Then, with regard to the jurisdiction of the court, thinks it would be desirable to limit the power of removing causes to causes above 50*l.*, which is the limit in the County Court Act. At present any small cause may be removed at a moment's notice to the superior courts by a certiorari or habeas corpus, 6496.—Practically it is a matter of course that a certiorari issues; but there might be some discretion exercised upon that subject, because a certiorari is not a writ of right like a habeas corpus, but in practice it issues as a matter of course. It issues out of the common law courts in cases of actions, and out of chancery in cases of suits in equity. The Commission is aware that this court has, besides its law jurisdiction, a perfect equity jurisdiction in matters arising within the City, concurrent with the equity jurisdiction of the highest courts, 6497.—That equity jurisdiction is not often exercised; there are not above five or six equity suits in a year, 6498.—There is no appeal in such cases; at least there is no instance of it. Should suggest therefore that if anything is done by Parliament upon that subject, they should provide against causes under 50*l.* being removed. If the court is maintained, some regulation also might be provided for preventing suits in equity being removed, at all events in small cases. There may be money attached in London, and if the defendant comes in after the verdict in the attachment, and it turns out that the contract upon which the debt arises took place out of the City, the whole of the proceedings are set aside. There is another matter, which is that the court, if it is to continue, requires additional power of amendment. Also wishes to call attention to distribution. On a freeman dying, half his property goes to the widow if there are no children, and one-third to the widow if there are children. Under the statute of distributions the widow has but one-third in all cases. That sometimes leads to great difficulty and doubt. There is another custom which witness thinks is of value, which is the custom that enables a femme covert to be a sole trader, 6499.—That is often enforced; she cannot make a bill of exchange, nor can she bind herself by bond; the reason applying to the bill of exchange being in all probability, that the bill of exchange is of modern origin, and therefore the custom could hardly apply to that, 6500.—Thinks the custom is not confined to the retail trade. There is another custom, which is of some value, that all shops within the City are market overt. In the case of the sale of stolen property, for instance, the party who buys is protected, except in cases in which he is liable under the provision of statutes which make it necessary to surrender property under some circumstances. There is also a customary law of apprentices, which is administered by the chamberlain, cases under which have sometimes come to the Mayor's Court. Is of opinion that, with certain regulations and amendments, this court is one to which the citizens have been in the habit of resorting, and which they value as a court regularly sitting every month within their own limits, and whose proceedings are less expensive and cumbrous than those of the superior courts of Westminster, 6501.—Thinks the practice of taking fees from the public for admittance in the court at the Old Bailey very objectionable, but according to regulations of long standing a fee was taken for admission to all the galleries of the court, and had for a great length of time been divided between the lord mayor, the sheriffs, and some one else; in point of fact, however, going to the under-sheriff, 6502.—It is alleged that the authorized fee is a fixed fee. It is, however, objectionable, and more especially so now, for there is in the rest of the court no room for the public at all, though nominally open to the public, 6503.

WORTLEY, the Right Hon. JAMES ARCHIBALD STUART, M.P. (Fourth Examination.)—With reference to the Irish Society the Commissioners have heard that there have been from time to time complaints made with regard to the 1,500 acres. Finds that an application was made to the corporation in the year 1834, and a threat made at that time of a petition to the House of Commons. Whether that petition was ever presented, does not know, but believes no committee was appointed, and no inquiry took place; but at that time finds a statement was drawn up in two columns, in one of which appeared the substantive petition and in the other appeared the answer. (The same was handed in.) In 1837 came the municipal inquiry, and subsequently the Municipal Reform Bills of the two kingdoms, which interferred with further proceedings about this matter. It was not till 1847 that the corporation of Derry came again with complaints to the corporation. They then presented the petition to the common council. The statement they made on that occasion in reference to the 1,500 acres is this: that in the year 1704, after the passing of that Act of Parliament which settled everything between the Irish Society and the bishop, those lands passed into the possession of the Irish Society; and from some reason or other the corporation of Derry were obliged to acquiesce at that time, and they have since received 90*l.* 10*s.* per annum from the society. When this petition was presented to the common council the petitioners thought that body had the power of rendering them redress. Nothing can be more conclusive to show how distinct the Irish Society is from the corporation than the course of proceeding which then took place. The petition was presented on the 25th of February 1847. The usual motion was immediately carried upon its presentation, that the petition be printed, and a copy sent to every member of this court, and that the petition be referred to the City solicitor, to advise with counsel as to the proper course to be pursued. Then on the 12th of April, that having been done, it was again taken into consideration by the Court of Common Council; and then it was "Resolved, that a committee be appointed to investigate the allegations and matters contained in the petition of the corporation of Londonderry respecting the Irish Society, and to report thereon to this court. Committee appointed accordingly." Then there are the names of the committee, beginning with the lord mayor and four aldermen; the committee consisting of the principal gentlemen belonging to the corporation. Then in the usual course the committee made their report to the common council of what had happened. It is a long report; but the effect of it is this: that they met and communicated with the Irish Society, and informed them of the petition which had been received; that the Irish society thereupon met—that they resolved to attend the committee by a deputation, attended also by counsel, to meet the complaints which were made on the part of the City of Londonderry. The committee met with the expectation that the corporation of Derry would come represented by the mayor and others to attend that committee. However, when the corporation were ready, or the committee were so prepared to receive them, they received a letter from Derry of the date 6th May 1847, to the effect that, having been advised by Mr. Turner, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Lloyd, that the corporation of London had not the power to rectify the subject matters of the petition, it would therefore be unnecessarily wasting the time of the Court of Common Council to attend them. Brings this before the Commission, first, to show that there was every disposition on the part of the corporation of London to entertain these complaints and investigate them, as well as perfect readiness on the part of the Irish Society to meet them fairly; and also to show that the corporation of Derry were advised, at that time, by the highest authority, that those two bodies are distinct. Though there may exist some visitorial power in the corporation, yet, when the members of the Irish Society are once appointed, the corporation cannot interfere, and cannot regulate their proceedings, 8440.—If the Irish Society were to be guilty of any direct infraction of their charter, there may rest in the judicial body of the corporation some power to rectify such an abuse, but it has never been put in practice, 8441.—Does not think that it affords any practical means of redress for any misconduct on the part of the Irish Society short of some complete breach of trust. Here, though the corporation were willing, and the Irish Society made no objection, the parties themselves were obliged to repudiate the interference of the corporation, because they were advised that it would be futile, 8442.—The governor is elected annually; they might refuse to re-elect him. With the exception of the recorder, who is permanent, the other members are elected to serve for two years, and are re-eligible only after an interval of a year. There have been various occasions on which propositions have been made in the Court of Common Council for an alteration in this constitution, but it has been found to be impossible, owing to the terms of the charter. A gentleman has been, within a few days, elected to the Irish Society. One of the members of the common council thought there was an objection to that gentleman being on the society; and gave notice of a motion to rescind that election. In the capacity of recorder, witness was obliged to advise the lord mayor that this gentleman could not make the motion, because, the common council having already made the election, they could not rescind it; that they were, in point of fact, functi officio, 8443.—This state of things can only be altered by an Act of Parliament, 8444.—Is unable, on account of his numerous other duties, to take any active part in the business of the Irish Society. Has never been specially summoned; has only been present on two occasions, 8445.—Expected they would consult him before any law proceedings were instituted, but has not been consulted at present, 8446.—On the last occasion they took the opinion of the first men in the profession. Will illustrate the position in which the recorder stands with reference to the Irish Society by what took place in the proceedings of 1847. A deputation appeared from Derry several times, and there was a negotiation. The society felt there was a claim for assistance, though no claim for the 1,500 acres. The corporation of Derry were without resources to maintain their courts or improve their town. They were going to Parliament for an Improvement Bill, and required assistance in that way. There was a negotiation by which the society should give them some settlement in lieu of their claim. One object was that there should be a recorder appointed to maintain the custom of foreign attachment which prevails in London and also in Derry. The Irish Society agreed to give them 700*l.* a year for their corporation, and 500*l.* a year towards improving their town. A complaint has been made that the grant is only from year to year, and that it was done only to keep the corporation of Derry in the power of the corporation of London. Mr. Recorder Law was in office on this occasion, but was unfortunately taken ill in the middle of the deliberations. Will read his opinion, as it was sent in writing, addressed to Alderman Wilson. They acted upon the opinion of the recorder and made the following resolution, "That the court will in each year recommend the society to grant the sum of 500*l.* and 700*l.*" Though they were thus advised not to bind themselves beyond two years at most, thinks it would be a gross breach of faith if they did not continue annually to propose that sum and do their best to pay it over. Thinks a more permanent board would be a much better means of carrying on the business of the society, 8447.—Is aware of the decision of Lord Langdale and the House of Lords in the case of the Skinners Company, 8448.—Has no doubt that the twelve companies have no beneficial interest in the income of the Irish Society, 8449.
